"Everyone sends orchids for the cotillion," said Evelyn.

Mrs. Lattimer said, "Now, Kitty, I don't want you to be rude to that man." But her eyes were dancing.

Evelyn could frown at Kitty. "You'd better behave. You don't know how lucky you are to have a date for your first cotillion. The way you act."

"But I don't want to go to my first cotillion," cried Kitty. "I don't want to be the belle of Decatur. I only want to go to New York and get me a job."

Downstairs, the doorbell rang. The door opened and closed. Deep voices murmured, and masculine feet stamped lightly as masculine shoulders came out of overcoats. Estella clumped up the stairs to do her announcing.

"The two dull Bates boys," said Kitty morosely. But Mrs. Lattimer thought, Young men come to take away my daughters.

"The last thing you're going to be is a belle," Evelyn said to her sister. She picked up her wrap and went out of the room.

Kitty lingered. She tried her orchids first on one shoulder and then on the other.

"Hadn't you better hurry?" Mrs. Lattimer said.

"Even an unknown Bates I keep waiting," said Kitty. She leaned over the dressing table and used a lot of Evelyn's perfume. "Do I smell loud enough?"

ILLUSTRATED BY

She lay there thinking of their wedding—of the white satin dress that had been her mother's—and it was like adding a pearl to the chain of memory.

ELLE OF DECATUR. I WANT TO GO TO NEW YORK AND GET ME A JOB."... BUT THAT WAS

Prelude to Happiness

BY LUCIA ALZAMORA

With extreme distaste her mother said, "You smell like a drugstore."

"It's no good unless it's too much," said Kitty absently. Then she came to the point. "Mother, is Evelyn going to marry Harry Bates?"

"I don't know. You children don't confide in me."

"Well, I'll let you know if I find out," said Kitty.

On the stairs, by herself, she was suddenly frightened, and she paused a moment to listen to the voices in the sitting room. She heard Evelyn's, low and sweet, and then a sudden laugh which was much too unconsidered to come out of Harry Bates. That must be Johnnie Bates, she thought, and for the first time it occurred to her not to identify him completely with his brother. Kitty drew a breath, tilted her chin and went into the living room.

She never forgot the first time she saw Johnnie Bates. She had never before come into a room and seen a man and thought, He's for me. He leaned against the mantelpiece in the traditional pose. It was the only traditional thing about him. He was neither tall, nor handsome, nor faintly corpulent like his brother Harry. Instead he was spare and closely knit, and the calm blue eyes of the Bateses were very warm and bright in his dark face. He was so taut with life, with gaiety, with energy as to look strangely alien in that old, serene room. He's as different as I am, she thought. She stood still just inside the doorway and waited.

"Kitty, this is Johnnie Bates," said Evelyn.

The pause mattered. There was the definite beat of seconds while Johnnie Bates straightened and looked and came toward her. "If I had known that you would still be like this," he said, "I'd have sent you all the pink camellias in my mother's garden."

"I like what I have," said Kitty.

"Kitty, here's Harry," Evelyn said.

Kitty smiled with a delicious vagueness. "Hullo, Harry," she said, and never even knew whether he took her outstretched hand, because over her shoulder she was saying to Johnnie, "But you've never seen me before."

"I have," he said. "I'll tell you about it." He took her arm and led her out of the house to the waiting car.

Harry and Evelyn followed them down the walk. "Who would have believed it?" Harry said.

Evelyn laughed. She was pleased. "They suit each other," she said. "Both mad as hatters."

For the rest of her life, that night seemed to Kitty a lovely unreality. She relived it so often that it mingled with her dreams, and in the end she didn't quite know where fact ended and the dream began.

In those days, all over polite Decatur, people gave cocktail parties for groups of friends before a cotillion.

As they went up the steps of the Randalls' big yellow house, Johnnie said, "The other time I saw you you were three years old."

"How old were you?"

"I was seven. I'd gone over to Green-Oaks to play with Evelyn. It was summer and hot."

"You couldn't remember."

"I do," he said.

Evelyn was laughing at them from the doorway. "Come on, you two."

Inside, there was a crowd of people whose faces were out of Kitty's childhood.

"Now try," said Evelyn in her ear. "Some of these men will dance with you at the beginning when you need it."

But Kitty was a triumph. Kitty glowed and smiled and hardly heard a word that was said to her.

"Little Kitty," people said. "Look at little Kitty all grown up. Kitty, where have you kept yourself for so many years?"

A dark-eyed man took both her hands in his and swung them wide apart. "Why, you've grown into a beauty," he said.

She heard that, and she smiled back at him. Suddenly she thought, You're nice. If I hadn't met Johnnie tonight I'd think you were terribly nice. I'd think, "Perhaps I'll fall in love with this

(Continued on Page 87)

There she was, squealing girlishly for Timmee to put her down, and keeping a strangle hold on him to make sure that he wouldn't.

ILLUSTRATED BY MICHAEL

GOLDFISH

By Baird Hall

VALERIE had one of those shining, open, cute faces like a well-scrubbed little boy. The Val Fletcher type of face costs $127,000, from the $5000 for birth through the $2500 last year's tuition at Miss Fosdick's school. The first time I saw Valerie, her mouth was still hanging open and her eyes still had the high-priced mixture of smug assurance and wide expectation. But she was, in fact, a couple of years out of finishing school. And there was a grown-up edge to her sweet loud voice. And she was lying like blazes.

This was on a station platform—Porter Depot, Vermont. She was talking to the tall, gangling boy named Tim who had picked up her skis and suitcases. I happened to know she was lying, so I knew why. She had come to get that Timothy Kyle. I mean, to marry him for his money. You don't expect girls like Valerie to marry for money. Oh, no, you don't. It's an oft-heard crack, but seldom a fact. I stood there on that platform, looking at Val smile on Timothy, and I felt my small, well-built stomach turn over. And I'm no Girl Guide.

How I spotted Valerie Fletcher takes some explaining. In fact, me in Vermont takes a lot of explaining.

"You'll have a swell time, Minks," Mr. Cobb had said. "And it's a swell story. Listen!" Cobb was managing editor of the slick picture book I worked for. I listened. "The point is, old Fletcher has this roaring row with his two children, makes the new will, flops unconscious, can't possibly recover from the stroke, but isn't dead this morning, so nobody knows about the will."

"Nope," I grinned, "not a soul."

Cobb flushed prettily. "Never mind how I know. I mean the newspapers don't. And this farm boy who's going to inherit the dough doesn't. You'll have your first pictures before he suspects a thing. The real stuff, with cows and chickens. You'll keep in touch with me by phone. When Fletcher actually dies, it's my guess the lawyers won't phone or write. They'll send a man to Vermont, on this kind of money. And you'll be right there with the camera."

"Sure. Little Minks, the girl in the manure pile."

That was as near as I came to a crack. But where I grew in Brooklyn the tree didn't, and it had always been all right by me. I knew no yen for green hills far away. And also, now was January, and from what I'd heard of this Vermont place I figured it might snow. I didn't own rubbers, not being the sporting type. I believe I mentioned, however, that Mr. Cobb was managing editor. And he said I'd love it.

So my train pulled out of Grand Central at noon, left civilization (Morrisania) a few minutes later and struck north through the botanical gardens. About dusk I saw we had passed beyond where white man had ever trod. Sometime after dark I changed trains, but it was so shocking cold I didn't take my nose out of my fur piece, which is probably why I didn't see Valerie Fletcher at that station. Mr. Cobb had provided me with illustrated reading matter for the long winter evenings—all about the Fletcher tribe, including the now disinherited offsprings Pearson and Valerie. I had looked at the pictures but skipped the reading, because my job was Timothy Kyle, the farm boy who was going to get Albert Fletcher's money and didn't know it. There was no morgue dope on Farmer Tim. He was just a guy old Fletcher had taken a shine to some summer in Vermont. Storybook stuff all right, if you go for that kind of human interest. I don't—except when I'm sent.

"Porter Depot," bawled the conductor.

I scrambled off the train and shot into the depot. It was a cool evening. The ticket office was empty, but there was a fat man standing near the station stove. "Look," I said. "Can I get a taxi to drive me to Sims River? And is there a good hotel there?"

The fat man didn't smirk or look surprised. He said, "Tim Kyle's meeting somebody on this train. He's from Sims River. He might carry you over."

Tim Kyle! Further data didn't interest me. This was a break and I grabbed open the door again. And Tim and Valerie Fletcher were right there on the platform.

Well-bred girls like Val talk very loud in public, since strangers don't matter. She was saying, "There's no real reason for barging in on you all of a sudden, Tim. But the ski bulletins were swell and—well, I guess I wanted to see you—a little—maybe." She laughed. You know, just a tinkle.

He looked down into her cute face, dazzled all right, but surprised. His surprise was the tip-off. She was giving him more play than usual. She was telling him she had no real reason for coming. No reason worth mention, as, for instance, that Tim was about to get the million or whatever dollars she wasn't going to get.

Right then is when the aforementioned well-built stomach turned over. Sure, I could be wrong. Cobb hadn't said the Fletcher children knew all. But I'd guessed it was from Pearson Fletcher, Valerie's brother, that Cobb himself knew about the will. Anyway, Valerie's being on this first train to Vermont was too neat for coincidence. This plain and fancy deducing went through me while Tim and Val were moving maybe three steps. Quick, that Minks dame.

Then I said, "Help. Help."

They turned back.

"Yes," I nodded, "I said, 'help.' Tim Kyle is meeting somebody on this train. He's from Sims River. He might carry me over or, as the fat man inside there hinted, I might try walking."

Tim looked down on me, not noticeably dazzled. He said, "Going to Sims River? Sure. Got a suitcase?"

Valerie had been gazing at an advertising thermometer on the station wall so as not to notice me. She said, "Twenty-eight below."

"Aw, no!" I gasped.

Tim was still looking me over, still not dazzled. "Guess you haven't got much on from the middle down. Well, the heater'll work the first ten miles."

His old station wagon had all windows gone behind, but there was a curtain rigged at the back of the front seat. The reason the heater worked for a while was because the road went uphill. "Uphill" is understatement. We ground up mile after mile in second gear. Mind you, it was black dark night. And the road got to be one track between snowbanks higher than my window and I sat staring up the path of the headlights. They two talked some, but I just stared. If Ellory Cobb had wanted to get rid of me, why hadn't he simply fired me like a man? My old mother loved me, and now my body would never be found. I stopped believing those headlights were headed for any town. This was the end.

"You ski?" said Valerie.

"No, I bowl," I said. "And shoot a little pool." It was one of those polite lies to make conversation. It was, in fact, the total conversation between Valerie and me during the trip.

"This," Tim said at long last, "is the top of the pass. We won't get heat from here down to the village. Where do we drop you?"

"At the hotel," I said.

Not believing in the town any more, I oughtn't to have been surprised to have him answer that there wasn't any hotel, which he did.

"But the man at the station said ——" Then I remembered the man hadn't, actually. "But somebody must take boarders."

"Well ——" Tim thought a minute. He shook his head. "It's getting on to ten o'clock. Won't be anybody much awake." (Continued on Page 184)

Love came to Minks Randall the hard way — her heart at the end of its rope was just bait for a man who wouldn't even nibble.

A Time of

EMMETT MAGUIRE, hitching Old Clay to the buckboard, was suddenly convinced of folly. He became too sorrowful to slide the thin tail through the crupper, too pensive to buckle a hame strap. He stood in the sallow, early morning light gazing about the farmyard.

Fool, he asked himself, where'll you find anything like this?

Just then, as he renounced it, the whole landscape so altered that he felt that for the first time in his nineteen years he was seeing it truly. All the familiar paraphernalia of the farm seemed suddenly to detach themselves from their background, move nearer him, become luminous and significant.

Amos, the blue-nosed mule, stood out against the sulphur-colored sky like sculpture. Emmett could not take his eyes from him. Here he was leaving; here he had, in fact, moved heaven and earth to get away, and what did he really know of Amos? Here he had consigned himself to dabbling and traveling when he might have stayed home and learned, got to the bottom of mules. Against the morning sky, streaked now like a ripening Baldwin, Amos' head hung more heavy and knowledgeable than the rock of ages. Would there be any wisdom in the next county equal to what Amos had?

In the moment of leave-taking Emmett doubted it. Leaving, what could he expect? Husks and fritterings. Sleep with the swine, too, no doubt at the last. But he felt as bound to move on as the prodigal himself, and for a better reason.

A sign and house painter soon paints himself out in his own neighborhood. All who incline toward paint, and have the money to pay for it, come finally either to the end of the houses and sheds and outhouses needing a new coat or to the end of their money. All who care to have their fences decorated with signs for Hi-John Compelling Powder have them so decorated. Then the painter moves on or puts down his brush.

"Having trouble?" Emmett's father came from behind the buckboard where, with Emmett's mother, he had been stowing away a round leather box of clean collars.

"No trouble," said Emmett, pulling the long switch tail on through. "I was thinking."

He was thinking, If they shed a tear, I'll have to unhitch, unpack, stay forever. But he was mistaken. Had his father laid a hand on the bridle, or his mother clung to him, he would have been off, as determined and set in his leave-taking as he had been in his preparation to go. But the leave-taking was seemly, no tears shed or protestations made. As he drove away the known objects continued to move toward him, become big with the brightness and urgency of the willfully rejected.

His parents saw him depart, untransformed: their dear son, artist and thinker, Emmett. Though those were words they had never been permitted to say to him.

Once, in the barn, his father had come upon a picture of Emmett's painting. He had stared at it a long time. It was a big, empty picture with great reaches of unoccupied cardboard. Except for the front of a house, an expanse of white siding dazzling in sunlight, there was almost nothing in the picture at all: shallow wooden steps ascended to a partially open door; beyond the door on the dark floor boards and deep in shadow lay something crumpled, a piece of goods, a ribbon perhaps, and beyond that a naked, retreating heel.

Emmett's father would have enriched the picture with many more objects: set pots of flowers on the steps, put a window next the door and a face at the window. Still empty and unembellished as the picture was, it had a certain power. He had found himself wondering about it: about that heel, more yellow than pink, about its haste, its alarm. Then he had noticed that there was a shadow across the steps,

"I'll die, this is so wonderful," Emmett thoug

Learning

Emmett Could Paint a Picture, But What Ivy Really Understood Was a Love Song—One Preferably Written in Two Time.

★ ★

By Jessamyn West

at near the house someone, stock-still, stood and watched. Lis-ned, too, perhaps.

But when he had said to Emmett, who came in, found him staring, Son, you're an artist," Emmett had taken the corn knife he had in s hand, and cut the picture to shreds.

"Don't call me that," he told his father. "Never say that. I n't learn. I'm a house-and-sign painter."

He was a house painter or a barn or shed painter, when he could nd houses and barns and sheds to paint; but in Bucklin County he as treading upon the heels of a competitor. Emmett regarded with orn the wash of murky green that marked the man's progress.

Not fit to set to the side of a henhouse, he thought, not good enough r any privy I'd paint. He thanked God for his contract and painted gns.

He had known for some time that he was being watched. That dn't trouble him. It was almost as if the eyes that followed the ovements of his hand gave it added force. It was talk that troubled.

"What's 'Crossing and Un-crossing Powder'?"

"I don't know," Emmett said, painting on.

"Would you make a sign for what you don't know?"

"Yes," said Emmett, "I would."

"I wouldn't."

Emmett said nothing.

"What's 'David the Fearless Floor Wash'?"

Emmett set his brush in the can of linseed oil, turned away from he granite rock on which he was lettering freehand. "What's a kid ho stands asking questions while you're trying to work?" he asked.

The boy was big, but round—round as an apple—and his round lack eyes were swallowing the lettering like quagmires.

"A nuisance," Emmett told him shortly.

"What's the sign for?" the boy asked, as if he hadn't heard.

"Make people buy the stuff."

"How can they buy it if they don't know what it is?"

"You couldn't buy it if you knew. You haven't got any money."

The boy's pants were tight, his pockets taut, his hands fat; still, e managed to squeeze a quarter up to the air.

"All right," said Emmett. "Read that and be quiet." He tossed im the Occult Supplies Catalogue, turned back to his painting.

"'Bat's Blood Oil,'" the boy said, and Emmett could hear him noistly swallowing.

"Shut up," said Emmett, "or I'll take it away from you."

The boy shut up. Except for the swallowing he didn't make nother sound until the sign was finished. The minute Emmett stepped away from the boulder to judge his completed work, he be-gan again.

"Which would you buy," he asked, "Graveyard Dust or Oriental Lover's Powder?"

"Graveyard Dust," said Emmett.

"Not me," said the boy. He pushed his quarter to the surface again. "I'll take three packages Oriental Lover's Powder."

"I don't sell the stuff," Emmett told him. "I just paint the signs. You write them"—he pointed to the catalogue—"to get the powders."

"Have you got a pencil so's I could write it down?" the boy asked.

Emmett tore a sheet from the little notebook he carried, handed it and a pencil to the boy. "What do you figure to do with it?" he asked, watching the boy, who wrote with his tongue as well as his fingers.

The boy looked up, but a sudden film came over his eyes. "None of your business," he said.

"That's right," said Emmett. "It isn't." He took back the pencil and began to collect his gear.

(Continued on Page 194)

look of her, the being here together."

ILLUSTRATED BY ANDREW LOOMIS

WE WANTED A BABY

Small and light as a baby is, the absence of one is the heaviest burden in the heart of marriage.

IN ancient times, when a woman was barren, she burned sacrifices to the gods of fertility and drank weird witches' brews. After two fruitless years of seeking out gynecologists, paying in fat fees what it would have cost to have a baby, stuffing myself with wheat germ, lettuce and hormone pills at fifty cents a swallow, I felt that witchcraft days were not so far behind. A well-known gynecologist has estimated that among his hundreds of sterile-women patients, 22.6 per cent were incurable, 70.4 per cent "relatively" sterile, and 7 per cent showed no cause whatever for their infertility. I, apparently, was in the last category.

When my husband and I first began to wonder why we were not having a child, after a year of marriage, we went together to our family doctor. Without bothering to examine us, he assured us heartily there was nothing wrong and told us to forget about it. Sterility was a complicated business, he said, and specialists cost money.

I did not realize at the time just how complicated it was, or how many dozens of frightened, weeping or desperate sterile women a gynecologist sees daily.

In the past fifty years, women have demanded emancipation from the kitchen and inadvertently freed themselves from the cradle, at what cost in human heartbreak only the involuntarily childless know. Today one in every five married women in the United States has never borne a living child. It is well known that the higher the financial, social and professional status of a couple, the lower their rate of reproduction. It is less well known that since the turn of the century, the fertility of all women in this country has decreased, wife of butcher, banker or farmer. Even the much-touted "baby boom" of '43 and '44 did not reach the proportions of the one during the last war, although, admittedly, childbearing has recently become "recognized" as the most richly satisfying experience in a woman's life, even in Hollywood.

Why are women less able to produce children today than a century ago? Herbert Spencer, writing eighty years ago, before the universal acceptance of birth-control practices, observed "greater frequency of absolute sterility, earlier cessation of childbearing, very frequent inability to suckle infants." He concluded that it was due to women's greater expenditure of energy, particularly the "overtaxing of their brains." Turning to Nature for parallels, he says, "The mother bee goes on laying eggs continuously. . . . She has plenty of food brought to her, is kept warm and goes through no considerable exertion. While, contrariwise, it is to be noted that the infertility of the workers is associated with the ceaseless labor of bringing materials for the combs and building them, as well as the labor of feeding the queen, the larvae and themselves." And, again, "When hens begin to molt, they cease to lay. While they are expending so much (energy) in producing new clothing, they have nothing to expend for producing eggs."

Since Spencer's time, women have gone right on exploding energy in all directions. The emphasis upon education, personality development, social ambition and vocational success, as well as the pressures of a highly restless and competitive mode of life, has, in the opinion of some scientists, affected women's natural capacities to reproduce.

This is by no means an accepted theory in medical circles, but most gynecologists would cautiously agree that too much social pressure and tension is undesirable when one is trying to have a child. For the benefit of those who, like myself, have gone through the agony of frustrated motherhood, my experiences may prove helpful.

I am what is known as a "career girl," a journalist for a large publication. My husband is a lawyer. This immediately puts us in the least fertile segment of the population—the college-bred professional class. I am twenty-seven, my husband twenty-eight, and we have been married about three years.

The first gynecologist I saw, about two years ago, we shall call Doctor A. A famed and busy practitioner, he charged me $15 for a half hour of his time, the longest interview I had with him. After a routine examination, he recommended that my husband and I build up our health, take daily doses of calcium, vitamins A and E, and "eat lots of lettuce." For six months after that, my husband and I solemnly chewed (and hated) turnip and collard greens, kale and dry-as-chalk calcium wafers the size of quarters. Apricots, extremely scarce at the time, were rampant with vitamin A, I discovered. I lugged home five-pound cans from wholesale grocers and we ate them until they ran out of our ears.

Meanwhile, Doctor A leisurely began giving us tests—or, rather, sending us to medical laboratories where we paid separate fees. There are four main factors in sterility: defective germ plasm, defective ovulation, impediment of the passages, and improper "habitat" for implantation. My husband's sperm was microscopically examined and found perfectly normal. For $20 we both had metabolism and blood-count tests which proved we were not anemic, suffering from any hidden infection or serious glandular disorders. The doctor thought perhaps I had better have a Rubin test to see if there were any closure in my tubes—this would be another $30 and a day and a night in the hospital. On the other hand, he saw no sign of pelvic infection, I had never had appendicitis or any abdominal operation. He doubted if the test were really necessary.

After a year of this leisurely and lamentably expensive kind of diagnosis, I switched to another city gynecologist, younger and, I hoped, more progressive. He gave me a Rubin test right in his office in a matter of minutes. The tubes were open, as Doctor A had suspected. Then, for the usual $15 fee, Doctor B did me the favor of taking down all the answers I had previously given to Doctor A. There are literally dozens of factors in a person's health history which affect reproduction, and I was beginning to know them by heart. First, the pituitary, thyroid, ovarian or adrenal glands may be off balance. Therefore it is important to know at what age puberty began, whether the menstrual flow occurs regularly, whether it is excessively severe or scant, and whether any pain or discomfort accompanies it. Next the doctor investigated my health record: gonorrhea, mumps, scarlet fever, typhoid fever, typhus, pneumonia, streptococcus angina and other such acute, highly contagious infections can affect the reproductive glands. A severe case of mumps as a young man rendered Alexander Woollcott sterile the rest of his life, to state one example. Chronic maladies, such as tuberculosis, syphilis, rheumatic fever, malaria, alcoholism, even a persistently infected sinus, can prevent conception. Was I too underweight or overweight? Did I have diabetes? Had I ever had an abortion? Appendicitis?

My health record was exceptionally good. Several vaginal examinations had proved everything normal and in position. What were my marital habits? Did I know my period of ovulation?

I remember learning in a college sociology course, to my considerable surprise, that it takes, on an average, 288 copulations to produce a pregnancy. When you consider that most doctors believe that a woman can become pregnant during only forty-eight hours in a month—some doctors say twenty-four—it is understandable why it sometimes takes so long. This is no excuse, in my opinion, for our family doctor's patting me reassuringly on the hand and saying that one of his patients waited fifteen years for her first child. Or Doctor A, who informed me that some couples, as barren together as Napoleon and Josephine, can each produce children when married to someone else. Both Napoleon and Josephine had low fertility indexes, he explained, and needed a highly fertile mate to conceive. Well, I didn't want to be married to anyone else! And I wasn't going to fold my hands and wait for fifteen years, if I could help it, not when my best childbearing years—from twenty to twenty-five—were already over.

I found myself shuttled into and out of busy doctors' offices so fast that I never had a chance to ask all the things I wanted to know. About this time of ovulation, for instance. So in a spirit of scientific inquiry, I consulted a medical library. I learned that some women feel definite symptoms of this mid-interval, this precious forty-eight hours when the egg is ready for fertilization. These symptoms may include breast ache, spotting, mucous discharge and a pain or tenderness of the lower abdomen. A friend of mine said she could always feel a slight friction in the lower part of one side, as if, she said, one of her hinges needed oiling! I found this description very apt. Generally one feels during this time a physical lassitude, a tendency toward short temper and depression. Hardly the most romantic time to conceive a child! Nature perversely saw to it that the period of greatest desire for a woman, generally just before and during the menses, is, in most cases, her most infertile time.

If a woman counts the first day of her menses as "one," conception is most likely to occur on the ninth to thirteenth day following. That is, if she menstruates every twenty-six days for a period of five days, she should start trying for a child four days after her period ends.

"Nonsense!" sniffed an imposing matriarchal friend of mine, with a stanch Victorian upbringing and five children to her credit. "I could have a child any time I wanted!"

Women with longer cycles ovulate later. If you have a twenty-seven-day cycle, the best days to conceive are the tenth to the fourteenth after the start of the menses. In a twenty-eight-day cycle, days 11 to 15; a thirty-day cycle, days 13 to 17; a thirty-four-day cycle, days 17 to 21. Women have been known to ovulate at any week of their cycle. There are several cases on record of women, sterile for many years, who discovered that they ovulated during their menses, and conceived by having relations during this period.

There is no exact, practical method to tell time of ovulation, unfortunately. However, there is one fairly exact gauge if one has the patience to try it. This is taking the daily body temperature, which reacts to the rhythm of the ovaries as do the tides to the moon. The temperature should be taken with a rectal thermometer before rising, preferably at the same time each morning, and plotted in tenths of degrees on graph paper. Over a period of a month, the temperature "curve" will reveal a trough near the mid-point (ovulation time) and a peak about two days before menstruation. The lowest early mid-interval temperature, including the first sharp rise, is the best time for coitus.

This chart should be kept for a period of about eight months to average one's time of ovulation correctly.

Now we come to another complication. Although a woman may menstruate regularly, she may not be ovulating. Two doctors, Israel and Mazer, found that of 109 regularly menstruating sterile women, 36 showed an absence of ovulation. Or a woman may be producing immature ova. There are many reasons for this, glandular or constitutional. It may be psychological, as well. As Dunbar has said, "A vivid but unsatisfied desire for a child may stimulate the ovaries to pathological growth. It is possible that this may result in premature discharge of the ova which are not yet ready for fertilization." He goes on to say that this may explain the peculiar cases of first conception after fifteen or twenty years of married life. As a woman gradually becomes reconciled to her sterility, this pathological growth ceases and she produces normal, fully matured ova.

Gynecologists have also found a relation between a happy, placid, contented frame of mind and fertility. "Where there is excessive fertility there is sluggishness of mind," found Herbert Spencer. Mentally unbalanced women, paranoiacs and schizophrenes produce few children. Some unhappy women, morbidly depressed by their inability to have a child, adopt one and, in their new-found happiness as a mother, themselves become pregnant.

Writes Dr. Samuel Siegler in his excellent book, Fertility in Women: "Modern civilization has reached the stage where woman, interested in worldliness after years of confined study and competition, forgets her actual role of motherhood and indulges in activities beyond her physical endurance and becomes, by the time she is married, physically worn, weak and tired, relatively incapable of bearing children. The unfortunate members of this class are those who must continue with their work, not because of the esteem which they thereby gain, but because of the present economic demands thrust upon them."

When I read this, I felt indeed "worn, weak and tired." Doctor A told me that he recommended for sterile couples a yachting trip around the world. Very feasible. I was supposed to get all the physical and mental relaxation I could, no excessive alcohol or tobacco, a diet rich in protein, vitamins and minerals, and some physical exercise every day, preferably out-of-doors. In reality, my schedule was something like this: two hours' commuting to and from my job each day, writing copy against a perpetual dead line, ten minutes' fresh air at lunch, home to cook dinner and wash dishes. As servants were impossible to get in our isolated locality, week ends I did heavy cleaning, laundry, cleaned silver, got the week's marketing done and went to a round of cocktail and bridge parties.

I argued with myself that plenty of women kept a home going singlehanded, riveted eight hours a day on some assembly line, and still produced bevies of healthy children. But there wasn't the mental strain involved. I wasn't a husky peasant, but one of the privileged classes who had found her greatest pleasure in "overtaxing her brains."

I considered quitting my job. There was a good chance I still would not become pregnant, and might become more self-absorbed and depressed than ever. The proposal frankly worried my husband. He argued that I had always led an exceedingly energetic life. I needed outside stimulus and excitement to be happy. Quitting would mean a radical reduction in our income. There would be no expensive luncheon and theater trips into town to keep me occupied. Three miles from the nearest store, I wouldn't even have a car—my husband needed ours for his long drive to work.

Meanwhile, I had heard of one doctor's considerable success in sterility cases with some kind of injection—which turned out to be pregnant mare's serum. This serum, which stimulates the ovarian follicles to mature growth, is useful in cases of anovulatory bleeding (menstruation without ovulation). It is fairly expensive, and is sometimes a spectacular success, sometimes a dismal failure. The injections must be taken at a certain time of the month, generally the second week of the cycle, and results appear in months, not days. I waited three months, and nothing happened. I decided, as a kind of desperate compromise, to take a six months' leave of absence from my job.

Once I had reached this decision, I felt lighter and happier than I had in months, although my husband was still skeptical of the results. I began to dream over my desk of the things I would do. First there was the garden—I would start a spring-and-fall perennial bed. I would get out my water colors, neglected for years, and practice on the piano. Maybe I could learn to bake a really superb lemon-meringue pie! Tea every afternoon, I mused ecstatically—no more of that wan, hungry, washed-out four-o'clock feeling.

I was so elated, spinning these daydreams, that at first I could not believe that my most supreme yearning had miraculously come true. A few days before I left my job, I discovered I was pregnant.

The "cure," I suppose, was the pregnant mare's serum. Apparently my pituitary gland was off balance. Endocrine imbalance, however, is reported to be the direct cause of from 20 to 90 per cent of all sterility cases. Why? What has affected women's glands in such a spectacular fashion? Is it perhaps, as some doctors feel, the stresses and strains of modern life taking their toll on the chemistry of the body?

All I know is this: compelled as I have always been to compete—for friends, for beaus, for college scholarships and, finally, professional success—I did not become pregnant until I abruptly ceased being interested in a career and striving. I was tired and fed up; like Robert Frost, I wanted to watch some woods, lovely, dark and deep, fill up with snow. I wanted spiritual quiet and the benison of leisure. Nor have I for an instant regretted my choice. As we lead the quiet "narrow" life of any suburban couple awaiting their first child, my husband and I are closer and happier than ever before.

JOAN STORY WRIGHT wrote poetry when she could barely print. Seventeen, living in Princeton, New Jersey, she will enter college next fall. These sonnets are her first published verse.

Dream of Me Truly

Dream of me truly, love, if you should dream.
  Not in the false night hold me reverently,
Deepening my virtues, making the faults seem Lesser and dear, and by such sophistry
Kindle your longing heart to fresher pain.
  No! I would have you dream in truthful peace;
Still your wild heart. How often have I lain
  Wrapped in nocturnal joys, to have them cease
With the harsh dawn, and leave my dazzled eyes
  Crying—alone—for one more glimpse of you.
I would not have you bear that sad surprise.
  I would not have you live for dreaming too.

So, when your dear dark head lies fast in sleep,
Dream of me truly, lest you wake to weep.

• • •

Love Not Beauty

Love beauty not too much—the damask cheek,
  The soft and fawnlike velvet of the eyes.
Love not the supple limbs, for they are weak;
  Love not the tender smile, for its light dies.
Keep no place in your heart for starry nights
  When crystal snow falls, and each bough is clad
In sparkling raiment; love not fireside lights,
  Their time is fleet; your love may make you sad.
Love not too well this earth life, lest you find
  Its beauty transient and its creatures frail,
For there is no endurance in our kind
  And human hearts are all too swift to fail.

If laughing life means all in all to you
Love not your love—for it may perish too.

• • •

The Cripple

I will await the darkness silently
  And lean against the blackness of the night,
For in this still time I find reverie
  And warmth, and hush which is my heart's delight.
Leave noontide to the lithe-limbed. I will take
  The midnight hours which are to me most sweet,
And of their lovely calmness I will make Bright wings of fancy for my crippled feet.
The flooding waving gusts of cool black air
  Caress my ugly body—hide its shape
From those too curious eyes. Wind fans my hair
  And none are there to whisper and to gape.

The sunshine is too blinding strong a light.
Here in my lonely room I love the night.

PUBLIC LIBRARY

"Rex," she said softly, "I don't want to be a Martha any more."

Guest Husband

EVELYN PRINCE stood with her hat on, one hand holding the telephone receiver, the other brushing a fleck from her lapel. "Many thanks, Agatha," she was saying, "but we can't today. We're just leaving for Palo Alto to see the boys." She listened while Agatha talked on, her eyes moving to the windows to glimpse the weather. It was one of those dim, gray mornings so characteristic of San Francisco. "Yes, you're absolutely right, Agatha. But we go Sundays. Parents' visiting day at the school, you know." She listened again, putting her hand over the mouthpiece and grimacing. "It's only Agatha," she said in a loud whisper to her husband. "And just when we're in a hurry."

Dr. Rex Prince hovered over his wife's desk, looking down at the enormous leather-covered engagement book that lay open upon it. He flicked over the pages, all of them all the way from January up to October filled with the clear, precise handwriting. Suddenly he laughed aloud.

Evelyn glanced at him sharply. "Agatha, Rex is waiting. I'll call you later in the day." She hung up. "What amuses you so much?" she asked her husband.

He continued to flip over the pages of the engagement book at random. "What kind of rat race is this?" he asked her, grinning.

"Would you like me to go to your office and examine your appointment book?" she countered, frowning.

He paused, grew grave as he stared at a page. His wife went quickly to his side.

"It's like reading someone else's mail," she objected. She looked down at the book. Open before him was the page headed July the tenth. It was blank except for an enormous penciled X crossing it off and the one word "Rex" written obliquely in the center. She flushed. "That was the day you came home from England," she said, slapping the book closed. "Sl all we go?"

He surveyed her with that cryptic, blank look that doctors wear when sizing up a new patient. "You gave me a whole day," he said.

Being late served to cover her confusion. They went down the stairs and she disappeared into the kitchen to give tomorrow's orders to Stella while he went for the car.

They moved off along the foggy, Sunday-morning street. She had a feeling of haste around her heart. It always made her irritable to be rushed. If Agatha hadn't phoned and talked so long —— She settled in the car, drawing in deep breaths of the fresh, damp air in a deliberate effort to relax.

"Tell me," her husband said good-naturedly, "do all housewives have a schedule of hours laid out for themselves like that?"

"Like what?"

"Like your calendar. Budgeting your time. Everything scheduled, day by day, hour by hour."

"Your house is very well run," she said, "and you know it."

Indeed, the house was beautifully run. When, after a two-years' absence, Doctor Prince had returned from war, he had found the garden as trim as ever; the roof in good condition; the car running smoothly though it was five years old. Stella was still in the kitchen, though everyone else had lost their servants. There was fresh chintz in the living room, a much improved arrangement of the furniture, a magnificent new lamp in his study, his journals, not one number missing, filed immaculately, all according to date. He had found a new, handsome custom-made dressing gown on his bed, recent portraits of the two boys in their military-academy uniforms on his bed table, a new commodious bed table that had replaced the tiny contraption he had always complained of. And his wife, her black hair swept up now, was shining and sleek as ever, her figure as slender, her clothes as smart, as inevitably hers. Everything for his comfort was anticipated All as usual, only more so.

Three Sundays a month they made this trip to Palo Alto to see the children. On the fourth Sunday the children came to them. While he had been at war the Sunday journeys had not seemed so tedious, Evelyn reflected. But now, sitting idle in the car, a weariness came over her as they entered the highway by the usual street, saw the airport blanketed in a stubborn fog, and behind the airport the bay a muddy eel green.

A LITTLE BIRD WHISPERED EVELYN THAT REX WAS TOO ATTRACTIVE TO LOSE . . . AN ENGLISH SPARROW WHO, ONE SUMMER NIGHT, MIGHT TURN INTO A NIGHTINGALE

★ ★

BY E. WILLIAMS

"Maybe we'll have some sun in Palo Alto," she said, in an attempt to break the wall of silence between them, reflecting, even as she spoke, how ridiculous it was that a woman should use the weather as a topic of conversation with her husband. Ever since his return there had been this strange self-consciousness between them, due perhaps to the fact that they were now living alone without the children. "Are the fogs as bad in England as they say they are?" she asked. There she was speaking of the weather again.

"Yes."

"You're rather difficult to talk to this morning."

"Am I?" He roused himself. "Yes, the London fog is just as they say it is." Then he added, "But so is the beauty of the English countryside. If you have a taste for that kind of country in that kind of weather."

"Did you have a taste for it?" she asked idly.

"Yes." He slowed down before passing a trailer that was carrying a beautiful, blanketed black horse. "That place I described to you—Markham House—old oaks, intimate hills, so green."

"That would be your friend Lady Brigid's place?"

He nodded.

In his letters he had frequently mentioned Lady Brigid, who, it seemed, had worked very hard at the hospital. Evelyn had imagined Lady Brigid as the English dowager so written about in novels, rather eccentric and lonely, residing in a pile of gray stone overrun with ivy. But when Rex had come home he had brought with him some snapshots of himself with Lady Brigid, who, it turned out, was a fairly pretty woman in her early thirties, a Dunkirk widow. In the picture she was wearing low-heeled walking shoes and a sloppy sweater and she stood small and smiling before an imposing stone façade that was the entrance to Markham House.

"I wonder," Evelyn said, thinking aloud, "how a mass of house like that is run. What are the mechanics? I wonder."

"There are stewards—housekeepers, I suppose."

"And Lady Brigid is free to walk among the hedgerows in sweater and tweeds," Evelyn mused. "How nice. I'd like it."

"Oh, no, you wouldn't," he laughed. "You'd be walking among the kitchens and closets. You love your work, dear. You'd miss it."

Evelyn moved her eyes over her husband's profile. She wondered if Lady Brigid might not have had a romantic feeling for her sandy-haired, rather shaggy husband. Indeed, he had a way of wearing a hat. In fact, he had an artful carelessness in his dress that an Englishwoman would undoubtedly find quite English.

In the days immediately preceding his return home, Evelyn had been apprehensive of what changes she might find in him. She had taken great pains that there should be none in her. But war and two years as medical man in a base hospital, two years of very hard work—merely two years of absence in itself could alter anyone greatly. But she found Rex little changed outwardly: a more pronounced graying at the temples, perhaps, and out of his uniform looking less tall than she had remembered; but he had the same attractive, Spencer Tracy look, that rumpled look that so many people, particularly his women patients, found so adorable in him. But there were intangible changes in him: a greater reticence, an almost small-boy shyness about the house. Home-coming was a happy time, yes. But there were awkward moments of self-consciousness, moments when she felt that they were out of alignment.

As for herself, after two years of living alone in a manless house, a husband had a way of seeming like a guest—of being almost, at times, a crowd. Especially in the mornings when one was most occupied.

One morning when he had first returned, he had wandered into the hall, and finding her busy there in the linen closet, he had stood, a quizzical look on his face, watching her count and arrange the linens. Inexplicably, she felt that she had been caught in a most unbecoming role, that he was seeing her as a petty hoarder of possessions.

"This is my job," she said. "Stella can't do everything." She was almost apologetic. "Pretty, isn't it?" she had asked, stepping back and taking an over-all view of the piled sheets and towels and pillowcases, arranged in neat rows and packaged in satin ribbons.

(Continued on Page 217)

If You Ask Me

BY ELEANOR ROOSEVELT

As a delegate to the UNO, will you be guided under any circumstances by your individual judgment of what is right, or under certain possible circumstances by the principle, "My country: may it ever be right; but right or wrong, my country"?

I will, of course, as a delegate to the UNO have to abide by whatever rules are set up within our delegation to govern procedures. Where decisions of policy are made within the delegation, I will try to represent the people. I know, of course, that my feeling of what should be done or of what people want may be wrong, but I would certainly try to work for what I thought represented the major good of the world as a whole. I will try to think at all times of ultimate objectives rather than of the narrower and more immediate aspects of any question that comes up as it affects my own or any other individual country.

I will do this because I believe so firmly that the good of all people in the future must be paramount in order to make it possible for any one of us to live and be free and happy on this globe.

"My country: may it ever be right; but my country, right or wrong" is a very good precept for men in our military services, since they are under the orders of Congress and their Commander-in-Chief and really have very little opportunity to form the policies of the nation. They are practically obligated, once a decision is made, to carry it out. For the rest of us, however, who have an obligation to take part in the forming of policies, I think we should make every possible effort to fight for the things which we believe are right, making it clear to the people why we hold our beliefs, thus creating public opinion. The majority must rule, but minorities sometimes become majorities, and full knowledge for the people is the only way that we, in a democracy, can be truly representative of the will of the people.

What qualifications do you think you have that make you a suitable representative of the U. S. in the United Nations Organization?

Since I did not choose myself as a representative, I shall have to rely on the judgment of other people, and I think your question could more properly be put to them than to me.

Why do so many returning servicemen think that "We'll fight Russia next"?

I do not think the servicemen think so, but there has been so much propaganda in certain newspapers and through other channels on this subject that many servicemen have been fed this idea.

Do you think the atomic bomb should continue to be manufactured, whether by ourselves or by the UNO?

I think the decision should be left to the UNO. It seems to me it might be well for the UNO to manufacture, and hold in reserve, a certain number of bombs; but a single nation should be forbidden to engage in the manufacture of the bombs, and we should set up a supervision and inspection system through the UNO which will prevent any nation from doing so.

Many mothers "give up everything" for their children and are then mortally hurt when children, in maturity, feel that their mothers do not fit, in appearance or social presentability, into their lives. Don't you think there is a kind of "escapist selfishness" in this kind of mother love that tries to live through the accomplishments of their children what they could not or would not achieve themselves?

I think probably a certain amount of selfishness in all mothers is good for children. We should realize that children have to stand on their own feet and we should not give up everything for them. The burdens in a family should be mutually borne and children should learn that they are a part of the community of the family, and I do not believe that any mother does a wise thing for her children when she makes life too easy for them.

CARTOON BY GARRETT PRICE, REPRINTED COURTESY OF COLLIER'S

"Does this have any connection with that story you told me about birds and bees?"

Since a large number of first sex offenses are committed through ignorance or a youthful curiosity, do you feel that more adequate sex education in the home and in the high school might prevent some juvenile delinquency?

I do, but this is a question for parents and teachers and doctors to decide. Some children are prepared at an earlier age than others for this kind of education.

During the war, advertisers sold the public on War Bonds and other appeals. Now they are selling the same public on more and better luxuries. Don't you think the leading advertisers could be enlisted in a campaign to sell the idea of peace and world citizenship?

Yes. I wish they could put on a campaign for world peace and responsible citizenship in our democracy. I think they should not do it on a profit basis, however, but on the basis of their own responsibility as citizens to use their abilities, in part at least, for the good of the country as a whole.

Why doesn't the United States see to it that Palestine is opened to Jewish refugees?

Because the United States alone has no jurisdiction over Palestine, and she is probably not willing to accept full responsibility even if she could obtain full powers to act alone. I doubt very much if the people of this country as a whole would want the United States to undertake this, because it would mean accepting military as well as civilian responsibility.

What did you take to London with you in the way of clothes and, if any, gifts for English friends?

I took a few gifts of things I knew were scarce in Great Britain. In the way of clothes, I took one evening dress, so made that it can be either formal or informal; one silk day dress and one wool day dress and one suit with blouses; a heavy fur coat for the steamer, a fur jacket and a raincoat and galoshes; underclothes, stockings, extra shoes and one pair of evening slippers.

Do you think it a sound principle of justice to try the so-called "war criminals" for acts that were not technically illegal under either German or Japanese or international law at the time they were committed?

Yes, I think it is a sound principle of justice to try people for acts they committed, whether they were technically illegal or not at the time. I realize that this is not the procedure usually adhered to by the courts, but I have always felt that that was one of the unfortunate ways in which justice sometimes miscarries even in domestic issues.

Do you think Congress and the President are making a sharp turn to the right?

I think Congress has always had certain, perhaps the majority of, members who are markedly conservative in both political parties, but there is also always a goodly number of progressives, and those I think are still active. I should not say that President Truman has taken any sharp turn to the conservative outlook.

The Quakers are pleading with the people of the United States to feed Germany. Do you think it is our job?

I think it is our job to feed as many people as we possibly can, but I have already expressed myself quite a number of times on the point that I think this should be done on the basis of giving our Allies everything we have to spare above the bare necessities. They have less resistance left, having been for five years under German domination, and during that period the Germans took for their own use everything they could possibly remove from the Allies. Therefore, the Germans are far better able to withstand a period of restricted diet and hardship.

I have been holding my own in the business world for almost five years, but my mother still does not think it suitable for me to have my own apartment. Do you think I should stay at home obediently?

It depends entirely, I think, on the kind of relationship you want in your home. If you want to carry on a very close family life, it is certainly better for you to live at home. However, if you find that as you have grown older and more independent, it creates friction to live with the family, perhaps it would be better for you to have your own apartment. You might find you could really have a pleasanter and happier relationship with your family by actually living apart. I think every woman, if she does not marry, craves a home of her own, and perhaps you could explain that to your mother.

---

Letters should be addressed to Mrs. Roosevelt, c/o the LADIES' HOME JOURNAL. It should be understood that Mrs. Roosevelt's answers reflect only her own opinions, and are not necessarily the opinions of the Editors of the JOURNAL.

YOU NEED NOT FEAR THE MENOPAUSE

By James Scott, M. D., B. Sc. (Med.)

THE "change of life" in women has taken place as early as seventeen years and as late as ninety-three. Furthermore, at least one woman has become pregnant at seventy-two. This change, then, is an episode that may touch women of any age and be a source of much anxiety.

Yet the change of life is not to be feared. Although the menopause—or climacteric, as doctors call it—should herald a new and fuller existence, its significance is so generally misunderstood that this perfectly normal period is dreaded by most as an era of discomfort, frustration—indeed, the end of useful living.

Since a fearful expectancy of the menopause—entirely unwarranted—can spoil the years of its approach and magnify the severity of symptoms when it arrives, every woman should know the true meaning of this change in her life; and knowing it, have no more fear. She will then anticipate a different but no less happy and comfortable future.

The menopause means what? Very simply, it means that the ovaries, those glands which every month since soon after the first menstruation have produced an egg capable of reproducing another human being, have ceased to function. That is all—but think what a wise provision of Nature it is: if this did not happen, women would bear babies at a time of life when they would be completely incapable of rearing them. How fortunate it is both for the woman and the race that the menopause does come!

When may the menopause be expected? Is it usual to have it early in life, and how often is it prolonged? In this country, most estimates have placed the average age of onset at between forty-seven and forty-eight years. Allowing for small deviations from this, you may assume that your change of life will take place between the years of forty-five and fifty-five. Any marked departure from this average should be an indication for you to consult your physician for a physical examination. Early and late changes are sufficiently unusual that some abnormality may be suspected which requires immediate attention. A cessation of the menstrual function in young women is not usually the menopause, and bleeding after fifty-five is rarely normal menstruation.

It has been said that a woman who menstruated for the first time at an older-than-average age will have an early menopause, and vice versa. Although this is a common observation of doctors, it is not entirely borne out by statistical studies. It certainly is not an accurate enough finding on which to base predictions for individual cases.

How long should it take to be entirely past this part of one's life? Actually, the change of life is not a sudden occurrence, as the word "menopause" suggests. The normal woman has a gradual decline in the function of her ovaries over a period of several years, accompanied by proportional alterations in her tissues. Her menstruation becomes less frequent and finally ceases. Rarely does she menstruate regularly and then dramatically stop. Even after menstruation has ceased her ovaries are still active to some extent, although they are not preparing and releasing eggs. Fertility, therefore, is a thing of the past.

If symptoms such as hot flushes, dizziness and irritability are felt, they may last from a few months to a year or more. An occasional woman may have symptoms for several years, but again she is the exception.

Many women are greatly worried that the menopause may alter their marital relationships. Indeed, for some this is said to be the basis for certain psychic phenomena that are apt to be a part of their symptoms. Medical men insist there is no need for anxiety on this score. The opposite is true more frequently. The removal of the fear of pregnancy in itself sometimes allows an emotional release of which a woman has never before been capable. The ovarian function, of course, decreases, and with this there is some shrinking of the genitals and a reduction in sex drive. But this process is a very slow one and takes place over many years, so that by the time cohabitation is difficult, the principals are of an age when such matters cease to be important to either one. It is true, then, that this part of the married woman's life may be fuller and more complete after the menopause than it has ever been. Doctors will tell you it all depends on how well you are adjusted before the menopause.

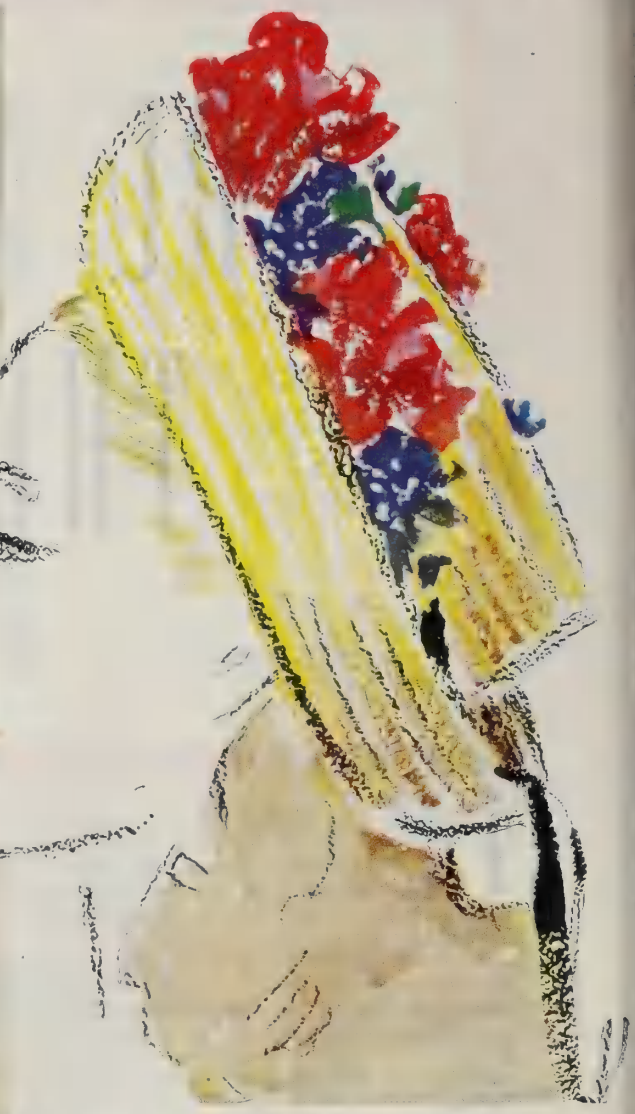
Perhaps you think all women have terrifying symptoms at this time of their lives. This certainly is not true. Researchers who have spent many years studying the menopause and compiling statistics about it have come out with the encouraging information that the majority of women have little or no trouble. If they have any symptoms, these are mild in character and of little inconvenience. So your chance of having real trouble is small. One doctor has said that only 10 per cent of women have difficulty that in any way interferes with their social or domestic life. In another careful study of 1197 patients, 1050 were observed to pass through their climacteric with no symptoms that in any way interfered with a perfectly normal existence. Taking different criteria as a basis for his observation one physician, after carefully recording all the patients who had symptoms of any degree, stated that 75 per cent experienced some signs of their change. It seems, then, you have a 3 to 1 chance of having some discomfort, but the likelihood of having severe symptoms is only 1 in 10.

But what about general health after the menopause? Here again there is no cause for alarm. Thousands of women have better health than they have ever had. The belief that menstruation is necessary to cleanse the blood is nothing more than a superstition. In this all physicians agree. It should be remembered that the menopause is not a disease—it is a normal stage in a woman's life. It is the counterpart of the "justice in fair round belly" of Shakespeare's stages of man. One medical writer has observed that women of innate physical refinement often show greater delicacy of lineament as they approach and pass the menopause.

From a general-health point of view the chief thing to watch is a greater tendency to obesity—the so-called "middle-age spread." Therefore a little care in the diet is in order. The loss of general vitality that may be expected is not a part of the menopause but of old age, the later decades of life. The occasional high blood pressure which you have heard is connected with this stage of your life is said by doctors to be more often than not related to your worry about yourself, or to lack of rest because of symptoms. It is not necessarily organic in nature and usually responds well to treatment. If it does not, it is a part of an underlying organic condition and is not a part of the menopause. Doctors are in agreement about this.

It is obvious, in spite of the certainty that relatively few women have much discomfort at the menopause, that some women do, and many expect they will be of this group. It is gratifying, then, to know that for the 1 in 10 who may have a considerable amount of trouble there is relief in store.

About twenty years ago studies of the internal secretions of the ovaries began that have culminated in efficient methods of treatment. One can now prophesy with confidence that almost every woman can obtain complete relief from her symptoms if she should be numbered among the unfortunate ones.



It has been found that failure of the ovary to supply one particular hormone is the seat of the trouble. This hormone is responsible for the growth of the external and internal genitals, breast development and other typically female characteristics, such as the distinctive fat distribution resulting in feminine curves.

When this hormone is no longer produced in sufficient amount there follows an upset or imbalance in the quantity of other hormones in the body. Secretions from the pituitary gland and the thyroid are among those that are thrown out of balance in relation to the amount required for a normal function. For example, the secretion of the pituitary responsible for the stimulation of the ovary is produced in prodigious amounts to encourage the ovary to function. But the ovary can no longer be stimulated. The result is an enormous excess of this pituitary hormone in the body. The symptoms such as hot flushes, dizziness, nervousness and irritability are all a result of this imbalance, although doctors are not sure of all the reasons why (Continued on Page 190)

HATS ARE YOUNG AND GAY...

INNOCENT BRETON, WIDE-BRIMMED, OFF-THE-BROW—SALLY VICTOR

BRETON, WITH FLOWERS—SALLY VICTOR

PHOTOGRAPHS BY LESLIE GILL

. . . they will remind you of morning sunshine on a country road; of the sharp green smell of new grass after rain; of a crossroads store where you could buy gingham and peppermint. They are the spirit of the country girl come to town—but fastidiously, with every hair in place. The Breton, always beloved, always one of the happiest hats of spring, is the embodiment of the fashion, with a wreath of field flowers around its crown, worn on the back of the head by the very young, straighter on by the somewhat older. The sailor of rough straw with streamers of taffeta ribbon falls naturally into step. The disarming bonnet of gingham or straw, stemming from Early American, is wholly of this day. ★ ★ BY WILHELA CUSHMAN

Fashion Editor of the Journal

DRAWINGS BY REYNALDO LUZA

ARLY AMERICAN STRAW SAILOR—BY JOHN FREDERICS

THE DANDY: COACHMAN HAT—BY MME. REINE

VICTORIAN BONNET, TIED UNDER CHIN—SALLY VICTOR

GINGHAM GIRL: GENE TIERNEY IN SALLY VICTOR'S BLUE BONNET

SAUCY SAILOR, BRETON BRIM, LARGE DAISIES—JOHN FREDERICS

Outline for Beauty... 1946

BY LOUISE PAINE BENJAMIN

Beauty Editor of the Journal

BEAUTY is brimming with soft laughter as well as loveliness this spring. She has become a warm flesh-and-blood woman, with yielding curves and knowing feminine ways. She has a lilt in her voice and a light in her eyes. All because her lover is home again.

Once more it is a solid world, with men in it, and full of their hearty reassuring sounds. Commanding voices, firm footsteps. No more pretending that cool austerity is a preferred way of living, or that a flutter of woman activity fills gray days. Least of all is there need, any longer, to try to fill sturdy boots that have now regained their rightful owners. Beauty relaxes, with a delicious sigh, into irresistible femininity.

★ ★ ★

BEAUTY HAS A TRICK OR TWO:

Woman is never more inventive than in matters of beguilement. We know a lady who twists a snow-white braid in her own raven locks, as a coronet for evening wear. Another who sweeps her hair high and smooth in a puff, except for two engaging curls, which she gilds or silvers with metal powder mixed with hair lacquer! And ever so many dazzling bits of jewelry have flitted from their original resting places at throat or shoulder to twinkle in smoothly coiled chignons. In those same chignons may be concealed a bit of scented cotton. Nice for dancing. Bare shoulders should be perfume-touched. Fragrant hands become even more kissable. Blue-green mascara is giving a lively air to loving eyes. Powder with a pinkish cast maintains a spring-morning look into an electric-lighted evening. It is a season for blush tones—on cheek, finger tips and ear lobes. Pink promise and rosy fulfillment.

Proxaic Postscript: Marvelous three-way treatment, for coiffure-complexion-contour. Brush hair and scalp vigorously with two brushes, one in each hand. Put your heart in your work, lifting the hair to its full length, swinging with one arm, then the other, and covering every inch of scalp. Not only will you acquire polished tresses, but you will lift and tighten your pectoral muscles, thereby improving your female form divine. You will also produce a fine glow in head and face. For extra good measure, your nerves will feel better, especially if you are subject to congestion at the nape.

★ ★ ★

BEAUTY HAS AN EMBRACEABLE WAIST:

Now that waists are reveling in encircling arms again, they should be worthy. Tidily restrained. Not with the artificial squeezed-in look conferred by sternly restricting garments, but as though they had a fetching neatness in their own right.

Waistlines are made: 1, By pulling the torso up out of the hips; 2, By indenting the intervening space. The following exercise affords a simple way of taking both steps:

Divide a pack of cards in two. Place the sections on the floor about a yard apart. Stand, without shoes, about six inches back from the center of an imaginary line drawn between the two packs. Stretch the hands high above the head. Now turn slowly, so that you can swing down and pick up one of the cards in the left pack with your right hand. Knees as unbending as possible. Come up to position. Start over again, reversing the process and turning to the other side. You won't pick up the whole pack the first time, but you may get to it. You may even be able to stand nearer the cards and get more twist. It's that grinding that counts.

★ ★ ★

BEAUTY HAS A COME-HITHER LOOK:

The radiant look that springs from happiness can be fostered by intelligence. Women in love are beautiful. Women with abundant health and vitality have beauty. Who shall say that health and vitality are not the first steps toward romance? Sound health means sound eating. But so great is the magic of food that you may eat for a sturdy body, and at the same time gain a beautiful one. You may choose foods that have special properties for clearing the skin and adding to its color, for brightening the eyes, for strengthening nails and teeth. You may choose foods that steady your nerves or quicken your inner processes. Briefly, you may so plan your diet that your good looks and sense of well-being improve to a point where you have a greater zest for living. A warm appreciation of life is the true basis of a lovable personality. And if you are lovable, you will be loved!

How is this springtime blossoming achieved? It begins with a basic eating plan, which concerns itself with the reinforcement of vitality, with the enrichment of the blood stream and emotions, as well as with calories. A diet with an eye on conquests as well as curves! Food for Romance, we have called it, and we present it on these pages, for your guidance. Food which encourages abounding health, quickens the faculties and rests the nerves inevitably puts a kind of bloom upon a woman. If, with canny care, she will also regulate her eating to control her measurements, she needs no further guide to beauty of form.

Food for Romance

This diet is designed to promote vitality rather than to reduce weight. It is, however, low enough in calorie count so that over a period of time there should be a gradual reduction. For more rapid reducing, cut bread-and-butter allowance in half; use skim milk instead of whole milk, lemon juice instead of salad dressing. If you need to gain, add more milk and cream, double the allotment of bread and butter, and eat extra meals at midmorning and before bedtime. Do not indulge recklessly in rich foods, no matter how underweight you are, as you run the risk of ruining your skin, digestion and disposition. This is a beauty diet.

General instructions: Each day you should include 2 glasses of whole milk, 2 pats of butter and 2 slices of whole-wheat bread. These can be distributed as preferred. Items starred below are to be deducted from this allowance. Drink water freely between meals. Use high seasonings sparingly. No fried food.

BREAKFAST

½ grapefruit (may be varied once or twice weekly with 1 cup strawberries, ½ cantaloupe or 2 medium peaches).
½ cup whole-grain cereal, hot or cold.
2 tablespoons wheat germ. Milk*.
1 teaspoon sugar.
Black coffee (can use part of milk allowance, if desired).

LUNCHEON

(Note that one hot and one cold dish are included. Bread and milk allowance, see above, makes good supplement.)

No. 1

Hot consommé or hot tomato juice, liberally sprinkled with parsley.
Mixed green salad with 1 hard-cooked egg and 1 tablespoon French dressing or lettuce, cottage cheese, green pepper, no dressing.
(Salads can be lavish mixtures: Romaine, endive, escarole, chicory, cucumbers, radishes, spring onions and raw cabbage are all good. And lots of water cress! The dark-green salads and leafy vegetables are especially beauty-making.)

On Alternate Days—No. 2

Large tomato juice with juice of ½ lemon.
Or ½ grapefruit.
2 eggs, boiled or poached.

4 P.M. Hot tea or milk*.

DINNER

Lean meat, fish or poultry, average serving.
Once a week, liver.
Baked or boiled potato, medium size. Eat skin.
Vegetable: Large serving from list below.
Green salad, 1 tablespoon French dressing.
Celery and carrot sticks. Eat celery tops!
Fruit, raw or cooked with minimum of sweetening.
Demitasse.

Approved Vegetable List

| | | |
|---|---|---|
| Asparagus | Cauliflower | Mustard greens |
| Artichokes | Celery | Okra |
| Beans, green or wax | Chard | Onions |
| Beets | Chicory | Romaine |
| Beet tops | Cucumbers | Spinach |
| Broccoli | Dandelion greens | Squash, summer and winter |
| Brussels sprouts | Eggplant | Tomatoes, fresh or canned |
| Cabbage | Endive | Turnips |
| Carrots | Kale | Turnip tops |
| | Kohlrabi | |
| | Leeks | |

PHOTO BY RALPH ORTHOF

DIPLOMATIC SPRING

BY RUTH MARY PACKARD

. . . A SEASON THAT LOOKS IMPARTIALLY ON BOTH SIDES OF EVERY FASHION. IF YOU DON'T LIKE FULL SKIRTS, YOU MAY WEAR SLIM ONES. IF NEUTRAL COLORS DON'T INSPIRE YOU, YOU CAN TURN WITH DELIGHT TO THE BRIGHT SHADES. . . . CHOOSE BETWEEN LONG COATS OR SHORTER ONES; TWEED SUITS OR LIGHTER WOOLENS; TWO-PIECE SHIRTWAIST DRESSES OR FLUTTERY AFTERNOON PRINTS.

PHOTOGRAPHS BY LESLIE GILL

NEWEST SHIRTWAIST fashion—long-sleeved crepe shirt with a soft wool jersey skirt in black or navy blue, designed by Rose Barrack. Skirt or shirt combines easily with other things. Burnt-straw sailor with gay colored quills, by Jeanne Tete.

CAPELET SLEEVE print in a brush-stroke design; a two-piece dress with divinely slim lines to wear for afternoon, luncheon, dinner—from now through midsummer. With Braagaard's

THE BRIGHT COAT in lime color, three-quarter length, goes with black, navy or gray. (Comes also in red and royal blue.) Remove the belt for a flare-back silhouette. Hat by Suzanne Remy.

THE GRAY COAT, by Monte Sano, belted tweed, with softly cuffed sleeves, has a fresh new look and adaptable nature, worn over neutrals or bright colors. Sally Victor's shiny black straw.

SLIM SKIRT suit, all-day fashion in neutral greige tweed; designed by Bruno. Worn with crisp short white piqué gloves and white piqué

FULL SKIRT, slim basque—the very young suit, in lightweight woolen by Maurice Rentner . . . skirt charming to wear separately with white

YOUNG,

PHOTOS BY LESLIE GILL

Mrs. Tierney wears her Adele Simpson beige tweed suit with a sophisticated beret with veil, by Suzanne Remy.

Wonderful, wearable, two-piece fashion by Sidney Wragge: shirtwaist with long soft sleeves, skirt with modified fullness; in navy-and-white polka-dot crepe. Worn by Mrs. Tierney.

There are certain fashions every season so well designed and so wearable that they are right for women of almost any age—twenty-year-olds to grandmothers included. Illustrious example: Gene Tierney Cassini (who has a small daughter) and her mother, Mrs. Belle Taylor Tierney, wear the same polka-dot dress, tweed town suit and faille afternoon suit. Accessories, being less ageless and always more personal, are different in each case. Gene chooses Breton sailors, shortie gloves, cotton bags, bow-neckline blouses. Her mother likes sophisticated feather hats, longer gloves, dark bags. It's the way the fashion is worn that bridges the years, makes it appropriate and individual.

Black faille suit—fashion loved by many women, designed by Nettie Rosenstein. Mrs. Tierney chooses black accessories: faille and feather hat, taffeta gloves.

BUT NOT TOO YOUNG

BY WILHELA CUSHMAN
Fashion Editor of the Journal

Gene Tierney Cassini wears her polka-dot dress the young way—with neckline high, a straw Breton sailor by Sally Victor, short white crocheted gloves, a small boutonniere of daisies.

With box-jacket tweed suit, Gene wears a white piqué bow-neck blouse, piqué gloves, John Frederics' straw Breton

Black faille suit with white accessories: Gene adores John Frederics' big-brimmed off-the-face white straw, white cotton bag and short gloves.

PHOTOS BY LESLIE GILL

Bright color with a white skirt. Cardigan sweater with fitted waist, dolman sleeves, silver buttons. Wear it with tailored spring and summer skirts. To knit. Directions 2237.

Green and white are spring colors. Low square neck, tiny sleeves, tucked inside waistband of full skirt. To knit, 2238.

A SUB-DEB KNITS FOR SPRING

Teen-age sweaters in gay colors, new designs. Young accessories in shell-sprinkled shawls, in spangled caps and bags. Sub-Debs with bright ideas on things to make themselves. A bright red cardigan with silver buttons can be the "big" sweater in your wardrobe—designed to wear with skirts and over tailored dresses. If you tell your best beau you made it yourself, your off-the-shoulder sweater with a pretty evening skirt is sure to be a success! Midriff sweaters are new and looking forward to summer vacations. Select your favorites to knit in the first shades of spring!

BY DAWN CROWELL

(Continued on page 193)

Order patterns by number from Reference Library, LADIES' HOME JOURNAL, Philadelphia 5, Pennsylvania, 5 cents for each pattern.

DESIGNS BY BEATTIE

SKETCHES BY LEE LUNZER

Trim, tailored and flattering. High-necked

Cap sleeves are cool. Sweater with drawstring

Summer in the country—on the beach. Mid

Pastel shawl for cool nights. Crocheted or knitted in loose stitch, trimmed with multicolored sea shells. 2242.

Young and gay for dancing. Off-shoulder sweater in pale blue to wear with evening skirt. To knit. 2243.

Costume: Match the color of your sweater with your skirt; use contrasting stripes at shoulders; pretty with corduroy or cotton. Knitting directions 2244.

Pastel and pretty. Palest blue knitted sweater with a pink stripe; low square neck. Matching yarn around waist; worn with a pastel wool skirt. 2245.

Cap and bag to match (sketch above). To knit. 2246. Photograph: Button-in-the-back knitted sweater to wear over tailored shirts. 2247.

Spring Secrets

IN A SUB-DEB'S WARDROBE

Spring secrets—surprise changes—magic touches—wonder wardrobe! A new suit with a young silhouette that leads a tailored life with its own white accessories and felt bowler, that dresses up for something special with a spring bonnet of straw and flowers. A soft wool dress that hides its own neckline with a spanking-white Quaker collar, and emerges gracefully with a matching belt and gloves for afternoon. A navy topper taken from a sailor's jacket that knows the world of your wardrobe—and gets along with it! Each outfit in a Sub-Deb's wardrobe can have a way of mixing and matching with its own accessories—and a new life with every change! BY DAWN CROWELL ft: Afternoon wool, low round neck, full skirt. Belt and gloves by Arpad. Right: ne dress with a demure change; wide white piqué collar, pleated edge.

PHOTOS BY GEORGE KARGER

Suddenly it's spring! Two-piece wool with piqué collar, cuffs. New "barrel" skirt. Left: Straw bonnet with flowers and ribbons.

CLOTHES DESIGNED BY EMILY WILKENS

Gray wool, tie neck, full skirt. Piqué beret, matching gloves.

ding taffeta, velvet ribbons, white violets.

Out-of-doors. Young navy topper, double-breasted,

Wide, wide starched white collar over tailored

You're More Important Than You Think

BY HARRY EMERSON FOSDICK

MANY people today, when they think of human nature in general, feel cynical, and when they think of themselves in particular, feel futile. The appalling situation of mankind has got them down, and they see little or nothing they, as individuals, can do about it. To be sure, we have won the war, but war always creates problems quite as difficult as those it solves, and of this war certainly that is true. Public attention is focused on the vast, complicated, external factors in the crisis, but deep inside people is another kind of problem: the struggle between cynicism and futility on one side, and faith, courage and morale on the other.

Difficulty can be stimulating, arousing such character and effort as easy days do not call out; but to produce that effect there must be some relevance and proportion between the size of the problem and our own ability and resource. Today, however, global disaster has for many gone far beyond the stimulating point. The scope of it is so vast, the factors determining what will come of it so far beyond our individual control that, facing it, millions feel not stimulation but personal futility and helplessness. Even the young and strong are tempted to such disillusionment—as one of our fighting men said, "After the war I'll give the world one more chance. If it goes on being a mess like this, to hell with it! I'll go listen to good music."

This mood is commonly taken by its victims to be realistic wisdom. They think that at last they are growing wise, seeing into the senselessness of everything and not fooling themselves any more, whereas the real reasons for the mood are much less complimentary.

Often such cynicism is nothing but spoiled idealism. A naturally sensitive, spiritually minded person has dreamed lovely dreams of the world he was going out to live in—and now look at it! This thunderstorm has turned his cream sour. So idealism, when disillusioned, commonly turns into cynicism, but that is the wrong answer. The right answer is really to become wise, seeing that this is a tough world and always has been, and that man's finest faiths and best ideals have never been fragile flowers intended for fair weather, but mountain movers, made for a tough world.

"Faith," as Kirsopp Lake said, "is not belief in spite of evidence, but life in scorn of consequences."

Even more commonly the cynical mood is not so much disillusioned idealism as it is a psychological alibi. The ghastliness of this generation's disaster can easily make a man feel sorry for himself, and when such self-pity goes far enough it says about life as a whole what one of our contemporaries said: "The outstanding fact that cannot be dodged by thoughtful men is the futility of it all." Well, if all life is futile, that lets me out. What can I do? Nothing is worth while. That attitude—the most comprehensive alibi the human mind knows—is common today, and much of our lost faith and morale, far from being the realistic insight we crack it up to be, is that and nothing else—an excuse for quitting—when all the time another attitude is within our reach. As a modern journalist put it: "If a thing can be done, experience and skill can do it. If a thing cannot be done, only faith can do it."

This is no plea for easygoing optimism; there is no ground for that. Nevertheless, if we will have it so, this generation may turn out, in the retrospect of our posterity, to be one of the greatest in history. Victor Hugo reminds us that we now think of the sixteenth century as one of history's main turning points, with the Protestant Reformation and all that, but that Erasmus, who lived then, called it "the excrement of the ages"; that we see in the seventeenth century thrilling discovery and adventure, opening up the whole new world, but that Bossuet, in the thick of it, called it "a bad and trivial age"; that to us the eighteenth century presents a stirring scene of political liberation, with the American and French Revolutions and the like, but that even Rousseau in a discouraged hour described it as "this great rottenness amidst which we live." So in those days the people who really fooled themselves were the cynics, while the men of faith, courage and morale were realistically right.

For many a man, then, losing faith, the first step is to analyze why he is losing it, debunking his high-flown ideas about the wisdom that causes his cynicism, and seeing the honest-to-goodness reasons for it within his own life: disillusioned idealism, retreat to a psychological alibi and failure of realistic insight.

It may help some to take a fresh grip on their courage if they recognize the momentous importance of individual attitudes in our present crisis. In estimating the possibilities of the next decades we know well, when we objectively think about it, that what the common people of Germany, Japan, Russia, Britain, China and the rest are saying to themselves does matter—almost more than anything else. The impotence of individuals is an illusion: mankind is made up of them; all decent social possibilities are rooted in their attitudes; all political organizations to maintain justice and peace depend on their faith and determination; and their breakdown into disillusionment and lost morale is the most menacing danger we face. Every individual who quits is a traitor.

Sir Alfred Zimmern, one of our leading experts on international affairs, walking in the gardens at New College, Oxford, was asked by Basil Mathews, "What, in your opinion, is the greatest obstacle between us and the building of enduring world peace?" and his unhesitating answer was, "The small-scale individual."

Such insistence on the importance of persons is no mere psychological shot in the arm to buck us up. An individual is more than himself—he is himself plus what he stands for. A slender wire can carry a strong current; a small window can let in a lot of light; and an ordinary man can stand for ideas on which the world's salvation depends.

All mankind's major social gains have had some such history as this: An idea gets hold of an individual. Commonly, not a great personality, he is shocked and humbled at the disproportion between himself and the cause he knows he ought to stand for. Nevertheless, he stands for it, and from his contagion other individuals catch his faith, and so the new idea goes out into the world, appealing to persons, one by one, saying, "Believe in me!" When, then, enough individuals believe in it and become its representatives, it overrides all the opposition that man's sin and ignorance can rear against it. Thus all man's intellectual and moral triumphs have been won.

Today some of the greatest ideas mankind ever faced are thus asking for our personal influence. (Continued on Page 122)

Elfine and the Three-Foot Fork

"YOUR face," Candy observed dreamily, "is lopsided." Bill inspected his black tie in a dignified silence. Candy considered him impersonally. "Your nose," she explained, "sort of folds over sideways and your mouth is all funny."

Bill paused with one arm in the sleeve of his dinner coat. "Women," he observed, "are remarkable. What would you do if I turned on you and said, 'Darling, your face is lopsided'?"

"Burst into tears," Candy answered promptly. "But men are different."

"They have to be."

"Anyway, I just meant in the mirror. It's perfectly straight in real life. Haven't you ever noticed how people's faces all sort of slip sideways in a mirror? I mean even people who ——"

Bill said, "You're going to be late."

"I'm all ready."

"Look, angel," Bill said, "your father is the soul of hospitality, and so is your mother, but I'm almost certain they don't expect their daughter to come to dinner in a pink satin girdle and a lace thing—even if it would make the evening brighter for their guests."

"I mean my face is all ready and my nails and hair and everything. It's just my dress—and I hope Mr. Fancher likes it."

Bill ran a hand over his black hair. "He better. Who is this Fancher anyway?"

Candy climbed carefully into her dinner dress. "I keep telling you and telling you, darling. Mr. Fred Fancher is one of the leading citizens of Minneapolis, Minnesota, and president of Fancher's Flawless Flour. And Mrs. Fred Fancher ——"

"You keep telling me about the Fanchers and their Flawless Flour, but why are they here? Why are we so urgently invited to meet them? What's it all about?"

She backed up to him. "Oh, we're just invited to meet them—that's all. Zip me up, will you, darling?"

It was very nice that her dress fastened all the way up the back. In four years of marriage, Candy had discovered the difficulties of evading Bill's eye when it wore that peculiar, probing expression. Not that she made a point of evasion—quite the reverse. But when one is normally inclined to candor, the smallest departure from it assumes large and guilty proportions. And here they were, she and Bill, spending Friday night in town, at her parents' house—and she knew very well why. Candy understood her father perfectly. And Pierce Goodwin, in turn, understood his son-in-law: he knew that uncompromising Scottish pride which could so easily stiffen into obstinacy, and he had never tried to overcome Bill's reluctance to accept favors. He simply conferred them—invisibly.

And so Candy and Bill had been invited to dinner, to help entertain the Fanchers of Minneapolis—and Candy was quite aware that Mr. Fred Fancher was enormously interested in young Bill Stewart, whose work for International Airways had been so outstanding during the war.

Bill sniffed appreciatively, sliding the fastener up to Candy's neck. "You smell good. O. K. if I kiss you?"

"Do," she said cordially. "Only don't put your heart in it, because of my lipsti—— Now it's all over you."

"Is it off?" Bill asked, scrubbing anxiously, as they started downstairs.

Candy examined him. "Not exactly. But it's awfully becoming. It makes your eyes brighter. Mr. Fancher is going to just love you."

Bill made a rude remark, and they walked into the living room. Candy's mother was standing by the small, bright fire, looked charming in pale gray chiffon. Mr. Goodwin was standing beside her, talking to a large gentleman with strong teeth, iron-gray hair and an indefinable air of solid worth.

"Candace, dear," said Mrs. Goodwin, "this is Mr. Fancher. . . . My daughter, Candace Stewart."

☆ ☆ ☆

CANDY THOUGHT:

"SHE'S JUST A LITTLE GIRL

WHO'S BEEN WITH

GROWNUPS FAR TOO LONG."

THREE DAYS PROVED

HOW TRUE THAT WAS.

☆ ☆ ☆

BY ELIZABETH DUNN

Mr. Fancher brought the full force of his smile to bear upon Mrs. Goodwin's daughter, a smile in which admiration combined with indulgent raillery. The phrases, "Little woman," and "Don't know what we'd do without them, bless their hearts," seemed to hang in the air around him. Candy sparkled at him demurely. You always sparkled demurely at the Mr. Fanchers; otherwise they bore an uneasy doubt of your femininity—there might even be a suspicion that you were a little hard. Under her sparkle, Mr. Fancher expanded happily.

"And my son-in-law," murmured Mrs. Goodwin.

Mr. Fancher's expression of doting protectiveness was instantly replaced by one which Candy mentally classified as The Electric Eye. He shook hands with Bill as though he had driven a nail with one decisively male stroke. Bill seemed quite unmoved.

"We're so sorry," said Mrs. Goodwin in the vague voice she used for telling lies, "that Mrs. Fancher couldn't be here."

Mr. Fancher looked solemn. "Too bad," he agreed. "Mrs. Fancher was mighty disappointed—but nothing to what the little girl is." He turned to Candy. "Mrs. Fancher's brother died and she's packing to go back tonight. I can't take care of the kid properly—got a lot of business to do. But the poor kid's heartbroken at leaving—her first visit to New York! This is quite a city you've got here, Mrs. Stewart."

Candy smiled with the flattered modesty of one who has knocked Manhattan together out of a few boards and some piano wire, and said, "How old is your little girl, Mr. Fancher?"

"Just ten." Mr. Fancher beamed. "But as I was telling your parents here, she's skipped two grades in three years—teachers can't keep up with her, I say!" He laughed and Mrs. Goodwin was blown a yard or two across the room. "Smartest kid in Minnesota—and not only smart, but sweet too. Feels too much. If you know what I mean."

"Such a dear age, ten," observed Mrs. Goodwin. "For girls, I mean. Boys always smell so queer—don't you agree, Mr. Fancher? But then it goes away when they're about fourteen. Baths. I suppose it's due to love, but so many towels. . . . Dinner, Cobb? Thank you. Shall we go in, Mr. Fancher?"

At dinner, Candy was seated at Mr. Fancher's right; he turned to her with an inviting and benevolent smile and Candy smiled idiotically back. For a dreadful moment she could think of nothing whatever to say to him. ("What is your street address in Minneapolis, Mr. Fancher? . . . Tell me about your boyhood. . . . Am I right in supposing that Mrs. Fancher has a very large bosom, very small feet and a mink coat?") Then she took a deep breath and clutched at her vanishing wits.

"What is your little girl's name, Mr. Fancher?"

Mr. Fancher's beam increased. "Elfine," he said. "Elfine Marie."

There was a short silence, broken by Bill, who strangled on his soup.

"You fond of children?" Mr. Fancher inquired.

"Oh, yes, I love them! At least," Candy added honestly, "I love most children. I mean I don't think you can love all children, any more than ——"

"Speaking of food," said Mr. Goodwin firmly, "I heard a story today. Friend of mine told it to me—Watson, the neurologist. He says he tells it as a test. The students who guess the answer are invariably the best adjusted people in his classes. Interesting."

"What is it, sir?" Bill inquired.

"Well, it seems there was a scientist," said Mr. Goodwin, "who decided to do some research on the nutrition in heaven and hell."

"What, dear?" Mrs. Goodwin inquired in a high, startled voice.

Mr. Goodwin smiled at her. "You know—to see how well people were fed. So he went down to hell, and there he found that the food was delicious, and there was lots of it, too—and yet everyone was suffering from malnutrition. Emaciated, anemic, all the starvation diseases ——"

"But why, dear? I mean if there was ——"

"Because," said Mr. Goodwin impressively, "because in hell everybody had (Continued on Page 141)

"Bill," said Candy, "you don't mind about Elfine?" Bill made an indeterminate sound and waved his toothbrush.

Sighing impatiently, she put her arms around his neck, bent and kissed him.

"You'll never ask me, Philip. I don't know why. But — will you marry me?"

This Side of Innocence

BY TAYLOR CALDWELL

ILLUSTRATED BY PRUETT CARTER

V

WHEN Philip went to Hilltop for dinner the following evening, he looked swiftly for signs of constraint. He saw that Amalie appeared too controlled, though she was gracious as always, and there was an inimical spark in Jerome's eye whenever he glanced at his wife. But his manner toward Philip was easy and welcoming.

Philip showed them a package he had brought. "A book of Shelley and a volume of some airs from Brahms," he said. "For Mary. I promised the child the Shelley and forgot it." He laughed gently. "But Mary didn't forget. She came after it yesterday."

Amalie smiled uncomfortably. Jerome said, with a smile, "Mary is impatient. She is also very rigorous about promises."

Philip was grateful for this diplomacy. By nature adroit in human relations, he used graceful lies and gentle hypocrisies when necessary to save the sensibilities of others. One of the reasons he had always admired Jerome was that the latter possessed, in a large measure, the ability to lay over the rough sand of threatening irritants the pearly substance of good manners and civilized deportment.

Philip, dismissing the subject of Mary, complimented Amalie on the arrangement of flowers. "You are the perfect hostess, Amalie," he said. "There is never a false note anywhere."

Jerome laughed. "Is this your night for passing out verbal Christmas presents, Philip?"

"No. I am merely expressing my gratitude for the fact that I am permitted to come to this house, and know you and Amalie."

Amalie said impulsively, "And we are grateful that we have you, Philip." She hesitated, looked at Jerome. "That is true, isn't it, love?"

"Yes, indeed, my pet." Jerome was standing near his wife. He touched her cheek. "We couldn't get along without Philip. He is the only man I can talk to in all Riversend. A diplomatic scoundrel, but he has his worth."

They went in to dinner. Philip saw that Amalie had been at her old task of trying to placate Jerome. His favorite dishes were served.

Philip complimented his hostess on their excellence. "Where do you get such beef?" he asked.

Jerome answered, "I buy it from one of the machinists in Munsey's factory. He bought four more acres from me, and he has a cow or two there."

The men then centered their attention on the always absorbing subject of the Riversend Community. The Community had been in full swing, now, for over a year. Industrialists, bankers, philanthropists who were concerned with human welfare had come in troops to Riversend, at first doubtful and suspicious, then amazed. Philip, though now assistant manager at his father's bank, had found time after his hours there to plan the whole project, and to help direct it.

Neat acres of diversified farming, chicken culture and flowers had replaced the grazing land which had been lying fallow for years. After the day's work and on holidays hundreds of workers and their families could be seen on their way to their acres, all with that look of deep satisfaction which comes to those who have something to live for besides their daily toil.

The factory owners had discovered that they rarely lost a good worker; they also had discovered that men took more interest in their tasks, and that they did them well. More and more of them were buying the small, neat houses in which they lived. Many of them actually built the houses themselves.

The Riversend Community was famous all over the industrial East. But the fight was not yet won, and Jerome and Philip knew it. They knew that the struggle for human justice and decency and dignity could never be ended. They talked of this struggle tonight.

"Sometimes I think that you yourself have taken on too much, Philip," said Jerome. "You never have a moment to call your own."

"It is my life," protested Philip. And then was silent. It was not his "life," there in his father's conservative bank with its dull ledgers. He did his work well, and Alfred was grateful and proud. But Philip escaped from the bank as soon as possible.

Alfred's bank was prospering, too, from the Community. Once, when he was sure that Jerome was not about, he had accompanied his son through the Community buildings, and had allowed himself a glimpse of the workers cultivating their land.

"You see, father," Philip had said, "we are preventing the concentration of industry and the complete urbanization of workers, before they can even begin to threaten this area."

"I have always denounced the divorcing of men from the land," Alfred had said. "I am glad to find that others agree with me."

A week later, Alfred had given Philip his personal check for three thousand dollars to help toward the building of a small medical clinic of which Philip had told him. "However," said Alfred stiffly, "I wish the gift to be kept anonymous."

Philip had been poignantly touched, though he accepted the gift with a few casual words. Alfred was grateful for this tact.

AFTER dinner Jerome requested that Philip play for them, and Philip consented with pleasure. A little later he announced that he wished to give his books to Mary. Amalie was about to call the girl, but Philip said:

"Please don't, Amalie. I'll go up to her sitting room, as usual. We like to have our little talks together, as you know. I haven't seen the child for days."

Philip opened the door of Mary's sitting room and said, "May I come in, please?"

Mary was at her desk. She rose at once, faintly smiling. "Oh, Philip." Her young voice was restrained, but calm as always. She indicated a chair for Philip, who sat down. He held his package on his knee. Mary sat down again.

"I've brought the Shelley for you, my dear," he said. "And also some airs of Brahms. A book, signed, it is alleged, by the composer himself. It is in vellum. I bought it in New York a month ago, and it did not arrive until today. When I played the airs over this morning, I decided you must have the book."

He held out the package to her. It was then that he saw the small bruises on her cheek. He went cold with shock. The coldness on his flesh increased, but there was a stern burning in him stronger than mere anger.

The girl sat down, unwrapped the package and examined the contents. She lifted radiant eyes. "Oh, Philip! How kind of you!"

His voice was trembling treacherously, though he tried to steady it. "Not half so kind as you, Mary. It was the kindest thing to visit my aunt and my father yesterday. They wanted me to tell you how much they enjoyed your coming. I believe they quite love you."

A bright color ran over her face. She said simply, "I love them too. I wanted to know them because of you, Philip."

"They want you to come again soon."

Mary bent her head over the books. "I want to, Philip," she said, in a low tone. "But I think it best not to."

There was a little silence. Then Philip murmured, "Your father forbade it?"

Mary nodded, her head still bent.

Philip sighed. "Well, then, I am sorry. He probably knows best."

MARY lifted her head; her eyes were fearless and direct. "I ought to have asked him first. You see, Philip, there were things I didn't know. I didn't know my mother had been married to your father. I didn't know that she had divorced him, and then married papa. If I had given it even just one thought—papa's not wanting me to go down there—I might have considered that he had good reason to forbid me. I seem to have grown up since yesterday."

That young and steady voice became unbearably pathetic to Philip. He said, as if defending her against the cruelty of disillusion, "My dear child!"

"Mamma told me," she went on. "She was very upset. It was thoughtless of me."

Philip drummed his fingers silently on the arm of his chair.

He heard Mary sigh. "How hard it must have been for all of you to leave Hilltop."

"Yes," he answered. He stood up. "You will try to forget all this, Mary? It does not make any difference between you and me?"

She arose too. "How could it, Philip?" She gave him her hand. "You will tell Aunt Dorothea and Uncle Alfred that I send them my love, and that I'll come to see them again, someday, but not just yet?"

"Yes, darling, I will." The poor, poor child. He went down the stairs slowly. In the library he saw Jerome, and again that harsh burning pierced him. But he saw Amalie also, and her anxious pallor. He said, "The child is very pleased with the books. She wants to play the Brahms first thing for you tomorrow, Jerome." (Continued on Page 123)

BLUEPRINT FOR A MEAL

By Ann Batchelder

HOW many a song and story has been sung and told over the roast beef of old England. It is about the only thing the British refrain from boiling. They stop at that. Turned on the monumental spit or roasted in the most up-to-date oven, their superb results come out only a step behind those we know, for no country in the world can deliver the meat to the carver in a more nutritious and succulent sequence than the best in an American kitchen. And let's hope that she hasn't lost the knack during the lush roasting days. For she knows all the tricks of the trade. And of course she couldn't forget.

I took a poll among my friends not long ago as to his and her "most favorite" dish. Roast beef pretty nearly tied with steak, but the roast had a slight edge. And not among the men more than the women either. It's a glorious dish, this roast. Rare in the center for those who like it rare, and brown and delicately crisp on the outer edges for the well-done school of thought. Personally, I go for medium, if you know what I mean. And that is the stage of doneness that my poll declared the winner.

Choosing your roast. This is a serious business. Go to it with that eye for quality you use when you pick out a fine diamond. Get at least a three-rib roast, for a too small roast is about as satisfactory as a watch that stops at half past eight and stays there. Twice a day it gets to be eight-thirty and that's all. Of course twice a day the watch is right.

Pick a roast that has a fine layer of fat on it, but not too much. Else you'll have fat in the roaster and little enough of the juices you're counting on for basting and to give you gravy when it's time for gravy to come through. The meat itself better be close-grained and streaked with veins of fat. And it better be red and rosy and beautifully trimmed.

Now to the roasting. Wipe the meat with a damp cloth and season with black pepper only. Leave the salt till the roast is done. Have your oven very hot, say around 450° to 500° F. Put the meat in an open roaster, fat side up, and sear it a few minutes. Some folks don't hold with this, but I'm telling you how I do it, and if you have what you think is a better way, that'll be new wise. After the roast is seared, turn down the heat to 350° F. and begin to baste with the juices and fat that have sought the bottom of the roaster. Above everything under the sun, don't put water in the roaster. That is, unless you want to ruin everything.

How much and how long. Well I might as well set it down, in case you are at the visiting will. If you want your roast rare, allow about eighteen to twenty

(Continued on Page 100)

Menu
Mushroom Consommé
Rib Roast of Beef
Franconia Potatoes
Yorkshire Pudding
Condiments Relishes
Lima Beans
Scalloped Tomatoes
Rolls
Green Salad
Upside-Down Cake
Foamy Sauce
PHOTO BY STUART-FOWLER

LINE A DAY By ANN BATCHELDER

1 Planning your herb gardens? BIBLE PLANTS FOR AMERICAN GARDENS, by Eleanor King, is a treasure house of Biblical lore. And its fascination is as perennial as the plants it tells about.

2 Split zucchini lengthwise. Scoop out the centers. Bake for a few minutes, fill with crisp sausages and put the halves together. Bake until tender.

3 Make up a receipt of Yorkshire pudding. Put half of it in a hot baking pan with beef drippings, spread with chopped beef, well seasoned as for meat balls, cover with the other half of the Yorkshire mixture and bake. Cut into squares and serve. Tomato sauce goes all right with this.

4 Afterthought on artichokes: Put two tablespoons salad oil, a clove of garlic and a squirt of lemon in the water when you boil.

5 To make tiny apple turnovers cook good tart apples with sugar, cinnamon and lemon to taste. Cut rich pastry into squares. Fill with sauce. Fold into triangles, pinch edges tightly together and fry in deep fat. Sprinkle with sugar. Serve hot. I said tiny and mean it.

6 Simple perfection in desserts: A variety of preserves and marmalades with assorted cheeses and crackers.

7 Make a very rich baking-powder-biscuit dough. Roll into it about one-fourth cup of finely minced water cress. Use as a crust for meat or chicken pie or as biscuits designed for same.

8 Salad business looks up. Broken pecan meats, shredded cabbage and celery mixed with old-fashioned "boiled" salad dressing is real good.

9 A baked-bean salad, at first glance, isn't much. But—mixed with chopped celery, chives, minced olives and salad dressing, it's another bird entirely.

10 Dept. of Utter Depression: The man who called for beefsteak sauce and mustard on broiled lobster. He was blackballed by even the cakewalkers' club.

11 Over the teacups try discussing little baking-powder biscuits, tender and soft as Belinda's glances and hot as the latest tales of her affairs.

12 Split the little biscuits and butter them liberally. Spread with maple cream, that very spreadable spread; and how they'll melt. Tea-table stuff.

13 Answer to Maybelle: My favorite sandwich is ham and Swiss cheese with Russian dressing on rye bread. 'Tain't stylish at the bridge table, but bridge is not a hungry game. And now you know.

14 Herb note: The herb vinegars are delicate responses to the call for flavor in salad dressings. A dill pickle may be as sour as gratitude, but with baked beans it's as tame as a tabby under the stove.

15 Old-fashioned bread and gravy is not to be sneezed at. But see to it that the gravy is good. No lumps, please.

16 News items: Those little thin minute steaks, frozen as hard as a mahogany four-poster, when cooked are as juicy and tender as the smile of the waitress at the Junction House beanery.

17 I'll let you in on a secret. To cut bacon into thin even slices, chill it in the freezing compartment until firm. Then it's easy.

18 Ever try squeezing an onion? Cut in half, skin and all, and squeeze on lemon reamer. Use juice to flavor meat dishes and such.

19 Remember toasted doughnuts? Split, toast and enjoy with your breakfast coffee. A grand way to rejuvenate a doughnut that has passed its prime.

20 Mashed potatoes are expected around a planked steak. But the unexpected is a purée of chestnuts, and few surprises can equal it.

21 From an old cookbook: "Advt.—Use Cakeoma, ready mixed for all your cakes and puddings. Perfect proportions and it never fails you." What's that about nothing new, etc.? This was circa 1848!

22 Pipe a border of Duchesse potatoes around a shallow casserole. Brown in the oven just a while. In the center arrange poached eggs and fill with creamed lobster. Chop the meat fine. Season well. Serve hot.

23 Should you be looking for something different for that new relish tray, add little gherkins, split halfway down, with a salted nut gone to bed inside. Chopped salted almonds in chicken salad may give you an idea too.

24 Discovery Dept., Fish-Ball File: Fish balls—you remember my receipt?—with tiny slivers of crisp bacon mixed with the fish and potatoes.

25 Creamed tuna fish with peas served in patty shells shows up at Sunday-night supper. Highly recommended by some.

26 Breasts of duck grilled, and served on small planks as filet mignon is done, with sliced stuffed oranges sautéed, is "de luxe." Use up the rest of the bird in hash. Only the breast to the plank.

27 Stuffed celery is an old story. But the plot changes when you stuff it with wild turkey, squab or partridge paste, mixed with a little mayonnaise, a touch of cream and lemon juice. Makes the boys say, "What have we here?"

28 Take half a glass of currant jelly, half a cup of chutney, juice of half a lemon, season with salt and pepper, heat and serve with lamb chops.

29 As cheese is to apple pie, closer than last year's union suit after the second washing, so is salt pork to a chowder—fish, clam or vegetable. "Useless one without the other." (Longfellow.)

30 For a light entree, say when the girls assemble for gin rummy or bridge. Bake a casserole of mushrooms with layers of grated cheese and have a salad—jellied or tossed. Coffee and gingersnaps.

31 March has thirty-one days, and personally that is twenty-nine too many. But April is waiting.

FROZEN UP—BY CURRIER & IVES

Tales of Belinda

"Belinda, Belinda, will you marry me?"
"When I empty my basket of fruit," said she.
"My basket of apples and pears and plums.
I'll marry you when the ripe time comes.
When my basket is empty of fruits," said she.

Now has Belinda gone her way.
Down in the churchyard she lies alone.
And her basket is empty and late is the day.
Heavy the cold and fruitless the stone.

3 ROUND BOWLS ...and 3 square meals

Hefty ...AND HEART-WARMING

Nourishing meat stock, brimming with garden vegetables, good barley and tender pieces of mutton combine to make a soup to warm the cockles of your heart! Have you tried this delicious soup of old Scotland? It's a highland fling of good eating for a hungry family.

Campbell's SCOTCH BROTH

THE DARK WOOD

(Continued from Page 18)

out the lights and crept into her cold bed. How natural now, how right, how comforting, to see her friend enfolded by a man's arm, her body moving as supple as a fish's to the silly music! Could it be that all the moments of Stella's life had marched inexorably toward this evening, on the eve of her journey to Italy? And what was to come afterward, when she had found her young husband's grave among the Italian olives—what then? Miriam caught her breath, thinking, Suppose she goes to pieces, then? In a strange land, alone with the dead?

I'm right, thought Miriam, singling out the dancers as they turned to the rhythm of drums and screaming trumpet. Yes, I'm right. She's walking in her sleep, dancing in her sleep. It's Alec she's dancing with, not Dick. It will always be Alec.

And in this crowded room where Alec had never set foot, Miriam remembered him, suddenly and blindingly she remembered him, the details of his coloring and his figure, the sound of his voice reading aloud from some book he especially liked, the tricks of expression and laughter, the curious Indian walk. She trembled with inexplicable emotion and thrust him quickly from her thoughts. The waiter brought her another drink, and the colored trumpeter sent an appalling blast over the heads of the dancers.

It quivered through Dick's nerves. "We shall miss you," he murmured. "You sure you're going to be all right?"

"Quite sure."

"And if you should want anything, or if things should go wrong, you won't hesitate to cable us? Promise?" Dick urged.

"I promise."

He held her close. "Oh, Stella!"

"No, Dick dear. Really, it's no use."

He knew this—he did not need to be reminded—yet pity in him blazed, inevitably, into something else. A simple man, he did not question his response to a purely sensual pathos. No doubt women would have questioned it, but he was a man, filled with confused remorse for what men's wars do to women. The waste of death was beyond dispute, but what was to be said, what done, about the waste of the living?

He who knows others is clever, but he who knows himself is enlightened.

—LAO TZU: Wisdom of the Chinese, edited by Brian Brown. (Coward-McCann, Inc.)

Meeting Stella a few days after he had got the news of Alec's death, he had taken her in his arms in a wordless embrace, all his brotherhood in tears for her, and for Alec. Later, months later, he embraced her again, muttering, "Why not, Stella? Why not? I can't sleep, thinking about you." But she put him aside with a resolution that surprised him when he reflected on it. "It's no use, Dick. There's nothing left, absolutely nothing. There never will be anything else, for anyone, ever." And so far as Dick knew there had been nothing for anyone else. For two years he had watched her youth fall away piecemeal. Death, which had dealt swiftly with Alec, took its time with Stella, matching her vitality second by second, pulse by pulse.

They danced, and he said, "When you come back, let's all go down to Jarley. You know you ought to do something about the house. Bad for a place to be left unoccupied for so long." He thought of the white house in its meadow above the sea; of the sheep grazing under gnarled black firs. He saw Alec walking up the pasture with his arms full of driftwood for autumn fires. "Better rent the place to strangers if you don't want to live there yourself," he went on, steering her through the crowd. "Don't you agree, Stella?"

"I suppose you're right. I ought to do something about it. Maybe this summer, when I come back from Italy."

The dance ended on a battering of drums, and Dick led her back to the table, where Miriam sat scrutinizing her face in a tiny mirror.

"I'm getting fat," she told them disconsolately. "I am fat—fat and middle-aged."

They laughed. "You look all right to me," said Dick, patting her hand. A faint inward sense of guilt made him outwardly affectionate. "And if it comes to age—what about me?"

"You," she told him, "look every inch the distinguished lawyer. Tall, handsome, darkish gray and fifty-three." She smiled. "Can you remember what any of us used to look like ten years ago?"

They argued about it lightheartedly over their drinks. A spotlight traveled over the darkened room and came to rest for a second on Stella. Ten years ago she was twenty and wore her brown hair tied with a black ribbon; she flushed easily and seemed always on the verge of laughter.

Ten years ago, thought Dick, I was forty-three, and I felt good. . . . Ten years ago, thought Miriam, following the beam of light on its passage round the room, ten years ago I was thirty-six, and there was no war, and we were all rather poor, and it was spring at Jarley, with ice still forming along the beach and the first robins building in the balm of Gilead by Alec's door.

It was after midnight when the Sparrows left Stella at her apartment. When the taxi had carried her friends away she emerged from the dim entry and stood for some minutes on the sidewalk, gazing at the buildings which towered as unsubstantial as combs of honey against the sky. The city breathed gustily, resisting sleep; traffic purred and whined, and from the distant river came the muted bellowing of tugs.

Like many lonely people, Stella had a perverse longing for the open. She walked up the street to Madison Avenue, and back toward Fifth, and then an old terror came upon her, the terror which she had often experienced before she married Alec and which returned after his death, the terror of being watched, of being stealthily followed. Now all her courage demanded of her not to run, not to scream. Quickly she made her way back to her door, through it to the automatic elevator. The bronze grille closed behind her, the cage mounted smoothly to the floor where she lived. She stepped out on her landing, painted a dull blue, her own door and the doors of her neighbors numbered in black.

Opening her door, she reached for the light switch. It evaded her hand, darkness engulfed her, arms enclosed her in a rigid embrace, lips sought hers.

Let me go! shrieked her mind. Let me go, let me go!

She found the switch and light streamed into the empty room where her suitcases stood packed and labeled for their journey. Petals from a vase of dead tulips had drifted onto the rug, a note from her maid stood against the clock on the mantel. Stella picked up the petals one by one and carried them to the fireplace, casting them on the uncharred log. Then she read the note, which said briefly that Anna would be on hand to give her breakfast before she left for the airport.

The clock said one o'clock. I must go to bed, thought Stella, and she put the note back on the mantel, carefully, as if it were something precious giving her hands something to do, giving her mind a focus. I must go to bed. How kind of Anna. How kind people are—Dick and Miriam, Mr. Symes. When I come home this room will look just as it looks now, the books on the piano, the clock on the shelf, the paper frill under the birch log, the silence, the dark door of the bedroom. Dick and Miriam will have sent fresh flowers, the clock will have been wound again, and if it is a fine day pigeons will be moaning on the roof of the building across the way. Everything will be just the same. When I shall have been to three handsome emerald-cut diamonds set with severe beauty in platinum

(Continued on Page 57)

HER RING—

She's Engaged!

Cornelia V. Clapp

charming young daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Kenneth H. Clapp,
"Apple Meadow," Bedford, N. Y. is to be the bride of Lt. (j.g.) James R. Neal, Jr.
of the U.S.M.S.

Cornelia's complexion is soft, clear, white—her eyes blue-violet her hair burnished brown

She's lovely! SHE USES Pond's!

BOOKS FOR SAILORS—At the Seamen's Institute Cornelia helps collect books to send out to the Merchant Marine. A friendly service as important in peacetime as in wartime. Cornelia is also a delightful hostess at a well-known and popular officers' club in New York. It was there she met her lieutenant fiancé.

"When Bob comes home from sea he's going to be a lawyer, and we hope to live in Virginia," Cornelia says.

She has a gracious air of easy perfection—in her charm of manner and her exquisite grooming. And, like so many engaged girls, her complexion is "Pond's-cared-for."

"I'm awfully choosy about using a very good cream," she says, "and Pond's Cold Cream is absolutely perfect for me—so cleansing and soft, and so soothing."

This is how Cornelia uses Pond's . . .

She smooths snowy Pond's Cold Cream generously over face and throat and pats well to soften and release dirt and make-up. Then tissues off.

She rinses with a second coat of Pond's—making quick creamy circles all around her face. Then tissues off again. "I cream my face twice—for extra softness and extra clean-ness," she says.

Use Pond's Cornelia's way every morning, every night, for in-between freshen-ups, too. It's no accident more women use Pond's than any other face cream at any price. Ask for a big luxury-size jar today!

You'll love a big, luxury jar of Pond's!

A FEW OF THE MANY POND'S SOCIETY BEAUTIES

Mrs. Reginald Vanderbilt
Princess Guy de Polignac
Mrs. Alister McCormick
Viscountess Milton
Mrs. Nicholas R. du Pont

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY

Joan Davis PREDICTS:

"2,700,000 babies for 1946"

AND EACH ONE CAN GET A CAKE OF SWAN SOAP FREE!

"Who wouldn't dress up like a baby!" chortles Joanie. "Every baby born in the U.S.A. this year can get a free cake of Swan!"

Lucky 1946 babies will have their precious complexions cared for by Swan—the creamy-gentle, new white floating soap that agrees so perfectly with baby skin!

Swan—pure as fine castiles! Milder than a May breeze! Hospital tests on hundreds of babies proved that "no soap tested—whether castile or floating soap—is milder than Swan!"

How do you get Swan for your baby? Just follow the directions below . . .

HERE'S HOW TO GET FREE SWAN FOR YOUR NEW BABY!

If you have a baby, born any time from Jan. 1st to Dec. 31st, 1946, fill out the coupon below. Or get a Swan Baby Coupon from your grocer. Just mail it in and your baby will receive a regular-size cake of Swan absolutely free! Easy, isn't it?

HERE'S A HAPPY WAY TO SOLVE A SOAP SNARL

Like to know another easy trick? Well, forget your fretting about loads of different soaps—and switch to Swan for every washing job. It's a sudsy dream for complexions, baths, dishes, and laundry. Four swell soaps in one—what a joy! Just fasten onto a cake of Swan and find out!

SWANNY SAYS: "HEY! For twins or triplets born in 1946, Swan has a special welcome gift. Just mail the Baby Coupon."

JOANIE BRINGS YOU SWANDERFUL DOINGS MONDAYS

"Another great idea," says Joanie, "is spinning the old radio dial to CBS every Monday Night." Why?

"Well—err," blushes Joan modestly, "that's where the Joan Davis Show is—if you like Joan Davis! It features Andy Russell, too. In fact, it's not bad!"

(NOTE: Tune in—Joanie's terrific! Andy's a dream!)

PASTE COUPON ON PENNY POST CARD AND MAIL IT IN

Swan, Box 4
New York 8, N. Y.
Dear Sirs:

Please send my baby a cake of Swan Soap absolutely FREE. (Only one free gift to a baby. The baby must be born in the U.S.A. in 1946. Offer ends Dec. 31st, 1946.)

Baby's name _____

Street _____

City _____ State _____

Baby's date of birth _____

Mother's full name _____

Doctor's Name _____

Doctor's address--Street _____

City _____ State _____

(Continued from Page 54)

Italy. Oh, my darling, she whispered, calling by name the presence she had just rebuffed.

II

THE throbbing of the motors seemed part of her own circulation as she sat, next morning, in the clipper that was to take her to Lisbon. She could hear, above the reverberation, the voices of the hostess and the copilot conversing in the rear of the plane. The pilot was already in his cubbyhole forward. Except for the empty seat beside her, the big ship was filled, and Stella learned that the delay in their taking off was due to the nonappearance of her neighbor, evidently a person of importance; and, as she suspected with increasing certainty, none other than Dick Sparrow's friend, Mr. William Symes. He had not been visible at the airport, although Dick—who, with Miriam, had come to see her off—searched everywhere for him. Stella hoped, rather ungratefully, that he would not show up at all, for she was in no mood for conversation with a stranger. It was with relief that she had said good-by to the Sparrows, whose affectionate concern had become oppressive. Now she longed for and dreaded the moment of departure, that wrenching apart of the body from its earth, the quick tightening of flesh and nerve.

The motors throbbed, a breeze flung spears of water against the window, and she could see the airport with its runways glistening in the sun. People strolled on the catwalks or hung on the railings, watching planes arrive and take off. Regrouped by distance, the city wore an antique and shadowy appearance, like tapestry under the cloudless sky. She felt withdrawn from the life of the city and from her friends, like that speck which she first took for a bird, then recognized as a plane melting into the void.

One thing about children so refreshing is their reluctance to go to bed for fear they will miss something worth seeing or hearing.

—EDGAR DEWITT JONES.
Christian Leader.

There was a commotion in the rear and she turned to see the hostess tuck a curl under cap and rearrange her expression to one of cheery welcome. Although Stella had never seen him, she recognized Mr. Symes as he stepped on board, hatless, carrying a brief case and an English overcoat. In a minute he was beside her, smiling and diffident, radiating talcum powder.

"Mrs. Harmon? They gave me the number of your seat. I am William Symes. How nice that we should be sitting together. I hope you don't mind? . . . Miss, I wonder if you'd mind taking my coat."

The pretty hostess took his coat, smiled, and was smiled upon in return. The copilot, on his way to join the chief pilot, also smiled. Everyone seemed affected by the appearance of this benign and florid young man who had kept them waiting for more than twenty minutes beyond the official hour of departure.

"Your safety belt," Symes reminded Stella, and bent forward to assist her. He fastened his own and leaned back. "Whew! I nearly missed the boat this time." And he explained that he had arrived in New York from Washington in the early hours of the morning, and had slept through the ringing of his alarm clock. "So I called the airport from my apartment and told them to hold everything, I'd be there in twenty minutes. Then I went out and waved a ten-dollar bill at a taxicab, and we made it—but only just!"

She saw that the near-catastrophe had merely amused him, that he was not a man to lose his head—or his dignity—over such misadventures. There was always another clipper for Lisbon, and whatever the mission, it would await his pleasure. While they exchanged trivialities Stella tried to recall the conversation of last night, but her mind had been occupied then with thoughts of her journey.

All she could remember now was that Dick Sparrow said he liked Symes, and that Miriam had declared she did not. Stella guessed that as a fellow traveler Symes could be tactfully unobtrusive. Later, so as not to embarrass him by a peremptory show of gratitude, she would thank him for his kindness in getting her accommodations on the plane, and for using his influence—as Dick had intimated he had done—with the officials at the passport office. For the rest, she was not especially curious, merely relieved that he and not some other, crude and garrulous, was to be her traveling companion on the hop to Lisbon.

The noise of the motors settled into a steady orchestration; the plane began to move; walls, water, the broken edges of the sky slipped past, sank, flattened.

Symes loosened his belt a little and carefully crossed his legs. He thought, She's not pretty, and she seems dull. Sparrow didn't warn me about that. He tried to remember just what Sparrow had told him about Mrs. Harmon, but it couldn't have been of any great significance or he would not have forgotten it so easily.

He was disappointed in his traveling companion, for he would have enjoyed talking with and impressing a pretty woman: it would have soothed him, and he needed soothing; the ordeal of the past twenty-four hours had left him with a sense of acute irritation. Washington had been hot, and he loathed heat; the men he was supposed to meet had eluded him, the man he was determined to talk to had remained abysmally drunk.

The story he had told Stella, like many of his stories, was only partly true. Circumlocution was natural to him, and he had become so adept in the art of concealing his personal life from others that there were occasions when he almost succeeded in concealing it from himself. The facts were he had spent the night with Regan Bycroft, and this morning they had quarreled. The reconciliation had taken longer than he intended, and for him to have missed the plane might have resulted in consequences considerably more serious than he liked to think about. However, the reconciliation had been satisfactory, even charming; he had not missed his plane, and the irritation which he felt was nothing more than the gradual subsidence of panic. The discovery that his traveling companion was neither good-looking nor apparently even interesting prolonged the sense of irritation, though no trace of it appeared in his face or manner.

"Look," he said, pointing. "Gorgeous, isn't it?" Gorgeous was a word he had come to regard as vulgar, but it occasionally slipped out, probably from habit.

Stella stared at the receding earth, the broad ribbons of water, and the arched delicacy of the bridges. Then the sea appeared, blue and immaculate, and between herself and the sea floated a few particles of silver, the wheeling gulls.

"I'VE often thought," said Symes, "that to die in the air would, artistically speaking, be preferable to dying anywhere else, and less painful too. Icarus must have been dead before he hit the earth—or was it the sea?"

As he spoke he suddenly remembered what Dick Sparrow had told him about Mrs. Harmon: that she was a widow, going to Italy to visit the grave of her husband who had been killed there during the war. Somewhat embarrassed, he decided to affect ignorance.

Stella said, "I don't think death is artistic. As far as I'm concerned, it is merely the final ignominy."

He reminded her, reprovingly, that the art of the world had been much concerned with the phenomenon of death, and that artists had achieved a vision which often transcended the ignominy.

She shrugged. "Why not paint death—violent death—as being as hideous as possible?"

"You mean, of course, as a lesson against war, or crime. But Goya did that, didn't he? And whom has he persuaded?"

"He persuades me," she replied, and Symes was made to feel that his reference to

"—the princess' dress was as white as this sheet—"

ALWAYS DISTINCTIVE ALWAYS DEPENDABLE

Fieldcrest
SHEETS

and the whiteness of Fieldcrest Sheets is only half the quality story

OF course Fieldcrest Sheets are loved for the snowy whiteness this little girl notices . . . but that's just one of many reasons. For wise women everywhere appreciate, too, the smooth sleeping comfort and remarkable stamina woven into all Fieldcrest sheets. Insist on Fieldcrest . . . more and more of these really white, serviceable sheets are reaching the better stores every day.

DURACALE, the luxurious, long-lasting percale.*
GOLDEN GATE, the heavy, extra-service muslin.*
WEARWELL, the sturdy, budget-wonder muslin.*

MARSHALL FIELD & COMPANY, INC., Manufacturing Division
Makers of Fieldcrest Sheets, Towels, Blankets, Bedspreads · 88 Worth St., New York 13

Your eye

is a sensitive barometer of health. The eye's condition helps the diagnosis not only of its ailments, but often of those in other parts of the body, such as high blood pressure, diabetes, hardening of the arteries. Prolonged headaches or faulty vision mean you should see a competent eye specialist. Common faults like nearsightedness, farsightedness,

and astigmatism can be helped by properly fitted glasses.

Remember—your eyes are good for a lifetime, if they get the care they need!

For further information on eye-health, send for your free copy of Metropolitan's Booklet, 36-J.

Metropolitan Life Insurance Company

(A MUTUAL COMPANY)

Frederick H. Ecker, CHAIRMAN OF THE BOARD

Leroy A. Lincoln, PRESIDENT

1 MADISON AVE., NEW YORK 10, N.Y.

COPYRIGHT 1946—METROPOLITAN LIFE INSURANCE CO.

Goya, like his reference to Icarus, had been somewhat unfortunate. Irritation returned and he decided, petulantly, that had she been pretty the conversation could not have taken this depressing turn, and he would have been spared embarrassment. Stella broke the uneasy pause by turning to him with a rather strained smile. "I want to thank you, Mr. Symes. Dick Sparrow told me of the trouble you went to in order to get me this seat."

He relented. "It was no trouble, just a matter of a telephone call."

"I can't believe that anything is so simple!"

"Well"—he smiled—"I admit there may have been a certain amount of wire pulling. I happened to learn that the airline people had a seat saved for someone who wished to go to Lisbon on a quite trivial errand which could easily wait, so I persuaded them to switch him to another flight, that was all."

Stella felt a shock of surprise and guilt. "Oh, I hate to think that I caused such trouble."

"Nothing to worry about, I give you my word."

She noticed for the first time the peculiar irregular beauty of Symes' face; animation and sullenness seemed continually at odds, and it occurred to her that no one would ever, actually, know what this man was thinking, or where his allegiance or sympathy might lie. She wondered whether this suggestion of something perennially young and volatile was what inspired liking for him in men as solid as Dick Sparrow, while at the same time it antagonized women as intuitive as Miriam.

After a moment's silence she said, "I know that there are still all sorts of difficulties about foreign travel, and Dick told me that you helped iron those out for me too. How can I thank you?"

Well, if she was not pretty she was, at all events, grateful, and Symes relented even further. His blue eyes met hers in a quizzical smile. "Just forget all about it."

"But I can't."

"All right, then. Just promise me you won't mention it around."

His manner was gaily impersonal, but Stella's sense of uneasiness and guilt persisted. This sort of thing, she knew, occurred all the time, all over the world. A mere matter of a word here or a word there, an exchange of favors between friends, and no harm done—that is, no great harm. She speculated on the plight of the stranger whose seat she had inherited, and her heart sank.

Symes watched her with renewed boredom. Not only was she plain, she was positively naïve, and he despised naïve people. He hoped she would not go telling everyone about this little affair. He had exerted himself in her behalf purely out of friendship for Dick Sparrow, who happened to be indispensable to him in a legal capacity; but he had no wish for the details of his generosity to be broadcast. These little gestures were performed behind the scenes, as anyone but a fool would understand. Symes' instinct was to bribe and propitiate, an instinct which had psychological roots in his childhood, which had been an unhappy one. He had developed the instinct to a fine art, and it rarely failed him. When people gave him good advice he suffered from a sense of having been saved in the nick of time from some nameless catastrophe, and out of relief and subconscious guilt he was moved to reward his saviors out of all proportion to the merits of the case—as, this morning, he had given the taxi driver a tip so huge that the man had departed wondering whether the whole thing were not a mistake. Frequently, after one of these extravagant gestures, Symes suffered a complete revulsion of feeling and retreated into miserly asceticism, which lasted until the next time.

Dick Sparrow had said to him, "I strongly advise Mrs. Bycroft against considering a divorce until her husband comes back from Europe. She wouldn't have a prayer! From what I hear, Colonel Bycroft is a hero, and it wouldn't look so good—for her, or for you ——"

★ Checks Perspiration! ALSO Prevents Odor!

the COMPLETE DEODORANT

★ You Get Long-Lasting Protection with Dependable Nonspi ★

NONSPI

35¢ and 60¢ Plus Tax ★ At all cosmetic counters

Dr. Scholl's for FOOT RELIEF

Makes you foot happy at small cost!

Don't suffer needless pain from your feet. Dr. Scholl, the noted foot authority, has formulated and designed a Remedy, Appliance, Arch Support, Pad or Plaster for quickly relieving any common foot trouble. The cost of Dr. Scholl's clinic-tested foot aids is very small. At Drug, Shoe, Dept. Stores and Toiletry Counters.

FALLEN ARCHES
Dr. Scholl's Foot-Eazer and exercise relieve tired, aching feet, foot and leg pains, when due to weak or fallen arches. $3.50 pair.

WEAK ARCHES
Dr. Scholl's Plastic Laminex Arch Supports help quickly relieve painful foot arch weakness. Featherlight, wafer-thin. $6.50 pair.

PAIN HERE?
Dr. Scholl's LuPAD, a soft featherweight cushion, loops over fore part of foot; relieves pains, callouses at ball. Washable. $1.00 pr.

CORNS—SORE TOES
Dr. Scholl's Zino-pads quickly relieve pain and gently remove corns; stop shoe pressure; soothe, cushion. Prevent corns, sore toes and blisters. 25¢ and 35¢ boxes.

CALLOUSES
Dr. Scholl's Zino-pads relieve pain, soothe, ease pressure on sore spot; quickly loosen and remove callouses. 25¢ and 35¢ boxes.

BUNIONS
Dr. Scholl's Zino-pads, special size for bunions, relieve tender and enlarged joints; lift shoe pressure. 25¢ and 35¢ boxes.

HOT, TIRED FEET
Dr. Scholl's Foot Balm quickly relieves, refreshes feverish, tender, sensitive, tired feet, due to exertion or fatigue. 35¢.

FOOT ODOR
Dr. Scholl's Foot Powder soothes, refreshes tender, chafed, hot feet; eases tight shoes; helps dispel offensive foot odor. 35¢.

BUNIONS
Dr. Scholl's Bunion Reducer, of soft rubber, relieves pain from shoe pressure, hides the bulge, helps preserve shape of shoe. 50¢ each. Leather Bunion Protector, 75¢ each.

ATHLETE'S FOOT
Dr. Scholl's Solvex relieves itching feet and toes; kills fungi it contacts; helps heal Athlete's Foot. Liquid, Ointment or Powder, 50¢.

Dr. Scholl's
REMEDIES • PADS • PLASTERS • ARCH SUPPORTS FOR MOST ALL COMMON FOOT TROUBLES

FREE Foot Book, also sample of Dr. Scholl's Zino-pads for Corns. Address Dr. Scholl's, Inc., Chicago, Ill.

Name .....

Address ..... D31

"But you understand," Symes had interrupted hastily, "you understand, Dick, that we don't want Mark Bycroft to bring the suit himself. That is definitely out. For Regan's sake and for her child's sake, she ought to be allowed to bring the suit. Of course I realize it's going to be tough; but after all, they've been separated four years, practically, and the whole thing is on the skids anyway."

Dick nodded. "Maybe, but my advice is, don't consider any action at all until Bycroft comes home. And keep yourself out of the picture as far as you possibly can."

Symes had grasped the point of Dick's argument. He knew that he could not expect to compete with his rival in the eyes of a hero-worshiping society. Justice might be a sentimental fool, but it could be an extremely obstinate one. Regan was not in love with her husband, she was in love with William Symes, but unless the husband proved accommodating he left them no alternative but the ugly one of allowing themselves to be put in the wrong. From that prospect both Regan and her lover shrank in dismay. Regan was ambitious, self-conscious, civic-minded. She had been exceedingly active in civic affairs during the war, and continued to enjoy the role now that peace and its problems had come to the land. She reveled in publicity and admiration, and nourished a corresponding dread of scandal, or even of criticism. Symes shared these feelings. He was touchy on the score of his war record, for he had never been in uniform. Nevertheless, he believed that he had served his country every bit as gloriously, by staying alive in civilian clothing, as the men who had distinguished themselves gaudily in the field. Naturally, this was not something he could easily discuss even with friends, and he had counted heavily on Dick Sparrow's sympathy. Fearful lest the lawyer fall short of anything except perfect understanding, Symes had gone on to declare that rather than provoke a scandal and cause suffering to Regan, to her husband and her son, he would himself renounce his love and step gracefully out of the picture.

Work is afraid of a resolute man.

"I can always get myself sent away somewhere," he explained with a tragic shrug of his handsome shoulders. "Brazil, Peru—anywhere. Anywhere, anything to avoid a mess."

Dick had looked at him in surprise. "What about Mrs. Bycroft? Would she march for this self-abnegation?"

"We realize that it's going to be a tough proposition, no matter what happens."

This conversation had taken place in a small French restaurant called Philippe's, on Third Avenue. The waiters and the floor were dirty, but the food was supposed to be good, and the atmosphere was certainly secluded, which was why Symes had suggested they eat there.

In one of his abrupt excursions into gratitude, guilt and uncertainty, Symes had said, "Dick, I'm so scared of doing the wrong thing, taking a wrong step! What did I ever do for guidance before I knew you?" The outburst amused Dick, but Symes had gone on earnestly: "I wish there was some little thing I could do to show my gratitude."

"I'll be sending you a bill one of these days." But out on the street, later, Dick remembered something and turned to his companion. "On second thought, I wonder whether there isn't a favor you could do me." And he went on to speak of Stella Harmon, of her wish to go to Italy, and of the difficulties and delays in obtaining passports and transportation. Symes replied eagerly that there certainly was something he could do, and that he would attend to the matter immediately, which he did.

Land had disappeared and below them the sea stretched tight and blue from horizon to horizon, a single vessel pinned to its surface. Stella felt the air move under the plane, like

Twice-Rich*

LIBBY'S IS RICH IN FLAVOR . . . RICH IN VITAMINS

The kind of tomatoes you slice to top your salad bowl . . . firm, ruddy-ripe. That's the kind Libby presses to give you tomato juice that's always RICH IN FLAVOR*. It's real sun-ripe tomato flavor, because Libby adds nothing to this wonderful juice but a touch of salt. And Libby experts protect the fresh-from-the-vine juice so carefully that it's RICH IN VITAMINS*. Yes—rich in Vitamins A and C and a ready source of Vitamins $B_1$ and $B_2$. Have this glorious juice for breakfast . . . and as a "starter" for luncheon and dinner. You don't know how good tomato juice can be until you taste Libby's twice-rich kind!

LIBBY, McNEILL & LIBBY
Chicago 9, Ill.

• • • •

Listen to "MY TRUE STORY" every morning, Mon. thru Fri. 10:00 EST, 9:00 CST, 11:30 MST, 10:30 PST, American Broadcasting Company

WHERE FOOD GROWS FINEST...
THERE LIBBY PACKS THE BEST

Libby's

FAMOUS VEGETABLES
Peas • Corn • Mixed Vegetables
Beets • Sauer Kraut • and others

LOOK TO LIBBY'S FOR PERFECTION

waves under a ship; a squall struck them, darkening the interior of the plane, then they were out in the sunlight again, raindrops glittering on the windows.

Symes inquired whether she had friends in Rome, in Florence, and she replied that she knew no one in Italy and that her visit was to be brief. He produced an envelope and scribbled addresses. "These are old friends of mine, and if you should feel like getting in touch with them I know they will be delighted to see you."

She thanked him and put the envelope in her pocketbook. He was really kind, and she felt that she was proving a disappointment to him. To retrieve herself somewhat in his eyes, she begged him to tell her about Italy. "I've never been there. I've never been much of anywhere, actually. It seems queer to think that I shall never see Europe as it used to be before the war."

Although Symes deplored naïveté, humility he regarded as something else again—rather an attractive trait, especially in women. He was quite willing to talk about Italy. "It's a mess, like the rest of Europe. I doubt if you'll find the Italians particularly cordial. Gratitude is not one of their cardinal virtues, and I'm told they dislike Americans almost as much as they do the English and the Russians." He frowned. "But then everyone in Europe dislikes everyone else." He embarked on a long disquisition on the political and economic chaos of Europe since the war ended; of the acceptance, by despairing people everywhere, of a third and more frightful conflict. "They seem to take it for granted. As a matter of fact, I'm inclined to agree with them. Europe is down and out, but Asia is not. And Asia is in our bailiwick. England and America have got to back each other. You've only to take a look at the map to see why. To protect Alaska and the Pacific islands, we've got to hold Japan and the coast of China. To protect Australia, the British have got to hold India. And the Indians and the Chinese and the Japs and the Russians don't want us. There are more of them than there are of us—billions against our millions. Only, we're smarter." His eyes narrowed, she was astonished by the sudden toughness which sharpened his features. "Yes, sir," he repeated slowly, as if he liked the taste of the words—"yes, sir, we're smarter. They better not forget that."

The hostess appeared with lunch on a chromium tray. While they ate, Symes continued his dissertation on the state of the world, reducing everything to carloads, quotas, calories. The only hope of continued peace, he told her, was through centralized control of the warehouses of London, Washington, Moscow; of Cairo, Delhi and Buenos Aires. Orchards must be planted among the cemeteries, wheat amidst the rubble, and all must be protected by the airfields and the omnipotent wings of the strongest, most important of nations, the United States.

Stella looked out the window and saw the sea and the sky meeting in a single radiant arc. What was it Alec had written her in one of his letters from Italy? "Men do not die, they are killed."

III

In the evening they flew above violet clouds between which they glimpsed the gold and level sea. People were talking in Spanish in the seat behind Stella: beside her Symes slept, his dark head touching her shoulder. She gazed from the fabulous tides of sunset to the book which she had brought with her to read on the journey. It still smelled, to her, of Dockett's bookstore. She could see the dusty shelves stretching from floor to ceiling, the long tables stacked with battered volumes, and the figures which moved like characters in a Kafka novel. That had been in the fall of 1935. She had worked at Dockett's for a year, and there seemed no reason to believe that she would not go on working at Dockett's indefinitely, since she was penniless and Dockett's kept her alive, if it did little besides. She had a room in the basement of a house on West 4th Street, and got her meals at a drugstore. When she was not sleeping in her basement room or eating a sandwich at the drugstore, she sat behind a desk at one end of Dockett's basement—she seemed destined to live in basements—and waited on the few customers who came drifting down the stairs in quest of bargains. Spectral silence invested Dockett's basement, where the air was brittle and lifeless and only mice moved with spirit. There were occasions when Stella brooded over the life encased within all these books, on the explorations, adventures, discoveries, glories. What had any of it to do with her—or, indeed, with the shabby dreamers who came to browse, sometimes to buy a volume? Her father had been a teacher and a scholar, but Stella learned to hate the sight of books, seeing them as mockeries of life as she knew it.

She sat at her desk one afternoon, watching the browsers as they fingered stained and creaking tomes. One by one they replaced them and climbed the staircase to the street, and she had a vision of them marching away to their private destinies. No doubt they returned to fathers and mothers, to brothers, sisters or friends, there to quarrel or to make love, or merely to sit together in fraternal warmth. This vision of anonymous feet moving away from her central self affected Stella like a nightmare in which she was left deserted; in desperation she found herself missing her father, whose death from cancer had been a merciful release for them both. It was true she had friends, but poverty and the need to earn a living took time and energy, and she saw little of her friends. I'm almost twenty, she reminded herself, and shivered. Twenty! Young, active, intelligent, she saw her future bounded by the four dingy walls of Dockett's bookstore, and by further adamant walls of uncertainty and fear—the gray fear of perpetual loneliness, of sickness and age as she had watched it, year after year, overwhelm her father so that he had been glad enough to die, and she had been glad for his sake.

She watched a mouse start from its hole and embark on its short and fatal journey toward a mousetrap.

Old Dockett was always setting traps, which she was always springing when his back was turned, for she liked the mice and in her dark moods sometimes identified herself with them. But she had forgotten to spring this trap and now she watched, fascinated, the progress of the mouse.

A book fell and the mouse vanished into its hole.

"I wonder," said Alec, "if you have a copy of Dante's Inferno?" He emerged from behind the stacks, a young man with dark hair and dark eyes, looking as if he spent his life under trees. "I've got to verify a quotation, but of course I'll buy the book."

Stella was staring at the mouse, which had returned, but before she could move to save it the bar of the trap fell with a crushing snap and she saw its eyes, suffused with blood, fixed on her in mute and eternal reproach.

"Perhaps you can verify it for me," said Alec. "Messun maggior dolore, che ricordarsi del tempo felice nella miseria; e ciòsail tuo dottore.' My cousin, Miriam Sparrow, insists it's from the Purgatorio, but I know she's wrong."

"I'm sorry," said Stella, staring at the mouse. "I don't understand Italian."

(Continued on Page 62)

★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

Only for Love

BY GRACE SAYRE

Spend summer's coins of silver
To buy a shining moon,
But never hoard the gold of sun
Unless the sands of time have run;
For gold is only spent for love
And love is gone too soon.

★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

IT'S HERE!

THE CORNED BEEF HASH

WITH THAT "FRESH-MADE" FLAVOR!

...IT'S ARMOUR STAR

Your first taste tells you there's a delicious difference in this corned beef hash! The meat is juicier... far fresher to taste! The potatoes are firmer, whiter! This exciting improvement was made possible through new cooking methods, developed by Armour during the war. Tomorrow, use the menu given here to please your family with a double-quick corned beef hash dinner.

30-Minute Dinner

Baked Armour Star
Corned Beef Hash*
Buttered Green Beans
Tomato and Endive Salad
Broiled Grapefruit

Bake 30 minutes in a 350° F. oven. Serves 3 to 4.*

© ARMOUR AND COMPANY 1946

(Continued from Page 60)

"In English it goes something like this: 'There is no greater pain than to recall a happy time in wretchedness.'" He came and stood before her, his brown hands resting on the desk. "Have you the Inferno? I can easily look it up."

"You may find it in that stack over there by the mouse."

"The mouse?" He turned, following her gaze. "Oh, thanks," She watched him reach down a book, blow the dust off it and turn the pages. "Here it is!" He turned, triumphant. "Canto Five, just as I thought. Miriam's a mule about her literary misconceptions. I'll have to buy the book and hold it under her nose. How much? Eighty-five cents?" He plunged a hand in his pocket and showered the money on the desk, a flight of pennies and nickels.

Slowly she was becoming aware of him, of the vitality in his voice and his eyes. "Thank you," she murmured, picking up the coins penny by penny, nickel by nickel. "Shall I wrap it for you?"

"I'll put it in my pocket."

Now he would go, carrying his find with him, victorious over his Cousin Miriam. They would argue and laugh in the completeness of their lives, in the perfection of their destinies, and she would go on sitting here in Dockett's basement, facing the dead mouse and its red tears, until old Dockett came down the staircase and pounced on it with an exultant "Another one! That'll teach 'em!"

But Alec seemed in no hurry to go. "Would you like to hear the rest of it?" he asked, and without waiting for her answer he perched on the desk and began to read, hesitating a little over the words, translating for her as he went along. Sunlight on the staircase turned the color of rose, of russet, and when he came to the end of the Fifth Canto he closed the book and sat for a moment silently looking at it.

"Poor old Paolo," he sighed at last. "Poor old Francesca!" He got up, and as he walked across the room toward the stairs Stella's gaze followed him in desperation. As if he felt it, he turned and looked back. "Murky down here, isn't it?" he said. "Do you ever come up for air?"

She took refuge in pride. "Sometimes, when I go home."

"Where's home?"

"Round the corner, in another basement." She laughed, biting her lips.

Slowly as she had become aware of him, Alec became aware of her, and as the vision deepened he saw it all: this basement with its mummified tomes and murdered mice, the girl with her bright hair tied with a velvet ribbon; he saw, too, the empty room to which she returned at the day's end, and in which, at night's end, she opened her eyes. He was stirred, as much by pity as by the poem he had just been reading, and as he gazed at her, wondering whether it had stirred her at all, he found himself charmed by her face. Afterward, he told her that he could not have brought himself to climb the stairs until he had made sure that he would see her again.

"Listen," he said. "I'm having dinner with the Sparrows—Dick and Miriam. We may go to a movie afterward, or we may just sit around and talk. Would you like that?"

"I don't know the Sparrows."

"I can fix that."

"But I don't know you!" She laughed, her face suddenly brilliant.

"I'm Alec Harmon. And you?"

"Stella Tyson."

Stella had always suspected that she was one of those people whose salvation lies in the hands of another being. For her, Alec was that being: he changed not only the outward condition of her life, but its spirit; she felt that she was reborn through him, and the years before she met him became as remote and dusty as the secondhand books in old Dockett's basement.

"I don't call it love," Miriam Sparrow declared on the first anniversary of their marriage. "I call it idolatry!"

"You're not jealous by any chance?" Alec had teased her. "You and Dick?"

"Certainly not." Then she added meditatively, "Envious, maybe."

They were all spending that first summer in Jarley, the Sparrows blistering themselves in the sun while Alec weeded his strawberry bed and Stella watched the three of them from her point of vantage under an apple tree. At the foot of the pasture the sea rolled in long blue waves, sheep lifted their heads, eying them with agate eyes.

"You do that as if your life depended on it," remarked Miriam, watching Alec clip a vine and set the young plant off by itself.

"It's how I do most things."

"You don't really expect to make a living out of strawberries, do you?"

Alec squatted on his heels, his bare body glowing like mahogany in the sun. "You'd be disappointed if I did, wouldn't you? You know, Miriam, you sometimes remind me of our maternal grandfather."

The plump, pink-and-white, languid Miriam sat up angrily. "That miserly old man!"

"I'm not accusing you of miserliness, my pet. But you do rather incline to share the old coot's notion that any form of pleasure is a variation on a theme by Satan. I'd hoped Dick had educated you by now."

"She relapses," mumbled Dick Sparrow, half buried in the long grass. "Minute my back is turned, she relapses."

Miriam tilted a bottle of sunburn oil into her palm and began wincingly to anoint her raw arms. Neither she nor Dick ever got used to the country. Every year during their summer vacation they blistered under the raging sun, or gave themselves indigestion and allergies through eating too many clams. Both were city-bred, incapable of navigating a plank bridge without spraining their ankles. But both were obsessed by the idea of spending their holidays in the country; they returned to New York raw, peeling, exhausted, there to boast to their friends about the delights of country life.

When you see a snake, never mind where he came from.

"I admit," she said presently, "I admit that it does amaze me, the way you and Stella enjoy life. Oh, I'm all for it, but you seem to do nothing else." She laughed ruefully. "Don't you ever intend to take a job, Alec? Don't you want to make money?"

"Certainly. I make money all the time. I made a profit out of these strawberries, believe it or not."

"I don't believe it. How much?"

"Four dollars and thirty-six cents."

"Net," said Stella proudly from under her apple tree.

Miriam laughed shrilly. "Oh, if grandpa could hear you!"

"Well," said Alec, prodding the moist earth with his trowel, "look. Father and grandfather made more dough than either of them could ever use. They left a tidy piece of it to me, and I'm grateful. But they never did get anything out of this place. They had no use for Jarley, and they left the minute they could. I have a kind of feeling they were ashamed of being country folk. They didn't like the smell of manure, or the smell of the beach at low tide. Well, I do—and they fixed it for me so I can go on living here and liking it."

"And playing at being a farmer! With your education!" Miriam looked accusingly at Stella. "You encourage him. You think everything he does is wonderful."

"Marvelous," Stella said complacently.

"But what was the use of his expensive schooling if he's going to waste it clopping about in sheep manure, planting berries and shooting ducks? And—yes, poaching with that wild man James Anderson? Why don't you have a baby?"

Alec shook his head. "Don't you know you must never rush a baby? It's apt to be bad for the poor little thing."

(Continued on Page 64)

What makes babies tick?

Many a bewildered mother, faced with the intricate mechanism of a small, new human being, asks herself that question. Plus a lot of others!

It's the purpose of child health stations, in scores of progressive communities, to provide the answers. Their guidance extends from the cradle to kindergarten — covers everything from proper feeding to periodic physical examinations.

This work is without question one of modern medicine's brightest achievements. Its results are easily reckoned. For, given frequent and expert care, more well babies stay well; more sick babies survive. Significantly, mortality figures are now at the nation's lowest mark.

Significantly, too, child health stations got their start as milk stations. Over half a century ago, it was seen how closely the disease-resistance of the nation's children is linked to the supply of safe milk.

It was then that a National Dairy company pioneered in milk pasteurization. Today, that same regard for public welfare continually prompts National Dairy Laboratories to improve the keeping qualities and guard the purity of milk — nature's most nearly perfect food. Through such efforts, milk now remains fresh and wholesome for days instead of hours.

Dedicated to the wider use and better understanding of dairy products as human food . . . as a base for the development of new products and materials . . . as a source of health and enduring progress on the farms and in the towns and cities of America.

Kraft Sealtest Breyers

NATIONAL DAIRY
PRODUCTS CORPORATION
AND AFFILIATED COMPANIES

PULL A MAIN DISH "OUT OF YOUR HAT" with this 7 minute macaroni-and-cheese

FOR fluffy MACARONI WITH fine CHEESE FLAVOR

Here's a new twist for Kraft Dinner—speedy and perfectly swell eating! Cook the special Kraft Dinner macaroni as directed on the box. Drain it and add 3 tablespoons of butter, Parkay margarine or bacon drippings, and 4 to 6 tablespoons of tomato juice or tomato soup. Add half the Kraft Grated from the Kraft Dinner box and mix lightly before piling the hot macaroni-and-cheese on a chop plate. Sprinkle it with the remaining Kraft Grated, and surround it with hot, cooked broccoli. Better buy several boxes of Kraft Dinner today so you'll have it ready for hurry-up main dishes any time.

Cheddar coming back! Watch for these two famous Kraft cheddar varieties: "Old English" with the wonderfully sharp flavor, and medium-mellow Kraft American. Gradually, as the Government needs less cheddar, there'll be more of these favorites for you.

The World's Favorite Cheeses are made by the Men and Women of KRAFT

Copr. 1946 by Kraft Foods Company

(Continued from Page 62)

"Besides," growled Dick from his hideaway in the long grass, "have you ever thought where you and I would spend our vacations, Miriam, if a baby had our room?"

In August Alec cut the marsh hay with his neighbor, James Anderson, and Stella watched them move two abreast through the blue-gray grasses, disturbing the plover, which rose wheeling and crying over their heads. Alec paused in his scything to send a whistle to the birds, decoying them out of the sky.

When summer marched into autumn, all bronze and brass, they lighted driftwood fires in the shallow old fireplaces and Alec hung his blue-and-white work gloves on a nail and went hunting black duck on the island, taking James Anderson with him. Stella harvested the fallen apples and raked leaves over the strawberry bed as she waited with rising anxiety for the men to come home. Sometimes, for company, she took the wood path to the Anderson house, and spent an hour talking to James' wife, Myrtle, in a kitchen which reeked of drying diapers, babies and woolen socks steaming behind the great wood stove.

Myrtle would see her to the door and send a reassuring word after her: "Don't you worry about them two! They been hunting ducks since they was weaned."

At other times Stella walked down to the shore and climbed a rock which overlooked the sea; from there she watched the white lobster boats pitching against the sky. Once in a while, if she was patient, she would catch a glimpse of Anderson's gray dory nosing homeward, and the sound of its outboard motor would reach her faintly across the tumultuous water. They came at last, bulky in Mackinaws and high boots, their unshaved faces crimson from the cold, and flung the day's bag at her feet—coot, eider, blacks, old squaw.

"Don't you go fretting about me!" Alec cried, laughing at her for her fears. "You should know by now that James and I always come back."

In winter the snow piled steadily under the windows, an acrid smell of wood smoke made their eyes water, and the radio rumbled news from Spain.

"What's it all about, can you make out?" growled James Anderson, and they discussed it peaceably, their stockinged feet propped on the andirons.

"Why can't they leave folks alone?" said James, rising at last and knocking out his pipe. He walked to the window and peered out. "Guess I better get going before it drifts in too heavy."

"Give my love to Myrtle," said Stella, and she and Alec watched him shoulder through the darkness toward his own window, a spark of light beyond the thin winter trees.

That was the first summer and the first winter at Jarley; they followed in undiminished splendor, five summers and five snows, but for Stella they were more than seasons, they were present and future in one, weighted with immediacy, each day a counterpart of yesterday and tomorrow. Earnestly, she and Alec discussed the question of having a child "one of these days," and James Anderson, himself a father at twenty, accused them of expecting to find a baby all ready made, frisking among the microscopic lambs under the fir trees, some spring morning.

"Better make up your minds," he advised them with fraternal concern. "Kid'd be a help around the place when you get old."

"Plenty of time," replied Alec. "Stella and I intend to live forever, anyway!"

Anderson thought this over and laughed. "Me too! Man yes, long as there's women and birds, and I got a charge of lead in one barrel, I'm in no hurry to quit."

But one September night in 1940 the moon rode high above the fir trees; the shorn meadow gleamed like silk, and the wind carried the smell of the salt marsh and the voices of innumerable birds feeding on the mud flats bared by the tide. Stella heard an apple fall from the tree into the grass, she heard the dry rustle of the balm of Gilead leaves beside the kitchen windows, then Alec stepped across the threshold and sat down beside her on the granite doorstep.

"They're bombing hell out of London," he said.

"I don't want to hear."

"They're killing everybody, everywhere."

She leaned against him, feeling the warmth of his body through the thin shirt. She thought of him as she had seen him last night, bronze against the white sheet; unable to tell whether his eyes were closed or open, she had to stoop over him until her face touched his. Then, in panic at his stillness, she wakened him. "Alec! Someone's shooting in the woods behind the orchard!"

He leaned on his elbow in the moonlight which streamed through the window. "It's James, after the deer."

"At this hour?"

He laughed softly. "Oh, James'd rather poach than sleep."

There was another shot, and Stella said, "Alec, don't go to sleep before I do."

He drew her down on his breast. "We'll go to sleep together, then,"

She laid her hand on his heart. "Like a clock," she murmured. "Like a clock, going on and on, forever."

He was silent, and from the woods there came another shot, closer this time.

"Like a clock," whispered Stella, feeling the steady rhythm of his heart. "Like a clock going on forever."

Now on this other night the moon towered above them, trite and monstrous witness to their love, and the advancing tide sent the birds wheeling across the marsh.

(Continued on Page 66)

"What'll it be, sir?"

Sugar-low but Ace-high!

SWANS DOWN'S "Mix-Easy" White Cake

Would you believe that this sumptuous, dreamy white cake, with all that melting dark-and-light chocolate frosting, takes only three quarters of a cup of sugar?

Fact! And wait—that's not all. It's a Swans Down "Mix-Easy" Cake . . . goes together like greased lightning.

Only 3 minutes to beat the batter. And no creaming. And all the ingredients except the meringue into the bowl at once. It's just the quickest trick you ever saw—and, what's more, it's one of the best.

Because—with all this speed—you still get the famous Swans Down fineness and tenderness.

And this cake tastes so rich—and keeps so long (if you can keep any of it)!

Only, of course, you just must have Swans Down! That special downy, feathery softness was never so important. Swans Down guarantees your success with this recipe—but not with any other flour.

"No creaming!"
"Beating cut in half!"
"Fewer dishes to wash!"
"Richer taste!"
"Keeps fresh longer!"

SWANS DOWN'S "MIX-EASY" DELICATE WHITE CAKE

Preparations: Have shortening at room temperature. Grease two deep 8-inch layer pans, line bottoms with waxed paper, grease again. Start oven for moderate heat (375°F.). Sift flour once before measuring. (All measurements are level.)

Measure into sifter:
2 cups sifted Swans Down Cake Flour (And be sure it's Swans Down!)
2½ teaspoons Calumet Baking Powder
¾ teaspoon salt
½ cup sugar

Measure into bowl:
½ cup shortening

Mix in small bowl:
⅔ cup milk
½ cup light corn syrup
1 teaspoon vanilla

Have ready:
3 egg whites, beaten to meringue* with
¼ cup sugar

*For meringue, beat egg whites with rotary egg beater (or at high speed of electric mixer) until foamy. Add ¼ cup sugar gradually, beating only until meringue will hold up in soft peaks.

Now—Swans Down's "Mix-Easy" Part! (Mix by hand or with electric mixer at low speed.) Stir shortening just to soften. Sift in dry ingredients, add liquid, and mix until all flour is dampened. Then beat 2 minutes. Add meringue mixture and beat 1 minute longer. (Count only actual beating time. Or count beating strokes. Allow 150 full strokes per minute. Scrape bowl and spoon often.)

Baking: Turn into pans. Bake in moderate oven (375°F.) about 25 minutes. Spread with Whipped Chocolate Frosting. Decorate with ½ square Baker's Unsweetened Chocolate melted with ½ teaspoon butter. Dribble from teaspoon.

Whipped Chocolate Frosting. Melt 1½ squares Baker's Unsweetened Chocolate over hot water; set aside. Beat 1 egg white with dash of salt until stiff enough to hold up in peaks, but not dry. Pour ½ cup light or dark corn syrup in fine stream over egg white, beating until frosting holds its shape (about 4 minutes). Add ½ teaspoon vanilla. Fold in chocolate.

Double cost of your ingredients back . . . If you don't think your Swans Down "Mix-Easy" Cake is better than any similar cake you've baked with any other flour, simply write us enclosing the guarantee insert from your Swans Down package and we'll send you double the cost of your ingredients! Swans Down itself has not changed—you can still use all your old favorite recipes. Swans Down has made supremely fine cakes for 50 years . . . and it's still the overwhelming choice of good cakemakers.

TUNE IN: Portia Faces Life—NBC Network

Watch for New "Mix-Easy" Recipes in your Swans Down box!

New "Mix-Easy" recipes . . . developed and tested in Swans Down kitchens at General Foods . . . are constantly appearing in Swans Down packages.

Bake a better cake with Swans Down

A Product of General Foods.

1. Of all the twelve girls in the family clan
The strongest by far was Grandmother Anne.

2. But washing her windows with water and rags Gave even old Annie the droops and the drags.

3. But Annie's descendant, a peewee named Beth,
Can whip through this job and not draw a deep breath.

4. Wee Beth is a lassie who's smart as can be;
For she uses WINDEX, not muscles, you see!

5. Spray it on, wipe it off, and pronto—you're done
Those windows all shine like the twelve-o'clock sun!

6. And WINDEX contains no dust-catching oil,
Keeps glass clean longer, cuts down future toil.

7. Don't be tempted by imitators who promise "more for your money." WINDEX is a quality, noninflammable, oil-free cleaner which leaves no dust-catching film, doesn't streak, sheds no dust on sills or floor.

Get brighter windows quicker with

WINDEX

Trade-Mark Reg. U. S. Pat. Off.
by The Drackett Company

Costs but a fraction of a cent per pane

For Extra Economy, Buy The Big 20-ounce Size

Copr. 1946, The Drackett Co.

(Continued from Page 64)

Stella said, "Don't leave me, Alec."

He took her in his arms. "Maybe I won't have to."

"No, say you never will!"

He changed the subject. "I talked to James this morning. I asked him if he wanted to get into trouble with the wardens, hunting deer like that, at night and out of season. He said, 'You know we been doing it a hundred and fifty years round here, for meat and for fun, and the warden knows it too. He better!' And James said, 'Leave folks alone and their sins don't amount to so much in the long run. It's ganging up on them makes them ugly.'"

"What else did James say?"

Alec hesitated; she felt his arm tighten round her. "He said he was trying to keep his eye in for what was coming."

"What did he mean, keep his eye in for what was coming?"

"You know what he meant."

She clutched him fiercely. "Alec, no! Not to us. There's just you and me, and that's all there is, all there ever will be. Our life, Alec. No one wants our life except us."

"They may ask for it one day, Stella."

"They can't!" she cried. "You know they can't!"

"Listen, let me say something, then let's forget it. If anything should happen . . . if I . . . you . . . should be asked . . . then don't ever believe ——" He broke off, his eyes fixed on the moon. "If ever it should happen that you hear I've been killed or reported missing, don't believe it. Don't ever believe it."

"But, Alec, what do you mean? What are you talking about? We aren't even in the war. James is crazy."

To be happy with a man you must understand him a lot and love him a little. To be happy with a woman you must love her a lot and not try to understand her at all.

—HELEN ROWLAND: Nectar in a Nutshell by C. K. Wright. (Geo. Allen & Unwin, Ltd.)

Stella watched the skies turn from violet to slate. It became difficult for her to read the page on her lap: "Nessun maggior dolore, che ricordarsi del tempo felice nella miseria; e ció sa il tuo dottore."

Symes wakened, and passed the palms of his hands over his hair. "Getting dark, isn't it? You shouldn't try to read in this light."

And as if some inert mechanism had but awaited the sound of his voice, the lights went on, consigning the outer world to darkness.

IV

A cold wind was blowing from the Apennines and the color of these mountains, the look of them huddled under the sky, made Stella think of the hills near Jarley. The resemblance ended there. She was not prepared for the desolation which met her gaze as the train carried her northward out of Rome. That there would be ruins, she knew—she had seen them in the newspapers and magazines, she had heard them described by commentators over the radio all through the years of the war. But with war's end surely stones healed themselves, battered spires were reunited with the sky, and all that was not flesh and blood resumed, somehow, its old appointed place? From the window of her train she watched slow-moving swarms of men and women laboriously sorting ashes and rubble; she thought she discerned, as Symes had warned her she might, hostility or indifference in the eyes of a warm people.

Yes, resemblance to home ended with the dark ridge of the mountains, but she found it again in the voice of Guido Vitelli when the train deposited her, at last, on the platform of Montescari. She stood for some minutes staring after the receding train, struggling with an instinct to run after it, to cry: "Take me, take me! Don't leave me here alone!" It answered her inaudible cry with a scornful bellow and disappeared into a tunnel, and she was left gazing at the glittering rails, at the tin roof and spindling walls of the station. She saw at once that the buildings had been erected after the war; they were perhaps two years old and had already an air of permanence. How long would they stand? Fifty years? A hundred? A thousand?

Her fellow passengers were drifting away, carrying suitcases, leading children by the hand. She thought, I'm here, I'm at Montescari! The strangeness of it made her tremble; her ears still throbbed with the sound of the airplane motors and the later, swaying lilt of the train. But the ground of Montescari stood firm under her feet and its stones sparkled in the sunshine of this exquisite April day.

The stationmaster, who had seen her from his window, emerged and walked toward her. He was middle-aged, with a detached, pleasant manner. He had seen at once that she was foreign—American or English—and guessed the errand which had brought her to Montescari. There had been others within recent months, and there would, he knew, be more, many more, of these sad pilgrims from overseas. He hoped that the local inn would be restored—it now boasted three rainproof rooms—and that the local café would be rebuilt by the time the obstacles to travel had been finally removed.

He greeted Stella. "Buono giorno, signora!" Then, in two of his five words of English: "Help you?"

"Thank you, thank you, yes."

He saw the terror and loneliness in her face and his eyes became gentle, for it was a look he recognized.

Stella went on quickly: "I've come to see the American Military Cemetery here at Montescari. They told me at Rome that I would surely find some place to stay for a few days. Could you direct me to some hotel?"

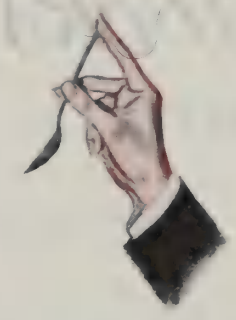
He made a gesture with his hand, and she read it rightly, as meaning that she should wait a moment while he went in search of an interpreter. In a moment he was back, accompanied by a dark young man wearing Army pants and a tweed coat.

He greeted Stella with a broad smile. "Ma'am? My name is Vitelli, Guido Vitelli. Can I be of assistance?"

Stella replied gratefully that he could; it was a relief to be spoken to in English, for she had heard nothing but Italian, and hesitated to experiment with the few phrases which she had committed to memory. She repeated her little speech to Guido, who nodded gravely.

"My mother has rooms. We have a nice house at the end of Scarlatti Street. There is a garden. The house was wrecked during the battle, but we've managed to fix it up. I think we can make you comfortable, all right."

At this point Mr. Bianchi, the stationmaster, who had been listening attentively, said something in Italian, and Guido nodded again. He turned to Stella.



"Mr. Bianchi says I should tell you that I was with the American Army. Since I was demobilized I live here. I have a truck, and I meet the trains for Mr. Bianchi." He picked up her suitcases. "My truck's down in the street. I can take you right over to the house now. Nobody else, is there, Giorgio?"

Mr. Bianchi replied in Italian that there was no one else in need of accommodations, but that Guido should prepare to meet the six-twenty that evening. No doubt the six-twenty would be late. It was always late, due to the continual repairment of bridges all the way south from Florence. He then bowed to Stella, who smiled uncertainly and murmured "Grazie!" as she turned to follow Guido across the platform and down a flight of steps to the street.

A line of houses patched with tin and roofing paper rose from mounds of brick and stucco, their originals. The little town, built on a slight eminence, rose in tiers which culminated in what was once the church of San Francesco. In the sunshine between trees which had survived the battle and trees that had been planted since then, it was difficult, at first, for Stella to perceive that the whole place was actually a series of ruins. Men

(Continued on Page 68)

I did a very smart thing today!

I chose these

'cause I'm sure Holmes & Edwards is a better kind of silverplate. It is Sterling Inlaid with two blocks of sterling silver at the backs of bowls and handles of the most used spoons and forks. Surely that means my precious spoons and forks will stay lovelier longer.

'cause I'm told that most other kinds of silverplate are only "reinforced" or "extra plated" and not Sterling Inlaid silverplate like Holmes & Edwards.

'cause I love Holmes & Edwards patterns best, particularly Youth. They're the kind you can live with day after day and never tire of.

'cause I'm proud of my table and the way my friends will exclaim when they see my Holmes & Edwards. Everybody knows there's nothing finer in silverplate.

'cause I'm thrifty and appreciate good values. You will discover a fifty piece service for eight is surprisingly inexpensive.

HOLMES & EDWARDS
STERLING INLAID° SILVERPLATE

HERE AND HERE
It's Sterling Inlaid

Copyright 1946, International Silver Co., Holmes & Edwards Div., Meriden, Conn. In Canada: The T. Eaton Co., Ltd. °Reg. U. S. Pat. Off.

Fashion Frocks

CHARMINGLY DIFFERENT

Pick and choose

from 125 Spring beauties

Brighten up, for a brilliant new selection of Spring beauties will brighten your doorstep the day ■ Fashion Frocks' representative comes to call. But the best news yet... you'll not be confined to slim pickings. Fashion Frocks' Spring Showing consists of a wide selection of more varied fabrics in a great array of styles and patterns. AND . . . this year, Fashion Frocks shows you many favored fashions in Crown SOAP'n'WATER* fabrics that are unconditionally washable. Fashion Frocks, Inc. Dept. J1, Cincinnati 25, Ohio.

*Reg. U. S. Pat. Off.

The famous Brighton Mills, in collaboration with Crown Fabrics and Fashion Frocks, produced this exquisite suit of Butcher Linen.

(Continued from Page 66)

were working everywhere—on ledges, on ladders, on scaffolds—while women carried baskets of dust and children dragged little carts neatly stacked with bits of brick.

"Here," said Guido cheerfully, "is my truck. Now you need to stand no more in the sun."

It was an old Army truck painted blue, with Guido's initials on the door. He put her luggage in the rear and invited her to sit beside him on the front seat. They roared up the street, passing a bulldozer at work, and were passed, in turn, by an assortment of vehicles packed with debris and workmen of all ages carrying picks and shovels.

"It is a little distance to the house," Guido explained, energetically changing gears. "We shall be out of the dust presently. Then it becomes pretty again." He glanced at her. "The green things grow fast, even here."

Stella pointed to a building. "What is that?"

"It was the parish house. In the oratory of the church—you can just see that from the next street—there is a relief by Della Robbia. That somehow was not hit. But most things were. Most of the frescoes. Even now when it is all over, sometimes a wall quivers and the plaster comes sliding down in a cascade. People working to restore the buildings have to be careful. Some have been killed by the sudden collapse of a roof."

They jolted up the street, and Guido told her of a town not far from Montescari, where the idiot Germans had destroyed a castle built by Frederick the Second, King of Naples and Sicily, in the thirteenth century. Suddenly he slowed, the truck began to crawl with ponderous growlings.

"There," he said, jerking a shoulder, "that's the town hall. The Germans used it for an observation post, so we shelled it. Then we used it, and they shelled it. A lot of the shells missed the town hall and hit the church and the houses next the church. Vasari built that church. You know about him?" He put on speed once more. "Well, I didn't, because though I am Italian I always lived in the United States since I was a kid. I never did hear about this guy Vasari, or about Della Robbia, until I come here to live after the war. Then I got to know an old fella, a friend of my wife's family. His name is Antonio Suli, and you know what Suli does all the time? You know what he done all the time during the battle for Montescari? There was two battles—or three, you might say. First when we drove out the Germans, second when they drove us out, the third time when we drove them out for keeps. Well, what old Suli done all that time was carry a sack and collect tiny bits of statues and stuff, and carry them away to a safe place till after the war. Now he's working on them, piecing them together bit by bit, like those picture puzzles they give to kids. It was old Suli told me all about Giorgio Vasari and Della Robbia. It was him told me about how old this place is. A thousand years old!"

Stella asked, "Was this your home before you went to America?"

"No, ma'am. My folks came from the south. But right after the war I married a girl from Montescari, and now we live here, my wife and me and my mother. Also my son." After a pause he went on: "I was with the Thirty-fourth Armored Division and it was us took Montescari. Afterward some of our outfit was sent back to this place, and then I met my wife. Me being Italian and speaking Italian made it easy all around. There's others done the same thing. Ame cans, English, Russian. Lot of 'em didn even go home." He laughed. "They kind disappeared. But the guy in charge of t American cemetery is an American. He g the job after his discharge from the Arm married an Italian girl, and lives right here Montescari."

"The Thirty-fourth Armored Division murmured Stella. Her lips tasted of du "Did you know—do you remember ma of the men who were with you?"

"Sure, most of the bunch that I was wit I remember."

"Would you remember their names?"

He turned, sudden understanding in h expressive brown face. "You ask me a maybe I'll remember."

"Alec Harmon?"

"Alec Harmon?" The name came soft from him. "Harmon. Can't say it rings bell. Was he an officer?"

"He was a private. Private Alec Harmon Suddenly she wanted to get out of the ca to rush away into the upheaval of this ali country, to fling herself deep into its su burned, its gun-scorched earth.

"There wasn't any Harmon in our bunch said Guido. He stopped the truck and pointe "That's my hous where you are goi to stay."

Stella saw a whi house roofed wit tiles, its doors and wi dows painted the ide tical blue which di guised Guido's o Army truck. One wi was cradled in scaffol ing, and he explaine that it had been dam aged in the gener bombardment.

"You see that bar place beyond m house? Bianchi th stationmaster's hous stood there. We ha to blow it up to get th Germans out of i Graves, they are every where, everywhere." He turned. "That on he was your brothe your husband?"

"My husband."

"Ah, povretta!"

"And the American cemetery?" she aske him, after a pause. "Where is the cemetery?

"You take that street to the right. Yo can see the sign from here—it is only twenty-minute walk." He added gently, " will drive you there later, when you hav eaten and rested from your journey."

Stella shook her head. "I'll go there now You say it's not far. I'll walk."

"Let me drive you," he urged. "It's ho and dusty."

"No, I'd rather walk. Will you take m luggage to the house? I'll find my way bac in a little while."

Guido opened the door for her. "You can' get lost. First you'll come to a cottage. Tha belongs to Sergeant Curtis. He's the care taker, and has all the records in his office You ask for him—Curtis, Alben Curtis."

Stella thanked him and watched the truck rumble off toward the house with the blu trimmings. A child carrying a copper po stared at her, unresponsive to her murmured greeting; she read an aloof recognition in the eyes of men and women who seemed to guess her errand. Dust covered her shoes, sun beat on her head, and the unfamiliar aura of a strange land rose about her. Presently the street became a mere road with the town rising on one side and green land on the other. She saw little paths branching toward houses hidden among the trees, and beyond them the mountains, slate and purple against the sky. An unknown bird sang in the hedge, an unknown man driving oxen touched his hat as he passed her. Had Alec come this way? Had the eyes of these strangers encountered all unsuspecting, the eyes of her beloved?

(Continued on Page 70)

★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

If You Were Love

BY JANET WEINBERGER

If love had gone and you were love and I were standing
Here at the door twisting the knob inward,
On pulsing feet I would have gone
to you;
No door would shock you from my sight again.
If only you were love and I were held
By love, enfolded, blanketed;
If you were love. . . .
The rhythm of these words—
I wonder if you know the rhythm of these words.

★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

"Look at my nylons— bought 4 years ago!"

says MRS. V. G. LINKE

"I've Luxed them after every wearing— Lux kept them lovely!"

THIS PAIR OF NYLONS WAS BOUGHT IN AUGUST, 1941

"I've just lived in the nylons I bought before the war," says Mrs. Linke, "and I'm still wearing most of them! I give a lot of credit to Lux. My nylons are Luxed after every wearing—in lukewarm suds. Believe me, for my new nylons I'll stick to Lux, too. It certainly helps to keep runs away."

Soap contains vital materials
DON'T WASTE IT!

Scientific strain tests bear out Mrs. Linke's remarkable record. Lux cut down runs over 50% in rayon, silk and lisle stockings. Tests with nylons showed similar results. Identical stockings rubbed with cake soap or washed with a strong soap popped runs quickly.

Give your lovely new nylons Lux care. Over 90% of the makers of stockings recommend Lux.

...CUTS DOWN RUNS OVER 50%

YOU FEEL SAFER

when your napkin has this triple-proved deodorant!

WHY LET the dread of offending haunt you—when Modess now has a triple-proved deodorant?

YES, TRIPLE-PROVED: proved effective by Modess chemists; proved tops in 26 tests by impartial laboratories; proved a hit with thousands who've tried the new Modess!

NO SEPARATE POWDER, no sprinkling or spilling!

GREATER SOFTNESS! 3 out of 4 women found Modess softer to the touch in a nationwide poll.

GREATER SAFETY! 209 nurses, in hospital tests, proved Modess less likely to strike through than nationally known layer-type napkins.

COSTS NO MORE, so next time get luxurious new Modess with the triple-proved deodorant. Box of 12 is only 22¢.

FREE! SEND for "Growing Up and Liking It," a bright, modern booklet on the how and why of menstruation. Write Martha Steele, Personal Products Corp., Box 332M, Milltown, N. J.

MODESS COMES TWO WAYS. Full-size and Junior. If you prefer a slightly narrower napkin, get Modess Junior.

(Continued from Page 68)

Stella walked on, a sense of unreality increasing with every step. The distance seemed farther than Guido had said, but at last the field ended and she saw the cemetery, its white crosses marching in endless columns toward a hill slashed and scarred like the town at her back. Across the road, in a neat garden behind a painted fence, stood the cottage which Guido had told her belonged to the American caretaker. But no one was visible. The man with the oxen had disappeared, the road lay deserted under a haze of dust. For several minutes Stella stood motionless while a flag atop its tall mast moved brightly, and the breeze brought her the scent of chestnut trees which had flowered among the nearer graves. Silence marched with the graves and beyond them to the battered hillside and the indifferent peaks beyond. Stella, feeling that she might sink beneath the stillness, turned and walked rapidly away.

V

MARK BYCROFT lighted his pipe and tossed the match over the rail. He felt the lift and sag of the ship as it headed into a wind which seemed bitterly cold for May. A bell jangled, a seaman padded up the deck, whistling, and Mark felt exhilaration sweep through him. He thought, Maybe we'll get into New York in time for me to take Regan out to dinner. He pictured his wife's face framed in the dark fur of her coat collar. Fur in May? Oh, well, women pay little attention to the seasons, and fur was the most expensive and the most becoming frame he could conjure up for her at this moment. He marveled at his own elation, which had mounted steadily ever since they left Antwerp ten days ago. Then the wind took a bite at him and he shivered.

"Cold, if you ask me," said Lieutenant Perry, joining him at the rail. "Or is it just the thought of getting home gives me the shivers?"

"Anticipatory nerves," said Mark. "It's been two years since I was home."

"I can't complain. I had thirty days, last year. But this time it's for keeps." He leaned on the rail, some puppy instinct making him get as close to Mark as he could.

Mark glanced at him with a mixture of liking and impatience. Perry had worked with him for the past eighteen months and Mark found his limpetlike devotion both amusing and oppressive. But war and exile bred a hunger for affection in these homesick children, and Mark had resigned himself to playing father, uncle and older brother; the role bored him, and he was glad that it could soon be discarded. By tomorrow they would all be home, and these emotional innovations, the pathetic, passionate loyalties of warriors, would take their place with the shapeless baggage and the rusty armor of war. Mark did not say this and he was sure that Perry, a simple person, did not feel it. No doubt, thought Mark, he is already making plans for a lifelong friendship, highlighted by yearly reunions of a maudlin and alcoholic nature. He reflected sadly on the simple loyalties born of war, loyalties so rarely carried forward into the dull preoccupations of peace. But, thought Mark, Perry'd bore Regan to death in five minutes. Again his wife's face rose before him and he caught his breath.

Perry said, "Gosh, I hope Lucy got my cable."

"She must have. I hope my wife got mine, too."

"Oh, sure, they must have." He gave a youthful laugh. "It does mean something, doesn't it? I mean, having one's wife meet one at the pier, and all that stuff."

Mark agreed that as far as he was concerned it meant something.

There was a slight pause, then Perry said, "You know, colonel, I've been thinking about what you said to me a few days ago."

"What did I say?" asked Mark patiently, though he wished the boy would leave him to his own reveries.

"I've been thinking about the advice you gave me."

"Oh, that. I only told you what I'd do—or, rather, what I wouldn't do, if I were in your shoes."

"But I've been thinking about it."

On their first evening out to sea Perry had joined him in a walk round the deck, and after a few preliminary attempts, the boy had come to the point: should he, or should he not, make a clean breast of his wartime sins to his wife? There had been a girl in Belgium; Perry had lived with her for several months, but this made no difference in his feelings for his wife in America. Indeed, it was love for his wife which inspired doubt and guilt in his young mind. Conscience dictated that he confess all, but though he felt sure of her understanding and ultimate forgiveness, he dreaded the thought of hurting her, and so on and so forth. While the boy was stammering out his story Mark had been silently computing the number of times he had heard it before, or others just like it. Asked for his advice, he gave it as he had given it time out of mind to others:

"I'd suggest you keep your big mouth shut."

"That doesn't seem right somehow."

"Then do as you please. All I can tell you is, I regard my sins as my personal responsibility. I can't see that candor serves any purpose beyond that of adding insult to injury. Safer all round, I think, to go on the theory that women and elephants never forget."

Perry replied broodingly that he feared deceit might prey on his mind.

Mark laughed. "A guy's got to have some privacy, hasn't he?"

They argued, then dropped the subject. Now, on their last evening at sea, Perry came back to it with a diffident smile. "I've been thinking and thinking, and I guess you're right, sir. Anyway, I shan't be in any hurry to start talking. If, someday, Lucy should ask me questions, I'll maybe tell her. But I guess there's no sense in trying to cross that bridge yet." He stared at the gray sea running below them. "I ask myself how I'd feel, whether I'd rather know or not know. How do you see that problem?"

Above all, no reproaches about what is past and cannot be altered! How can a man live at all if he did not grant absolution every night to himself and all his fellows!
—GOETHE.

The problem, as it affected Perry, had long since ceased to interest Colonel Bycroft, but he pondered it politely, and replied with what he hoped sounded like devastating sophistry that, if deceit were the order of the day, he trusted that he might be thoroughly and successfully deceived.

The young man laughed. "You should worry! And so should Mrs. Bycroft." After a slight pause he added, "Did you ever happen to hear what they said of you in our outfit, colonel?"

"No, what?" asked Mark uneasily.

"They said that if the Almighty had ever put it up to you, your conscience would have gone bail for the whole bunch of us."

MARK was not sure whether to take this as a compliment or the reverse; he smiled benignly and let it pass. He knew that some of his brother officers had considered him a freak; a few condemned him as a snob, others dismissed him for a prig. He was neither, but had felt under no compulsion to explain. If war had taught him anything it had taught him a dogged patience with the impatience of men. Recompense came to him in the friendship of a few, and in the absurdly filial devotion of the very young, like Perry. These occasionally saw Mark drunk, or lost him in mysterious side streets; but he always showed up sane and self-possessed, immune to chaff, impenetrable under cross-examination.

The role of conventional hero made him profoundly uncomfortable, for heroism is not a normal role for sensitive men. He had decided, rather cynically, that it was a lucky thing nations did not confer medals and citations on a man for his private victories, else such decorations might paint weird rainbows across the invisible heart. Two

(Continued on Page 72)

est. I wondered whether we might call ne evening on you and your wife."

"Sure!" He turned, smiling. "We'd like it you did."

Suddenly he felt that this was true, that would be happy to welcome them, to pre- nt them to Regan and to watch the effect of r charm on their artless youth. No doubt ey would stay too long and bore her half to ath, but she would rise to the occasion— that he was certain. Mark could see her ing it as he had often seen her in the past: aceful and assured, putting strangers at eir ease, making them feel at home, and ver, not once, permitting the tick of the rlor clock to intrude on their enchantment. nd he could hear her protesting afterward: Mark, how could you? I on't want to sound mean, t honestly, those bores!"

"It would be swell," said erry eagerly, "if your ife and mine could meet nd be friends. I remem- er your telling me that Mrs. Bycroft was terested in all sorts of public affairs. Lucy ould like that. She's quite a reader, and e did a swell job in the Red Cross during he war." He produced a notebook. "I'll ke down your address. There'll be a crush the pier tomorrow, and I may not have nance to see you then."

Mark gave him the address and Perry rote it down, frowning in the murky light. he sea sent a cloud of spray over them. Let's walk," said Mark.

They sauntered up the deck in the eve- ing gloom. The ship's bows rose and dipped efore the vanishing horizon, and Mark nought of home, of the house to which he ould return with his wife and Neddy, and f life restored to a small and normal scale. Everything would be in perspective; intense, ersonal, responsive. He would return to mall-town politics and run for mayor as he ad planned to do before the war. He was ick of existence on the Gargantuan plane, ick of society as a shapeless, anonymous lump as he had seen it in the Army of Occupation. Suddenly, passionately, he wanted America.

If fools did not go to market, the rubbish would never be sold.

VI

REGAN was not on the pier to meet him. Mark waited, his sense of solitude increasing as he stood in the center of exclaiming strangers from whose jubilations and disappointments he felt equally excluded. He strolled up and down the damp and windy cobbles and concrete, his musette bag slung over his shoulder, while a porter mounted guard over his little heap of baggage near the exit gate. And as he waited he assumed the indifferent expression people wear in such situations. The crowd broke into groups, into clots, into couples, and streamed away from him to the line of waiting cabs and the bright sunlight of the street beyond. But Regan did not appear. Nor did he set eyes on young Perry, who with his other shipboard acquaintances had vanished into the anonymous mob.

The porter caught his eye. "Telephone booths on the other side of the gate, sir—on your right."

Mark thanked him and made his way toward them, followed by the man carrying his luggage. But there was a queue of people waiting outside the telephone booths, and with sudden decision Mark turned and hailed a cab. He had waited half an hour, and Regan was always pitilessly punctual.

There had been some mistake; she may have been misinformed by the cable office or else by the officials at the pier. But he would be home in fifteen minutes. Excitement, which had ebbed while he waited for Regan, now returned, and he found himself trembling as he pressed against the cab window and peered at the dingy and teeming vistas of Seventh Avenue.

"It's standing," he muttered. "Actually standing!"

(Continued on Page 75)

FOR THE Lift OF A Lifeline

... there's nothing that does the trick like Life-Bra. Its exclusive design puts verve in every curve. Gives your upper Lifeline the firm, alluring contours of youth because it Lifts–Molds–Corrects–Holds–all at the same time. Whatever your figure type, there's a Life-Bra "for the Lift of Your Lifeline." Be fitted and see ... at all better stores and shops. $1.25 to $3.50

Life-Bra

A Formfit CREATION

THE FORMFIT CO., CHICAGO, NEW YORK

Home is where you wear your slippers...

...they should be worthy of your home

Above all, you want your home... to stand for the finest in everything. And since nothing means "home" quite so much as your slippers, they should be Daniel Green Slippers. For only Daniel Green puts into slippers the "stay-in-shape" quality and superb workmanship of a fine shoe. Outstanding beauty, comfort, and quality ...make Daniel Green the slippers that "belong" in your home. Daniel Green Slippers come in many other styles and colors.

The Cara

above, in sizes AA width, 4½ to 10. B width, 3½ to 10, around $4.50.

The Majorette

at left, sizes AA width, 4½ to 10. B width, 3½ to 10, around $4.50.

Daniel Green

COMFY SLIPPERS

Dolgeville, New York

YOU FEEL SAFER

when your napkin has this triple-proved deodorant!

WHY LET the dread of offending haunt you—when Modess now has a triple-proved deodorant?

YES, TRIPLE-PROVED: proved effective by Modess chemists; proved tops in 26 tests by impartial laboratories; proved a hit with thousands who've tried the new Modess!

NO SEPARATE POWDER, no sprinkling or spilling!

GREATER SOFTNESS! 3 out of 4 women found Modess softer to the touch in a nationwide poll.

GREATER SAFETY! 209 nurses, in hospital tests, proved Modess less likely to strike through than nationally known layer-type napkins.

COSTS NO MORE, so next time get luxurious new Modess with the triple-proved deodorant. Box of 12 is only 22¢.

FREE! SEND for "Growing Up and Liking It," a bright, modern booklet on the how and why of menstruation. Write Martha Steele, Personal Products Corp., Box 332M, Milltown, N. J.

MODESS COMES TWO WAYS. Full-size and Junior. If you prefer a slightly narrower napkin, get Modess Junior.

(Continued from Page 68)

Stella walked on, a sense of unreality increasing with every step. The distance seemed farther than Guido had said, but at last the field ended and she saw the cemetery, its white crosses marching in endless columns toward a hill slashed and scarred like the town at her back. Across the road, in a neat garden behind a painted fence, stood the cottage which Guido had told her belonged to the American caretaker. But no one was visible. The man with the oxen had disappeared, the road lay deserted under a haze of dust. For several minutes Stella stood motionless while a flag atop its tall mast moved brightly, and the breeze brought her the scent of chestnut trees which had flowered among the nearer graves. Silence marched with the graves and beyond them to the battered hillside and the indifferent peaks beyond. Stella, feeling that she might sink beneath the stillness, turned and walked rapidly away.

V

MARK BYCROFT lighted his pipe and tossed the match over the rail. He felt the lift and sag of the ship as it headed into a wind which seemed bitterly cold for May. A bell jangled, a seaman padded up the deck, whistling, and Mark felt exhilaration sweep through him. He thought, Maybe we'll get into New York in time for me to take Regan out to dinner. He pictured his wife's face framed in the dark fur of her coat collar. Fur in May? Oh, well, women pay little attention to the seasons, and fur was the most expensive and the most becoming frame he could conjure up for her at this moment. He marveled at his own elation, which had mounted steadily ever since they left Antwerp ten days ago. Then the wind took a bite at him and he shivered.

"Cold, if you ask me," said Lieutenant Perry, joining him at the rail. "Or is it just the thought of getting home gives me the shivers?"

"Anticipatory nerves," said Mark. "It's been two years since I was home."

"I can't complain. I had thirty days, last year. But this time it's for keeps." He leaned on the rail, some puppy instinct making him get as close to Mark as he could.

Mark glanced at him with a mixture of liking and impatience. Perry had worked with him for the past eighteen months and Mark found his limpetlike devotion both amusing and oppressive. But war and exile bred a hunger for affection in these homesick children, and Mark had resigned himself to playing father, uncle and older brother; the role bored him, and he was glad that it could soon be discarded. By tomorrow they would all be home, and these emotional innovations, the pathetic, passionate loyalties of warriors, would take their place with the shapeless baggage and the rusty armor of war. Mark did not say this and he was sure that Perry, a simple person, did not feel it. No doubt, thought Mark, he is already making plans for a lifelong friendship, highlighted by yearly reunions of a maudlin and alcoholic nature. He reflected sadly on the simple loyalties born of war, loyalties so rarely carried forward into the dull preoccupations of peace. But, thought Mark, Perry'd bore Regan to death in five minutes. Again his wife's face rose before him and he caught his breath.

Perry said, "Gosh, I hope Lucy got my cable."

"She must have. I hope my wife got mine, too."

"Oh, sure, they must have." He gave a youthful laugh. "It does mean something, doesn't it? I mean, having one's wife meet one at the pier, and all that stuff."

Mark agreed that as far as he was concerned it meant something.

There was a slight pause, then Perry said, "You know, colonel, I've been thinking about what you said to me a few days ago."

"What did I say?" asked Mark patiently, though he wished the boy would leave him to his own reveries.

"I've been thinking about the advice you gave me."

"Oh, that. I only told you what I'd do—or, rather, what I wouldn't do, if I were in your shoes."

"But I've been thinking about it."

On their first evening out to sea Perry had joined him in a walk round the deck, and after a few preliminary attempts, the boy had come to the point: should he, or should he not, make a clean breast of his wartime sins to his wife? There had been a girl in Belgium; Perry had lived with her for several months, but this made no difference in his feelings for his wife in America. Indeed, it was love for his wife which inspired doubt and guilt in his young mind. Conscience dictated that he confess all, but though he felt sure of her understanding and ultimate forgiveness, he dreaded the thought of hurting her, and so on and so forth. While the boy was stammering out his story Mark had been silently computing the number of times he had heard it before, or others just like it. Asked for his advice, he gave it as he had given it time out of mind to others:

"I'd suggest you keep your big mouth shut."

"That doesn't seem right somehow."

"Then do as you please. All I can tell you is, I regard my sins as my personal responsibility. I can't see that candor serves any purpose beyond that of adding insult to injury. Safer all round, I think, to go on the theory that women and elephants never forget."

Perry replied broodingly that he feared deceit might prey on his mind.

Mark laughed. "A guy's got to have some privacy, hasn't he?"

They argued, then dropped the subject. Now, on their last evening at sea, Perry came back to it with a diffident smile. "I've been thinking and thinking, and I guess you're right, sir. Anyway, I shan't be in any hurry to start talking. If, someday, Lucy should ask me questions, I'll maybe tell her. But I guess there's no sense in trying to cross that bridge yet." He stared at the gray sea running below them. "I ask myself how I'd feel, whether I'd rather know or not know. How do you see that problem?"

Above all, no reproaches about what is past and cannot be altered! How can a man live at all if he did not grant absolution every night to himself and all his fellows!
—GOETHE.

The problem, as it affected Perry, had long since ceased to interest Colonel Bycroft, but he pondered it politely, and replied with what he hoped sounded like devastating sophistry that, if deceit were the order of the day, he trusted that he might be thoroughly and successfully deceived.

The young man laughed. "You should worry! And so should Mrs. Bycroft." After a slight pause he added, "Did you ever happen to hear what they said of you in our outfit, colonel?"

"No, what?" asked Mark uneasily.

"They said that if the Almighty had ever put it up to you, your conscience would have gone bail for the whole bunch of us."

MARK was not sure whether to take this as a compliment or the reverse; he smiled benignly and let it pass. He knew that some of his brother officers had considered him a freak; a few condemned him as a snob, others dismissed him for a prig. He was neither, but had felt under no compulsion to explain. If war had taught him anything it had taught him a dogged patience with the impatience of men. Recompense came to him in the friendship of a few, and in the absurdly filial devotion of the very young, like Perry. These occasionally saw Mark drunk, or lost him in mysterious side streets; but he always showed up sane and self-possessed, immune to chaff, impenetrable under cross-examination.

The role of conventional hero made him profoundly uncomfortable, for heroism is not a normal role for sensitive men. He had decided, rather cynically, that it was a lucky thing nations did not confer medals and citations on a man for his private victories, else such decorations might paint weird rainbows across the invisible heart. Two

(Continued on Page 72)

est. I wondered whether we might call ne evening on you and your wife."

"Sure!" He turned, smiling. "We'd like it you did."

Suddenly he felt that this was true, that would be happy to welcome them, to pre- nt them to Regan and to watch the effect of r charm on their artless youth. No doubt ey would stay too long and bore her half to ath, but she would rise to the occasion— that he was certain. Mark could see her ing it as he had often seen her in the past: aceful and assured, putting strangers at eir ease, making them feel at home, and ver, not once, permitting the tick of the rlor clock to intrude on their enchantment. nd he could hear her protesting afterward: Mark, how could you? I n't want to sound mean, t honestly, those bores!"

"It would be swell," said erry eagerly, "if your ife and mine could meet nd be friends. I remem- er your telling me that Mrs. Bycroft was terested in all sorts of public affairs. Lucy ould like that. She's quite a reader, and e did a swell job in the Red Cross during he war." He produced a notebook. "I'll ake down your address. There'll be a crush n the pier tomorrow, and I may not have a nance to see you then."

Mark gave him the address and Perry rote it down, frowning in the murky light. he sea sent a cloud of spray over them. Let's walk," said Mark.

They sauntered up the deck in the eve- ing gloom. The ship's bows rose and dipped efore the vanishing horizon, and Mark hought of home, of the house to which he ould return with his wife and Neddy, and f life restored to a small and normal scale. Everything would be in perspective; intense, ersonal, responsive. He would return to mall-town politics and run for mayor as he ad planned to do before the war. He was ick of existence on the Gargantuan plane, ick of society as a shapeless, anonymous lump as he had seen it in the Army of Occupation. Suddenly, passionately, he wanted America.

If fools did not go to market, the rubbish would never be sold.

VI

REGAN was not on the pier to meet him. Mark waited, his sense of solitude increasing as he stood in the center of exclaiming strangers from whose jubilations and disappointments he felt equally excluded. He strolled up and down the damp and windy cobbles and concrete, his musette bag slung over his shoulder, while a porter mounted guard over his little heap of baggage near the exit gate. And as he waited he assumed the indifferent expression people wear in such situations. The crowd broke into groups, into clots, into couples, and streamed away from him to the line of waiting cabs and the bright sunlight of the street beyond. But Regan did not appear. Nor did he set eyes on young Perry, who with his other shipboard acquaintances had vanished into the anonymous mob.

The porter caught his eye. "Telephone booths on the other side of the gate, sir—on your right."

Mark thanked him and made his way toward them, followed by the man carrying his luggage. But there was a queue of people waiting outside the telephone booths, and with sudden decision Mark turned and hailed a cab. He had waited half an hour, and Regan was always pitilessly punctual.

There had been some mistake; she may have been misinformed by the cable office or else by the officials at the pier. But he would be home in fifteen minutes. Excitement, which had ebbed while he waited for Regan, now returned, and he found himself trembling as he pressed against the cab window and peered at the dingy and teeming vistas of Seventh Avenue.

"It's standing," he muttered. "Actually standing!"

(Continued on Page 75)

FOR THE Lift OF A Lifeline

... there's nothing that does the trick like Life-Bra. Its exclusive design puts verve in every curve. Gives your upper Lifeline the firm, alluring contours of youth because it Lifts—Molds—Corrects—Holds—all at the same time. Whatever your figure type, there's a Life-Bra "for the Lift of Your Lifeline." Be fitted and see ... at all better stores and shops. $1.25 to $3.50.

THE FORMFIT CO., CHICAGO, NEW YORK

Life-Bra

A Formfit CREATION

Home is where you wear your slippers...

...they should be worthy of your home

Above all, you want your home... to stand for the finest in everything. And since nothing means "home" quite so much as your slippers, they should be Daniel Green Slippers. For only Daniel Green puts into slippers the "stay-in-shape" quality and superb workmanship of a fine shoe. Outstanding beauty, comfort, and quality ...make Daniel Green the slippers that "belong" in your home. Daniel Green Slippers come in many other styles and colors.

The Cara

above, in sizes AA width, 4½ to 10. B width, 3½ to 10, around $4.50.

The Majorette

at left, sizes AA width, 4½ to 10. B width, 3½ to 10, around $4.50.

Daniel Green

COMFY SLIPPERS

Dolgeville, New York

"Please, DUZ, may I borrow your backyard for just one washday?"

Writes Mrs. F. E. Davis
Tuckahoe, N.Y.

"I want to show you how much more DUZ does than your ads say. All they ever talk about is towels, overalls and undies.

"But that's not half of it. Everybody knows that DUZ can't be beat for getting towels white and cleaning work clothes fast. And they know it's safer for pretty colored undies than any other big-name washday soaps.

"But I'm fairly busting to show folks other DUZables that flap in the breeze on my washline . . .

"Do you see those corduroy britches? The boys come home from playing and half the dirt in the lot is ground into their pants. But I just pop those pants into a frothy rich lather of DUZ suds and they come out spanking clean. DUZ sure takes a lot of grief out of my life!

"Look at little Allison's party dress! It's pretty gay for a hand-me-down that's seen plenty of soil and plenty of washdays! And I give the credit to DUZ. It's a blessing for doing up pretty colored dresses. DUZ gets the dirt out clean and quick and keeps the pretty colors more sparkling and bright.

"I take a heap of pride in my curtains! DUZ does soot-stained kitchen curtains white as fresh snow, yet it's safe for fine net and organdy. You bet I'm a DUZ fan!

"I even DUZ the leaves on my plants to keep them clean and shiny! You ought to spread out and show folks no washday soap going can beat DUZ for getting all sorts of dirty things clean and doing all kinds of nice things safe!"

DUZ does Everything

—and I mean Everything!

(Continued from Page 73)

He told the driver to stop at a florist's and emerged carrrying freesias and late tulips whose fragrance went to his head. It seemed a long time since he had bought flowers for a woman, and he smiled as the driver caught his eye.

On East 53rd Street a late sun quivered along the walls. Would Regan guess it was he who had rung the bell? Would she come down the stairs to meet him? The buzzer sounded and he went in, lugging suitcases. The smell of fresh paint reminded him of the ship; irrelevantly at this moment he thought of Perry, deliriously reunited with his wife. Regan's apartment was on the second floor, and the door was opened for him by a Negro maid, small, neat, middle-aged.

She stared at him in concern. "Colonel Bycroft? Is Mrs. Bycroft with you?"

"I must have missed her. I waited half an hour, then decided that we must have got our signals crossed." He set his suitcases on the floor and felt suddenly limp and breathless, as if he'd drunk too much coffee.

The woman clasped her hands in distress. "But she went to the pier to meet you. Oh, what a pity!"

He looked at her. "I don't seem to remember you from my last visit."

"I'm Octavia Evans, and I've been with Mrs. Bycroft a little more than a year. Can I get you something to eat or drink? Mrs. Bycroft should be home any minute."

"Nothing, thanks." He held the flowers out to her. "Would you put these in water?"

She took them tenderly in her black hands. Slowly the tension in Mark's nerves began to lessen.

He looked round him at a room he barely remembered from his last leave. A square room lined with books in expensive bindings. Paneled walls, a blue rug on the floor, everything elegant and austere. He felt that its owner might appear at any moment, unheralded, from its cool, sunlit void.

It was not Regan, but his son Neddy who appeared unheralded and stood silently gazing at him. Octavia Evans glanced at the child, then moved quietly out of the room, closing the door after her.

Mark made an uncertain movement. "Hullo, son! Remember me?"

"Yes," said Neddy expressionlessly. He looked past Mark to something beyond. "There's your picture," he said, and came into the room. "Over there on the bookcase."

Mark turned. "So it is." The photograph, taken when he joined the Army in 1941, faced him with a frozen smile. Why had he smiled? How inane it seemed now, that smile, the joke forgotten, the occasion past!

Neddy stood beside him. "There's another picture of you in my room. In my picture you're not wearing a hat."

Mark wondered nervously whether he should kiss the child. Would he like it or would he turn shy and rebuff him as he had done last time? He reflected, remorsefully, How little I've thought of him these past years! He's been here in the background, shadowy, an abstraction almost, one who has had to wait upon the future to achieve substance and meaning.

He temporized. "I'm glad your mother didn't take you to the pier to meet me, because then I'd have missed you both."

"She said I was to stay here and entertain you until she got back."

The words settled into Mark's consciousness with a sort of cumulative shock. "What? But why would she expect you to entertain me if ——" He stopped, thinking, No use trying to straighten it out at this point.

He held out his hand. "Show me around, will you, Neddy? It's been so long since I was here. Tell me what's new."

The boy took his hand and they walked toward the bookcases. "Those are new. Aren't they pretty? Mother won't let me touch them because the bindings are so expensive."

"And that picture?" said Mark, coming to a halt before it. "I don't seem to remember it."

"It's a Braque. I gave it to mother on her birthday."

"And I suppose you picked it out yourself?"

"Mr. Symes helped me. He said he knew mother would like it, and she did like it."

"Who is Mr. Symes?"

"He's a gentleman," said Neddy indifferently.

Mark gazed at the painting, a handsomely framed and, he guessed, fairly faithful reproduction. Where had his six-year-old son learned to utter the names of great painters with such glibness? Amused, he returned to the picture. Regan's interest in art had always fascinated him as he watched it develop by what he recognized as a series of happy accidents from the naïve to the esoteric. She was not artistic, nor was she drawn toward the moody companionship of artists. Her tastes had been formed by fortuitous contact with excellence, aided by a shrewd judgment. But it was taste, good taste, the very best of taste; that was her real creed, her goal in all she did or aspired to do. In the early days of their marriage Mark had alternated between irritation and amusement at what he considered a peculiar form of snobbery, but he had soon discovered that it was snobbery based on a powerful will, springing from some urgent need of her character—the need to be admired, to be obeyed. Beauty, intelligence, grace, all of which she possessed, were apparently not sufficient. Mark's own reaction to painting or to music was usually silent; he felt things simply and directly, and when he did venture to express himself, usually managed to make some stupendous mistake, as when he attributed to Haydn a symphony of Brahms. "You're such a clodhopper," Regan told him in shamed disgust, and he had laughed, too much in love with her to mind. Now, as he gazed at the Braque with his son's hand in his, Mark experienced the old, lost, speechless delight, and it brought tolerance and good humor. Imagine caring whether a person's love for beauty were true or false! As if the question made any difference to beauty.

Neddy was pulling at his hand. "Here are some more books, papa. And the Chinese Buddha."

They toured the room, and presently Mark saw that it was entirely changed from the time of his last visit. He could not have said what had been taken from it and what added; except for the presence of his portrait and the child at his side, he felt that he had had little share in its history. The thought brought a twinge of sadness, but not of resentment, for he had banished resentment, he told himself, forever.

"Now," said Neddy, "we'll go and look at mother's room."

Like the parlor which they had left, this was filled with light and elegance, but so orderly, so self-conscious in every detail that Mark hesitated on the threshold, feeling that his presence, and Neddy's, was an intrusion.

The boy must have sensed this, for he walked on tiptoe and spoke in a hushed voice: "Mother's clothes are in that closet, and her shoes are in that one, and she keeps throat lozenges on that little table near her bed. Feel the coverlet!" He laid his small hand on the gleaming silk. "It's so smooth!"

Mark stood beside the desk and examined a pile of newspaper clippings. Most of these were concerned with lectures and discussions which Regan had given or in which she had participated. Lectures on the Negro problem and the Jewish problem and the problem of colonial people all over the world. There were notices relating to himself, with cuts showing him as the recipient of medals and citations. He guessed that Regan had been preparing them to paste into a scrapbook which lay open on the desk. Mark smiled as he glanced at the neat piles of letters, the calendar heavily penciled with tentative dates, the morocco-covered pocket dictionary, the cubbyholes stuffed with documents of all descriptions, all the paraphernalia of a busy, energetic, public-spirited citizen. There was also a photograph of Neddy as a baby, and another of Regan's parents, but none of himself. There used to be one, he remembered suddenly, a small one taken during his last year at high school. He wondered what had happened to it. Moving away from the desk, he felt the subtle presence of his wife, and it made his blood leap. His glance sought her in the four corners of the room, in the quilted satin chair beside the window, among the snowy pillows of the big bed. On the mantelpiece were framed snapshots of people he didn't know.

"Those are friends of mother's," explained Neddy. "In the country, last year."

"Where are you?"

"I wasn't there. I stayed with Aunt Hester."

Mark returned the snapshots to their place between the clock and a corsage of wilted gardenias in a tumbler. He wondered, Where is the past? What becomes of it? And he found himself remembering it with intense seriousness, remembering the house in Connecticut, wild iris growing beside stone walls, brown and black cattle standing in the pastures, like a Breughel canvas, and friends and lovers in summers of peace. While it lasted it had seemed eternal. But the war had killed the past as surely as it had killed his friends, and now he thought about those friends as he had not dared let himself think about them before. He thought about them as they had been, laughing and drinking in the garden, or by the fire. Well, they were dead, and the past which had contained them was dead. It was morbid to brood, morbid and wrong. Here in America the buildings stood unscathed, gardens flowered, fires sent up their

"Miss Gaylord, there has been—er—some question of your loyalty to the firm!"

Every Woman Needs Plenty of Hand-Knit Sweaters for Spring

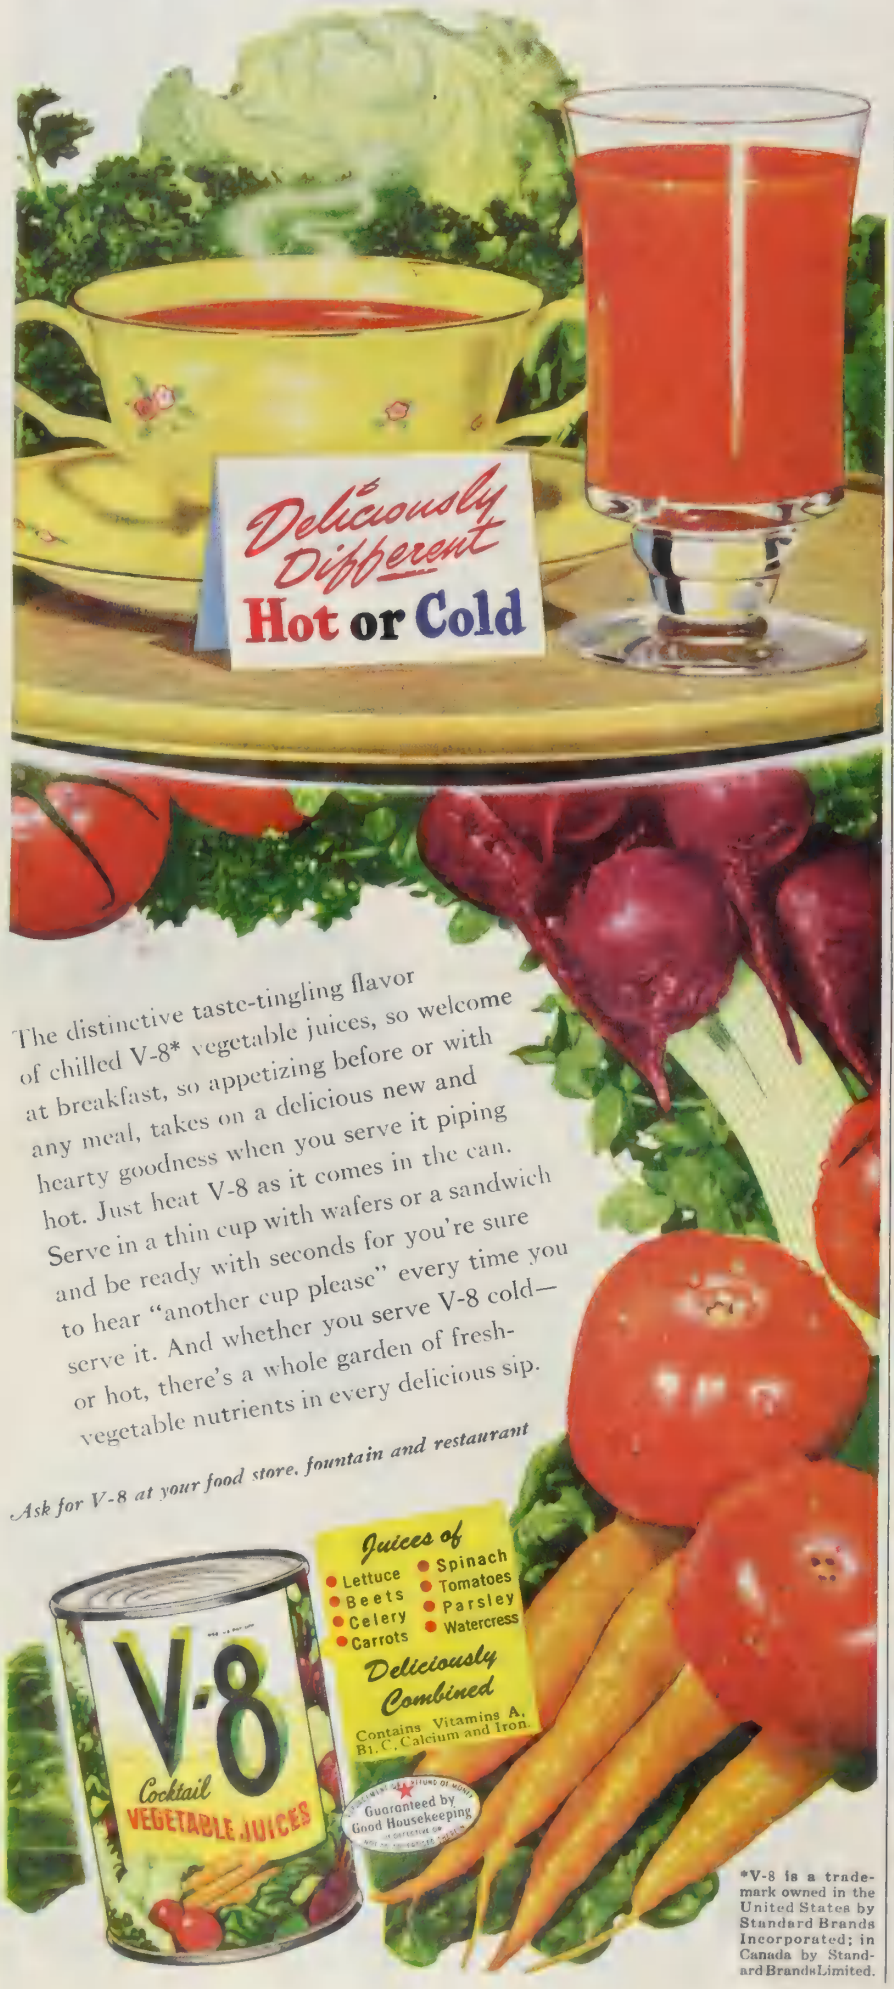
Knit them of FLEISHER'S YARN

Knit a peplum sweater . . . to wear with a short skirt for important afternoons, a long skirt for important evenings. Costlier-looking when hand-knit of Fleisher's Fleecy Zephyr.

Knit a yoke front sweater . . . to dress up suits. Smarter when hand-knit of Fleisher's Sock and Sport Yarn.

Knit an all-purpose cardigan . . . for walking, golfing, or lounging on cool evenings. Wears better, washes better if hand-knit of Fleisher's Yarn.

FOR ALL YOUR KNITTING



Fleisher's Yarn

THERE'S NOTHING FINER

Twenty-five cents sent to Fleisher's will bring Fleisher's Sweater Book, Vol. 76 with instructions for these sweaters and many others.

230 Fifth Ave., New York 1, N. Y., Dept. JF3

"Wake-Up" your taste with V-8 vegetable juices

The distinctive taste-tingling flavor of chilled V-8* vegetable juices, so welcome at breakfast, so appetizing before or with any meal, takes on a delicious new and hearty goodness when you serve it piping hot. Just heat V-8 as it comes in the can. Serve in a thin cup with wafers or a sandwich and be ready with seconds for you're sure to hear "another cup please" every time you serve it. And whether you serve V-8 cold—or hot, there's a whole garden of fresh-vegetable nutrients in every delicious sip.

Ask for V-8 at your food store, fountain and restaurant

*V-8 is a trademark owned in the United States by Standard Brands Incorporated; in Canada by Standard Brands Limited.

golden sparks; but the dead were not here to see or to understand. They were denied forever the sun of winter and summer's shade, and the survivors moved in a new world, and strangers occupied the picture frames.

Why didn't Regan come home? What was keeping her? How could she have missed him at the pier? He longed for her with a sort of panic.

Neddy took his hand again. "Now let's go and see my room."

There the tour ended, and as the man sat down on the small bed the child sat on the floor and set about his own affairs, which involved a cardboard fort and plastic men. Do I love him? Mark wondered, watching the preoccupied face. Does he love me?

There, half an hour later, Regan found them.

VII

MARK heard rain beating against the windows and dreamed that he was in Germany and that rain was falling over the land, returning it to a primordial sludge. Out of the rain a Negro woman came toward him carrying flowers and crying piteously, "What a pity, oh, what a pity!" He wanted to ask her what it was she bewailed, but fear overcame him. He woke in semidarkness and listened to the drumming sound of the rain as it mingled with the noise of traffic and voices from the street. The sounds made a design outside the boundaries of the room; the quiet within seemed to extend beyond closed doors and he lay wondering whether he was alone in the house. Regan had dressed and left the room without waking him; the silk coverlet felt cool under his hand, and now he remembered what Neddy had said yesterday:

"Mother told me I was to stay here and entertain you till she got back."

Yet when she appeared at last and Mark took her in his arms, she had exclaimed, "Mark! Imagine, I went to the wrong pier!" He had scarcely listened. Unmindful of Neddy's perplexed stare, he held Regan against his breast until she cried, laughing, "You're smothering me!"

But memory wakened with a nervous twitching of his body under the bedclothes and a further deepening of silence. He stared at the chandelier where light gathered in fugitive gleams, and reminded himself how often he had lain in this bed with Regan and contemplated those radiant drops of light. That had been in the past. There had been little time, last night, to revive the past, that luminous island which lay so far behind Regan and himself. They had left Neddy with the maid and had gone to dinner at a restaurant where Regan, laughing, begged him not to overdo the Martinis. There, in the midst of strangers, they talked for the most part of inconsequential matters; they might themselves have been little better than strangers to each other, and Mark had caught himself wondering whether that were not so, after all. Then her beauty had come upon him like the moon out of the trees, bringing him the unfailing, fresh experience he associated with her and with no one else, that shock of sweetness which held him to her in spite of everything. He'd said abruptly, "Let's go home, I can't talk like this to you. I'm crazy for you—crazy." She had not shrunk from his gaze, nor, later, from his arms, but her art was not equal to the final deception, when he recognized, with a dull sense of having always known it, that she did not love him.

He heard the telephone ringing in the parlor and Regan's voice, crisp and clear, answering it. There was a smell of coffee and he remembered that in the old days at home they used to breakfast in the kitchen in pajamas, with Neddy crawling about on the floor. This morning some instinct bade him bathe and shave and put on his clothes as if for a journey, and he was glad he did, for he found Regan not only dressed but wearing a hat.

She came out of the pantry carrying a coffeepot which she put on a bridge table between the windows. The table was set with a cloth, his flowers stood in a bowl in the center.

She said gaily, "Neddy and I have had our breakfast, and Octavia's taken him to school."

Try Duff's Waffle Mix for—

Tangy Rarebit Waffles

IDEA!

For a Quick Snack . . . when friends drop in. Serve crisp waffles topped with bacon, tomato slices, and creamy rarebit sauce. For perfect waffles, use Duff's!

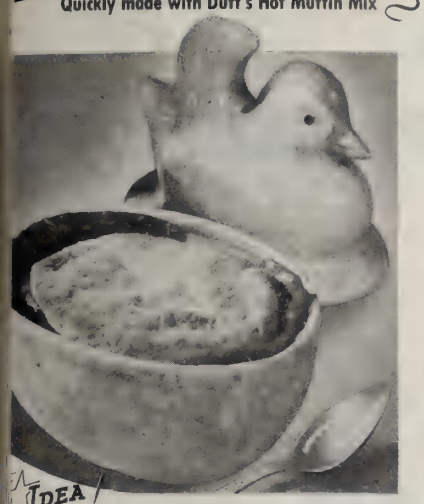
JUST ADD WATER -that's all!

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

A PRODUCT OF AMERICAN HOME FOODS, INC.

Vanilla Pudding that's My-T-Fine

Easy recipe for Vanilla Party Pudding: Prepare My-T-Fine Vanilla Pudding according to simple directions on the package. Arrange six or more tiny colored gumdrops spoke-fashion around edge of pudding, top with spoonful of marshmallow whip and bright-colored gumdrop. You'll love it!



5 delicious My-T-Fine desserts

Vanilla
Chocolate
Butterscotch
Nut Chocolate
Lemon Pie Filling

Savory Meat-Pie

Quickly made with Duff's Hot Muffin Mix

IDEA!

For a Hearty Meal . . . when left-over meats are on hand. Combine meat with fresh vegetables, and bake under a tender, flaky crust, made with Duff's.

JUST ADD WATER -that's all!

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

A PRODUCT OF AMERICAN HOME FOODS, INC.

"Looks as if I might have missed you too. Why the hat?"

"I must go to Hester. She's wretched." And he listened while she embarked on details of her sister's chronic asthma, each attack of which was followed by a deep psychic depression when the sufferer wanted no one near her—no one, that is, except her sister Regan.

"But didn't Hester know I was coming home?"

"Of course. But she can't help these attacks, and I haven't the heart to cross her when she's so ill."

Regan went back to the pantry and returned with toast and an electric egg boiler. So he was to be deserted, first by his son and then by his wife, on his first day home. Mark watched her nervously arranging dishes and knives, and he saw that his scrutiny troubled her. She spilled the salt and dropped a napkin on the floor. He waited until there was nothing further for her to do, then said:

"I'm sorry about Hester, but I'd rather not talk about her for a moment, if you don't mind. Do you know what I was planning on the boat coming over, Regan?"

"No, what?"

"I was planning to go down to the country, to our house, with you and Neddy. It must be perfect there now. I haven't mown a lawn since God knows when!"

She stared at the flowers. "I should have told you. I sold the house."

"You did what!"

"Yes, I sold it last year. Oh, I should have written you about it. I meant to, but kept putting it off—all the tedious details—and I didn't want to bother you. But I just couldn't bear the place after John Halloran was killed, and the Severs boy next door. It seemed so desolate. I thought you'd feel the same way about it."

The tree of silence bears the fruit of peace.

He sat frozenly thinking that of course she had every right to sell the house. It was hers, left her by her father. But he had been fond of it, and the thought of its being lost left him, for a minute, speechless.

Regan said in a controlled voice, "I'd got to hate the place, Mark. Everything seemed different, changed. I could never have gone back there to live."

"A lot of things seem to have changed. I'll have to get used to the idea. I'm sorry, though, about the house." Just to speak of it like that, casually, took his breath. She gave him a swift glance.

"It didn't occur to me that you cared for it particularly. It wasn't beautiful, or even valuable."

No, it was neither beautiful nor valuable, but it was the house where his son was born, it was the place Mark had most wanted to come back to, after the war. With an effort at calmness, he said, "I don't understand why you didn't tell me, why you waited until now."

"I should have told you. But I had a chance to sell last year, when real-estate values were high. I thought I might as well. Do sit down and have your breakfast."

He had risen; now he sat down again and watched her pour his coffee. In the silence which ensued he felt the distance between them as something perilous, but when he tried to speak his lips felt dry. She was graceful with her little wifely attentions, retrieving his egg from the boiler, fetching him matches. And last night she had lain in his arms, her body responsive to his, her face set in a mask of dislike, her eyes black with protest.

In falsehood either the body betrays the spirit, or the spirit betrays the body: so much Mark had discovered through the rough and ultimate truth of war; he wished now that he had never discovered it, because the past had been sweet in spite of falsehood, perhaps because of falsehood. But having made his discovery, he could not ignore it, and in his

(Continued on Page 79)

fish THAT'S delish

French's WORCESTERSHIRE SAUCE gives wonderful flavor

For Baked Fish: Pour off all but 2 tbs. of the drippings from the fish and blend in 1 or 2 tbs. flour. Add slowly 1 cup hot stock or bouillon. Season with 3 tsp. French's Worcestershire Sauce.

TOP-NOTCH QUALITY AT half the price

Say Shefford for fine cheese

slice it

melt it spread it

PLAIN or Fancy

2 ways to serve potatoes and cheese

Scalloped Potatoes with Cheese

3 tablespoons Blue Bonnet Margarine or butter
3 tablespoons flour
1 teaspoon salt
2 cups milk
4 cups (8 medium-sized) raw sliced potatoes
6 ounces (1 cup) grated Shefford Chevel*

Melt margarine or butter; add flour and salt; stir until well blended. Add milk slowly, stirring constantly until thick and smooth. Alternate layers of sliced potatoes, white sauce and Chevel in a 1½-quart casserole. Bake in a moderate oven at 375° F. for 1 hour. Makes 6 servings.

Chevel is a trade-mark owned by Shefford Cheese Co., Inc.*

Potato Cheese Rosettes

1 teaspoon salt
4 tablespoons Blue Bonnet Margarine or butter
2 tablespoons milk
1 egg
4 cups mashed potatoes
2¼ ounces (¼ cup) finely grated Shefford Chevel

Add salt, margarine or butter, milk and egg to mashed potatoes. Beat well. Force through pastry tube onto a well-greased baking sheet to form individual rosettes. Sprinkle each rosette with grated Chevel. Bake in a hot oven at 450° F. for 20 minutes, or until brown. Makes 6 servings.

You can call it potatoes and cheese, potatoes au gratin, or pommes de terre au fromage. But any way you make it, it comes out better if you make it with Shefford Cheese. It's that good honest, real-cheese flavor of Shefford. Nineteen varieties in the Shefford family—and every flavor based on the solid food values of good milk expertly made into fine cheese. Be sure it's Shefford you get.

SHEFFORD CHEESE CO., INC., Green Bay, Wis.

... and wouldn't you Know... she's wearing

Connies

... for she takes pride in looking lithe and young... dotes on shoes that look fresh and fanciful... yet she insists on quality. Connies, with their foot flattering tricks, their dependable leathers and careful craftsmanship, are her BUYword. You'll see why ... when you see ... and try on ... the new CONNIES.

$5 and $6
some styles slightly higher

Connie
SHOE CREATIONS

WOHL SHOE COMPANY • SAINT LOUIS, MISSOURI

(Continued from Page 77)

refusal to do so lay the difference between himself and Regan.

He said presently, "There are several things I find puzzling. One is how you happened to go to the wrong pier yesterday."

Here was Regan's chance—another chance, one of the numerous chances presented to her since her arrival at the apartment yesterday evening—to come out with the truth, at last to extricate herself from the errors of the past and the hypocrisy of the present. Instead she answered, "But I told you!" and immediately began to tell him all over again, while he broke an egg into a cup, and heard, at his elbow, the steady vibration of rain against the window.

Regan's story as she told it was simple and brief, but the story she could not, as yet, bring herself to tell was neither brief nor simple. That story began long before yesterday. It began four years ago at the time of Mark's first departure overseas, on the day when she admitted to herself how little she missed him, how untrammeled, how exhilarating life had become since he went away. If there had been any doubt of this in her mind it vanished during the few days of his first leave; but then some sense of fair play and the shuddering thought that this might, after all, be the last time she would see him had given her the wit to pretend and to send him back to war, happy and reassured. Just how happy, she was to learn when she got his first letter; she had had the grace to weep a little when she read it.

But a month later she met William Symes, and he effectively resolved any doubts which might have disturbed her heart if not her mind. Regan had wanted to write and ask for a divorce at the earliest possible moment, but word reached her that Mark had been wounded and cited for extraordinary gallantry. The lovers decided they had better wait. They waited. Mark got another medal and the newspapers carried his picture and the story of his achievement. Friends called on Regan. They praised him, and praised her for her courage in his absence. It became more and more difficult to face the truth. Then the war ended and instead of coming home, as he might have done, Mark chose to stay with the forces of occupation. In his letter to Regan he explained, with a simplicity she had come to resent, that he felt it was up to him to remain until he was sure his end of the job was complete. The delay infuriated and frightened Regan. She was infatuated with Symes, and dreaded the thought of losing him.

The interminable absence came to an end, and on the day that Mark was to arrive in New York she realized, with a shock, that she was totally unprepared to face him. Throughout the preceding day she was consumed with nervous revulsion. What was she going to say? What were the words one used on such an occasion? She was a fool not to have given him some hint of her feelings before this—a fool not to have prepared him somewhat for what lay in store. Instead, she had written him affectionate, noncommittal letters filled with accounts of her life with Neddy, and of her social and civic activities. Now that the hour of decision had arrived, she was in danger of losing her very capable head. The instinct to procrastinate increased with every second that brought their meeting nearer. Was it absolutely essential that she go to the pier to meet him? They had been separated for almost four years, and would shortly be separated again, this time for the rest of their lives. Why bother to fake rapture at this eleventh hour? Better let him come back to the apartment alone and talk to Neddy, while she walked in the park and clarified her ideas.

Between the moment of her arriving at this decision and the moment of putting it

(Continued on Page 81)

GLOVES GALORE

FOR every summer print—a matching pair of gloves! Wilhela Cushman's pages this month show this charming fashion . . . and the Journal Reference Library brings you the patterns to make your own. See the assortment of glove patterns listed below, and order the ones you want.

JOURNAL REFERENCE LIBRARY

GLOVES TO MAKE

2223. New Journal Slip-On Glove Pattern. To make gloves of printed crepe or cotton. 5c.
2166. Glove Pattern. To make gloves of satin, taffeta or printed crepe, with rayon jersey palms and finger linings, for better fit. 5c.
2215. Shortie-Glove Pattern. To make shortie gloves of white piqué, crisp gingham or satin, with rayon palms in white or black jersey. 5c.
1941. John Frederics' Glove Pattern. Gloves of wool or rayon jersey. 5c.

OTHER PATTERNS FOR THINGS TO WEAR

2217. Sash-Tie Blouse. Surplice style. A happy choice to wear with a bolero suit. 5c.
2218. Sleeveless Blouse. With a bow neckline. Make it in a gay color to dress up a black suit. 5c.
2219. Jersey Slipover. This has cap sleeves, a rolled neckline and a wrap-around sash. 5c.
2222. Dinner Skirt and Blouse. The skirt is full and the blouse has drop shoulders. 5c.
2224. Spring Blouse. Delightful in a bright print—cap sleeves, boat neckline. 5c.
2161. Sleeveless Overblouse. To be made from a straight piece of material. 5c.
2167. Overblouse. Easy to make—with cap sleeves and a peplum. 5c.
2216. Sleeveless Weskit. Make it of crisp cotton and fasten with a row of flat buttons down the front. Ideal with suits. 5c.
2162. Tie Snood. Make it of soft jersey with a jeweled edge. 5c.
2170. Striped Satin Scarf. With flaring ends. 5c.
2165. Triangle Scarf and Matching Fan. 5c.
2211. Three-in-One Scarf. Four loops at each end—each of a different-colored satin, sequin studded. This is equally effective as a sash or a bustle. 5c.
3005. Felt Beret and Taffeta Neck Bow. Designed for the sub-deb. 5c.
2213. Bustle Bow. A deep swath of bias taffeta around the hips with a two-fold pouf in back. 5c.
2096. Feed Bag. Make one in white piqué to carry with your summer cottons. 5c.
2097. 8-Twist Hat. Just a strip of checked gingham twisted into a figure 8. 5c.
2098. Cereal-Box Handbag. Cover the box with checked gingham or taffeta, attach grosgrain ribbon handles—and you have a smart bag. 5c.
3001. Felt Suspenders and Matching Half-Hat. Easy-to-make felt accessories that girls delight in wearing. 5c.
3002. Weskit and Matching Beanie. Size 12. 5c.
3003. Two-Color Blouse and Matching Tam. Make these of velveteen. Attractive in light and dark combinations of jersey. Blouse has a tie collar, the tam has a drawstring which ties. Size 12. 5c.
2212. Triangle Scarf. Made of three triangles, cleverly cut, of two shades of ribbon. For suit or dress neckline. 5c.
2087. Mother's Apron. Full pointed skirt with handy pocket; protective bib with bow-tied neckstring. 10c.
2088. Daughter's Apron. Exactly like mother's (2087) in sizes 2, 4 and 6. 10c.

We will gladly send any of these patterns if you'll order by name and number. They will be mailed anywhere in the United States and Canada upon receipt of stamps, cash, check or money order. Do not send stamped, addressed envelopes or Victory Stamps. Readers in all foreign countries should send International Reply Coupons, purchased at their post office. Please address all requests to the Reference Library, Ladies' Home Journal, Philadelphia 5, Penna.

Only one soap gives your skin this exciting Bouquet

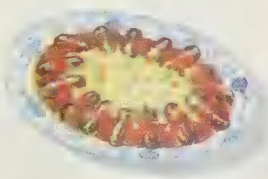
Learn the secret of so many popular girls' fragrant appeal!

Do you want to weave a spell around his heart—to charm him with a scent as subtle as sweet music? Then do as popular girls have done for seventy-six romantic years. Bathe with Cashmere Bouquet Soap—the soap that points up your appeal with the fragrance men love. Its enchanting bouquet comes from a secret wedding of rare perfumes, more costly by far than you'd expect to find in any soap. Be exciting! Be enchanting! Bathe every day with Cashmere Bouquet Soap. Lovely for your complexion, too.

10¢

3 CAKES FOR 27¢

ADORNS YOUR SKIN WITH THE FRAGRANCE MEN LOVE



Cashmere Bouquet

CASHMERE BOUQUET

This quick, "Country-Kitchen" supper

LEADS OFF WITH OLD-FASHIONED, CHICKENY NOODLE SOUP!

"COUNTRY-KITCHEN" SUPPER
Lipton's Noodle Soup
Creole Sausages
Succotash (canned or frozen)
Assorted Fresh Vegetable Relish
Popovers (prepared mix)
Jelly Roll Lipton Tea

DID YOU ever go out to grandma's for a wonderful country supper like this? Well, you'll be mighty pleased to find how quick and easy it is to fix.

To begin with, your soup course—Lipton's Noodle Soup—takes just 7 minutes from package to table! And what's more—it's as rich and chickeny-tasting as the soup grandma simmered for hours in her own soup kettle. Lipton's is a real, old-fashioned noodle soup—with oodles of tender egg noodles in its golden, parsley-flecked broth.

This grand soup mix is thrifty, too! One 10¢ package will serve 4 to 6—with the grandest, fresh-cooked noodle soup since grandma's day.

CREOLE SAUSAGES

(An old-time dish that's sure to be as triumphant as those hearty bowls of Lipton's Soup.) Cover and cook 12 sausages in cold pan with enough water to cover bottom of pan, for 15 minutes. Remove cover and cook until brown. Remove from pan and place on hot platter. Pour off all but 2 tablespoons of fat. Cook 4 tablespoons each chopped green pepper and chopped onion in fat until soft. Stir in 1 cup prepared tomato sauce, ½ cup water, ⅛ teaspoon thyme, and dash of Worcestershire Sauce. Heat to boiling. Pour over sausages. Serves 4. Put Lipton's Soup on your grocery list today—have it on hand to serve with most any meal!

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

10¢

ALSO IN THRIFTY 3-PACK CARTONS

LIPTON'S CONTINENTAL NOODLE SOUP

Made by the makers of that brisk Lipton Tea

(Continued from Page 79)

into effect, Regan changed her mind half a dozen times. When Neddy pleaded to go with her she put him off by saying he must stay home and entertain papa in case she should happen to miss him. But to Octavia she said simply, "I'm going to the pier to meet the colonel."

She walked up Madison Avenue, across Fifth to the park. There she strolled and sat on a bench for the better part of an hour. She felt the ticking of the watch on her wrist, and watched the afternoon light glide down the buildings on 59th Street, and recalled with bitterness how she had walked here a few weeks before, waiting for Symes, who had just returned from his trip to the Middle East. He was filled with large, important affairs, the less important of which he confided to her. And he had brought her a dozen beautiful handkerchiefs from Lisbon. Pride in him, jealousy of the work which took him away from her on these mysterious errands, had warred in Regan's breast. Mark must give her a divorce, at once. Now as she walked alone her anxiety mounted to a fever. She imagined she heard Mark's ship hooting in the river, and pictured him standing at the rail, searching for her among the crowd on the pier. His face formed before her—dark, smiling, eager—and she thought rebelliously, One can't be expected to be faithful when there is no feeling left. She belonged to Symes; Symes was her real love; and she began to argue with herself that love alone is chaste and that out of chasteness she must reject Mark.

She looked at her watch and saw that she had twenty minutes in which to reach the pier, if she took a cab. But by the time she had gained the street she changed her mind and went instead to a drugstore, from where she telephoned her lover.

"Bill? Oh, Bill, I can't meet him!"

Symes' voice sounded chillingly calm. "But he'll be expecting you, Regan. There's no point in building up hostility at the start, is there? Besides, wouldn't it be cowardly to avoid meeting him at the pier?"

"What am I going to say to him?"

"Haven't you thought it all out?"

"Oh, yes, of course—a thousand times. But it all sounds so feeble now."

"Well, you'll find the words, all right. You are the most marvelously articulate person—you know you are!" His voice became caressing. "Be calm, darling. Calm, and kind. After all, it's not exactly the poor guy's fault, is it?"

He was thinking of his rival as the distinguished soldier, the hero; Regan frowned. "I wish you'd give me some idea of how to set about telling him."

"I wouldn't tell him much of anything today, if I were you," he told her. "There's no point in rushing it. I think we agreed on that."

"He's sure to ask questions. He can be terribly shrewd." She broke off, angry at herself for trembling.

"Listen, sweet." Symes' voice sounded almost paternal, burdened with his weight of understanding. "Don't rush things! Don't mention us at all at this stage of the game. I can't see—nor can Dick Sparrow—that a confession would serve any purpose. And naming names can have bad psychological consequences. Be conciliatory. Take your time. Use all your tact."

"But I've got to tell him sometime; why not do it right away?"

"Well"—his voice took on a slight edge—"tell him anything, make any excuse you want for leaving him, but don't bring my name into it."

"Bill!"

"Darling, try to understand my position. I have got to watch my step. I dare not risk a row, and all the subsequent, inevitable publicity. Nor can you." The old caressing note crept back into his voice. "It's a tragic situation, but you know how I feel about you, about us."

They talked for a few minutes in incoherent, passionate murmurs, then said good-by. Reassured, even exalted by this conversation with her lover, Regan glanced at her watch. The boat would have docked by now, and Mark be on his way to the apartment. She stepped into the fading sunlight and summoned a taxi to take her home.

Mark listened to a different story, the story of her journey to the wrong pier, of her fruitless attempt to catch him at the right one; of her grievous disappointment at missing him. When she had finished this second recital which he had heard once already, he said slowly:

"Why, if you were going to the pier to meet me, did you tell Neddy that he must stay home to keep me company?"

She had forgotten this. Well, here now was the moment; there had been others more propitious, but they had all slipped by unseized. Fate and Mark had intervened—so had the presence of Neddy and, to a lesser degree, that of the colored servant Octavia. The moments had slipped by; they vanished into hours, into the evening, into night. Tomorrow, Regan had promised herself with desperate finality, tomorrow morning when Octavia has taken Neddy to school I'll tell him. I shall just tell him I don't want to live with him any more. That's all. No excuses, no apologies, no explanations—just a plain statement of fact. And long after Mark had fallen asleep beside her she lay shaping and polishing the plain statement of fact, reducing it to an unequivocal simplicity, her gaze fixed on the complicated glory of the chandelier above the bed. In the morning she had risen and dressed without disturbing him and, with the maid and Neddy safely out of the house, awaited the propitious moment.

Was this it? Mark was looking at her steadily. She contrived a smile. "I'm afraid

---

There is one thing certain about a well-dressed woman: she has taken trouble. And to take trouble is to strengthen character.

—ROBERT LYND: Irish Digest

---

I lied to Neddy. I had to. I wanted to see you alone."

His voice became formal. "I seem to be rather dense. There are a number of things I find rather hard to understand. For instance, your selling the house. I might have understood your doing that, for it was your house, though I'd always looked on it as being mine, too, and Neddy's. But I'd have expected you to do it differently, somehow. Your taste has always been so impeccable."

Was he mocking her? She felt a gust of anger. "Listen, Mark. When one is left alone for four years one learns to make decisions for oneself. I learned!" He remained silent and she went on quickly: "You should know how time, and separation, bring changes in things—in people ——" She broke off, watching him, waiting for some signal which would help her to come out with the statement which she'd been all night composing. But he said nothing. He was not looking at her now, but at the bowl of freesias and tulips which he'd bought yesterday on his way home from the pier. Regan began again: "After all, there must have been decisions which you had to make, over there, during these years. I wouldn't blame you. I'd have understood."

"Decisions?"

"Well, changes of feeling, doubts about the past, and about the future too. One can't live through four years of war without something happening to change one's whole conception of life."

This was very far from the plain statement of fact which she had intended to make, but she had not bargained for his silence, for his refusal to help her by question, or glance, or accusation. He was letting her do it alone, and she felt that it was deliberate on his part, a sort of revenge for what he must already have guessed. She paused, standing before him in her summer hat, her smart linen suit, her air of patient determination.

"Surely," she said at last, "you didn't expect to come home and find everything, and everyone, exactly what they were when you went away?"

"Not exactly, no."

"Well, then?"

"I was so sick of ruins—of ruined houses, ruined people—and I had a craving for wholeness."

"I don't think I know quite what you mean by wholeness."

He gave her a terrible look. "No, I don't think you do."

"It would mean different things to different people."

"It does." He rose and stood facing her. There was something powerful about him, something menacing too. "Wholeness, to me, means the past, the present and the future. To the people I've seen in Europe it means only the present—it means today. What does it mean to you?"

"Was the past so good? Are you being honest?"

"Are you being honest?"

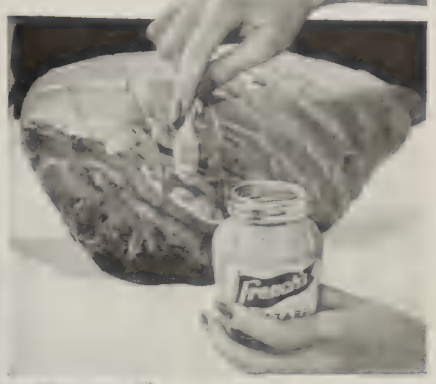
"I'm trying, but you won't give me a chance!"

"Does that trouble you? I haven't been around to deny you any chances, have I?"

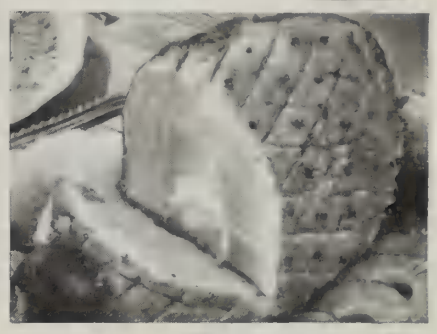
"Nor have I denied you yours!" She was on the offensive, her voice just missing shrillness. "Everything is changed, and you might as well accept it. I don't doubt you're changed too. I haven't asked any questions, I don't mean to ask any. What is this past you talk about? Our life before the war? Our lives during the war? Our lives to come? Four years is a long time. Can't you see?"

He stared at her, his head lowered in a curious, wary attitude. "I think I see. I think I know what you're trying to say, but I'm not going to say it for you."



She came out with it then with a rush of words—not the words of last night, the polished and logical sentence which was to have solved everything, clarified everything, and to have resolved in a single gesture the tiresome necessity for argument and recrimination. Instead she declared loudly that she no longer loved him; she wondered whether she had ever loved him; four years had changed her feelings toward him; she had found her métier, her own life, her career: she wanted a divorce, and the sooner the better for everyone concerned. She had made all the necessary plans; she would go to her sister Hester, leaving Neddy here with Mark for a little while, a week perhaps. After that he could see the child whenever he wished—with reservations. He was welcome to stay on in the apartment until he made other arrangements. She had wanted to tell him all this yesterday, but somehow it had been too difficult. He had taken too much for granted, he hadn't given her a chance to speak out. Besides, she had been unwilling to ruin his first few hours at home, unwilling to wound him. Then there had been Neddy and Octavia. She guessed he would have hated a scene. She did not particularly like scenes herself. But now the truth was out, and there was not much to add to it. She was sorry, of course she was sorry! The whole thing was tragic, but after all, they had been separated four years; this was inevitable; perhaps it would have happened anyway, war or no war. The fact remained, it had happened, and that was all there was to it. There was no need to discuss it further now.

He must think things over by himself and try to be reasonable. Why not? They were adult beings. These matters should be arranged without undue bitterness. On her side certainly there was nothing but the desire to be friends, and this should not be difficult, for Neddy's sake. For Neddy's sake Mark must see that a divorce was the only thing; he must allow her to bring the suit. But they would discuss the details later on, when he had had time to reflect and to adjust himself to the changed situation.



Mark heard her out in silence. When she was done he turned and looked out the window. Rain streamed between him and the buildings across the street. A procession of umbrellas scuttled along the glistening sidewalk. He could hear the traffic on Madison Avenue, and an occasional isolated voice.

Regan said, "I'm going, Mark. Octavia will pack my things, and I'll send for them

French's

baked in

U-m-m-m!

Ham with that French's Flavor!

Wrap a tender smoked ham loosely in wrapping paper, place fat side up on rack in uncovered roaster. Add no water. Bake ham in moderate oven (325°F.) allowing 3½ to 4 hours for 10- to 12-lb. ham.

Now take ham out, remove paper and skin. Score fat surface in squares. Spread with 4 tablesp. French's Mustard. Cover surface with 1 cup brown sugar mixed with 2 tablesp. flour. Stud squares with whole cloves. Bake in moderately hot oven of 400°F. 15 minutes or until golden brown. Serve with pineapple slices browned in ham liquor.

FREE! NEW RECIPE BOOK

"Mealtime Magic" in full color. Send name and address to The R. T. French Company, 1253 Mustard St., Rochester 9, N. Y., and this booklet will be sent you FREE.

Largest selling prepared mustard in U.S.A. today
Also made in Canada

Are you in the know?

Do you choose the colors of your clothes—

- ☐ To copy your gal pal
- ☐ To suit your color-type
- ☐ Because they're hi-fashion

A color that's Bacallish for one chick can be her gal pal's poison! The trick is to find shades to suit your own color-type. Tuck materials of assorted hues under your chin. Whichever befriends your skin-tone and tresses—that's for you! It's a poise-booster. So too, (on "calendar" days) is Kotex—the napkin that befriends your smoothest date duds. Because Kotex has flat tapered ends that don't show. You can scoff at revealing outlines with those special flat pressed ends!

This sleeping beauty's off the beam, because—

- ☐ She's a curfew keeper
- ☐ She should be prom-trotting
- ☐ She's still wearing makeup

Sleep and beauty go together—but don't dream of wearing makeup to bed! It coarsens your skin—makes mud-pies of your complexion. It invites unsightly "blossoms." So, refresh your face thoroughly at bedtime. Cleanliness and daintiness go together, too. And they're never more important than at "certain" times . . . that's why Kotex contains a deodorant. Locked inside each Kotex napkin, the deodorant can't shake out because it is processed into each pad—not merely dusted on. See how this Kotex "extra" can keep you sweet-and-lovely!

Should a gal go down the aisle first?

- ☐ Yes
- ☐ No
- ☐ Not always

Usually, the swish dish should be first to follow the usher. But a gal doesn't always precede her escort. When the usher is not at the door, her tall-dark-and-Vansome leads the way. Know what's what. It keeps you confident. And to stay confident on "those" days, know which napkin gives lasting comfort: Kotex, of course. For Kotex is made to stay soft while wearing. And you get plus protection from that exclusive safety center, so there's never a panicky moment with Kotex!

A DEODORANT in every Kotex* napkin at no extra cost

*T. M. Reg. U. S. Pat. Off.

More women choose KOTEX than all other sanitary napkins*

later. She'll take care of Neddy, and of you, for as long as you want to stay here. I hope you'll call me up at Hester's. Perhaps we could have lunch together, or dinner, one of these days when we've both had time to take stock—when we can talk about this some more. Mark ——"

He turned slowly. "There's another thing I don't understand. Why, considering all this—why did you sleep with me last night?"

She gathered up her gloves, her pocketbook, her silk umbrella; she became the room as though she had come prepared to have her portrait painted in it: The Woman in the Parlor; or, The Lady in the Puce-colored Chair.

"Why did I? Well"—she glanced away—"I felt badly. I didn't want to have it on my conscience that I had refused you."

"Your conscience?" Mark repeated the word wonderingly, then turned and leaned his forehead on the windowpane, staring at the wet street.

Regan waited a moment, then a queer terror came on her and she walked quickly across the room and let herself out of the apartment. He saw her a few minutes later, hurrying up the street under her silk umbrella. He was still standing there twenty minutes later when the door behind him opened and someone came into the room. He whirled around, cursing, and found himself staring into Octavia's black eyes.

She said sharply, "Colonel Bycroft, light your pipe!"

"What?" He peered at her. "What was it you said, Octavia?"

"I said for you to light your pipe."

The words reached him. His fingers unclenched slowly and he reached in his pockets for his pipe and tobacco pouch.

Octavia hung her hat and coat in the coat closet and began to clear the things from the breakfast table, the uneaten egg, the untasted coffee, the cold toast. She said, "Miss Hester is a sick woman. Two and three times a month they have to get the doctor to give her adrenalin. She's got so now she can't stand to have anybody around except Mrs. Bycroft."

Mark filled his pipe, watching her suspiciously. How much did she know, this black woman with the composed, matter-of-fact manner?

She went on: "If Mrs. Bycroft can't fetch Neddy after school today maybe you will? If it stops raining you could take his skates and let him skate home. He likes that."

Mark heard the rain beating on the windows and thought of it falling in every corner of the vast city, touching the faces of strangers, touching Regan's warm flesh, falling, perhaps, on her lover; for he had no doubt, no doubt at all, that she had a lover. A sense of estrangement grew on him, an unreality so profound that he felt it might engulf him utterly. He gave a faint sigh like the sigh of the dying, and Octavia, on her way to the kitchen door, turned to look at him.

"You won't forget about Neddy, Colonel Bycroft? I'll tell you how you get to the school."

Mark nodded absently. "All right, Octavia. I'll remember."

VIII

THREE days later, after several false starts he wrote to his wife:

Dear Regan: I've been considering this whole affair of you and me and Neddy. I am not, as you are, especially good at self-expression, so you'll have to excuse me if this letter seems a bit crude and to the point. From what I recall of our interview on Monday, it seemed you no longer want to live with me, that you want a divorce at the earliest possible moment. No doubt you are better acquainted with the law than I am, but even I know that in this state grounds for divorce is adultery. If I remember correctly it was your idea that I allow you to bring the suit out of consideration for Neddy, whose home should, naturally, be with his mother, as it naturally could not be were you judged the guilty party. You seem to have given this matter your usual lucid consideration, but you overlooked two things: first, that I have no wish to divorce you or to be divorced by you; second, that I want my son to live with me. There is a third point, though a minor one: I see no reason why you should expect me to connive at a happy state of affairs from which I am to be excluded. If you don't choose to live with me I see no reason why you can't go on living as you have these past four years without me. A husbandless state may not be the ideal one for an intelligent and beautiful woman, but no doubt it has its compensations. Neddy, however, stays with me. You must see that there is no reason, legal or moral, why he should not—rather the reverse, in fact. Of course you are welcome to talk to him over the telephone whenever you like, or to visit him here in my presence. Octavia Evans has my instructions on this matter.

Yours,
MARK.

THIS letter was more temperate, more formal than others which he wrote and destroyed. But the mildness of its language did not reflect his mood, which flamed into rage while he groped for words. When he had put the letter into an envelope and addressed it he sat at her desk, surrounded by the minutiæ of her existence—the existence from which she had banished him forever, the existence of which he knew so little, suspected so much. Ransacking the drawers earlier in the day, he had found only endless newspaper clippings and a collection of his letters to her, from Europe. These last he examined with horror. How could he have been such a fool as to imagine that the future had been up to him alone? He remembered his fatuous remark to young Perry on the boat coming home: "If deception is to be the order of the day, then I hope I'm properly deceived," or something of the sort. Well, he had no cause to complain. Hadn't she come out with the truth in short enough order? He had arrived on Sunday, and on Monday morning she told him she was through. He'd had his night, his droit du seigneur. "I didn't want to have it on my conscience that I had refused you." Her conscience. He shivered, wondering whether certain passions, like malaria, might infect a man for the rest of his life. Her conscience!

Heaven is the place where the donkey at last catches up with his carrot.
—C. K. WRIGHT: Nectar in a Nutshell. (George Allen & Unwin, Ltd.)

Yet last night he had sat in Neddy's bedroom while the child slept, and asked himself, Do I love her? just as earlier he had asked himself whether he loved his son. Passing from childhood to maturity and marriage, do we merely exchange one imaginary security for another? Sleepless, he'd found a book and tried to read.

So here I am, in the middle way, having had twenty years—Twenty years largely wasted, the years of l'entre deux guerres ——

Ainsi, Mr. Eliot! Mark replaced the tired poet in the bookcase and found another, a poet of the French Resistance. Regan read everything, everything. And what taste! Impeccable. Impeccable taste, impeccable ideas, impeccable conscience. He shut the book and sat thinking. Why should she allow herself to suffer, to be lonely and neglected, for four years—or for four months, or four weeks? Men found their compensations, as he knew very well, and no one blamed them. Curious, but true, General Wilmer's remark that the soldier facing annihilation thinks mostly of the woman he'll have the minute he can get round to it. Women facing death at another remove are not more delicate, and their excuse every bit as sound as a soldier's. Though I can see this clearly enough, reflected Mark, I can't forgive it. But why was he so sure there was something that demanded his forgiveness? All she had said was that she was through with him and wanted to live her own life, that fabulous cliché, prerogative of American women and of no others. Well, let her have her life.

"Light your pipe, Colonel Bycroft!" How melodramatic of Octavia, and yet he had

(Continued on Page 84)

PUZZLE—WHICH IS THE PIN-UP GAL?

One look at GLENDORA DONALDSON's sparkling beauty and you know she's a famous model.

And her cuddly 6-months-old daughter, Linda, is already giving Glennie plenty of competition. Who could choose between two such perfect complexions?

"We share a family beauty secret—three generations old," Glennie says. "It's Ivory care! I learned about pure, mild Ivory in my bathinette and it's still my beauty soap today!"

Here's Glennie's style secret

Being a Navy wife and mother, as well as a famous model, isn't enough for Glennie's many talents—she makes all her own clothes, too! This playsuit was her own idea . . . and it cost only $5.95 to make.

"But nice clothes aren't all that count in modeling," Glennie says. "A fresh, radiant complexion is the most important asset of all—I call it that Ivory Look!"

Say, who's the model here?

Yes, Glennie is an accomplished artist as well as a beautiful subject. "Real beauty always starts with a lovely complexion," Glennie says.

"Models can't afford to be careless about that. I'd advise anyone who wants to look her loveliest to take that tip."

Change to regular, gentle cleansings with pure, mild Ivory—Glennie's own beauty soap—the soap more doctors advise than any other. That's the way to have a softer, smoother, lovelier skin—that Ivory Look!

99 44/100% Pure

More doctors advise Ivory than any other Soap

Don't be a soap waster—Ivory contains scarce materials—make it last!

The Countess de Petiteville

Bearer of a historic 1000-year-old Norman name, the Countess de Petiteville is very active in the French Red Cross and in the musical and cultural life of Paris. She has a fine, cameo type of beauty, with dazzling white skin. The 1-Minute Mask of Pond's Vanishing Cream has won her delighted approval—"It gives my skin a clearer, brighter look," she says. "Makes it feel smoother right away!"

The Countess says: "The Mask refreshes my skin, gives it a more wide-awake look!"

Lovely things happen to your complexion—in only one minute!

Follow the Countess de Petiteville's beauty lead . . . with Pond's 1-Minute Mask. Spread a luxurious Mask of Pond's Vanishing Cream over your face—all but eyes.

The Mask works by what skin specialists call "keratolytic" action. It has the power to loosen and dissolve bits of chapped, curling skin and dirt particles! After one minute, tissue off the Mask. Off comes loosened debris, too!

Now look at your face! Feel it! Your skin looks clearer and fresher ...feels softer! In one minute—the Mask "re-styles" your complexion!

"A quick powder base, too!"

"Besides having a Mask 3 or 4 times a week, I use Pond's Vanishing Cream another way, too—as a light powder base. It goes on so smoothly—holds powder!" says the Countess.

Get a BIG jar of glamour-making Masks!

(Continued from Page 82)

obeyed her instinctively, feeling murder peter out at his finger tips. Had Octavia seen it in his face, in his clenched hands when he swung round from the window? He had not asked her to explain her strange command, and her manner since then had been thoroughly circumspect and composed.

As for Regan, she was not one to leave evidence around. Too fastidious, far, far too clever. And yet the evidence seemed everywhere visible in Mark's jealous eye: in the books she had taken to reading, in the paintings she had bought, in the things which now interested her. These were the signs, the signals, of a new passion; and he knew that passion forms and directs even the mature spirit, that it doesn't make much difference whether the lovers are more or less fools, or knaves. But why couldn't Regan be content just to love? Why must she compel beauty, which she did not understand, to state the case for her? Why must she identify art and conscience with the paraphernalia of sex? He fell asleep with the question unanswered.

Now he stamped his letter to Regan and went into the parlor where Octavia was dusting the furniture. "I'm going for a walk. I'll pick Neddy up at school on my way back." It would make the third time he had called for Neddy; already father and son regarded it as a fixed habit. Mark went on: "I might as well tell you, Octavia, that Mrs. Bycroft and I are not on the best of terms. You may have guessed this. It's why she has gone to stay with her sister. I have just written her that she can speak to Neddy on the phone. But I do not want her to see him except when I'm here."

Octavia knelt on the floor, the duster in her hands, and looked up at him. "What do you want I should do, colonel?"

"That's up to you. I'd be grateful if you stayed, but go to Mrs. Bycroft if you prefer. Neddy remains with me."

She said slowly, "This thing, will it last? Or given time, will it pass?"

"I don't know."

"It's the war," she said, and nodded her neat gray head. "The war, that's what did it."

"You can't blame everything on the war," he told her.

"Given evil as big as the war, you can blame it."

The sound of her voice took the edge off his loneliness. She was a woman, the broad wedding ring bitten deep into her black finger, her palms pale and soft from work.

She went on: "You ever stop to think how hate has taken the place of love in almost everything, Colonel Bycroft? In people, in religion?"

"Well," said Mark, "it doesn't demand so much of one here," and he tapped his forehead.

Octavia smiled. "Or here," she said, and laid her dark hand on her heart. "I'll stay with you and Neddy, sir, if you want me to."

Mark thanked her and went out to mail his letter. But outdoors the rejoicing sunlight and gaiety mocked him. His sense of outrage returned as he found a mailbox and dropped the letter into it with a vicious snap of the lid. Well, Regan would not get away with her beautifully contrived little plans—on that score his mind was made up. Let her rage and scheme as she liked, he would go on living in the apartment and he would hold on to Neddy. She could go to Reno if she wished, and try to get her divorce there, or she could go to hell and take her anonymous prancing gigolo with her.

Miserable, frustrated, Mark walked down Madison Avenue, and his embittered expression lingered in the memory of strangers who passed him. Two soldiers in uniform saluted, and he lifted his hand mechanically in response. He began to think about his impending discharge from the Army, and about the problem of the future. The simple, straightforward ambitions of which he had dreamed recurred to mock him. Run for mayor of his home town, when he had no home town, nor even a home? Well, he had a little money, enough to tide himself and

WHY CAN'T YOU WRITE?

It's much simpler than you think!

SO many people with the "germ" of writing in them simply can't get started. They suffer from inertia. Or they set up imaginary barriers to taking the first step.

Many are convinced the field is confined to persons gifted with a genius for writing.

Few realize that the great bulk of commercial writing is done by so-called "unknowns." Not only do these thousands of men and women produce most of the fiction published, but countless articles on homemaking, business, fashions, hobbies, decorating, local, club and church activities, etc., as well.

Such material is in constant demand. Every week thousands of checks for $25, $50 and $100 go out to writers whose latent ability was perhaps no greater than yours.

The Practical Method

NEWSPAPER work demonstrates that the way to learn to write is by writing! Newspaper copy desk editors waste no time on theories or ancient classics. The story is the thing. Every copy "cub" goes through the course of practical criticism—a training that turns out more successful authors than any other experience.

That is why Newspaper Institute of America bases its writing instruction on the Copy Desk Method. It starts and keeps you writing in your own home, on your own time. And upon the very same kind of actual assignments given daily to metropolitan reporters. Thus you learn by doing, not by studying the individual styles of model authors.

Each week your work is analyzed constructively by practical writers. Writing soon becomes easy, absorbing. Profitable, too, as you gain the "professional" touch that gets your material accepted by editors. Above all, you can see constant progress—week by week—as your faults are corrected and your writing ability grows.

Test Yourself—FREE

Our unique Writing Aptitude Test tells whether you possess the fundamental qualities necessary to successful writing—acute observation, dramatic instinct, creative imagination, etc. You'll enjoy this test. The coupon will bring it without cost or obligation. Newspaper Institute of America, One Park Ave., New York 16, N. Y. (Founded 1925)

FREE Newspaper Institute of America
One Park Ave., New York 16, N. Y.

Send me, without cost or obligation, your Writing Aptitude Test and further information about writing for profit, as promised in Ladies' Home Journal, March.

Mr. }
Mrs }
Miss }

Address .....

(All correspondence confidential No salesman will call on you.)
55-C-596

Copyright 1946 Newspaper Institute of America

Chest Cold Misery Relieved by Moist Heat of ANTIPHLOGISTINE

SIMPLE CHEST COLD SORE THROAT BRONCHIAL IRRITATION

SIMPLE SPRAIN, BRUISE SORE MUSCLES CHARLEY HORSE

The moist heat of an ANTIPHLOGISTINE poultice relieves cough, tightness of chest muscle soreness due to chest cold, bronchial irritation and simple sore throat.

Apply that ANTIPHLOGISTINE poultice just hot enough to be comfortable—then feel the moist heat go right to work on that cough, tightness of chest muscle soreness. Does good, feels good for several hours.

The moist heat of an ANTIPHLOGISTINE poultice also relieves pain . . . reduces swelling, limbers up stiff, aching muscles due to a simple sprain, bruise, charley horse, similar injury or condition.

Get ANTIPHLOGISTINE (Aunty Flo) in tube or can at any drug store NOW.

Antiphlogistine

The White Package with the Orange Band

Neddy over the next year or two. He'd have to start looking round for a job. Perhaps his old publishing firm would take him back. When he left them four years ago old Carter had practically wept and assured him that they would always be happy to welcome him back. But that was four years ago! His thoughts reverted to Regan and his immediate predicament: the explanations, the excuses he'd have to furnish inquisitive friends. Well, there were several who were not alive to ask questions. Tom Nesbit, for instance, Alan Severs, John Halloran all were dead. And what about the others who had survived? Were their wives with them? Did they still have homes, and children they could talk to as he seemed, as yet, unable to talk to Neddy?

I'm thirty-three, he reminded himself, frowning, and gasped as a racing taxi missed him. The frightened scream of a woman who saw how close he had been to annihilation rang in Mark's ears for a whole block.

He gave himself a shake and walked soberly on toward Gramercy Park. Perhaps the sense of estrangement would pass eventually and he would find himself at last, reconciled, at peace, He was thirty-three. At forty-three he would be old, unless he got himself killed by a taxi or stepped on by a horse. He watched the shiny buttocks of one ridden by a policeman, clopping along the pavement. And he remembered another horse lying on its back in a Belgian street, the maggots crawling in and out of its open eyes. Quickly, his gaze traveled to the pale channel of sky running before him, upheld by the vertical roofs of the avenue; and presently these physical objects, the taxicabs, the busses, the horses of policemen, the dazzling windows, all lost their strangeness and sank into the pattern of remembered things. For two days he had walked about the city, marking its changes since his youth. It seemed as if the architecture and character of the place transformed themselves while one slept. In Europe centuries had plunged into the pit, but in New York the past lingered in strange and awful innocence.

Mark peered between the railings of Gramercy Park. Here, too, the past lingered beside the statue of Edwin Booth, the willow trees and the ornamental urns overflowing with geraniums. Favored children played among the flower beds. He must bring Neddy and show him the house where Neddy's father was born. That house on the corner, worn brick, with an iron buffalo head for door knocker. A succession of nursemaids had lifted him so he could touch that knocker; finally he'd been able to reach it himself, and just about that time the house was sold and his parents took him away to live in New Jersey.

No wind is of service to him who is bound nowhere.

As Mark stood on the sidewalk gazing at his old home the heavy oak door opened and two attendants appeared, manipulating a wheel chair in which sat an ancient lady, swathed in shawls and looking like a caddis worm. With a shock he recognized Mrs. Halloran, the grandmother of his friend killed in the war. The wheel chair, pushed by one of the attendants, passed him, and Mark bowed. Her eyes peered into his, the unresponsive lightless eyes of the very old, of the forgetful, the forgotten. So she lived here now in the house where he and her grandson had played as children. Mark turned and walked south along the park railings, thinking of the dead boy. John Halloran had died at the beginning of the war, at El Guettar, and was buried in the African sand.

Mark stopped and gazed for a minute at the willow which he and John had been forbidden to climb. It rose glittering and formal out of the grass, and a child leaned against it, watching friends playing near by.

(To be Continued)

BESTFORM

Girdles Brassieres All-in-ones

no finer fit at any price

BRASSIERES 79¢ to $1.50

FOUNDATIONS $2.50 to $6.50

Bestform Foundations, Inc. • 64 West 23rd Street, New York 10, N.Y.

TNT FOR TWO!

ONE part boy, one part girl—one flash of beauty to light the fuse.
One blinding moment and your heart rockets skyward. One swift embrace and you know you've found love. In his eyes you can see you are strictly from heaven. The night reels as he whispers, "It's a date—for forever!"

FOREVER you'll watch over your loveliness with Woodbury—the beauty soap made for the skin alone.
Each day taking your Woodbury Facial Cocktail . . . gently cleansing your skin to exquisite-smooth freshness.
Precious Woodbury . . . guardian of the lovely-to-kiss complexion that first made him yours!

WOODBURY
FOR THE SKIN
YOU LOVE
TO TOUCH

PRELUDE TO HAPPINESS

(Continued from Page 23)

...n't know that isn't the way when you really fall in love.

Johnnie was scowling over her shoulder. "She's always been a beauty," he said rudely. He had two glasses in his hands. He gave one to Kitty. She lifted it and he touched it with his. "I don't have to say it," said Johnnie, and they drank.

The dark man lifted a discreet eyebrow over a twinkling eye and disappeared.

"What was his name?" asked Kitty.

"That was Dr. Lawford Paige," said Johnnie; then, amazingly, "Do you regret?"

"I shan't even ask you what."

In the back of Harry's car again, he took her hand. "That time I saw you in Green-Oaks," he said, "you had a thin, ugly, old colored woman for a nurse."

"That was Dah," said Kitty.

"She was sitting on the steps of the church, where the trees made some shade, and you were lying across her lap and she was fanning you with a palm-leaf fan. You had on a pale pink dress and your hair was so pale a yellow and your face just barely flushed. Your long little legs dangled over her skirt. I didn't know what hit me. Of course it was the first time I'd realized beauty, but how was I to know?"

"You didn't ask me tonight just to be nice," Kitty said. "It's because you remembered that."

"I hardly ever do anything just to be nice. Life is too short and the world's too fine."

The car had stopped before the hotel. The light of festive glory shone from its every window, but Kitty turned her back on it to look into his eyes.

"Oh, Johnnie—the world!" she said.

The big dining room at the hotel makes a very good ballroom. The flower-laden tables are pushed fanwise toward the walls to leave a dance space in the center. The lights are soft enough to be becoming, but not too low to see by, and the floor is good. To get to the dining room, however, you have to walk the length of the hotel, and whenever a cotillion is given there all the resident tourist ladies sit solidly in the chairs that line the wide corridors and watch the society of Decatur go by.

"Goodness," said Kitty. She giggled.

"I've always rather liked this part," Johnnie said. His eyes met hers, and both sets of eyebrows went up; he grinned and she nodded, and suddenly both of them were bowing graciously to the startled onlookers on either side.

"Good evening," they said. "Good evening, madam."

EVELYN and Harry came up behind them. Evelyn was laughing in spite of herself. "Stop it. You're not really funny."

"Not funny at all," said Harry. "Just ill-bred."

Kitty took his hand and gave it a little pat. "Harry, dear, I'm afraid we're just un-Southern."

"Kitty, you're wonderful," Johnnie said.

Why his words should hurt her, Kitty didn't know, but her heart contracted. She forced a smile and followed Evelyn into the crush of people outside the ballroom.

"You don't shake hands with the chaperons, you just bow," Evelyn said.

"Like the Queen of England," Kitty said so listlessly that Evelyn turned to look at her.

"What's wrong?" she asked, but Kitty shook her head.

"Nothing at all." To herself she said fiercely, It's that he spoke to me as though I were anyone—just any girl he was taking out who was taking things a little for granted. The tears stung behind her eyelids.

"We're going in now," Evelyn said.

The crowd evened out into a line of pairs, white hands were suddenly fragile against black sleeves, and the clatter of conversation reduced itself to a polite, expectant hum.

Ahead of Kitty, Harry and Evelyn moved along. She stood by herself, blinking back the stinging tears. He's escaped, she thought.

Immediately he was there. "Did you think I'd gone?" He took her hand and pulled it through his arm. "I nearly went, but then I didn't want to."

HER mind's eye saw him pushing quickly through the crowd, out into the frosty night, and stopping, and frowning, and smiling and coming back. She couldn't look at him because her relief was so desperate.

He bent his head till his bright eyes could look into hers. "I'll never want to." All the heaviness was gone and she was tremulous and happy as she had never been before.

Johnnie told her long after what they had for dinner that night: some sort of shrimp and crab, and clear soup, and pheasant, and salad, and ice cream with plenty of green in it, and little cakes and coffee. It always seemed to her very indicative of the difference between a man and a woman, that he should so have enjoyed his dinner and remembered it because he loved her, while she, because she loved him, had neither tasted a mouthful nor known what was put before her.

Also, of course, because through the first part of the evening she danced so much. Young girls in love float through a dance as though it were a cloud. Kitty went from one pair of arms to another and then to Johnnie and then to another and another and then to Johnnie. She asked:

"Don't you dance with anyone but me?"

"No, darling," said Johnnie.

Back at the table, Evelyn whispered to her, "You're doing beautifully. Lots of people get stuck at the cotillion."

"Not me," said Kitty, and paused because suddenly the music changed and the floor was clear. "What's this?"

"Get up," said Evelyn. "This is the debutantes' dance."

Johnnie was standing before her with his hands outstretched. She moved toward him.

Nineteen girls in white waltzed around and around with the men who had brought them. The long white skirts and the long black coattails flew out and around and out and around. The little world at the tables watched and nodded and murmured.

"You're the best girl on the floor," said Johnnie.

She turned her face to him. It was solemn and delicate and her eyes were wide. "This is so pretty."

"It's a valentine," said Johnnie.

"It could catch one."

"Not you," he said. "Nor me."

Her head went back against his shoulder.

When the music stopped, he still stood before her. "Look," he said, "I'm going to New York on Monday. I've got a job there."

NEXT MONTH

Jane: a girl too afraid of being hurt to give all of herself to her husband.

Warren: a man wanting the right to make claims on another human being.

● Could these two build a lasting marriage? Could they learn the selflessness of love?

Andrina Iverson, in her first novel, sees clearly that a wedding ceremony and a marriage may be years apart, in . . .

The Gifts of Love

Complete in the APRIL JOURNAL

You'll never worry about staying sweet and dainty if you use Fresh.

Fresh, new cream deodorant, stops perspiration worries completely.

Fresh contains the most effective perspiration-stopping ingredient known to science.

Fresh stays smooth...never gritty or sticky...doesn't dry out.

Clogged pore openings say so plainly ...Your beauty care is wrong!

Don't let blackheads, stubborn dirt or dry, aging "top skin" hide the natural radiance of your complexion. Exquisite cleansing is this simple: once a week, Edna Wallace Hopper White Clay Pack. And, every day, Homogenized Facial Cream.

Only a clean skin is lovely and young-looking...

so start this marvelous Twin Treatment care today!

Once a week . . . this "blushing beauty" Mask!

Spread White Clay Pack over clean face and neck. Relax while it "lifts up" tired, lax tissues. Helps to loosen blackheads and cleanse pore openings. Wash off when dry (about 8 minutes).

Now see how your complexion glows with a fresher, livelier bloom—awakened by White Clay Pack's gentle blushing action. Your skin seems firmer, finer in texture—free from unlovely "top skin." And your fresher, smoother complexion takes make-up with utter flattery. Clearly you look younger, prettier. And here's what you'll do, every day, to help protect that charm . . .

Daily . . . protection for fresh underskin clarity

To get the most glamorizing results from your weekly White Clay Pack, follow this daily beauty care with Homogenized Facial Cream. This rich, blush-pink cream cleanses and lubricates superbly—helps to soften rough, dry skin.

Pat on with upward, outward strokes—light-as-feather pats around your eyes where tiny lines show. (See diagram). For extra lubrication, apply a thin film at night. Watch your skin reveal a brighter, smoother freshness that's so ready for make-up—and for compliments!

Edna Wallace Hopper Twin Treatment

for a lovelier, younger look

"New York?"

"Yes. Come get a drink."

In the bar, people were drinking champagne punch. "Wait here," Johnnie said, but before he came back Lawford Paige had come up to her.

"You're a belle," he said. "I've been watching you. Will you dance with me?"

"I'd love to," said Kitty politely, but he saw her searching the crowd.

"Johnnie will find you," he said.

There were very few people in the ballroom, because dinner was over and the music had just begun again. Lawford Paige was a very good dancer and though he had the floor he used only a quarter of it.

"I like to dance with you," said Kitty.

"Thank you," he said.

After quite a long time she said, "This is wonderful. If I were the sort of girl who closed her eyes when she danced; I'd close my eyes."

"Thank you," he said.

"Of course I'm a good dancer too."

"Yes," he said.

"Thank you," said Kitty.

The laugh came out of the corners of his mouth.

"Success at last," said Kitty.

That time he really laughed.

Kitty searched in her mind for a fine, long word that all the reviewers were using about books those days. "Do you know," she said, "when dancing's like this it makes you feel sad. It—it's nostalgic."

"Is it?"

"I can't imagine why you're so easy to talk to. You never say anything but 'Thank you,' and 'Is it?' You certainly don't commit yourself."

"Don't I?" he said, but he was laughing again.

"Well, I've always loved to amuse people."

"You'd better stop amusing me. Here comes Johnnie, and I don't think he likes it."

He handed her over with a flourish and, over Johnnie's shoulder, she watched him go.

"He's charming," she said. "But I really don't know why. Except that he understands what I mean even when he pretends not to."

"He's very charming," Johnnie said evenly.

She reached her arm farther up on his shoulder and put her face against his. Deliberately, she closed her eyes.

"Open them, you little wretch."

She looked up at him. "I was just trying something. Johnnie, dancing with you isn't nostalgic a bit. I'm tingling."

"Let's get out of here," said Johnnie. "We'll get your coat." He held it for her. It was black velvet with a white-fox collar. He looked at her blond head framed in the fur. "Pretty."

OUTSIDE, the December night was clear, and the stars were hanging in the sky. At the bottom of the steps they stood still. They were alone on the sidewalk, between the hotel and the long line of automobiles.

"I've never seen so many stars," said Kitty.

"Oh, come here," Johnnie said. He reached for her and took her in his arms and kissed her.

They walked home slowly. Her arm was through his and her fingers caught in his. They went through the quiet, half-lit streets, past the old, grilled houses, past the white churches and across the ghostly squares.

Once Johnnie said, "I'll bet no one ever walked home from the cotillion before."

Kitty said, "I knew a girl once who walked home from a party through Central Park. I never understood why she thought it was so wonderful, but of course it was this."

"This," said Johnnie, and she turned her face so that he could kiss her.

When they reached the square where the Lattimers lived, they stopped.

"I'd better go in," said Kitty.

"No." He led her to a bench. "Sit here." He sat down beside her. "Look. I thought I could go to New York and come back and

HONEYMOON

Loveliness

CAN BE YOURS TONIGHT

You—at your peak of charm. You in his arms! You with petal-soft skin—so excitingly fragrant—a vision of loveliness to win romance . . . and hold it.

Never, never lose this magic!

Tonight—every night—revel in a sea of billowing, fragrant foam that floats fatigue away as it caresses your skin. Step forth aglow—alive—with the freshness of a dew-drenched flower.

Five floral scents (25 luxurious baths) in every package.

FOAMING BATH Sachet

At Better Toiletry Counters Everywhere

ROBERT H. CLARK COMPANY
Beverly Hills • California

HAT—MME. REINE ■ SUIT—TROY STIX don't be afraid of it it's only • • • slightly dangerous

it's spring,
it's love,
it's the new nail polish shade by

La Cross

SCHNEFEL BROS CORP 630 FIFTH AVENUE NEW YORK 20 N Y

get you. But now I think I have to take you with me. Only, I haven't any money."

"I can work. I can do anything."

"Oh, darling," he said.

It was very late when Kitty let herself in. She went up the stairs carefully, but Evelyn heard her.

"Kitty," she called, and her light went on.

Kitty perched herself on the foot of Evelyn's bed. Evelyn lay sleeplessly with her arms above her head. Her soft, dark hair was spread out over the pillow.

"How nice you look," Kitty said. "You always used to braid it."

"Where have you been? It's been hours since you left the cotillion."

Kitty smiled to herself. She wasn't going to tell Evelyn. It was too soon. "I've been talking to Johnnie Bates out in the square," she said.

"Johnnie," said Evelyn. "I thought you might be with Lawford. He disappeared about the same time. It's not really very nice to have late dates."

Something in her sister's voice made Kitty look at her closely. She suddenly remembered how Evelyn had looked at her as she danced by with Lawford Paige. How strange, she thought. She cocked her head a little.

"Lawford's nice," she said. "He'd be just right for you, Evelyn. Why don't you marry him instead of Harry?"

The slow red crept up into Evelyn's face, but for an instant the glow in her eyes met that in Kitty's. Then she reached out and switched off her light. "Don't be silly."

Kitty tiptoed down the corridor, past her mother's door to her own room. She had thought that she could never sleep that night, but at twenty-two her nervous system was perfect and she lay awake for only a little while. Just before she dropped off, several very lucid thoughts appeared in her mind:

Marriage is not made for everybody, not attractive to everybody, not good for everybody who embarks in it. It is the cause of much suffering; it is bleeding from a thousand wounds. Without it there would presumably be still more suffering in the world and much less happiness. —WESTERMARCK: Delineator.

I'm in love with Johnnie Bates and he's in love with me. Evelyn's in love with Lawford, only he's not in love with her. Not yet. If Lawford hadn't been so nice to me, Johnnie wouldn't have asked me to marry him. He'd have waited. I hope Evelyn gets Lawford. If she does, I'll regret him a little because he admired me. Girls always regret the men who admire them. How silly. Only I don't really regret. Not anything. Not at all.

Sleep came up over her like a comfortable cloud, and she thought no more.

The next morning, when Mrs. Lattimer left the house to go to church, both her daughters were still asleep. When she returned, Evelyn called to her from the bathtub.

"Kitty's gone out," she said.

Mrs. Lattimer looked into Kitty's room. There was a note on the pincushion and Mrs. Lattimer was old-fashioned enough to catch her breath before she read it. This is what it said:

I don't know if Evelyn is going to marry Harry Bates or not, but I'm pretty sure I'm going to marry Johnnie Bates.

P.S. We haven't eloped. We have just gone to Green-Oaks for the day. I hope Aunt Kathy will feed us.

"I do declare," said Mrs. Lattimer.

Evelyn came in then, wrapped in a bath sheet, and Mrs. Lattimer handed her the note. Evelyn read it and began to laugh.

"It doesn't seem decent," said Mrs. Lattimer. "Do you think she means it?"

"Of course she means it," Evelyn said. "He hasn't a copper penny, but his family and his manners are both all right."

"He'll probably make money. All they Bateses do."

Three delightful ways to make the most of Jell-O's "locked-in" flavor: A sherbet glass filled with tart, cool, green-crystal flakes of Lime Jell-O. A salad mold of Lemon Jell-O, with tomato slices, green lima beans, and crunchy sliced celery. Rose-red Raspberry Jell-O, generously topped with whipped cream!

What's found only in Jell-O?
That "locked-in" Jell-O Flavor!

Try these on your Jell-O Puddings! Banana slices and nuts on Chocolate. Chocolate cookies on Butterscotch. Rich, red strawberry jam on Vanilla. There's grand old-fashioned flavor in these smooth puddings!

PRODUCTS OF GENERAL FOODS

Jell-O Puddings—
Like Grandma's—only more so!

by General Foods

NEW
ALL-PURPOSE
ENAMEL

THE NEW
SHERWIN-WILLIAMS
ENAMELOID

GIVE walls, woodwork, toys, furniture beautiful new color with this high-gloss, 1-coat enamel. Use Enameloid, too, for outside woodwork and doors, porches and automobiles.

SHERWIN PAINTS WILLIAMS

(Continued from Page 90)

"That's no way to talk about Crandall," Johnnie said, but Crandall only slid down on his spine another inch and smiled at her approvingly.

"You're much too pretty to be so clever."

Kitty felt warm both inside and out. "Do you know, if you painted this room a sort of canary yellow, and put some sort of gauzy stuff at the windows and got some slip covers and re-covered all these pillows, it would really be very nice."

Johnnie was laughing at her. "I didn't reckon with the homemaking instinct."

"Neither did I," said Kitty. She was startled. "It must be marriage."

Crandall was laughing too. "From here, marriage looks fine." He got to his feet and held out his hand. "Come see the rest of the place before I go. You can tell me how to make the back yard into a garden come spring."

But in the spring it was Kitty, not Crandall, who made the garden. Crandall—who, as Johnnie put it, was expanding—found another apartment that suited him better, and it seemed much easier to take over his lease than to move. Besides, Johnnie and Kitty liked their basement. They lived in it for nearly five years, and before they left it Kitty had done to it nearly all the things she thought of that first day, and a good many more. She made it a gay, informal place. All her life it made Kitty smile to remember that she never finished painting the desk on the window side, and that the hems in the bedroom curtains were held up by pins till she finally took them down for good.

She was very busy during that time. Crandall got her a job after she'd been in New York a little more than a month. It was the day after the first party.

The party was a great success. Kitty had quickly learned that anybody who could read could cook, and that people in New York considered food an important subject for research. When she and Johnnie decided to pay everyone back, she wrote her mother for the shrimp-gumbo recipe. It took her all afternoon to make it, and to get the salad ready for Johnnie to mix and to cut up the fruit for the macédoine.

During the party, excitement and pleasure sustained her. They had ten guests, four of whom sat on the floor. They were most of them people whom Johnnie knew well and who, after one good appraising look, had welcomed Kitty. Crandall was there, of course, and a handsome couple named McPherson who were both in publishing, and a nervous-looking man called Parsons, who was in radio, and his wife, Sally, who devoted her life to keeping him soothed and to bringing up two babies. There were also Brian Scholz, a handsome customer's man with a passion for discussing Proust, and Lisa Dunsany, a very minor actress whom Scholz quite erroneously considered his girl of the moment. She married him. There were also three of those delightful, those amusing extra men who hung around so pleasantly for years, until, one by one, they all got married and everything evened up.

No one except Sally Parsons went home till three in the morning. When they were all gone, Kitty and Johnnie fell happily into each other's arms. "It was a good one," Johnnie said. They went to bed.

Kitty woke up as usual the next morning to the sound of a razor being stropped in the bathroom. Automatically, she got up and ran to the kitchen to put on the coffee. At the door of the kitchen she stopped. She moaned. The sticky pans filled the sink and the dirty dishes were stacked even on the floor. As she turned to look into the living room, she realized that she wasn't feeling very well. In the living room everything looked rumpled. Cigarette butts overflowed from every ash tray, and the tables and the rug were powdered with ashes.

Kitty put her hand to her head. "Johnnie," she called.

He came with his face half lathered. "Oh, good heavens," he said, and Kitty realized that Johnnie wasn't feeling well either.

"We shouldn't have left it."

Johnnie put his arm around her. "Look. You go get dressed and we'll go out to breakfast."

They drank their coffee at the nearest drugstore. When they had finished, Johnnie paid the check. As she watched him, Kitty had a sudden sense of man's peculiar freedom. He was going to his work now, which would engross him all day, and when he came home tonight everything would be straightened out by magic.

As though he felt something of what was in her mind, Johnnie said, "Kitty, get someone to clear up that mess. Call up an agency."

"We can't afford it."

"We can if I go without lunch a few days."

She should have said, "Darling, I love you." Instead she said, "Oh, don't be silly."

"O.K. I won't," he said, and turned on his heel.

She thought, I've fought with Johnnie.

At the end of two miserable hours she had made very little impression on the dishes.

Light of Love

By A. L. T. TAYLOR

Oh, my love is a wanton though she be kind
With a wanton heart and a wanton mind,
With a smile for every man in sight
And a kiss for any lad at night;
She gives me her love with no more thought
Than a poacher gives to the beast he's caught,
Yet her eyes are dark and her hair is gold
And I've given her my heart in her hands to hold.
For though she be wanton she still is kind
And the only lass I am likely to find
Who will give no hurt for the fun of giving,
Who can fill my heart with the zest of living.
Oh, my love is a wanton though she be kind
With a wanton heart and a wanton mind,
Yet I envy no man in the whole wide world,
For her love is a bud as yet uncurled
And one day the bud will be opened by me;
Then no longer a wanton will my love be.

When Crandall rang the doorbell, her rubber gloves had just begun to leak, and the tears she could not restrain were plopping regularly into the dishpan.

"I left my pipe," Crandall said. Then he saw the room. "Gosh."

Kitty began to cry again.

"My poor girl," said Crandall. He patted her shoulder and wiped her eyes.

"It's just that I'm so tired," sobbed Kitty.

"You need two things. The first is to learn how to wash dishes." He took off his coat and rolled up his sleeves, and then he led her back to the kitchen. "Now, what you do is get all the different sizes in stacks, and it's better to rinse them off under the faucet first. You wash the glasses and then the silver and then the plates. And you use lots of soapsuds and hot water."

He washed and she dried, and they finished the kitchen in short order. Then they tackled the living room. When everything was neat again, Kitty sank into a chair and stared at Crandall in amazement.

"What I want to know," she said, "is where did you learn to do all this?"

He grinned. "I'm really only a country boy. There's not much about a house I don't know."

"So that's why you're so desperately smooth all the time," cried Kitty.

Crandall didn't answer her. He rolled down his shirt sleeves and put on the well-cut coat he wore so carelessly. "Now we will talk about you. The second thing that you need is a job. Then you can pay a slavey to do all this."

"But I've been meaning to get a job. Only I've had fun being just a wife for a while."

"When you begin to throw parties, you've been just a wife long enough. You might as well work till you have kids."

"Kids?" Kitty said.

"PEOPLE have 'em. Now I think I can get you a job with a publisher I know. They'll probably give you fifteen a week and put you to typing lists, but you ought to get along, and even on fifteen you can pay for lunch and carfare and have a part-time maid and a couple of dollars over for fun."

"Fun! Beautiful dresses from Klein's and beautiful parties and beautiful everything."

"Well, yes and no. You go on up there now. I'll telephone Tom Bushley while you're on the way and then I'll sit here and think about my play. I need to."

"Don't you have to go to work at all?"

"This is my week end. We go to press on Mondays."

As Kitty went out the door she looked back at him, and said something she had been screwing up her courage for since the moment he had so silently rolled down his sleeves: "Crandall, Johnnie and I think you're wonderful. We think you're the nicest and most accomplished person we know."

Crandall smiled. "You're sweet. Kitty, it was a very prosperous farm, but I certainly hated it."

Kitty got the job. It was only on the way back to the apartment that she thought about Johnnie. Her state of mind as she let herself into the basement was a strange mixture of jubilation and dismay.

"Crandall, they took me," she said. "Crandall, what will Johnnie say?"

"He'll probably beat you."

"I could telephone, except that I never call him at the office."

"It's different now that you're a working-woman," said Crandall. He stood up. "I'll go. Listeners cramp the style."

"Crandall darling, thank you. Thank you for everything."

He made her a little bow and went away.

She faced the telephone with some trepidation. It took a long time to get him.

"Hullo," Johnnie said brusquely.

"It's Kitty," she said.

"Why, hullo," he said, and now his voice was right.

"Johnnie, I'm sorry about this morning."

There was a pause. He was remembering.

"You should be," he said at last.

"Johnnie, I've done something. I've got a job."

"You've got what?"

"A job. So we can have a maid."

There was another pause, a longer one.

"Look," Johnnie said, "it takes me by surprise that I hate the idea. I mean you working."

"Johnnie, you're sweet."

"I'll be home in half an hour."

She hung up feeling cherished. How silly, she thought. How reactionary. All the time she was smiling at nothing. She flung herself on the couch. How nice.

Kitty did well at her job. In very little time she was making twenty a week and being given manuscripts to read. If she had been able to take her work as seriously as she took her marriage, she would probably have turned into a career woman. Real publishers never go home without a manuscript under one arm, and Kitty always left her reading on her desk.

She loved her life as she was leading it. She loved dashing off with Johnnie in the morning and leaving everything in a mess for fat Nellie to straighten. She loved coming back at six o'clock, to find the apartment neat as a pin and the marketing done.

(Continued on Page 94)

"People think I have a maid, but—

ALL I HAVE IS A SECRET!

I let Tavern Products make light work of my spring cleaning!"

Floors are a cinch now with Tavern Non-Rub Wax. Easily applied on linoleum, wood, rubber or asphalt tile. Dries to lustre in 20 minutes. Wears longer—cleans easier—even resists water spots! Tavern Non-Rub Floor Wax.

Boy! What a beautiful finis! grand looks as pretty as the d it, thanks to Tavern Furniture grease and grime off all our fu Won't attract or hold daily Furniture Gloss.

I clean house the easy wa Tavern Rug Cleaner is a super-shar poo for rugs. Non-caustic, non-i flammable. And I get spotless wi dows with Tavern Window Clean Works fast — leaves no streak Tavern Rug Cleaner, Tavern Wi dow Cleaner.

Typical symbol of hospitality— Chequers Tavern, Steyning, England

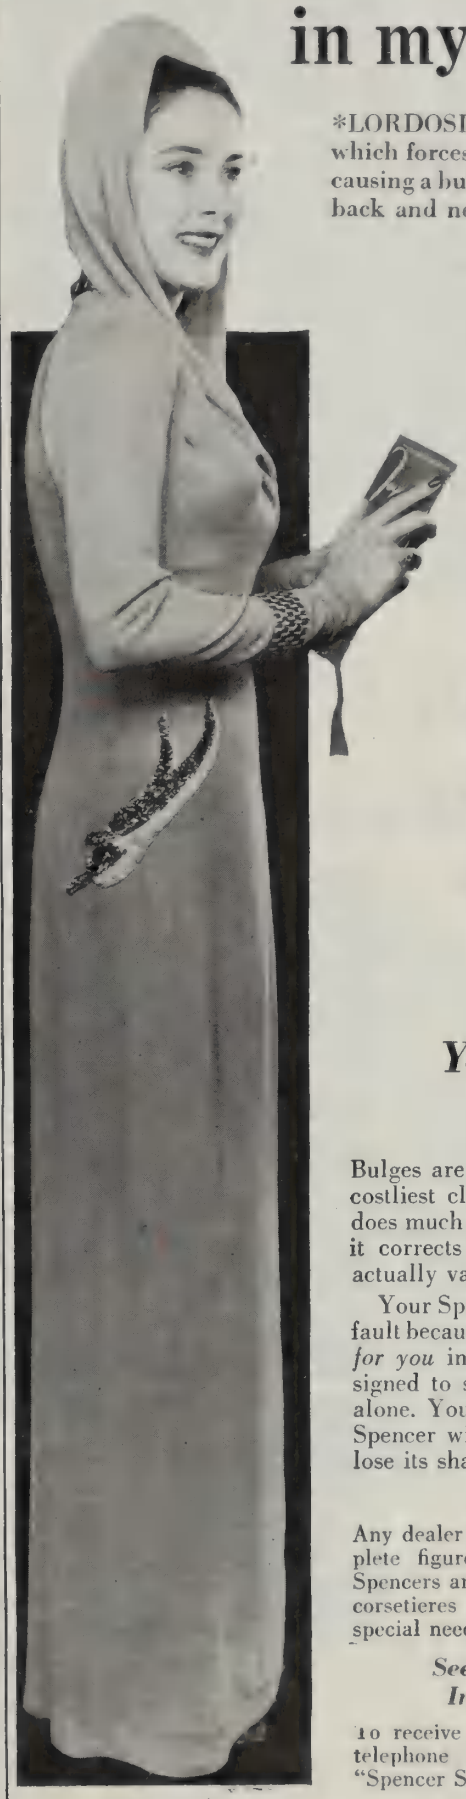
SOCONY-VACUUM



TAVERN HOM

"I Lost that *Lordosis Bulge in my SPENCER"

*LORDOSIS is an incurve at waistline in back which forces abdomen forward and downward, causing a bulge at lower back, too. Tired, aching back and nervous fatigue often result.

In the support she was wearing — In her Spencer Fashion Support

You can lose your bulges too!

Bulges are ugly. They ruin the lines of even the costliest clothes. Get a Spencer! For a Spencer does much more than conceal your figure faults—it corrects the cause of your bulges and they actually vanish.

Your Spencer will effectively correct any figure fault because we create a fashion support especially for you in which every line is individually designed to solve your figure problem—and yours alone. You'll be amazed to find how little your Spencer will cost. And it is guaranteed never to lose its shape.

Have a Figure Analysis

Any dealer in Spencers will gladly give you a complete figure analysis. You'll find it fascinating! Spencers are sold by women dealers who are expert corsetieres qualified to consult with you on your special needs.

See Your Future Beauty Lines In Interesting Free Booklet

To receive booklet send coupon below—or look in telephone directory for "Spencer corsetiere" or "Spencer Support Shop."

Note lovely lines which her Spencer gives her gown!

Do you want to make money in a professional type of business? Experience not needed—we train you. Profitable — interesting. Check here ☐ for information.

MARCH, 1946

Lordosis Posture ☐ Breast Problems ☐ Ptosis Posture ☐

TO: ANNE SPENCER — SEND TODAY

Spencer, Incorporated
141 Derby Avenue, New Haven 7, Conn.

Please send your free booklet. I have marked my posture problem at left.

Name .....
(Please print)

Street .....

City ■ State

SPENCER INDIVIDUALLY DESIGNED SUPPORTS

Reg. U. S. Pat. Off.

NEW
ALL-PURPOSE
ENAMEL

THE NEW
SHERWIN-WILLIAMS
ENAMELOID

GIVE walls, woodwork, toys, furniture beautiful new color with this high-gloss, 1-coat enamel. Use Enameloid, too, for outside woodwork and doors, porches and automobiles.

SHERWIN-WILLIAMS PAINTS

(Continued from Page 90)

"That's no way to talk about Crandall," Johnnie said, but Crandall only slid down on his spine another inch and smiled at her approvingly.

"You're much too pretty to be so clever."

Kitty felt warm both inside and out. "Do you know, if you painted this room a sort of canary yellow, and put some sort of gauzy stuff at the windows and got some slip covers and re-covered all these pillows, it would really be very nice."

Johnnie was laughing at her. "I didn't reckon with the homemaking instinct."

"Neither did I," said Kitty. She was startled. "It must be marriage."

Crandall was laughing too. "From here, marriage looks fine." He got to his feet and held out his hand. "Come see the rest of the place before I go. You can tell me how to make the back yard into a garden come spring."

But in the spring it was Kitty, not Crandall, who made the garden. Crandall—who, as Johnnie put it, was expanding—found another apartment that suited him better, and it seemed much easier to take over his lease than to move. Besides, Johnnie and Kitty liked their basement. They lived in it for nearly five years, and before they left it Kitty had done to it nearly all the things she thought of that first day, and a good many more. She made it a gay, informal place. All her life it made Kitty smile to remember that she never finished painting the desk on the window side, and that the hems in the bedroom curtains were held up by pins till she finally took them down for good.

She was very busy during that time. Crandall got her a job after she'd been in New York a little more than a month. It was the day after the first party.

The party was a great success. Kitty had quickly learned that anybody who could read could cook, and that people in New York considered food an important subject for research. When she and Johnnie decided to pay everyone back, she wrote her mother for the shrimp-gumbo recipe. It took her all afternoon to make it, and to get the salad ready for Johnnie to mix and to cut up the fruit for the macédoine.

During the party, excitement and pleasure sustained her. They had ten guests, four of whom sat on the floor. They were most of them people whom Johnnie knew well and who, after one good appraising look, had welcomed Kitty. Crandall was there, of course, and a handsome couple named McPherson who were both in publishing, and a nervous-looking man called Parsons, who was in radio, and his wife, Sally, who devoted her life to keeping him soothed and to bringing up two babies. There were also Brian Scholz, a handsome customer's man with a passion for discussing Proust, and Lisa Dunsany, a very minor actress whom Scholz quite erroneously considered his girl of the moment. She married him. There were also three of those delightful, those amusing extra men who hung around so pleasantly for years, until, one by one, they all got married and everything evened up.

No one except Sally Parsons went home till three in the morning. When they were all gone, Kitty and Johnnie fell happily into each other's arms. "It was a good one," Johnnie said. They went to bed.

Kitty woke up as usual the next morning to the sound of a razor being stropped in the bathroom. Automatically, she got up and ran to the kitchen to put on the coffee. At the door of the kitchen she stopped. She moaned. The sticky pans filled the sink and the dirty dishes were stacked even on the floor. As she turned to look into the living room, she realized that she wasn't feeling very well. In the living room everything looked rumpled. Cigarette butts overflowed from every ash tray, and the tables and the rug were powdered with ashes.

Kitty put her hand to her head. "Johnnie," she called.

He came with his face half lathered. "Oh, good heavens," he said, and Kitty realized that Johnnie wasn't feeling well either.

(Continued from Page 92)

ne vegetables fixed, the table set. The parties they went to and the friends who ropped in were fun, and so was sitting at ome, reading or sewing, while Johnnie vorked on his book.

Sundays were wonderful. They slept very ate then and woke up slowly. When Kitty ;ot breakfast she brought it back to the low vide bed and they stayed there for a long ime, drinking coffee and reading the Sunday ›apers. About three o'clock they went out ›or a meal. In those days, the sidewalk café vas yet to invade New York, but far over on he East Side there was an old foreign restaurant where you could sit out-of-doors ›ehind a green lattice and watch the ›assers-by. They often went there.

"It's like Paris," Kitty said the first time Johnnie took her. "I've never been in Paris, Johnnie, have you?"

"No," he said. "We'll go together."

When she had been married a year and a ıalf, and had almost forgotten that there vas another existence than hers and Johnnie's, Kitty had a letter from her mother:

My dear child: I think you must take after ne because you write so seldom. We all enjoy 'our letters when they come. I think your ıpartment must be very pretty and I approve ›f everything that you tell me you have done o it. A great many of our relations think it odd hat you are living in a basement. I think it ery narrow-minded of them. When I used to isit in New York as a young girl almost veryone lived in those brownstone houses and can imagine that the downstairs part would urn out well.

Evelyn's friend, Jane Randall, who married Harriman Lane, has fixed up one of those old warehouses down on the river front and she and Harriman are living in it. Everyone pretends to be scandalized, but Evelyn says the place is perfectly delightful. I do not think it any ›odder to live in a basement in New York than in a warehouse in Decatur.

I thank you, my dear child, for inviting me to visit you. I am afraid I am too old to sleep on a studio couch, but I should be so pleased if you would invite Evelyn instead. She is in the doldrums, and I think you and Johnnie would do her good.

I hope you are not working too hard at that ob, and that you are giving Johnnie enough to at. If you want any receipts I shall be delighted o send them to you.

My dear love to you both.

Your mother,

ELIZABETH FORBES LATTIMER.

Evelyn arrived in New York late in June, when the heat was just beginning, and she stayed until August.

New York was good for her. She had never been so gay, so uncritical or so lovely. It was as though in coming away she had resolutely left behind all heaviness of spirit.

Johnnie, considering her with a manly and a novelist's eye, thought, That gal's just ready. Just waiting.

To his and Kitty's immense surprise, Crandall seemed to be what she'd been waiting for. They had diligently introduced Evelyn to all the bachelors they knew, but they had steered clear of Crandall.

"He'll scare her and she'll scare him, and then they'll both stiffen up and be mean," Kitty said.

But Crandall eased in one evening after dinner. He looked very long and cool in one of the first gabardine suits ever worn in New York by a young man. They were having coffee, and Kitty gave him a cup and ntroduced him to Evelyn in what she considered a properly offhand manner.

"Evelyn, this is David Crandall," she said. "Call him Crandall. Everyone does."

"I've never called a man by his last name n my life," said Evelyn.

Crandall shot her a look then. That look ook her in well—her fine body and her long ıands and her gentle dark eyes and her ıaughty mouth. He didn't speak to her at ll until he got up to go, nearly two hours ater. Then suddenly he turned to her.

"How about dinner tomorrow night?"

"I'd love it," said Evelyn without the lightest surprise. Her eyes were sparkling s the door closed behind him. "He's deghtful, isn't he?" she said.

FOR A COOL, CLEAN SMOKE

The smart looking Kirsten is instantly recognized as a really fine pipe. The light-weight duralumin radiator condenses and traps tars, oils and moisture . . . no tongue-bite nor throat irritation. Each puff of smoke is delightfully cooled. The Kirsten Pipe is clean and easy to keep clean.

Large $8.50
Medium $7.00

THE Kirsten "RADIATOR" PIPE
The Perfect Gift for "HIM"
KIRSTEN PIPE CO., Dept. 241, Seattle 1, Wash.

BIRTHDAYS and ANNIVERSARIES Bring You BIG CASH PROFITS

Sell Everyday Greeting Cards
New 1946 Assortments Now Ready!
Everybody wants these charming messages for Birthdays, Anniversaries, Get-Well and Sympathy occasions. Sell Assortment of 14 beauteous folders for $1. You make up to 50c per box.

Make Big Money Easy!
No experience needed. Call on friends, others. Samples bring quick sales, easy cash daily. Send 65c for Sample Everyday Box. Money back if not satisfied.
CHILTON GREETINGS
147 ESSEX STREET
Dept. 6-S, Boston 11, Mass.

VAUGHAN'S
GARDENING ILLUSTRATED
250 COLOR PLATES
THE MOST BEAUTIFUL SEED CATALOG

Pick flowers for your peace garden from 2250 annuals and perennials (many unobtainable during war), roses, etc., 250 pictured in full color. Also luxury vegetables; new weed killers. 110 pages, 52 in full color. Catalog FREE on request.

SPECIAL—Annual Sweet William. Brilliant flowers equal to biennial varieties which bloom only 2nd year. Flowers early 1st year from seed, lives over winter to bloom again. Seed with catalog, 10c.

VAUGHAN'S SEED STORE, Dept. 113
10 W. Randolph, Chicago 1 ▪ 47 Barclay, N.Y.C.7

FALSE TEETH
KLUTCH holds them tighter

KLUTCH forms a comfort cushion; holds dental plates so much firmer and snugger that one can eat and talk with greater comfort and security; in many cases almost as well as with natural teeth. Klutch lessens the constant fear of a dropping, rocking, chafing plate. 25c and 50c at druggists. . . If your druggist hasn't it, don't waste money on substitutes, but send us 10c and we will mail you a generous trial box. I. P. INC.

KLUTCH CO., Box 4621-C, ELMIRA, N. Y.

"MY Don Juan Lipstick STAYS ON!"

Says
Paula Stone
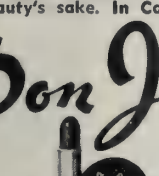
FAMOUS ON SCREEN, STAGE AND RADIO



"My lips stay lovely hours longer without retouching... That's why Don Juan is tops with me."

4 beauty extras:
See what they do for your lips

1. DON JUAN STAYS ON when you eat, drink, kiss, if used as directed.
2. LIPS STAY LOVELY without frequent retouching—Try today.
3. NOT DRYING or SMEARY. Imparts appealing "glamour" look. Creamy smooth—easily applied.
4. NEW Style SHADES... Try Medium Red, a rich, true red, flattering, youthful looking, or Raspberry, darker, so delighting. Other shades, too.

Matching powder, rouge & cake make-up —for beauty's sake. In Canada also.

Don Juan LIPSTICK STAYS ON

BLUE-JAY with Nupercaine gives Amazing 3-Way RELIEF from CORNS!

1 EXCLUSIVE with Blue-Jay, anesthetic Nupercaine soon curbs surface pain.
2 INSTANTLY stops shoe-pressure pain.
3 GENTLE medication to loosen hard "core," simply lift it out in a few days.

Only Blue-Jay Has NUPERCAINE

Not single action, not double action, but TRIPLE relief with this NEW KIND of corn plaster! At all drug or toilet goods counters.

BLUE JAY Corn Plasters — 2 Sizes—Standard and Little Toe
A product of BAUER & BLACK
Division of The Kendall Company, Chicago 16

BOILPROOF-INEXPENSIVE
AT NOTION COUNTERS
York Process NAME TAPES
AVOID LOSSES MARY JONES
6 DOZEN $1.25 • 9 DOZEN $1.50
12 DOZEN $1.75
If Unobtainable, Trial 3 doz. $1
NAME MAKER CORP. DEPT. 42, N. Y. 3, N. Y.

Women-Earn Money-Sell Yours-Truly nylons
AMAZING NEW FIT SERVICE
Write today . . . ask for FREE outfit with sample stocking. Enjoy taking orders for Yours-Truly Nylon Hosiery. Sensational Individual Customer Fit Service to fit every type of leg: short, long, extra long, slim, stout, average. Earn money of your own. No experience needed. Write fully.
AMERICAN HOSIERY MILLS, Dept. T-156, Indianapolis 7, Ind.

YARN BUY DIRECT SAVE MONEY
FREE Samples and Directions. All wool 2-3-4-ply Knitting Yarns. Unexcelled quality. Low Prices.
BARTLETT YARN MILLS, Box R, Harmony, Maine.

After that, Crandall took Evelyn off their hands. She was always coming in and going out and they seldom saw her even at breakfast.

Kitty and Johnnie looked on with a strange mixture of concern, gratification and amusement.

"What do you suppose they talk about?" Kitty said.

"You don't have to talk much."

"We did."

He grinned. "You did."

Kitty rolled an eye at him, but she persisted. "They don't seem to fit. What do you suppose they see in each other?"

"I'll tell you. I've been thinking about it. In Crandall, Evelyn has found the missing half of my brother Harry. In Evelyn, Crandall has found his ideal."

"Crandall!"

"Sure. Crandall's a simple romantic beneath all that slick stuff. He's never run into anyone as naturally and completely a lady as Evelyn. It's bowled him over."

"How about me? I'm a Lattimer."

Johnnie smiled at her. "You're something else again. People think a lot of things about you before it occurs to them you're a lady. If it ever does. But Evelyn—do you know she's been here a month and she's never once called a girl a gal, or a man a guy, or said 'swell' or 'O.K.' Nothing on earth will ever change Evelyn."

"Not even Crandall?"

"Well, I hope not. But they might make a good couple—if they'd be kind to each other."

In those days, Kitty sometimes remembered how often she had heard her mother say: "Of course I never ask Evelyn anything." You couldn't. You could only observe and conjecture. You could notice that she called him David now, and how his eyes softened when she said it. You could say, "Evelyn, look at your hair!" so that she'd say, "We've been riding on top of the bus." Evelyn and Crandall on top of the bus!

When Kitty told him that, Johnnie whistled. "I guess it's love all right."

But when Crandall asked Evelyn to marry him, she turned him down.

Kitty came home from work one afternoon to find her sister packing. Evelyn's eyes were very red. When she saw Kitty, she had to blink back the tears before she could speak.

"I'm packing," she said.

Then, as though the effort of speech had been too much, she really began to cry. For the first time in her life, Kitty put her arms around her older sister and comforted her. When Evelyn finally stopped crying, the sisters looked at each other with some constraint. At last, and as though it explained everything, Evelyn said:

"David wants to marry me."

"What?" said Kitty, who had been imagining the opposite.

"I've refused him," Evelyn said, and she began to cry again.

This time Kitty didn't touch her. "I don't understand at all. What is it you want?"

As though the hint of anger in her sister's voice had spurred her, Evelyn stood up. She flung out her arms in an uncharacteristic manner. "Not this." Her gesture took in all of Kitty's world.

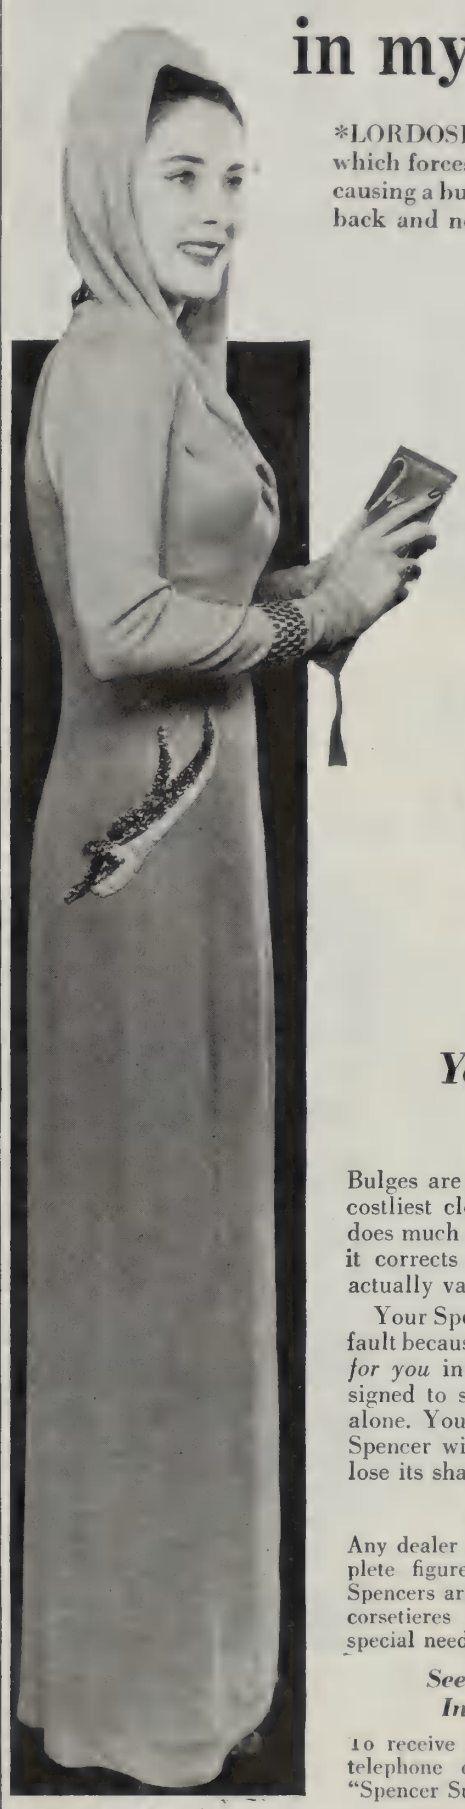
"Well, really," said Kitty.

"Oh, it's all right for you. I wish I were like you."

"Don't you love him?" Kitty said.

"That's why I'm crying."

"But I don't understand at all."



Evelyn leaned her head against the wall behind her. "I'm twenty-eight, and I know pretty well what I want out of life. I'm only going to have two thirds of it. David's the third I'm going to do without."

"And is my brother-in-law Harry Bates the other two thirds?"

Flatterers are clever mind readers. They tell us exactly what we think. —ALBERT A. BRANDT.

"I Lost that *Lordosis Bulge in my SPENCER"

*LORDOSIS is an incurve at waistline in back which forces abdomen forward and downward, causing a bulge at lower back, too. Tired, aching back and nervous fatigue often result.

Note lovely lines which her Spencer gives her gown!

In the support she was wearing — In her Spencer Fashion Support

You can lose your bulges too!

Bulges are ugly. They ruin the lines of even the costliest clothes. Get a Spencer! For a Spencer does much more than conceal your figure faults—it corrects the cause of your bulges and they actually vanish.

Your Spencer will effectively correct any figure fault because we create a fashion support especially for you in which every line is individually designed to solve your figure problem—and yours alone. You'll be amazed to find how little your Spencer will cost. And it is guaranteed never to lose its shape.

Have a Figure Analysis

Any dealer in Spencers will gladly give you a complete figure analysis. You'll find it fascinating! Spencers are sold by women dealers who are expert corsetieres qualified to consult with you on your special needs.

See Your Future Beauty Lines In Interesting Free Booklet

To receive booklet send coupon below—or look in telephone directory for "Spencer corsetiere" or "Spencer Support Shop."

Do you want to make money in a professional type of business? Experience not needed—we train you. Profitable—interesting. Check here ☐ for information.

TO: ANNE SPENCER — SEND TODAY
Spencer, Incorporated
141 Derby Avenue, New Haven 7, Conn.
Please send your free booklet. I have marked my posture problem at left.
Name.....
(Please print)
Street.....
City & State

SPENCER INDIVIDUALLY DESIGNED SUPPORTS
Reg. U.S. Pat. Off.

BOWL COVERS you can make yourself with Cut-Rite

TEAR OFF TO SIZE . . . .
Tear off enough Cut-Rite to extend beyond the rim of the bowl at least an inch on all sides. Center the Cut-Rite on the bowl and hold it firmly in place with your left hand.

PLEAT AND TWIST . . . .
Still holding the wax paper firmly in place, start by pleating a corner; twist and tuck under-and-up to the rim of bowl.

A SNUG COVER . . . .
Continue to twist and tuck under-and-up, working on the bias, and turning bowl away from you as you go . . . until you have completed a snug-fitting roll.

RIGHT NOW's the time to start being a clever Cut-Rite cook. It's so easy to make your own flavor-saving, transparent bowl covers. To use little Cut-Rite short-cuts to save yourself dish-washing. Grate cheese on Cut-Rite, roll your pie-crust on it.

Waxed-through Cut-Rite is so pliable it doesn't tear—so extra-heavy one thickness is all that's needed to wrap up that juicy half a grapefruit left over from breakfast. Left-overs wrapped in Cut-Rite save icebox space, too—fit neatly into corners! Keep Cut-Rite always handy—you'll find a dozen different uses for it daily! Scott Paper Company, Chester, Pennsylvania.

Get Cut-Rite with its famous sawtooth cutting edge in the big 125-foot roll

CUT-RITE
Reg. U. S. Pat. Off.

TEARS-RITE · SAVES-RITE · LOOKS-RITE

"Yes," said Evelyn, and the color rose in her face.

"Why?"

"Kitty," said Evelyn. Her eyes implored her sister to be kind.

"Tell me," said Kitty.

"I'll try. I'm not good at saying things. I'm not like you." She paused a moment to marshal her thoughts. "I've loved staying here with you and Johnnie. It's been wonderful to be so gay and silly, but I don't want to go on that way forever. When I marry I want to be established and dignified. I want a house to run that will still be mine tomorrow, and I want children."

"Children? Anybody can have children."

"Your friends, the Parsons, certainly can," said Evelyn. "Two babies in that little dark hole of a bedroom and no one to look after them properly."

"Sally does her best."

"Look at her. She's a wreck because her husband won't grow up. He'll never believe decent plumbing is worth more than a living room big enough to throw parties in."

"But Crandall's much nicer than Bennie Parsons. And he makes a lot more. And I think he'd like to have children."

"Of course," said Evelyn. She closed her eyes, and Kitty could just see the line of moisture along her lashes. "In about ten years David will want just exactly what I want. But now he still wants to drink more than he should and spend more than he has, and nothing is going to stop him. I'd hate it and then he'd hate me. I didn't want him to want to marry me." She opened her eyes then. They were wide and honest. "Only I didn't want to stop him either," Evelyn finished.

It was just then, as though a playwright were timing it, that the doorbell rang.

"I'll go," said Kitty.

Crandall brushed by her as though she weren't there. He stood in the doorway of the living room and stared at Evelyn.

"I came to see if you had changed your mind," he said.

It took her a long time to answer him. "No, David," she said.

His hands moved quickly. "I'm going to get so drunk." He turned on his heel and nearly bumped into Kitty. He gave her a one-sided smile. "I'm behaving badly."

WHEN he had gone, Kitty said, "Poor darling. He was tight."

"I'm glad he was," said Evelyn. "If he hadn't been I might have changed my mind."

Kitty and Johnnie put her on the train that night. Just before the train pulled out, just after she said, "Give mother my love," Kitty said, "Evelyn, why don't you marry Lawford Paige?"

"He's never asked me," Evelyn said. The train began to move. "I haven't thought of him in days." Her face, as Kitty saw it last, was startled.

Kitty told Johnnie all the details that night. "Do you think she's right?"

"Dull but right. It's too bad. She'll be nice and secure with brother Harry, but she'll never have much fun."

"Johnnie, all this talk about children. Do you think we should have some?"

"In time, and one at a time."

They giggled and turned over, and fell asleep very happily.

Evelyn was married to Harry Bates just before Christmas. Kitty went home to be matron of honor, but Johnnie, who was working very hard, stayed in New York.

One evening, just before Kitty left, Crandall dropped in.

"You certainly haven't been around," said Kitty.

"I'VE been a mess," he said. He pulled a square gray envelope out of his pocket. "I've had a letter from Evelyn."

"I told you she was getting married," Johnnie said.

"I didn't believe it."

"I'm going home tomorrow," said Kitty. "I'm going to be matron of honor."

Crandall smiled. "A great big wedding."

"Yes," said Kitty.

The silences were awful. Kitty couldn't stand it. She went to Crandall and put her arm through his. "There are lots of girls."

"Lots," said Crandall. He began to laugh. "Don't you worry. No more benders for Crandall. I think this is my cue to prove I'm a little man. I shall write the great American play and make Evelyn sorry."

"If it's any satisfaction," said Johnnie, "she'll probably be a little sorry for the rest of her life."

"Well, give her my love."

Kitty did, though she hadn't meant to.

Evelyn was married in Christ Church with eight bridesmaids besides Kitty. She looked what Mrs. Lattimer called a dream in ancestral lace and tulle and soft white satin.

Nothing about Evelyn's wedding seemed very actual to Kitty because Johnnie wasn't there. Decatur, where she had lived all her childhood, where she had left all her family, was now only a place which had once contained him. Moving dutifully through Evelyn's wedding, she had a strange vague feeling that only her body was there. This made her look bland and extremely pretty, and people spoke of how becoming matrimony had been to Kitty Lattimer.

During the reception, however, she had one sharp moment which she never forgot. She was showing Evelyn's wedding presents to old Mrs. Marcus Howe. "Mother says it's a really vulgar display," Kitty said. Mrs. Howe only nodded benignly, but Lawford Paige, who was poking among the silver and the crystal, straightened up and gave his characteristic burst of laughter.

"I can hear her say it," he said.

"I'm glad to see you appreciate my mother," said Kitty.

She had seen him and recognized him as she came into the room, but until now he hadn't turned. He came forward and bent over her hand. She saw that his hair was thinning on the top of his head.

"I'm in favor of all the Lattimer ladies."

"Well, I don't see why you didn't marry one," said Kitty.

He looked her in the eye. "I didn't think I had a chance," he said.

No amount of will power could have stopped that blush. Kitty let it come. "I meant Evelyn."

(Continued on Page 99)

Recipe Neighbors

By Catherine Cate Coblentz

My mother's mother had recipe neighbors,
Of this I am very glad,
Bound in a book is the record now
Of the friends my grandmother had.

There was Mrs. Babson, of sugar-pie fame,
And Em, whose biscuits were light,
And R. L. W., whose eggless cake
We are having for supper tonight.

My neighbors serve mints and bakery stuff
And we chatter a bit at tea,
But no one says when she comes to leave,
"Do give me the recipe."

A century hence one will never know
Or care for my friends and their fate,
But someone will treasure lovingly
What the recipe neighbors ate.

No wonder the FRIGIDAIRE REFRIGERATOR is America's favorite! Only Frigidaire offers the current-saving Meter-Miser, simplest cold-producing mechanism ever built. Super-Freezer Chest for modern frozen food storage. Cold-Wall refrigeration that protects vitamins, guards against wilting and drying. Behind every Frigidaire feature stands Frigidaire's proved dependability – a record for lasting satisfaction established in millions of American kitchens!

Yes, they're all FRIGIDAIRE

...made by the makers of America's favorite refrigerator!

It's a FRIGIDAIRE ELECTRIC RANGE, with really important features—and lots of them! Fast-heating Radiantube units for modern, clean, smudge-free cooking; BIG oven; waist-high broiler; thrifty Thermizer Cooker for one-unit preparation of entire meals. Automatic devices for "remote-control" cooking; lighted signals. Flush-to-wall cabinet; heavy insulation; porcelain finish inside and out. True Frigidaire value, too: low first cost and low operating cost.

This new FRIGIDAIRE HOME FREEZER means "fresh" fruits and berries in midwinter; safe frozen storage for meats; vegetables retaining color, flavor, vitamins for months; pastries, special dishes prepared far ahead. Exciting to think about? Give very serious thought to this: Frigidaire has built more low-temperature refrigerated cabinets than any other company. So buy a Frigidaire Home Freezer – either a chest or upright model – and be sure of dependable, economical frozen food storage.

With a FRIGIDAIRE ELECTRIC WATER HEATER, hot water's always on tap—instantly. It's economical, too: heating elements are in direct contact with water; baffles keep cold water apart from hot. Round, streamlined models, or table-top cabinet to go with the Frigidaire Electric Range.

See the Favorite...See Frigidaire

Over 7 million Built and Sold

See your Frigidaire Dealer for proof that every one of these Frigidaire appliances meets the same high standards that make the Frigidaire Refrigerator... America's favorite! Find his name in Classified Telephone Directory. Or write Frigidaire, 714 Amelia St., Dayton 1, Ohio. In Canada, 479 Commercial Rd., Leaside 12, Ontario.

FRIGIDAIRE

made only by

GENERAL MOTORS

REFRIGERATORS · RANGES
WATER HEATERS · HOME FREEZERS
KITCHEN CABINETS

Who says Ritzy Desserts take time?

How many minutes have you—5—10—15?
That's all you need to whip up nifties like these.
It's easy, too—with Del Monte Brand Fruit Cocktail!

8 TEMPTERS YOU CAN MAKE ON THE RUN

You can reel off treats galore—any time—with Del Monte Fruit Cocktail. Not only desserts. Starters, salads, main course bright spots, too. No peeling, no dicing, no mixing. But all fruit cocktails are not alike. You'll want Del Monte, the flavor-first kind.

If you have 5 minutes

- Spoon Del Monte Fruit Cocktail on leftover cake (top). Looks new, is new with rich Del Monte flavor.
- Or dish up chilled Del Monte Fruit Cocktail (center). No fuss, no fixing, no shopping for fruits!
- Or make a parfait of Del Monte Fruit Cocktail and softened ice cream. You'll like the balanced flavor of this cocktail.

If you have 10 minutes

- Make a "nest" in angel cake, fill with Fruit Cocktail buttered, warmed, flavored with almond (right).
- Or treat the family to five luscious fruits with marshmallow cream and chopped salted almonds (below).
- Or thicken Fruit Cocktail slightly, add sherry flavor. Gay, colorful, delicious atop warm fruit cake.

If you have 15 minutes

- Dress up cinnamon toast stars with hot buttery Fruit Cocktail (right). See how easy to liven up plain foods? No trouble at all.
- Or make French toast (with brown sugar), serve with spiced buttered Del Monte Fruit Cocktail. Different and so good!

Buy and hold Victory Bonds

Remember! Del Monte puts

flavor first

- ✓ In Growing
- ✓ In Picking
- ✓ In Packing
- ✓ In Testing

Del Monte FRUIT COCKTAIL

SAVES TIME—SAVES WORK—MAKES MEALS BRIGHTER

(Continued from Page 96)

"Evelyn." He stared. "I certainly never thought of that. Kitty, this is outrageous."

"Anyway, it's too late," she said. She wanted to stick pins into him, but she had no real conviction that they would prick him. "I think you've been very dull. She would have been exactly right."

"Evelyn," he said. "Not Kitty?"

"Certainly not I," she said. "I couldn't even live here."

"Do you think I'll live here always?"

"Won't you?" she said.

"Yes. Though I've had moments of thinking I wouldn't." He leaned back precariously among the wedding presents. "Kitty, don't go too far away."

Afterward, she always wished that she had asked him just what he meant.

When she got back to New York, Johnnie met her at the Pennsylvania Station. They walked arm in arm behind the porter. "We'll take a cab and go have tea at the Waldorf," said Johnnie.

"What I like about you," said Kitty, "is that you always know when to be rich."

"I am rich," he said.

She looked up at him quickly, and saw that he was bursting with excitement. "Johnnie?" she said.

But he laughed and shook his head. "I'll tell you at the Waldorf."

It was the old Waldorf on 34th Street.

"Tea and cinnamon toast," said Johnnie. Then he leaned toward her. "This is a symbol. Baby, they've raised me to sixty-five."

"Oh, Johnnie, I thought maybe sixty."

"Gosh, I wish I could kiss you."

"What shall we do with it?"

"Let's spend it. Let's just throw it away," said Johnnie.

"We can go to the theater."

"And dining and dancing."

"And buy a dress and a suit and two hats."

"And a book and a picture."

"And give wonderful parties."

"And what else?"

They looked at each other. At last Kitty said, "Well, I suppose we could have a baby."

"I suppose we could," Johnnie said. "I'd sort of thought of it."

"Isn't it funny? After a while there's nothing else left to have but a baby."

"Well, we don't have to have it right away. Kitty, this raise means I'm going to have to work like a fool—even nights and perhaps week ends."

"But Johnnie, your book?"

"I'll get it in," Johnnie said grimly.

He found, in the next few months, that it was very hard to do. Schemes for selling face creams engrossed him to such an extent that he took to getting up early in order to work on the novel.

Kitty would open a protesting eye. "You're getting thin," she'd say.

But Johnnie would only laugh at her.

Sometimes at breakfast he'd hurriedly read her what he had written, and she'd criticize to the best of her ability.

Once he said, "You've really got editorial sense, Kitty."

"I wish anyone else thought so."

To her immense surprise, someone else did. The publishing house she worked for suddenly raised her to thirty a week and began to call her an assistant editor.

When she told Johnnie, he whistled. "The rich certainly get richer."

It was some weeks later that Kitty, sitting on the edge of her bed with one stocking off and one stocking on and a strange, vague feeling in her head, thought to herself in an awed sort of way, And the poor get children.

That night, when they were getting ready for bed, Johnnie said, "That's a nice tune, baby, but I wish you'd stop humming it."

She went over to him and put her arms around his waist and laid her cheek on his chest. "But ain't we, Johnnie? Ain't we got fun?" Later, when he was asleep, she thought, I won't tell him till I'm sure. Not till I've seen a doctor.

During the next week things suddenly got to be less fun. Kitty felt terrible. She lost her appetite and her color, and she found that she disliked everything and everybody.

Johnnie worried about her. One night at dinner he said, "I think you'd better give up that job. It's too much for you."

"No, it's not," said Kitty.

"Well, then, you'd better take a tonic."

"I don't need it," said Kitty.

"Kitty, don't you like me any more?"

"Of course," said Kitty.

Very stiffly, Johnnie said, "You go see a doctor. Something's wrong with you."

"No. Nothing's wrong with me. Johnnie," she said, "we're going to have a baby."

"A baby?" said Johnnie.

They looked at each other across their dinner table, and put back their heads, and laughed till they cried.

Kitty's pregnancy was probably the most sentimental period of her life. She gave up her job when she was in the sixth month, not only because she was beginning to be awkwardly heavy but because, as she said, her mind stopped working. She spent hours taking baby shirts and baby dresses and pillowcases out of the cedar chest where she kept them, and putting them back again. At other times she was overcome by a furious energy that drove her to cleaning out bureau drawers and even, one day, to washing blankets

(Continued on Page 101)

"Georgie takes after his father."

IMAGINE!

An Instant Coffee as delicious as the finest ground coffee you can buy!

—AND Ready in 5 Seconds!

No wonder thousands are switching to the New G. WASHINGTON!

● No wonder housewives everywhere are discovering that the NEW G. Washington, made in just 5 seconds, is as delicious as the finest ground coffee they ever tasted! Because it's pure coffee, 100% coffee, with no dextrins, maltose or dextrose added! Just add hot water to one-half teaspoonful! There's no coffee pot, no grounds, no waste!

COSTS NO MORE

Best of all, G. Washington costs no more. The 2-oz. container is equal to a full pound of ground coffee! Say goodbye to complicated coffee-making! Get the New G. Washington's Instant Coffee at your grocery or delicatessen store today and see how good it is!

THE NEW G. Washington's INSTANT COFFEE

A PRODUCT OF AMERICAN HOME FOODS, INC.

DUPLIN COUNTY PUBLIC LIBRARY

New Spry with Cake-Improver

GETS YOU COMPLIMENTS GALORE!

EVEN IF YOU'VE NEVER BAKED SEE HOW EASY IT IS. MIXED IN A JIFFY! ONLY ONE BOWL TO WASH!

IN CANS OR JARS
All Spry now has Cake-Improver

GLORIA CHOCOLATE CAKE

Cake-Improver Spry's Easy One-Bowl Method

2 cups sifted cake flour
1½ cups sugar
2½ teaspoons baking powder (with a tartrate powder use 4 teaspoons)
1 teaspoon salt
½ cup Spry
1 cup less 2 tablespoons milk
1½ teaspoons vanilla
2 eggs, unbeaten

FOLLOW Spry's Easy Mixing Method! Only One Bowl to Wash—Sift flour, sugar, baking powder and salt into mixing bowl. Drop Spry right in. (No creaming with sugar—that tiresome step you always hated.) Add about ⅔ of milk, then vanilla and beat 150 strokes. Spry blends like magic! Scrape bowl and spoon often throughout entire mixing. Add eggs and beat 250 strokes. Add remaining milk and beat 50 strokes. See the easy-to-beat, easy-to-pour batter new Spry gives you! Bake in two deep 8-inch Spry-coated layer pans in moderately hot oven (375°F.) 25-35 minutes. And take marvelously light layers from the oven thanks to New Cake-Improver Spry.

Glorious Chocolate Frosting. Combine 2 tablespoons Spry, 1 cup sifted confectioners' sugar, ¼ teaspoon salt, 1 teaspoon vanilla. Add 2 egg yolks and beat until smooth. Add ¼ cup scalded milk and 3 ounces melted unsweetened chocolate; beat thoroughly until frosting is thick and smooth. Cover tops of layers. Increase one-half to cover sides, too.

You're SURE to get praise-winning cakes!

GET in on this grand news if you love cake and compliments . . . New Spry with Cake-Improver is here! . . .

It's modern magic for cakes. Spry's secret makes possible a simple, easy new way to mix your cake batter that does away with tiresome creaming and long, hard beating that used to make your arm ache.

Your easy-pouring batter is all ready for the cake pans in ⅔ less mixing time. What's more, all the ingredients go straight into the same bowl. Saves washing dishes!

Lighter, Super-Delicious Cake

And Spry's One-Bowl Method gives even beginners sensational success. Light-as-a-feather cakes, delicious, fine-grained, and they keep fresh for days! How happy you'll be when your husband says, "What a wife!" and the youngsters exclaim, "Gee, Mom, you're some cook!"

Remember, Spry's special Cake-Improver is the secret of these wonderful cakes. You can use Spry to advantage in your old family cake recipes, too. But you can't use other kinds of shortening for Spry's One-Bowl Cakes and expect the marvelous results New Spry can promise you.

RELY ON SPRY WHEN YOU BAKE OR FRY. Get flaky, tender pastry with Spry. Fry the Spry way—without unpleasant smoke or smell—for golden-brown, crispy fried foods, so digestible even the children can eat them. Spry is pure, all-vegetable, all-purpose shortening. It stays fresh on the pantry shelf. Spry, whether in cans or jars, gives you the new Cake-Improver advantage, improves all your cooking.

(Continued from Page 99)

"I think I have the nesting instinct," she ld Johnnie quite seriously.

"It's nice you can still be objective about " he said.

Both Johnnie and Crandall were amused the mental and physical changes in her. nat Johnnie should be, she took for granted, ut Crandall surprised her. She saw a great al more of him in those months than she d since Evelyn's marriage, and, besides e amusement, she felt in him a most unex- cted understanding and sympathy.

One day when he came to take her driv- g, she spoke of it: "Crandall, why are you nice to me?"

"Well, I guess because I like you. And I uess because I'm interested. I've never ally known a gal who was having a baby."

Kitty began to laugh. "That's it. You're bserving. Oh, Crandall. Do you know, the fference between you and Johnnie is that ou really like to look at life and he really es to live it."

"Lucky Johnnie," Crandall said.

"Well, yes," said Kitty.

"How about you?"

"I'm a little of both. But of course, just ow, I'm most interested in observing my- lf. Why, Crandall, sometimes I'm amazed. hose naps I take, and lying there after I ake up and thinking of nothing in the most onderful way. And being so proud of my- lf. I know, in my right mind, that I must ok awful, but I just look at myself in the irror and I think, 'My, don't I carry this aby well.'"

"You carry it O.K.," said Crandall.

If Kitty's mother, in Decatur, could have eard this conversation she would have been rrified. As it was, she was delighted with er daughter. When she ot Kitty's letter, she ent to her desk, and took o her neglected pen and egan to write:

My dear daughter: Noth- g has pleased me so much your news since you your- lf were born. I am so glad at you and Johnnie are ving a baby while you are still so young. should like to send you the baby's things. nd me a list of what you need and I shall y to fill it in like a good grandmother. That es sound strange. If you would like to come me to have your baby with Doctor Emery the Tremaine Hospital, everyone would delighted and we could make you very mfortable. I imagine you would rather stay th Johnnie. If so, I shall come to New York nen the baby is born. I shall stay at the urray Hill Hotel unless you decide not to ve a nurse after you come home from the spital. I do think that it is better, if possible, have a nurse for a little while, as they start u off on the right foot. Take care of your- lf, and let me know if there is anything that an do for you. You were a lovely baby with llow curls almost from the start, and never ld. I remember Johnnie when he was five nths old. He was like a billiard ball, but he d plenty of manner even then. I hope your by will be just like both of you. My dear ughter, there is nothing like a child in the use.

Your affectionate mother,

ELIZABETH FORBES LATTIMER.

Kitty read this letter aloud to Johnnie at eakfast. Her eyes were blurring when e put it down. "What a nice letter."

Johnnie looked at her, and hesitated, d then spoke. "Kitty, would you like to home to have the baby?"

HE had been thinking about it. While she ad she had been thinking how pleasant, w comfortable it would be. She would lie bed in the morning until she was well ake. If it was cold, Estella would come in close the window and kindle a fire in the ate. By the time breakfast came up on r mother's old wicker tray, the room would warm and delicious. Her mother would me to tell her the telephone news while she e. For the first time in her life, Kitty unted what she had always had till she arried.

She smiled at Johnnie. "I'd rather stay re with you and have the baby in a ward."

He came around the table to kiss her. "You won't have to do that."

Kitty's baby was born toward the end of a cold February day. She woke up very early on that morning and knew at once what had waked her. She hated to wake Johnnie up. She shook him a little.

"Johnnie, it's the baby," she said.

"No," said Johnnie. He rolled over and buried his head in his arms. But then, as though her words had got through to him at last, he sat up quickly. "The baby. Are you all right?"

"Yes." She leaned over and kissed him on the cheek. "Now I'll call the doctor."

After that, everything seemed to move by schedule. They dressed quickly and then Johnny took up the long-packed suitcase and they went.

KITTY stood inside the iron gate while he ran to the corner for a cab. The snow slanted in at her through the grille. Yankee baby, she thought.

Even the taxi driver reacted properly.

"Drive carefully," Johnnie said.

"You don't have to tell me," said the driver.

Kitty sat on the edge of the seat all the long way to the hospital.

"Are you frightened?" asked Johnnie.

"No, but I'm so excited. I'm so glad it's happening. I was beginning to think I was just a fat girl."

At the hospital, excitement died. Kitty was put to bed and Johnnie was sent home to get some sleep.

"Nothing will happen for hours," the nurses said. Nothing did.

At about nine o'clock the doctor came in.

"Well, I'm glad you're here," Kitty said indignantly.

Doctor Kenny grinned. He was a big, fresh-faced, middle-aged man. "Babies sort of like to take their time," he said.

"This one certainly does," said Kitty.

Doctor Kenny grinned again and put his stethoscope back in his pocket and went away. A moment later he stuck his head in the door. "I'll be right here."

Nurses and interns kept coming in and going out again, and at eleven Johnnie came back. He looked freshly bathed and shaven, and very bright-eyed. "I slept," he said in some surprise.

"I wish you'd make them give me my breakfast," said Kitty.

He leaned over and kissed her. His cheek felt cold and hard against hers. "I shouldn't think you'd want to eat. You're having a baby."

"Not so you'd know it," said Kitty.

"Gosh," said Johnnie, "if this is all there is to it, I don't see what all the fuss is about."

The nurse who was taking Kitty's pulse snorted audibly. "I'll live to see you eat those words, Mr. Bates," she said. Then she looked kindly at them both. "It's really just nerves that makes him talk so silly."

"Well, I wish it would hurry," said Kitty.

At twelve-thirty the nurse went downstairs to get her lunch. In a discouraged sort of way, she paused in the doorway to look at Johnnie. "You might as well eat too. Nothing's happening at all."

"You might as well," said Kitty.

When he had gone, she lay quietly, waiting for the small twinges that she'd been having all morning.

After a while Doctor Kenny looked in on her. Her eyes were bright with excitement and there was a row of small white marks where her teeth had clenched on her lower lip.

"Hullo," she said. "It's coming."

"Good girl," he said. He came in and sat in Johnnie's chair. "We'll let you take a few of these pains. They're what bring babies."

She closed her eyes tight and set her lips against a moan.

He got up and stood beside the bed. "Hang on to my hand." No man on earth had ever seemed to her so strong and wise and kind.

The most important emotion to preserve in maturity is the enjoyment of enjoyment.

—WILLIAM LYON PHELPS: In Your Life.

"ROYAL DESSERTS TASTE MORE DELICIOUS!" —say 8 out of every 10

Survey of 1,526 Royal users reveals why millions are "Reaching for Royal"

Royal Desserts taste more delicious! Yes, eight out of every ten of those 1,526 Royal users said so—gave it as the reason they always want Royal!

Royal Butterscotch Pudding got compliments right and left. They praised its "good butterscotch flavor . . . full satisfying richness." "Tastes like Mother's," they said. "A favorite with my family!" "Especially good!"

You, too, will find Royal Butterscotch Pudding a real treat, luscious-tasting, satin-smooth, easy to make and, like all Royal Puddings, it requires no sugar. Try it soon, either "plain" or dressed up for St. Patrick's Day, as pictured above. You'll love it and see why so many folks say—Royal Desserts taste more delicious!

If your grocer's temporarily out of Royal Puddings, keep on asking. It's worth waiting to get Royal.

THE POPULARITY of tuna salads, sandwiches and entrées in campus dining rooms and faculty clubs is not accidental. Students and professors alike know that these famous brands of quality tuna contain vitamins "A" and "D" . . . are tasty and satisfying, easy to digest . . . rich but not "heavy."

Many of our boats are still "in the Navy" but we're working overtime to keep dealers supplied with "America's favorite tunas."

VAN CAMP SEA FOOD CO., INC.
Terminal Island, California

FAMOUS VAN CAMP SEA FOODS

Buy EITHER Brand... the quality is the same

The nurse came back, and then Johnnie came and stood unimportantly just inside the door.

"Why don't you wait in the sitting room, Mr. Bates?" said Doctor Kenny.

"All right," said Johnnie in a very pale voice.

Somewhere, Kitty found a smile for him. "I'm fine, Johnnie."

"You're a good girl," said Doctor Kenny. To the nurse he said, "You might as well take her in."

Then the pain and the excitement. Then nothing.

She opened her eyes and she was back in her bed. The covers were piled high on her and still she was a little cold. Johnnie tiptoed forward.

"Hullo," he said.

"Hullo. Wasn't I successful?"

"You were wonderful." He bent down and kissed her, lightly, as though she might break.

"I want to see the baby," said Kitty.

The nurse was suddenly in the picture again. She was beside Johnnie, shaking her head. "Mrs. Bates, you must go to sleep."

"I want to see him," Kitty said.

"Wait a minute," said the nurse.

"Kitty," Johnnie said. His eyes were sunken and burning in his haggard face. "Kitty, it's a lovely baby. Miss Neff says it's one of the nicest babies she's ever seen."

Miss Neff wheeled in a miniature crib. The whole thing was covered by a little blue blanket. At one end there was a square white placard which read: "Baby Boy Bates."

"Kitty," said Johnnie desperately, "it's a beautiful baby."

Miss Neff pulled down the blanket.

He was a tiny baby and very red and wrinkled. His head was rather the shape of a pineapple and his nose was flat on his face and his ears seemed crumpled. He looked about right.

Kitty began to laugh. "Oh, Johnnie, poor Johnnie." Laughing, she went to sleep.

They named the baby David Lattimer Bates, both for Crandall and for Kitty's father.

Johnnie came to the hospital every day after work, and stretched out in the comfortable chair while Kitty told him about the flowers, the presents and the visitors. Afterward he always thought of those two weeks as a sort of lapse in time during which Kitty ceased to be his wife and became only a pretty creature who lived in a hospital bed. Of paternal feelings he could discover in himself none whatsoever, except pride, but he rather thought that would change later on. Kitty assured him of it.

"Every time they bring him in to me I like him even better," she said.

To her, in retrospect, the days she spent in the hospital were like a dream of idle and luxurious bliss. Once when she complained of having to stay in bed when she felt so well, her mother said, "Kitty, you are having a delightful time. Do, child, enjoy it."

MRS. LATTIMER had arrived in New York when the baby was a week old. Each time her mother came to the hospital, Kitty was struck anew by her quality. I've always thought she was charming, she thought, but I never knew she had so much style. Every day, after Mrs. Lattimer had kissed Kitty, she sat down in the straight chair. When she sat, she crossed her ankles and let her hands lie loosely in her lap.

Once she said, "I find it very trying always to look at my grandchild through a pane of glass. I know he has the Forbes hands, but the nurse will never hold them up long enough for me to see."

Kitty said, "We'll be home soon and then you can have him all you like."

Mrs. Lattimer shook her head. "I'm going to see you settled. Then I'm going home."

"But, mother ——"

"This New York is no place for me. I'm too old."

"I was just thinking how you suit it."

"Do Lord," said Mrs. Lattimer. Then she said, "Besides, I don't think grandmothers should be around to tell people how to do."

"You wouldn't."

"I might," said Mrs. Lattimer.

She went back to Decatur the day after Johnnie took a long lunch hour in order to taxi his wife, his son and the baby nurse home to Bank Street. The nurse was to sleep on the studio couch and the baby, in his bassinet, was to be with her at night and with Kitty in the daytime.

Mrs. Lattimer viewed the arrangements with considerable sang-froid. Gloved and hatted, ready to go, she sat down for a moment at the foot of Kitty's bed. "Kitty, I can't abide that woman, so I'm sure she's an excellent nurse. Keep her as long as you can."

"Two weeks," said Kitty.

"That's not enough," said her mother. She got up and kissed Kitty. "Good-by, daughter. Be very good to Johnnie now."

"But I always am," said Kitty.

"Yes, of course," said Mrs. Lattimer.

Two weeks later, the first night after the nurse left, Kitty remembered this. Why, she didn't quite know.

"It's good to be alone again," she said. She lay in bed with her head in its familiar place against Johnnie's shoulder. She felt full of peace and contentment and capability.

★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

The Subtle Year

BY NATHANIEL BURT

Now the subtle year
Blushes green, and the earth
Moves to glory as the clear
Rains kiss it into birth.

The dogwood mist is swooning white;
The grass springs brilliant to the lawn;
And sweeter glows the star-hung night
Between the hands of dusk and dawn.

And in my heart there stirs anew
A faint, pipe-silver bud of song
That, blossoming, shall break for you
In trumpetings, shrill-sweet and long.

★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

Over in the corner, out of drafts, the baby's bassinet gleamed white. "Only, of course, we'll never really be so alone again."

"That little job over there."

"Sally Parsons was here today. We talked about our children."

Johnnie laughed.

"Well, but you know, it's really amazing how much fun it is to talk to other parents and the way they sort of rally round. You find out all sorts of things about people. It's like being let into a club you didn't know existed."

"It's certainly pleasant to have you and your conversation back."

"Johnnie, I don't want to change. I don't want to be like Sally Parsons, all wrapped up in my children and sort of down-at-the-heel. If you ever see me getting that way, give me a jolt."

"I will," said Johnnie.

Sometimes, in the next few months, it seemed to Kitty that all she did was to give the baby a bottle and take a nap, and give the baby a bottle and take a nap, and so on and so on. Actually, most of the time, she was enjoying herself. Even the early-morning feeding was mitigated by the facts that David was at his nicest, and that sunrise is a very pretty thing to see. That was the winter that Johnnie ate breakfast at the drugstore, so that she could go back to sleep till it was time to bathe David. Though he offered, she never let Johnnie take her place at six in the morning; but sometimes at night, if she went to bed early, he would take care of his son at ten o'clock. She would rouse, then, to give sleepy directions and, half awake, she would see how relaxed David was in the strong masculine hands and how the small, downy head nodded confidently against the big shoulder. All the time he fed the baby, Johnnie talked to him in a stiff-lipped monotone. Once Kitty thought, Just the way he talks to a puppy.

It wasn't long before she found out that fat Nellie, who came in at twelve now instead of at two, could be trusted to give the baby a bottle and even to make the sacred formula. Except that, if they went out, they always had to get someone to stay with David, their life together soon began to go on in a fair version of its accustomed manner.

SUNDAY-MORNING leisure seemed gone forever, but in every possible way it was Kitty's pride to have things as they always had been. Nothing seemed really very interesting or important to her except what concerned her child and her child's father, and she was happiest when her family was all together and alone. She talked less than ever before, because what she had to say was of so limited an interest, and because for the first time in her life she had no desire to express her emotions and her attitudes in words. Later on, when she could analyze, she thought of those months as a time when the fire was lit and the curtains drawn. It was almost a year before she became, again, a sharply cut individual.

A great many things happened before then. For one thing, it was the year of the bank holiday, which failed to affect Johnnie and Kitty in any except a rather pleasurable and exciting way. After the first flurry, Kitty found out that her credit with the grocer and the butcher was good, and Johnnie found out that walking to work made him feel wonderful. They had had very little money on hand.

"People are really charming to people with babies," Kitty said.

Crandall, who came in often those nights, snorted with laughter, but Johnnie shook his head seriously.

"No," he said, "these things just don't affect people like us very much. Why, since we've been married we've been through a crash and a depression and it's all made very little difference to us, because we had nothing to begin with and never expected anything to fall into our laps. These are our times, and we're living through them and getting along, in proportion, as well as the young and poor generally do. We're really lucky to have started on a shoestring. Later on, when you get places, it must hurt terribly to retrench."

"And so you're going to get places?"

Johnnie slid down in his chair and stretched out his legs and smiled. "Sure."

In June of that year, Crandall finished his play and promptly sold an option on it. In July, Johnnie got another raise and a two-weeks vacation. This the young Bateses spent in a beach shack on Fire Island which they rented through their friend, Brian Scholz, who, having stopped being a customer's man, was now, more or less tentatively, a real-estate man.

"Now Brian," said Johnnie, going on with his theory, "is the kind of person bad times hurt. He banked on prosperity. It's a darn good thing for him he married a hardheaded gal like Lisa. Though I bet he didn't think so at the time."

It was the first time Kitty had left her child, who stayed at home with the expensive baby nurse; and, to her immense surprise, during those two weeks of sun and beach and sea she often forgot that she had him. Once, even, it was Johnnie who said, "Hadn't we better telephone about the kid?" It was only on the way home that she suddenly had a frantic feeling that she couldn't get there fast enough. She was never again, however, so completely wrapped up in David as she had been for those first few months.

The tan she had acquired at Fire Island was immensely becoming, and she began to

(Continued on Page 104)

Including Federal Excise Tax, delivery to your home, and a 5-year Protection Plan . . . . Only $155.25

1 Be sure to see this G-E beauty, now on your dealer's floor. 7-cubic-foot capacity. Has a Cold Storage compartment for meats, 2 Crisping compartments for keeping vegetables fresh and crisp. The really big G-E Super-Freezer makes 8 pounds of ice. Can also be used for storing frozen foods. Stainless steel shelves. Powered by the famous G-E "sealed-in-steel" unit, for years of attention-free service.

Including Federal Excise Tax, delivery to your home, and a 5-year Protection Plan . . . . Only $151.50

2 This lower-priced model is also available at your G-E dealer's today. 7-cubic-foot size, with an ice-making capacity of 8 pounds. Has a special Chiller Tray for meats, 4 freezing trays in a really big compartment for ice and storing frozen foods. There isn't a better refrigerator buy today than this low-priced G-E. For it, too, is equipped with the latest version of the G-E "sealed-in-steel" refrigerating unit.

Great New G-E Refrigerators!

. . . powered by the new, more efficient "sealed-in-steel" refrigerating unit

If you need a refrigerator, it's great to know that you can go to your dealer's and order a G-E.

He has new models to show you. They're in the 7-cubic-foot size that best meets the needs of the average family.

Every inch G-E

Beautifully styled . . . designed for the utmost convenience in food storage . . . equipped with needed accessories . . . these up-to-the-minute refrigerators are every inch G-E.

The most important point of all—the "sealed-in-steel" unit, a famous G-E "first"

The most important point about any refrigerator is how well and how dependably it provides you with refrigeration. No other appliance in your home is called upon to serve you so constantly—24 hours a day, every day in the year.

This is why you should give most consideration—not to "extras" that all refrigerators offer—but to the very heart of the refrigerator—the mechanism!

The "heart" of your G-E is the famous "sealed-in-steel" refrigerating unit—a type of cooling mechanism pioneered by G-E 20 years ago. This mechanism is permanently sealed in an airtight steel case. No oil can leak out, no dust can get in—to cause wear, trouble, or noise in the unit.

The G-E "sealed-in-steel" principle has since been adopted by others. But no other refrigerating mechanism has the performance record of the G-E unit! After 20 years, many of the original G-E units are still giving attention-free refrigeration. A million have been in service ten years or longer.

And the unit that gave this great performance in the past has been vastly improved in the G-E Refrigerator you buy today. Constantly refined—built with ever-greater precision . . . the 1946 "sealed-in-steel" unit is the most dependable, most efficient, and most economical ever built!

See the G-E Home Freezer!

Powered by the famous "sealed-in-steel" unit. This unit, plus highly efficient cabinet design, provides safe, efficient, dependable freezing and storage. General Electric Company, Bridgeport, Connecticut.

G-E Refrigerators

A MILLION IN SERVICE 10 YEARS OR LONGER

GENERAL ELECTRIC

Who wouldn't be tempted by Shredded Ralston? Here's whole wheat as you've never tasted it before . . . so delicious the flavor-secret's patented! And when you pour on the milk or cream . . . surprise! . . . it stays crisp and crunchy, down to the last golden-brown biscuit in the bowl. Try this different-from-all-other cereal tomorrow!

Tune in TOM MIX weekdays 5:45 P. M., OPRY HOUSE MATINEE Sat. 1:00 P. M. E. S. T., Mutual Network realize with great pleasure that she had never looked so well in her life. One night she saw Johnnie watching her as she examined herself in the mirror. She turned to him, smiling and half embarrassed.

(Continued from Page 102)

"I've changed," she said. "What is it?"

"You're luscious," said Johnnie. "When did you get luscious, Mrs. Bates?"

"Do you like it?"

"I love it," said Johnnie.

In September, Evelyn had a baby girl who was promptly named Lattimer Bates.

In October, Johnnie and Kitty moved because David needed a room of his own and would soon need a park. When they first spoke of leaving Bank Street they both felt sad.

"It's the end of an era," Johnnie said.

But Kitty said, "Oh, Johnnie, it needn't be. We needn't change. Just moving uptown needn't make us different."

He took her by the elbows and kissed her on the cheek, as though she were a child. "We're changing all the time. We're older and we're parents. And we have ambitions."

"I haven't. Not new ones, anyway."

"Well, I have," said Johnnie. "I want to make a lot of dough."

"What for?"

"For you and David. And for me too. I want to be a success. I want to be the best advertising man in New York."

She looked at him. He stood against the wall. His hands were in his pockets and his body was thrust forward. His blue eyes were sparkling. She thought of the first time she had seen him, standing just so, beside the mantelpiece in her mother's sitting room.

"And I still want to finish my book," said Johnnie. "And I refuse to live in the nineties. We must never live in the nineties."

"Oh, Johnnie," said Kitty. She was in his arms. They were laughing.

In the end they compromised by taking a remodeled apartment on Beekman Place. There was plenty of sun and air, and a small hall bedroom for David.

That was long before the water-front parks were built along the East River, but even then the baby carriages of the neighborhood gathered in the parklike dead ends over the river, and that was where Kitty took David each day. In an unexciting sort of way it was a pleasant enough proceeding.

At the end of a year the Bateses moved again. Johnnie was making a very fair salary now and it suddenly seemed imperative to have a maid who slept in.

"If I see just one more baby-sitter, I shall scream," said Kitty.

"And think," said Johnnie, "of Sunday mornings."

This time they moved to Eighty-fifth Street, just off Lexington Avenue. There were two master bedrooms and two baths, and a large living room and a real kitchen and a very small maid's room and bath. There was also an elevator.

JOHNNIE'S mother sent them a few pieces of beautiful old furniture and, building around these, Kitty did a very good job of decorating. When she had finished she could only stand and admire.

Johnnie laughed at her. "It costs too much, and I doubt anyone will come to see us up here, but it certainly is pretty."

"Johnnie, it's so wonderful to have the kitchen in the right place and the bathroom in the right place."

Johnnie grinned. "Bath*rooms*," he said.

It turned out a good thing that they were well equipped for entertaining, because the second winter that they lived on Eighty-fifth Street, Crandall's play was finally produced. What with that, and their own increasing affluence, the Bateses' social horizons began to spread out like an accordion.

Crandall's play was a hit. On the opening night, Kitty and Johnnie sat in the fifth row center. At the end of the first act they turned to each other with the tears of mirth in their eyes. Above the applause Kitty said, "But it's wonderful."

For an instant, then, there was an unexpected look on Johnnie's face. Almost, it was envy; almost, chagrin.

Kitty laid her hand on his. She wanted to say, "What has Crandall got but this?" She was silent and, as quickly as it had come, the look was gone.

"Let's go find this funny guy," said Johnnie.

After it all was over, they had supper with Crandall and Jack Rugg, the director, and most of the cast, and later they and Rugg and the leading lady went back to Crandall's apartment and waited for the notices to come out in the morning papers. It was a long, exciting night full of food and coffee and talk. It suited Jack Rugg, whom neither of them had met before. Johnnie said he seemed an odd duck, but amusing. Kitty smiled and said nothing. Kitty had known from the moment that Rugg looked at her from under his lowering black eyebrows that he thought she was wonderful.

EVELYN, in Decatur, didn't see a review of Crandall's play until the next afternoon. Though her husband subscribed to The New York Times, Evelyn rarely looked at it, but on this day she took up the paper as soon as it came and carried it with her to her sitting room. When she had finished reading, she put the paper down and went to her desk. On a sheet of her pale-gray notepaper she wrote:

It is in his own interest the cat purrs. —PROVERB.

Dear David: I am so glad about the play.

Sincerely,

EVELYN LATTIMER BATES.

Some time after Crandall got this letter, he called on Kitty. "I've heard from Evelyn." He handed her the note.

Kitty read it. "Oh, Crandall."

"It was nice of her, wasn't it?"

Kitty looked up at him. "Oh, Crandall, how she must have loved writing to you."

He shook his head. "I'll never understand women. Forever probing the wound."

"Does it still bother you, Crandall?"

"Well, I talk about it, don't I?"

Kitty tilted her head. "Crandall, I don't know what to do about Jack Rugg."

His eyebrows went up.

"No," said Kitty. "It's just that he's going into producing and he wants me to read plays for him."

"Why not? If you have the time."

"I have the time. And I'd love to work again. It's just that I don't know."

"Come clean, Mrs. Bates," said Crandall.

"It's nothing," Kitty said. "He's been up here a few times and once, when he asked us to go out to dinner with him, Johnnie had to take some clients carousing, but I went anyway. Johnnie didn't mind and I had a wonderful time. I felt so impressive. And yesterday he asked me to have lunch to talk about this job. Crandall, he really couldn't be nicer, and he treats me as though I were made of glass."

"Look, baby, work for Jack Rugg, but don't flirt with him. He's really not like anyone you know."

"Well, that's what I like," said Kitty. "And I never flirt."

"Yes, you do," said Crandall.

"Why, Crandall."

"You always have, sort of naturally, but now it's a little different because you're in the process of changing from our pretty little Kitty to the lovely Mrs. Bates."

"Crandall, you playwright."

"So you look out you don't go to your own head."

She smiled at him. It might be true, but it wasn't entirely uncomplimentary. "Uncle Crandall, I may flirt, but I never go out in the garden."

It was just then that the front door opened. David was back from the park. When he saw his mother and Crandall in the living room, he started away from the maid and flung himself first on one and then on the other. As she hugged him, Kitty laid her cheek against the soft baby hair.

(Continued on Page 106)

ME OF THE GOLDEN GUERNSEY DISTRIBUTORS COVERING OVER 2000 CITIES. FOR OTHERS WRITE GOLDEN GUERNSEY INC., PETERBOROUGH, N.

ABAMA
han Mo-La-Jac Farms
LIFORNIA
ambra erly Hills
ank ndale ewood
g Beach Angeles
adena Adohr Farms
Golden State
ramento Golden State Francisco Golden State ta Barb'ra Golden State ta Monica Adohr Farms
Golden State

INDIANA
E. Chicago Prairie View
Elkhart Eby's Dairy
Lookwell Farms Dairy
Wambaugh Dairy Products
Fort Wayne Eskay Dairy Co.
Allen Dairy Prods.
Gary & Hammond
Cloverleaf Dairy Co.
Dixie Dairy Co.
Hobart Hillcrest Farm D.
Indianap's Capitol Dairies
Wm. H. Roberts & Sons
Lafayette Furnas Ice Cr.
Marion Pure Milk Co.
Richmond Wayne Dairy
South Bend Reliable Dairy

MASSACHUSETTS (Con.)
Marlboro Deerfoot Farms
Methuen Greycourt Farm
Milford R.W. Coffin & Sons
Natick Sunshine Dairy
New Bedford Frates Dairy
Gulf Hill Farm
N. Adams
Fillmore Farms, Inc.
Northampton United Dairy
No. Easton Langwater Farm
Pittsfield Crescent Cr'y.
Pittsfield Milk Exchange
Rockport Dr. Babson Farm
Shrewsbury Hillcrest Dairy
Jensen's Wayside Dairy
So. Dartmouth Gulf Hill Farm

NEW JERSEY
All Northern Counties
Alderney Dairy
Audubon Abbotts Dairies
Bloomfield Mt. Vernon F'ms
Bridgeton Rainier's Dairies
Camden Abbotts Dairies
Chatham Florham Park D.
Clifton Sisco Dairy
Convent Hollow Hill Farm
Cranford Sunrise Dairies
Wood Brook Farms
Elizabeth Dairyland Farms
Wood Brook Farms
Fanwood Wood Brook Farms
Florham Park Dairies Inc.
Haddonfield Abbotts D'ries

NEW JERSEY (Con.)
Union Ideal Dairy Farms
Mt. Vernon Farms
Wood Brook Farms
Westfield Schmalz Dairy
Sunrise Dairies
Wood Brock Farms
Westville Abbotts Dairies
Westwood Franklin Lake
Whitehouse Durling Farms
Woodbury Abbotts Dairies
NEW YORK
Albany Mark W. Stevens
Boulevard Dairy Co.
Norman's Kill Dairy
Auburn Guernsey F'rms, Inc.
Buffalo Beck's Dairy

OHIO (Con.)
Columbus Diamond Milk
Dayton Grocer's Coop.
Himes Brothers Dairy
Shoemake Farms, Inc.
Dover Cappeldale Farms
Hamilton McGreevy Dairy
Lancaster Bennett Dairy
Mansfield Raemelton Farm
Mt. Vernon Jewell Milk
Sandusky Esmond Dairy
Springfield Citizen's Dairy
Lynn Guernsey Farm
Stow Stow Dairy
Toledo Babcock Dairy Co.
Wooster Ideal Dairy
Youngstown Sanitary Milk

PENNSYLVANIA (Con.)
Lebanon Hershey Choc. Co.
Lewistown Pure Milk Co.
Mechanicsb'g Konhaus F'm
Monongahela Hank's Dairy
Mapleview
Norristown Holiday Dairy
Levengood Dairy
Parkers Landing
Parker's View Farm
Phila. Breuninger's Dairy
(Main Line) Brookmead
Pittsburgh Lewis Dairies
Page Milk Co.
Pottstown Levengood Dairy
Sunny Slope Dairy
Pottsville J. H. Brokoff

VERMONT
Bennington Fillmore Far
Brattleboro
Shaw-Bellville Dairy C
Springfield Estey's Da
VIRGINIA
Alexandria Dairy Produc
Bristol Pinemont Far
Denbigh Burkholder Da
Fairfax Willowmere Far
Fredericksb'g Farmers C
Galax Round Hill Fa
Kenbridge Guernsey Da
Lynchburg Westover Da
Lynnhaven Bayville Far
Martinsville Fisher Far
Norfolk Bayville Far

IN ABOUT 2 YEARS, IN OVER 2,000 CITIES,
100% MORE FAMILIES HAVE STARTED ENJOYING

THAT SPECIAL MILK
GOLDEN GUERNSEY

From Maine to California, Americans are giving more thought to the kind of milk they buy! And GOLDEN GUERNSEY Milk is sweeping the nation — because its special superiority does maximum justice to the reputation of milk as "the most nearly perfect" food!

Why this trend towards GOLDEN GUERNSEY Milk? Simply because it has an unusually large share of the proteins, vitamins and minerals which make for healthy living! It's that special milk — from the ample supply of rich-enough-to-whip cream which tops each quart, right down to the last nourishing drop! Besides, the whole family enjoys that distinctive, refreshing GOLDEN GUERNSEY flavor!

GOLDEN GUERNSEY Milk comes only from fine Guernsey cows, is produced on carefully selected farms, and is always kept separate! The words GOLDEN GUERNSEY are the certificate of GOLDEN GUERNSEY, Inc., a non-profit agricultural corporation, that milk so marked conforms to its own high standards as well as to requirements of local and state health authorities. Ask your own milkman about GOLDEN GUERNSEY soon. Let your family learn what America is discovering — GOLDEN GUERNSEY, that special milk, is consistently better, consistently better-tasting!

(Con.)
ckton Clowes' Dairy
Happyholme Dairy

OLORADO
nver Carlson-Frink Co.
eblo City Park Dairy
Loving's Guernsey Dairy

ONNECTICUT
nsonia Brock-Hall
ron Wood Ford Farm
thel The Rider Dairy
idgeport Brock-Hall
Dewhirst Dairy
nbury The Rider Dairy rien
rden's Sunny Valley F'ms
rfield Brock-Hall
reens Farms Nyala Farm reenwich Round Hill Farm
rden's Sunny Valley F'ms
artford Bryant & Chapman
H. P. Hood
iddletown
Brock's Lakeview
ilford Brock-Hall
lark D.—New Haven D. augatuck Brock-Hall
d Oak F.—New Haven D. ew Haven Brock-Hall
Clark Dairy, Inc.
New Haven Dairy
amford
rden's Sunny Valley F'ms
aterbury Brock-Hall
Maple Hill Dairy
New Haven Dairy
atertown Mt. Fair Farm

ELAWARE
ilmington Hill Girt F'ms
West End Dairy

LORIDA
Land
Greenhutch Dairy Farm
acksonville Dinsmore Dairy inter Park Lakemont Dairy

LINOIS
hicago Bowman Dairy
anville Bredehoft Dairy ecatur Ridgelydale Dairy

INDIANA (Con.)
Valparaiso Blalock Dairy

IOWA
Ames F. H. Logsdon
Davenport Wyanet Farms
Fort Dodge Creamery Co.

KENTUCKY
Ashland Hickory Hill Dairy
Harlan Chappell's Dairy
Louisville Cherokee S. Milk
Owensboro Model D'y, Inc.
Princeton Cream & Butter
Winchester Marsh Dairy Co.

MAINE
Anson A. H. Ouellette
Farmington Richvale Farm
Kingfield Maple Lane Farm
Madison A. H. Ouellette

MARYLAND
Baltimore Green Spring D'y
Church Hill Kennersley F'm
Frederick Ideal Farms Dairy
Hagerstown Eden Plains D.
Woodside Hall Farms
Hyattsville Harvey Dairy
Port Deposit Mt. Ararat F'ms
Rockville Sycamore Dairy
Salisbury City Dairy
Homestead Dairy
Williamsport
Woodside Hall

MASSACHUSETTS
Boston and Vicinity
Deerfoot F.—White Bros.
H. P. Hood & Sons
Wethersfield Farm
Whiting Milk Co.
Bradford Robert H. Sawyer
Brockton H. P. Hood
Cape Cod H. P. Hood
White Brothers
Chicopee F. B. Mallory, Inc.
Duxbury White Brothers
E. Bridgewater H. P. Hood
Fitchburg Tri-City CoOp.
Framingham Deerfoot Farms
Sunshine Dairy
Gloucester Dr. Babson Farm
Greenf'ld Sheldegren Farm
Haverhill Rob't. H. Sawyer
Holyoke F. B. Mallory, Inc.
Shadylawn Farm

MASSACHUSETTS (Con.)
So. Hadley Shadylawn Farm
Springfield F. B. Mallory, Inc.
General Ice Cream Corp.
United Dairy System, Inc.
Taunton H. P. Hood
Westfield F. B. Mallory, Inc.
Worcester Deerfoot Farms
Hillcrest Dairy
Jensen's Wayside Dairy
United Dairy System, Inc.

MICHIGAN
Bay City Bay City Dairy
Flint Genesee Dairy
Grand Rapids Rosemont F.
Kalamazoo Lockshore Farm
Lansing Heatherwood Farm
Midland Dairy Co.
Rochester Great Oaks Dairy
Saginaw Huebner Dairy
Saginaw Dairy

MINNESOTA
Austin Marigold Dairies
Barnum Barnum Creamery
Duluth Bay View Dairy
Faribault Marigold Dairies
Farmington Brandtjen Farms
Mankato H. N. Best & Son
Marigold Dairies
Minneapolis Ewald Bros.
Moorhead Fairmont Cr'y.
Owatonna Marigold D'ries
Pipestone Allen Gewecke
Rochester Marigold Dairies
St. Paul Sanitary Dairies
Winona Marigold Dairies

MISSISSIPPI
Gulfport Robinwood Farm
Horn Lake Gayoso Farms
Stoneville
Walker Farm Dairy

MISSOURI
Jefferson City
Vogel's Guernsey Farm
St. Louis St. Louis Dairy

MONTANA
Billings Billings Dairy

NEBRASKA
Lincoln Skyline Dairy
Omaha Roberts Dairy

NEVADA
Reno Model Dairy

NEW HAMPSHIRE

NEW JERSEY (Con.)
Haddon Heights Abbotts D.
Hightstown Conover's-
Hightstown Guernsey D'y
Hillside (with Elizabeth)
Mt. Vernon Farms
Wood Brook Farms
Irvington Alderney Dairy
Mt. Vernon Farms
Phil Knorr—Sunrise D.
Port Murray Dairy
Kearney Mt. Vernon Farms
Linden Mt. Vernon Farms
Wood Brook Farms
Madison
Florham Park Dairies, Inc.
Medford Locust Lane Dairy
Mendham Audley Farms
Merchantville Abbotts D.
Millside Farms
Parks Dairies, Inc.
Metuchen Wood Brook F'ms
Midland Park Franklin Lake
Millburn
Florham Park Dairies, Inc.
Middlesex & Union Counties
Forsgate Farms, Inc.
Moorestown Locust Lane
Newark Alderney Dairy
Mt. Vernon
Sunrise—Wood Brook
New Brunswick Krauzer's
Kreiger—Mayer's Sanitary
Middlesex Farm—Paulus
—Schmidt's—Wood Brook
No. Arlington Forest Dairy
Paterson Franklin Lake
Peapack-Gladstone Dairy
Perth Amboy Wood Brook
Supreme Milk Cream
Plainfield Sunrise Dairies
Schmalz Dairy
Wood Brook Farms
Point Pleasant
Van Schoick's Dairy
Port Murray Dairy
Princeton Rockwood Dairy
Rahway Sunrise Dairies
Wood Brook Farms
Ridgewood Franklin Lake
Camden County Abbotts D.
Millside F.—Parks D'ries
Roselle Roselle Park
Sunrise D.—Wood Brook F.

NEW YORK (Con.)
Clayton Merle L. Youngs
Harrison Dellwood Dairy
Hoosick Falls Fillmore F'ms
Irvington Dellwood Dairy
Mamaroneck Dellwood D.
Mt. Vernon Dellwood D'ry Newburgh Forge Hill Farm
New Rochelle Dellw'd D'y
Oswego Oswego Dairy
Pattersonville W.W. Jeffers
Plattsburg Dairy Co.
Rochester Schreiner Milk
Nakoma F.D.—Hudson D.
Rye Dellwood Dairy
Scarsdale Dellwood Dairy
Schenectady Connelly Bros.
Syracuse Guernsey Co-Op.
Tarrytown Dellwood Dairy
Troy Collar City Creamery
Utica Sunshine Dairy
White Plains Dellwood D'y
Yonkers Dellwood Dairy
NORTH CAROLINA
Asheville Southern Dairies
Boone New River Dairy
Brevard Transylvania D'ries
Concord Clear Springs Farm
Durham Durham Dairy
Elkin Klondike Farm
Hendersonville
McNaughton Farms
High Point Clover Brand
Lexington Coble Dairies
Mount Airy
Dan Valley Farm
Mt. Pleasant Green Hills
Roanoke Rapids
Chockoyette Farm
Winston-Salem Selected D'y
NORTH DAKOTA
Fargo Fairmont Creamery
OHIO
Akron Akron Pure Milk
Belle Isle F.—Mountrose D.
Chestnut Ridge Dairy
Canton Superior Dairy
Cincinnati Opekasit Farms
G. H. Berling Dairy Co.
J. H. Berling Dairy
Cleveland Suburbs
Dairymen's O. Farmers'
O. A. Dean Dairy Co.
Franchester Farms
H. J. Munz Dairy

OKLAHOMA
Ardmore Primrose Farm
Tom Cooper Farms
Enid Jerry Oven Farm
Oklahoma City
Meadow Lodge Farms

OREGON
Medford Cloverhill Farm
Portland Fairview Farms
Shedd Prairie Rose Dairy

PENNSYLVANIA
Allentown Hess Lehigh
Altoona J. E. Harshbarger
Ambler Meyer's Dairy
Ambridge Taylor Milk Co.
Beaver Falls Bonnie View
Berwick Berwick Creamery
Berwyn Chesterbrook Farm
Bethlehem Mowrer's Dairy
Big Run William Irvin Co.
Brockport Keystone Dairy
Butler Moser's Dairy
Carbondale
Bethany-Homestead Farms
Chadds Ford Hill Girt Farms
Chambersburg Dairy
Chester Miller-Flounders
Cornwall Fairview Farms
Donora Triumphant Dairy
Doylestown Smith's San. D'y
Gardenville Farms
Easton Meyer's Dairy
Easton Sanitary Milk Co.
Elizabeth Mentor Farms
Ellwood City Fisher's D'y
Erie Fromknecht Dairy
Yaple's Dairy
Fayette City Patterson D'y
Greensburg Rathgeb's D'y
Silvis Farms
Hamburg Paul R. Kohler
Smith's Model Dairy
Harrisburg Dairies
Hatboro Ivycrest Dairies
Hazleton S. C. Price
Modern Sanitary Dairy
Honesdale
Bethany-Homestead Farms
Hummelstown Geo. Fromm
Indiana Indiana Dairy Co.
Jenkintown Taylor's Dairy
Johnstown Sanitary Dairy
Somerset Dairy Co.
Kane Ideal Farms

PENNSYLVANIA (Con.)
Pulaski Pleasant Acres
Quarryville Norwood F'ms
Reading Clover Farms
St. Lawrence Dairy
Red Lion Warners Dairy
Roxborough Missimer-
Wood-Narcissa Dairies
Scranton Glendale Farms
Shamokin Sanitary Milk
Shippenville Gruber & Son
Sligo Shook's Dairy
Spring City
Sunny Slope Dairy, Inc.
Tamaqua Emerich's Dairy
Terre Hill White Oak Farm
Tunkhan'ck Shadow Brook
Uniontown Garner Dairy
Friendship Hill Dairy
Wayne Brookmead Dairies
Waynesboro Antietam Farm
West Chester Eachus Dairy
Wilkes-Barre Glendale F'ms
Goodleigh Farms
Wilkinsburg Chas. G. Turner
Williamsport Milk Products
York Warner's Dairy
York Sanitary Milk

RHODE ISLAND
Cranston H. P. Hood
Pawtucket H. P. Hood
Providence H. P. Hood
Warwick H. P. Hood
Woonsocket H. P. Hood

SOUTH CAROLINA
Charleston West End Dairy
Chester Hillbright Dairy
Columbia Edisto Farms Dairy
Greenwood
Greenwood Dairy Farm
Hartsville
Coker Pedigreed Seed Co.
Moncks Corner Gippy Ptn.

SOUTH DAKOTA
Sioux Falls Lakeside Dairy

TENNESSEE
Bristol Pinemont Farms
Memphis Gayoso Farms

TEXAS
Dallas Cabell's, Inc.
San Antonio Dairyland

UTAH
Logan Cache Meadow
Ogden Arden-Sunfreze

VIRGINIA (Con.)
Portsmouth Pine Grove
Pulaski Buena Vista
Radford
Clover Creamery Co.,
Richmond Curles Neck
Richmond D.—Virgini
Roanoke Clover Crea
Garst Bros. D.—Roanok
Staunton Augusta D's.
Urbana Rosegill
Virginia Beach Bayvill
Williamsburg
Pleasant Walk
WASHINGTON, D.
Thompson's D.—Wakefi
WASHINGTON
Bellingham Hillview
Bremerton Price's G.
Olympia Meyer's
Port Orchard Price's
Seattle Marymoor
Golden Arrow
Vancouver Golden We Middale Guernsey
WEST VIRGINIA
Charleston
Imperial Ice Crean
WISCONSIN
Appleton Schaefer
Ashland Howard
Chippewa Falls
Clover Dair
Eau Claire Uecke
Dolly Madison D
Fond du Lac Luxerin
Green Bay Delwiche
Kaukauna Modern
Kenosha Milk Pro's. Co
La Crosse Dolly Ma
Madison Bowman Far
Manitowac Sorge
Menasha Gear Dair
Milwaukee G
Guernsey Dairy Co
Oconomowoc Shorelc
Racine Progressive
Stevens Pt. Altenburg
Superior Russell Cre
Tomahawk Ta-Ma-A
Waukesha Fox's G'nse
Wausau Bridgeman-R
West Bend Decorah Fa
Wisconsin Rapids
Wis. Valley Cre

o sugar...just spice...makes Bran muffins nice

Sugarless Muffins

NABISCO BRAN SPICE MUFFINS

| | | |
|---|---|---|
| 1 cup Nabisco 100% Bran | 1 cup sifted all-purpose flour | ½ tsp. nutmeg |
| 1 cup milk | 3¾ tsp. salt | |
| 2 eggs | 3 tsp. baking powder | ¼ cup melted shortening |
| ¼ cup molasses | ½ tsp. cinnamon | 12 walnut-meat halves |

Soak Nabisco 100% Bran in milk 5 min. Beat eggs; add with molasses. Sift dry ingredients, add to bran mixture. Stir only until well mixed. Add shortening. Fill greased muffin pans ⅔ full. Place nutmeat on each muffin. Bake in moderately hot oven, 375° F., 30 min. Makes 12 spicy, fluffy muffins. Light and fine in texture because they're made with Nabisco 100% Bran that's finer milled to give you the perfect muffins you dream about! (Help furnish diet-bulk that's so often needed by adults.)

A dandy dish to start the day...

Cereals

NABISCO BRAN WITH HONEY-MILK

*2 tsp. liquid honey to each cup top milk

Good-good—this grand, new way to get Nabisco 100% Bran's important iron, phosphorus, Vitamin B₁. And a simple, good-tasting way to provide diet-bulk . . . help relieve constipation due to lack of bulk-food! Finer-milled, Nabisco 100% Bran's mild . . . gentle in action. Really "easy-on-you". Of highest quality because Nabisco uses only the best bran, processed in its own flour mills.

Eat Nabisco 100% Bran regularly. See your physician if your condition persists.

NABISCO 100% BRAN FINER MILLED

Favorite for Flavor... this finer-milled Bran

One of the many fine foods baked by Nabisco
NAtional BIScuit COmpany

(Continued from Page 104)

"My fine, fat friend," she said. "I guess you're what I really like."

"Well, O.K.," said Crandall.

It would probably have ended at that if Kitty and Johnnie hadn't gone to a party that night. During the evening, Kitty's eye happened to light on her husband. It had long been their pride that at parties they saw nothing of each other, but it was always pleasant, once or twice during the evening, to see what the other was up to. Then, going home, you could say, "You were having fun," or "Weren't you stuck with Mrs. O'Brian, though."

This particular night Johnnie wasn't stuck at all. He was concentrating on a dark woman in a red dress. She was laughing softly, and she was enjoying herself. Kitty smiled. And then, perhaps because of her conversation with Crandall, she looked again.

Why, he's turning it on, she thought. All that charm. It was a long time since Johnnie had turned it on for her. She hadn't quite realized that it still existed. But I don't for him either. We don't need to. We have something much better.

Nevertheless, when, in the taxi going home, Johnnie said, "You had a good time. I watched you," she answered:

"Johnnie, I feel stuffy. I think I'd like a job again. Jack Rugg wants me to read for him. Would you mind?"

He was silent a moment. Then he said, "What about the boy?"

"He's really old enough for nursery school," said Kitty.

"That baby."

"Or I can use some of my money to get Nellie in to do the housework and Vera can take him in the mornings too. It's only a part-time job. I won't neglect you and David. And I'd really like to do something with my head."

Johnnie laughed. "Do it if you want." It was only when they got back to the apartment that Johnnie said, "Oughtn't we to be having another child pretty soon?"

"I've been thinking about it. But I feel so wonderful. Let's wait a little."

"Time enough," said Johnnie.

She hesitated, and then she frowned. "Johnnie, we never have any money left over. I don't k..ow why. You make more."

"We spend it. Perhaps we should budget or something."

"I will if you will," she said.

Working for Jack Rugg turned out to be an exciting business, and Kitty found that she spent more time in the dark little office on Forty-fourth Street than she had expected to. Besides Rugg and herself, the only members of the office force were a tough, good-humored blonde who was a combination telephone girl and secretary and a tough, emaciated young man who seemed to do a little of everything. Both of them were remarkably efficient and both of them treated Kitty with a casual familiarity which ended by pleasing her very much. They always referred to her as "the visiting lady," but when they spoke to her, they called her "darling." The only person who came into the office who didn't call her "darling" was Jack Rugg. She soon noticed, and with some degree of pleasure, that this made her an exception to his rule.

She was, on the whole, quite satisfied with the way things were turning out. She liked her work, and the people she met through Rugg were fascinating to her. People in the theater, she found, talked a great deal about only one subject—which was the theater. It was, she thought, like being let into still another club. When she tried to explain this to Johnnie, he said he thought it sounded pretty dull and why didn't she stop if she wanted to. Something kept her from saying, "But it's not dull if you're in it. It's fun."

Another thing she couldn't explain to Johnnie was Jack Rugg; and, actually, there was nothing to explain. Rugg couldn't, she Opens cans of every shape with equal ease. Swings aside when not in use. Built-in bottle opener. Guaranteed 5 years* . . . over 5,000,000 Dazey Can Openers now in use. For lasting satisfaction . . . . "Pick A Dazey."

also DAZEY Super Juicers

Beautifully designed . . . sturdily constructed . . . colored plastic reamer . . . strains pith and seeds with a single action. Dazey satin-smooth aluminum juicer fills the everyday need for ■■ easy-to-use, easy-to-clean fruit juicer

*Reconditioning or replacement guaranteed for only a 25c service charge if defective.

DAZEY CORPORATION
Warne and Carter Aves. · St. Louis 7, Mo.

knew, have been more businesslike in his treatment of her, but somehow, even while discussing scripts, he contrived to make her feel cherished.

It's nothing you can put your finger on, she thought. And I don't flirt. And I really handle things very well. And I have my job, at which I'm very good. She was putting on her hat preparatory to going down to the office, and she leaned forward and smiled at herself in the mirror. She looked very pretty and the smile grew wider. And besides, a little admiration is good for a girl my age.

She was, of course, having her cake and eating it too, and enjoying the process very much. The pattern of her life was perfect, exactly as she had always thought life should be—full and exciting and even breathless.

She couldn't have been less prepared than she was for the changes in it which Johnnie suggested one evening. She was late that night, though she took a taxi, and she found him at home when she got there.

An inherited famous name often equals that suit of clothes which had been tailored for a father and is too large for the son to wear.

"Oh, Johnnie, I'm sorry," she said. "I didn't go down till after lunch and I got held up. People talk so much."

"Including Mrs. Bates," said Johnnie from the sofa. "Come here. David's having his supper and I want to tell you something."

She went over and kissed him and sat down by his side. The room was warm and expectant, as though it had been waiting all day to be lived in. Kitty smiled. "Mrs. Bates, having done a very good day's work, sat down on her lovely sofa beside her delightful and desirable husband while she waited for her enchanting little boy to finish eating his cereal, his applesauce and his cooky." She let her head slide against the back of the sofa until it rested against Johnnie's shoulder. "Isn't this heaven?"

"Look, Kitty," Johnnie said, "would you mind very much if you sort of had to fall out of heaven? I mean leaving all this behind and starting from scratch again?" His voice wasn't casual at all.

Kitty sat up straight and stared at him. "Why, Johnnie. Why, what do you mean?"

Johnnie was looking straight ahead. "Look, baby, I want you to listen to me and tell me what you think. This guy, Douglas Tenney, down at Washburn and Higgins, wants to open his own office and he wants me to go in with him. He's a good guy. I'd have to borrow quite a lot of money to put in, and for a while we'd be poor. We'd have to give up all this and Vera, but I think we could have Nellie a few hours the way we used to. And you'd have to give up that job, because it's really sort of a liability, and in the end everything may come out all right or not. If not, we'd just be flat broke and me with no job. But I'd sort of like to try it; I've got some ideas. Now, what do you think?"

"I think it's crazy."

He got up and went to the fireplace, and stood looking into it and stirring the little logs with his toe.

"It's so irresponsible," Kitty said. "We have a child and not a cent to fall back on."

"Of course you're right. I really thought so too." She heard his tight voice and, as he turned, she saw his tight, blank face. Oh, what have I done? she thought.

"Johnnie," she said. "I didn't mean it. I was wrong. You must do it. I'll scrub and clean and do anything I can."

"Forget it," Johnnie said.

She got up and went to stand beside him. "Johnnie, please. It's important. You wanted me to back you up and I didn't."

"Look, baby, just because you think I'm disappointed you don't have to put on an act. Your first reaction was what I wanted to see. I've seen it, so now we can drop the whole business."

"Johnnie, please," she said.

BRER RABBIT
GOLD LABEL NEW ORLEANS
MOLASSES

OVER 60% NATURAL SUGAR

RICH IN IRON

That sugar in Brer Rabbit Molasses comes straight from the juice of the sugar cane. Real sugar—in its natural form.

Iron is essential for good red blood! Brer Rabbit New Orleans Molasses is one of the richest known sources of food iron.

TWO TYPES:

GOLD LABEL—highest quality mild-flavored light molasses for table use, cooking and a delicately flavored milk shake.

GREEN LABEL—full-flavored dark molasses for cooking and a rich-flavored milk shake.

FREE! 15 Sugar-Saving Recipes

Send me leaflet giving recipes for no-sugar desserts. Also valuable 52-page book of 116 fine molasses recipes; washable cover; large, clear illustrations. BOTH FREE.

Name_____ (Print Name and Address)

Address_____

Paste this coupon on penny postcard and mail to: BRER RABBIT, c/o Penick ■ Ford, Ltd., Inc., New Orleans, La., Dept. J3-6.

Making Stew Today?

VITALOX

makes any stew better! Adds the rich, delicious flavor of fine beef and vegetable spices!

For real beef flavor

Pours Easily! Concentrated beef juice with vegetable seasonings.

Recipes on Every Bottle

Easter Gift FROM A STAR

FRANCES LANGFORD, Star of RKO Radio's "Bamboo Blonde"

"This Easter, I'm both giving and serving Hoenshel Brandied Fruit Cake," says Frances Langford.

It's so delightfully crammed with choice fruits and nuts, so fragrant with rare brandies and wines! If your store can't supply you, write to:

HOENSHEL FINE FOODS, INC., Sandusky, Ohio
Largest Individual Makers of Fruit Cake in the United States

Fruit Cakes sent postpaid: 1 lb., $1.05—1½ lb., $1.55—3 lb., $2.88. West of Rocky Mts., add 25c postage.

Ask about the new Individual Guest Wedding Package, too!

KNOWS NO SEASON

HOENSHEL Brandied Fruit Cake

PLUM, FIG, AND FIG AND DATE PUDDING for tables . . .

ALL OH'S! AND AH'S!

This is the year to make your tables smarter than ever, for happy reunions or long deferred weddings. So here's a tip on how to make entertaining expansive without being expensive. Choose Fostoria in a blithe and gay etching or a lively, sparkling cutting. Every piece is handmade by skilled American craftsmen. They're lively with sparkle and lovely to live with. Sold at the better stores everywhere.

FOSTORIA GLASS COMPANY
MOUNDSVILLE · WEST VA.

Fostoria

He reached out, and for the first time in their lives he patted her shoulder. "Oh, forget it," he said again. There was no talk between them.

Kitty thought, What's happening? Why, what's happening to us?

The next day, as the result of a sleepless night, she gave up her job. It turned out a more spectacular performance than she had expected.

She was sitting at Rugg's desk, finishing her last report, when he came in. "Jack," she said, "I might as well tell you. I'm resigning."

He closed the door behind him. "What was that?" he said.

"You see, it takes lots more time than I thought it would. I hate to quit on you, but last night I realized I'd been neglecting my child and my husband."

Rugg came forward and sat on the edge of the desk. "This isn't at all the way things were meant to turn out, is it?"

Honestly and unwisely Kitty said, "No, I suppose not."

He leaned forward and picked her out of her chair and kissed her on the mouth.

Kitty was startled, but not outraged. She stood for a moment quietly inside the circle of his arms, then she said, "Let me go, Jack."

"No," he replied.

"If you don't let me go, I'll have to kick."

He gave a sort of snort then, and dropped his arms. "You can always make me laugh."

Kitty backed across the room to the door. What I should do, she thought, is get right out of here. But I can't. "Jack," she said, "will you tell me just why you offered me this job?"

"Sure. I was nuts about you and it was the only way I could think of to see a lot of you. And I thought if you were around me all the time you'd end by falling for me. People have before now."

Kitty could feel the blood come up in her face. "I turned out to be a good reader."

He sat himself down wearily in the chair behind his desk. "You're a swell reader. But that isn't why you took the job, is it?"

"No. I knew what it was all about, only I never really faced it. I've been a very silly and stupid girl—no, woman. At my age one's a woman. I guess I was a little bored, and when you liked me I was so flattered, and this seemed exciting and different and it never even occurred to me I couldn't handle you. I never really thought about it. I guess I thought you'd go on sort of dangerously admiring me forever and I'd go on being a coveted object. I'm just a fool."

"How you talk," said Rugg.

"Of course a little of it was that I wanted a job, and of course I knew I'd be good at it. But that wasn't it really. I could have had lots of jobs before now."

"You're so honest," Rugg said. He picked up a paper clip and carefully straightened it. "How much do you like me?"

"Lots," said Kitty.

He looked up at her. "You wouldn't marry me, would you?"

Then she was shocked. Then she was horrified. "Oh, no, thank you," she said. "Oh, thank you with all my heart." She opened the door, and fled from the pain on his self-contained face.

All the way home in the taxi, she shivered. This is the way it happens, she thought. This is how people drift into things. When he kissed me, I liked it. I do like him. But what I love is my husband, my child and my home. Oh, never, never, never. She closed her eyes and the tears trickled gently.

When she got home, only Nellie was there. "I'll get you some tea," Nellie said.

"No," said Kitty. Then: "Yes, please. And toast. And cake. And everything."

While she waited, she walked around her apartment and looked at her things. For a long time she stood in the door of her room and Johnnie's, and then in David's.

How lovely to be me, she thought. Every time a curious, aching feeling of regret returned to her, she banished it. After her second cup of tea, she leaned back in the sofa and laughed weakly for a long time.

Johnnie, when he came in, said, "You're looking pretty, Mrs. Bates."

"I'm a woman of leisure," she said. "I've given up my job."

He stopped smiling. He looked tired. "You didn't have to do that on account of me. I made up my mind last night. I've already told Tenney."

She didn't know what she had expected from him. She only knew it wasn't this. "You must do as you wish," she said evenly. "But you were right about my job. With what I spend on taxis and lunches and Nellie, and all the time it takes, it's really rather silly. So I've stopped."

"You can keep Nellie if you like. I have a feeling that from now on I'm going to be fairly high-powered."

"I don't want Nellie. I don't want anything," Kitty said. She went to him and put her arms around his waist and buried her head in his shoulder.

"Why, baby. Why, what's all this?" Then, suddenly, he held her off. "That guy Rugg didn't make a pass at you, did he?"

"Heavens, no," said Kitty and held on all the tighter.

When she lay in bed that night, she thought, It's the first thing I've ever not told him. But I couldn't tell him. Could I? No, I couldn't. The foolish tears slid out of her eyes, across her cheekbones, and traveled uncomfortably to the pillow. She put out her hand, but Johnnie had rolled far over to his side and she had to reach farther. That's just how it is. All the time you're cheerfully neglecting someone, they're getting a little away from you too.

Troubles and anxieties pile together at certain times in anyone's life. It was a little later in that restless year that Evelyn's husband, Johnnie's brother, Harry Bates, was killed in an automobile accident.

Johnnie arrived from the office white-faced and bewildered. He's remembering when they were little, Kitty thought. All that time doing the same things and eating the same food and having the same parents.

It wasn't until they were alone together on the train that Johnnie said, "I don't really know why I feel so sunk. We never got along very well—not even when we were kids. Maybe that's the reason."

Kitty shook her head. "No. There's something true in all those old sayings. I guess blood is really thicker than water."

Johnnie leaned forward and picked up her hand. "I haven't heard you say anything like that for a long time."

"We never have time for conversation any more. We're always too busy or too tired or something."

(Continued on Page 110)

Remembrance

By Caroline Henry

I had forgotten lilacs
Strong and brave yet priceless-frail,
I had forgotten dogwood
Shy along a mountain trail,
Forgotten amber shadows
Beneath the flaming larch,
Forgotten where the crocus
Pioneered in March.

Then back you came, a-sailing,
Full of April, laughter, lightness,
Full of sun and wind and rain,
In a trembling brightness,
Like a diamond's liquid drop
There you stand—to me
Representing old, lost days
In strangest alchemy!

in Weddings and Silver

Girls today are planning lovely weddings in the classic tradition . . . families are giving Gorham Sterling. For 115 years, Gorham has held to a single standard: the best . . . in design, in the unsurpassed execution by Gorham's famous master-craftsmen. About 12 favorite patterns, averaging about $23* per six-piece place-setting: luncheon knife and fork, cream soup spoon, teaspoon, salad fork, butter spreader. Knowledgeable people say, "You can't do better than Gorham!"

Gorham
STERLING

America's Leading Silversmiths since 1831
PROVIDENCE 7, RHODE ISLAND

Gown by Jay Thorpe

*Inc. Fed. Tax © 1946 The Gorham Company

"I don't see how you dare let Tommy do it!"

MOTHER: Do what, Mother?

GRANDMA: Wear those canvas sneakers all the time. Won't they ruin his feet?

MOTHER: Goodness, don't be old-fashioned, Mother. Tommy's canvas shoes have "P-F".

GRANDMA: That explains everything, except . . . what is "P-F"?

MOTHER: "P-F" means Posture Foundation. It's a special built-in feature that keeps the bones of the feet in their natural, normal position. It guards against flat feet and strained, tired leg muscles.

GRANDMA: Well, I never. Do all sneakers have "P-F" these days?

MOTHER: Indeed not. "P-F" is a Patented Feature found only in canvas shoes made by B. F. Goodrich or Hood Rubber Company.

GRANDMA: My land, what'll they think of next?

1 This sponge rubber cushion protects the sensitive area of the foot. 2 This orthopedically correct rigid wedge keeps the bones of the foot in their natural, normal position.

"P-F" means Posture Foundation

—a Patented Feature found only in canvas shoes made by

B. F. Goodrich or HOOD RUBBER COMPANY

(Continued from Page 108)

"We have time now," said Johnnie.

"Johnnie," she said, "I wonder how Evelyn is feeling."

"Awful. Because if your brother is your brother, I guess your husband is certainly your husband."

"I guess he certainly is," said Kitty. She smiled at him. "You're so nice to talk to. Nicer than anyone."

Afterward, both of them remembered that trip on the train, to Harry's funeral, as having been a peculiarly close and happy interlude in their lives. There was nothing happy, however, about their stay in Decatur. It was a time of sorrow, of dark clothes and low voices. Though spring was beginning in the South, the few days they spent there were gray and the city seemed the sadder for its flowers.

Kitty could see Johnnie's emotion for his brother dissolving into impatience with the immemorial rites. With it went something of what had drawn them together on the train. She knew he couldn't wait to get away, and though her restlessness matched his, she could not keep from feeling hurt and, somehow ridiculously, at fault.

Johnnie, who had his work, returned to New York the day after the funeral, but Kitty stayed on a few days longer. When she went back to her mother's house after seeing him off, she found Mrs. Lattimer punching vigorously at her needle-point. As Kitty came in, she looked up briefly.

"I hate funerals," she said.

"You certainly took that one in your stride," said Kitty.

"Daughter," said Mrs. Lattimer, "convention is often a very helpful thing."

Kitty laughed. For the first time since she had come to Decatur, she felt warm. "Mother, what will Evelyn do now? With that big house and those two little girls."

"Live in the house and raise the children."

"But she's so young," said Kitty.

"Much too young to be a widow."

"Lawford Paige brought me back from St. Bartholomew's yesterday," said Kitty.

"Did he?"

"Johnnie asked him to. There wasn't really room in the Bates car on account of their Great-aunt Susan."

"So very fat," said Mrs. Lattimer.

"Yes," said Kitty, but she was thinking about Lawford Paige, who wasn't fat at all.

SHE had sat beside him in his car and thought how attractive he was, and wondered why for the first time she felt no response to him whatsoever. Something is wrong with me. I can't feel, she had thought.

Idly she had said, "They planted too many palmettos along this road." He hadn't answered, and then she'd said, "What are you thinking?"

"I'm thinking of the last time I saw you."

"It was Harry and Evelyn's wedding," said Kitty. She remembered suddenly how she had asked him then why he himself hadn't married Evelyn. "Lawford, do you remember what we talked about?"

She saw at once that he had been thinking only of her, of how she had been then and of how she had changed, and not of Evelyn at all. But when she spoke of it, he remembered. The car spurted a little and, when he looked at her, his tired and knowing eyes were wide.

"Kitty—hush," he said.

"Oh, Lawford, phooey," Kitty said.

Sitting, now, under her mother's gentle eye, she was herself a little horrified. I never could have said it, she thought, if I hadn't felt so strange.

Out loud she said, "Lawford's been very helpful, hasn't he?"

"Lawford——" said Mrs. Lattimer. Then, very firmly, she said, "Naturally. He was Harry's doctor and one of his best friends." She looked her daughter straight in the eye and then, even more firmly, she changed the subject.

When Kitty finally found herself on the train, going North, she thought of all this, and also of her sister Evelyn. She thought of herself standing in the long window of Evelyn's bedroom and looking down into the walled garden where the two little girls and so easy to use!

FIBS? they're so easy to tell!

Women who us tampons shoul learn about FIBS Because FIBS hav those smooth, ger tly tapered ends tha tell you at a glanc insertion must b both easy and comfortable.

FIBS are the tampons that are "quilted —a feature fastidious women are quick t appreciate. This "quilting" prevents tin cotton particles from clinging to delicat internal membranes.

Besides, quilting makes a very real con tribution to your comfort—keeps FIB from fluffing up to an uncomfortable siz which could otherwise cause pressure, irri tation, difficult removal. No other tampo is quilted!

Next time you buy tampon be sure to ask for FIBS!*

*T. M. Reg. U. S. Pat. O.

CRO-PAX FOOT AIDS

CORNS
6 Waterproof Pads . . . 4 medicated discs . . . for quick, safe removal of corns.

CALLOUSES
Callous Pads, waterproof, remove pressure; 3 large medicated discs remove core.

BUNIONS
Bunion Pads...Waterproof . . . medicated . . . Relieve Pressure.

AT ALL 10¢ STORES

FOREST CITY PRODUCTS, INC. CLEVELAND 13, OHIO

KEEP ADORABLE!

Yodora checks perspiration odor the SOOTHINGEST way

- Made on a face cream base. Yodora is actually soothing to normal skins.
- Entirely free from irritating salts. Can be used right after under-arm shaving.
- Its soft, cream consistency stays that way indefinitely. Never gets stiff or grainy.
- Contains no chemicals to spoil clothing.
- Tubes or jars, 10¢, 30¢, 60¢.
- Yes, Yodora is a gentle deodorant. Try it today — feel the wonderful difference!

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

McKesson & Robbins, Inc., Bridgeport, Conn.

Hair OFF Face Lips...Arms...Legs

ow Happy! I had ugly superfluous hair . . . was loved . . . discouraged. Tried many things . . . even ors. Nothing was satisfactory. Then I developed imple, painless, inexpensive method. It has helped busands win beauty, love, happiness. My FREE ok, "What I Did About Superfluous Hair" plains method. Mailed in plain envelope. Also IAL OFFER. Write Mme. Annette Lanzette. P. O. x 4040, Merchandise Mart, Dept. 308, Chicago 54, Ill.

FALSE TEETH That Loosen Need Not Embarrass

Many wearers of false teeth have suffered al embarrassment because their plate dropped, pped or wabbled at just the wrong time. Do t live in fear of this happening to you. Just rinkle a little FASTEETH, the alkaline on-acid) powder, on your plates. Holds se teeth more firmly, so they feel more mfortable. Does not sour. Checks "plate or" (denture breath). Get FASTEETH at y drug store.

LEARN MILLINERY AT HOME

Design and make exclusive hats under personal direction of one of America's noted igners. Complete materials, blocks, etc., furnished. Every illustrated. You make exclusive salable hats right from start. We teach you how to start a profitable business in re time. Low cost and easy terms. Expert milliners are in hand. Free National Placement Dept. Send for free catalog.

LOUIE MILLER SCHOOL OF MILLINERY
35 N. Wabash Ave., Dept. 33, Chicago 1, Ill.

were so quietly playing. Evelyn had come to stand beside her.

Evelyn had said, "Kitty, I shall miss him so. We had so much together."

She wanted me to know that she mourned him, thought Kitty. They did have a lot. That lovely house and the children and old friends and a graceful, easy way of life. She shook herself. But I couldn't stand it. I hate small cities. I hate knowing everyone. I'd go nuts.

Suddenly, she couldn't wait to get home. It was all she could do not to sit on the edge of her seat, urging the train on in her dreadful anxiety.

When she got to New York, early the next morning, Johnnie met her. He was exactly as he had always been. He kissed her, and got her a porter and put her in a taxi before he went on to the office. At the apartment, she hadn't got her key in the lock before David, on tiptoe, had opened the door.

He flung his arms around her knees. "Mummy, mummy," he said. Then: "What did you bring me?"

With his hand in hers, she toured the apartment. It was clean and neat, but obviously the madam had been away. She and David changed the position of the pillows on the sofa and of the vases on the tables.

When he had gone to the park, she opened the mail and looked over the telephone list. With it in her hand, she sat down to let people know she was back. Her accustomed, attractive, everyday life was all about her, just as it had always been. Why, what can have been wrong with me? thought Kitty.

Life for the Bateses went on in a fairly even tenor. In the summers, now that David was older, they took a house in Connecticut,

Some people pass their whole life in the expectation of the moment when they really will begin to live.

and Johnnie commuted whenever he didn't have to work too late.

The first year, Kitty said, "I never thought I'd join a beach club, but how are you going to swim if you don't?"

Johnnie said, "I wish we could have a place of our own. We could if we saved."

He said it many times again, and Kitty always agreed with him, but they never saved the money.

They did move to larger quarters in town, because it suddenly seemed imperative to have a dining room. They took a charming little brownstone house in the east sixties which, though low enough in rent, turned out to be very expensive to run. Both of them, however, were delighted to have their own front door.

"It keeps making me think of our iron grille in Bank Street," Kitty said.

"Sometimes I wish it were," said Johnnie.

"You wouldn't like it now a bit."

That was the year that Evelyn and Lawford Paige, very quietly, got married. When Kitty and Johnnie heard the news, they both burst out laughing.

"I did that with my little hatchet," Kitty said.

"I think you did," said Johnnie. "Do you know, I used to think Lawford sort of had a yen for you?"

"I guess he sort of had," said Kitty. "Isn't it odd, when you think how it all started, that Evelyn's got exactly what she wanted in the beginning."

"She's missed a lot, though."

"What?"

"Oh, ecstasy," said Johnnie.

"We've had that, haven't w ?"

He came and took her in his arms, and they held to each other as though they would never let go. "Yes," said Johnnie.

The next time Crandall came to call, they told him about Evelyn. Success sat very well on Crandall. He had gained solidity without forfeiting his particular brand of charm.

Kitty, observing him, thought, If he had been like this, Evelyn would have taken him.

Now..."Home and You, dear"

Time for love and the deeply-desired softness of your hands. How do other women keep their hands welcomingly soft? "Young Marrieds" use Jergens Lotion, nearly 4 to 1; Jergens is, 7 to 1, the hand care of the Hollywood Stars.

Even more effective, now—thanks to wartime discoveries in skin-care. Jergens skin scientists can now make your Jergens Lotion even finer. Women made tests and said, "Makes my hands even softer"; and "Protects longer".

Dear familiar things—shared again. "Sweet, your hands feel so soft!" Two skin-softening ingredients many doctors use are still part of this even finer Jergens Lotion. In the stores now—same bottle—still 10¢ to $1.00 (plus tax). None of that oiliness; no sticky feeling.

For the Softest, Adorable Hands, use

JERGENS LOTION

Now more Effective than ever—thanks to Wartime Research

"SOAPING" dulls hair—
Halo glorifies it!

Here's why your very first Halo Shampoo will leave your hair aglow with natural luster!

1. Halo reveals the true natural beauty of your hair the very first time you use it . . . leaves it shimmering with glorious highlights. 2. Even finest soaps leave dingy soap-film on hair. But Halo contains no soap. Made with a new patented ingredient it cannot leave soap-film! 3. Needs no lemon or vinegar after-rinse. Halo rinses away, quickly and completely! 4. Makes oceans of rich, fragrant lather, in hardest water. Leaves hair sweet, naturally radiant! 5. Carries away unsightly loose dandruff like magic! 6. Lets hair dry soft and manageable, easy to curl! 10¢ or larger sizes.

Reveals the Hidden Beauty of your Hair!

Johnnie said, "How's the new play?"

"Packing them in," said Crandall.

"Crandall," Kitty said carefully, "Evelyn's just married again. A sort of old beau."

"I bet his name is Lawford Paige."

"How did you know?"

"She told me about him. I think he was her dream boy."

"No," Johnnie said. "You were her dream boy. Lawford was her Mr. One Hundred Per Cent."

Crandall laughed. "This is a funny thing. I came to tell you that I'm getting married myself."

Undeniably, their jaws hung open. Then Johnnie had one hand and Kitty the other. "Crandall!" . . . "Crandall, how wonderful!"

"Hey, take it easy," Crandall said.

They stood in a little three-cornered group, smiling anxiously at one another.

"Do we know her?" Kitty said.

Crandall sat down and lit a cigarette. "I've kept her hidden. Her name is Mary Church. She's twenty-four years old, and she's very beautiful and she thinks I'm wonderful."

"Twenty-four," said Kitty. "Heavens, Crandall."

"She's got lots of sense," Crandall said. He was looking happy and self-conscious. "You'll probably think she's rather like Evelyn. I suppose that's why I went for her at first. Only she's really herself. And she thinks I'm wonderful, and I like that very much."

"She sounds perfect," said Kitty. "There's the nicest little house right on this block. I wish you'd take it."

Crandall stretched out his long legs. "Not us. None of this footless living. I've had enough and Mary would hate it. We're going to buy a place in the country and have a lot of children right off and bring them up the way we both think kids should be brought up."

"But I thought you hated the country," Kitty said.

"It's a funny thing," said Crandall. "I don't at all any more."

Johnnie said, "I believe Crandall is going to be landed gentry."

CRANDALL gave a surprised snort of laughter. He got to his feet and stood for a moment, looking at them almost shyly. "We're getting married next month. May I bring Mary to see you?"

"Crandall, how lovely," said Kitty. "Come tomorrow. Come early and stay for dinner."

"Thanks." Quite seriously, as though he were going on a journey, he went to Johnnie and shook his hand. Then he kissed Kitty. "Well, good-by."

She put her arms around his neck and pressed her cheek to his. "Crandall, dear, you'll be so happy."

"Well, good-by," he said again, and went away.

Kitty turned to Johnnie. Her arms went out, and fell to her sides again. "Everyone but us seems to be getting settled."

"Don't you remember? We never wanted to," said Johnnie.

After that, naturally enough, there was a great deal less of Crandall in their lives. They spent an occasional week end with him and Mary and their ever-increasing brood. When Crandall and Mary came into town, for an opening or a party, they stayed with the Bateses. Mary, who really looked amazingly like Evelyn, was a charming creature, and they all had a very good time together—but it was as two couples rather than as highly individual friends.

Every now and then, though, when Crandall was alone, he would drop in on Kitty, and then they would fall easily into the old intimacy.

One afternoon, when he hadn't been for a very long time, he looked around the room and he said, "Do you know, I miss this."

"Do you mean this footless living?" Kitty asked.

"I suppose so," said Crandall. Then he laughed. "Has that rankled all this time?"

"I don't know. It must have."

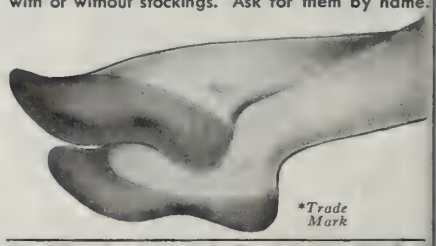
there's no doubt about it ... they're genuine if you see this Trade-Mark...

Maiden Form
BRASSIERES



If you can't find your style at first, try again! Dealers supplied monthly. Send for free Style folders: Maiden Form Brassiere Co., Inc., New York 16.

"There is a Maiden Form for Every Type of Figure!"

THERE'S YEAR ROUND COMFORT IN genuine Footlets *

Protect your health, your stockings, your comfort with FOOTLETS. They're in fashion the year round with or without stockings. Ask for them by name.

*Trade Mark

STRAWBERRY PLANTS Senator Dunlap, world's most popular, or Giant Mastodon Everbearing . . . 100 plants, very special $3.50, or 25 for $1. Cash orders prepaid, or sent C.O.D. plus charges. Return at once if not satisfied. FREE for prompt action with $3.50 orders, 2 hardy Cushion Mums $1.00 Value. Order now. OWEN NURSERY, Dept. 5B1, Bloomington, Ill. Clip this.

LETITIA FINE KNITTING YARNS
100% VIRGIN WOOL
SEND FOR FREE COLOR CARD
CHESTNUT HILL YARN CO., BOX 4027L
CHESTNUT HILL, PHILADELPHIA, PA.

Take a Page from our Notebook

You'll lead the Easter Parade when you follow the Footsteps of Fashion in beautiful
Krippendorf Foot Rest Shoes.
Designed especially to fit
at toe...and heel...and instep.
Joyously comfortable shoes, smartly styled
to work in...play in...live in!
Write for name of your nearest dealer.

$6.95 to $7.95
(Slightly higher Denver west)

THE KRIPPENDORF-DITTMANN CO. Krippendorf FOOT REST SHOE VERIFLEXIBLE CINCINNATI 2, OHIO

Help for DRY SKIN

Thelma, Lady Furness, twin sister of Mrs. Reginald Vanderbilt, says . . . "Pond's Dry Skin Cream is delightful."

3 Special Features

Lanolin—very like oil of skin
Homogenized—to soak in better
Special Emulsifier—extra softening aid

Dry, sensitive skin just seems to "eat up" this Pond's Dry Skin Cream, women say. It's so extra-rich . . . soakier! Not sticky, not heavy. Stroke this luscious cream on your face and throat. Hands like it, too! Leave it on 5 to 15 minutes or overnight. Use Pond's Dry Skin Cream daily. It is special help to make dry, roughish skin look softer, smoother, prettier! You'll love Pond's Dry Skin Cream! At beauty counters everywhere—ask for your jar today.

Pond's DRY SKIN Cream

Amazing New Plan!

DRESS for YOU FOR ORDERING 3!

THRILLING NEW PLAN! Your choice of Gorgeous New Dress or Suit, in your favorite style, size and color, given to you for sending orders for only three dresses for your friends, neighbors, or members of your family. That's all. Not one cent to pay. Everything supplied without cost.

Experience Unnecessary
Spare Time Will Do!

Famous Harford Frocks will send you their big, new Style Line showing scores of latest fashions, with actual fabrics, in dresses, lingerie, children's wear, etc., at sensational low, money-saving prices. Also SPORTSWEAR, slacks, suits and coats. Show styles and fabrics to your friends, neighbors, and family—send in only 3 orders—and get dress or suit. You can get your complete wardrobe easily, quickly and without cost, and also earn good money for spare time work if you wish.

BE FIRST IN YOUR TOWN!

WRITE TODAY for Big Style Presentation. Due to today's conditions we may not be able to send it at once . . . but rush your name and address to be placed on our list and be among the first to receive the new Style Line when available. Write now.

YOUR CHOICE OF MORE THAN 100 STYLES

HARFORD FROCKS
Dept. C-9012, Cincinnati 25, Ohio

Scoldy Lox BOB PINS
NEVER LET YOUR HAIR DOWN

* The pins with a lasting grip
* Smooth finish inside and out

She was standing before him, smiling. He thought how gay and pretty and superficial she was, and how he liked her.

"Eager little Kitty," he said.

"I'm not at all," said Kitty.

"I'm thinking of the way you were."

"Before living became footless?"

"Chips on shoulders don't become you," Crandall said.

"It's just that it's true. And so I suppose it rankles." She sat down opposite him. She wasn't angry at all, but she was a good deal more thoughtful than he had seen her for some time. "Crandall, what's wrong with me?" she said at last.

He hunched his shoulders and slid a little farther down on his spine. "Do you remember the time, so many years ago, that I taught you to wash dishes and settled your life for you? I wish it were as easy as that now."

"But you're all right, Crandall," Kitty said. "You're fine."

"Oh, me. I came all my croppers early. So now I'm pleased with what I have, which happens to be exactly what I want."

"You're very smug," said Kitty. "I think you'll get fat."

Crandall patted his lean middle. "Doubtless." He was laughing, but the old dissecting light was in his eye. "I've been thinking about you and Johnnie."

Her eyebrows went up. "What have you thought?"

"Well, when you and Johnnie first came to New York you were about the pleasantest and most purposeful young things in the world, and here you are—both restless as witches and no direction at all. Of course, Johnnie has his work. That helps him."

"I have my child," said Kitty.

The greatest amount of smuggling is done over the borders of morality.

"Sure. But no little boy who spends from nine till five in the very best school can possibly take up much of his mother's time. I'm afraid you're just a parasite, Kitty; you don't even do good works."

"I hate good works. And I can't imagine why I'm not furious with you."

"Because we're friends," he told her. "By the way, Rugg got married the other day."

"Did he?" said Kitty. "Who?" She could feel herself just faintly blush.

"Well, I think he must have been drunk when he did it."

"Oh," said Kitty. Then she said, "What were you going to say about Johnnie and me, Crandall?"

"I think it's this. I think you got where you were going much too soon, and now you're stymied because there's nothing else to do that you really want to do."

"Heavens," said Kitty.

"Look at it. You wanted to sort of conquer New York, and get to know all the clever people and do all the clever things and get places. Well, you have. And what have all the clever people turned out to be but most of those girls and boys you used to play with down on Bank Street? And haven't most of them turned stuffy with success, though? And the ones that haven't are drunks or something. And as for the old clever ones—the ones we used to wish we knew—now we know them, and do we like them? Not so much. They're just like everybody else."

"Isn't it funny?" Kitty said. "The clever people and the stuffy people turn out to be the same people. Why, at parties now, we sometimes even meet our rich New York cousins. The ones that used to send Evelyn and me their hand-me-downs. We used to shun them like poison. And there they are—at the same places."

"Sure. You've arrived—you've even made a lot of money," he said. "And that wasn't in the books when you came. But very pleasant it's been."

(Continued on Page 115)

IT IS THAT SUPERB Evening in Paris face powder which gives your skin such a velvety look, of course! It is so soft and fine, and it clings so long and smoothly. Evening in Paris rouge and lipstick are designed to harmonize . . . and the complete make-up is more marvelously becoming than you'd even dream!

You'd better try it now . . . and discover for yourself why the men say "if a lovely woman would be even lovelier . . . her make-up should be Evening in Paris!"

Evening in Paris
Face Powder $1.00
Rouge 50¢
Lipstick 50¢
plus tax

BOURJOIS N. Y.—Distributors

Tune in the Powder Box Theater—Thursday 10:30 P.M., E.S.T., Columbia Network.

WORK GOES TWICE AS FAST WITH RINSO'S TWIN* ADVANTAGES

Mrs. John Lally

* GETS WHITES GLEAMING WHITE
* KEEPS WASHABLE COLORS SPARKLING BRIGHT

THE LALLY TWINS love to play store. They live in a comfortable home and their mother does all her own housework. With active twins, there is plenty of washing. Mrs. Lally has "used Rinso for years."

THE TWINS are very helpful about the house and enjoy their tasks. They keep their room in order, and they often wash out daddy's socks and their dolls' dresses.

These are the Lally twins, Joanne and Janet, of the Bronx, New York. They are just 8 years old and in Grade 3-A, the advance group, at their school. They sing, dance and swim—and have a beloved pet kitten named "Ginger."

IN THE COURSE of his work, Mr. Lally, the twins' father, gets his clothes pretty dirty. But Mrs. Lally says, "Rinso gets out that stubborn dirt—FAST!"

Remember—

RINSO IS ANTI-SNEEZE

(PATENTED PROCESS)

—the only granulated soap 98% free of irritating sneezy soap-dust

AMOS: Avoid soap waste. Just use enough Rinso to keep 2 or 3 inches of suds...and do a full load of wash.

ANDY: And, folks, tune in our radio program every Tuesday night—on the NBC Network.

(Continued from Page 113)

"And now what?"

"That's harder," said Crandall. He got up and went to lean against the mantelpiece. "The only thing I know is that when people get well into the thirties—like us—they've got to have something to hang on to. It can be a family, or a house, or work or a cause, or even a good sure feeling between two people. But there's got to be something. I guess it's what the novelists have always called roots."

"What do you recommend?"

"I don't recommend. I just point out," said Crandall.

After he had gone, Kitty thought for a long time of all he had said. She arrived at no conclusions whatsoever. At last she got up and emptied the ash tray Crandall had used. Then she stopped and addressed Crandall's chair as though he still were in it.

"For a parasite, I'm a very good housekeeper," she said.

When Johnnie came home that night, and had had his dinner, and was drinking his coffee, Kitty said:

"Johnnie, are you bored?"

"Me?" said Johnnie. "Why should I be?"

"Oh, nothing. But when Crandall was here today we were talking about the way things used to be." She was silent a moment, then she said, "Johnnie, whatever happened to that book of yours? Did you ever finish it?"

Johnnie stared at her. "What on earth brought that up?"

"Well, did you?"

"No."

Kitty thought to herself, What a cold blue eye you can have, Johnnie Bates. But she persevered. "Johnnie, why don't we just buy that place in the country we're always talking about? Couldn't we have a mortgage and pay it off quick?"

"Don't you think the time is past for that?" said Johnnie.

"Why?"

"Baby, don't you know we're going to be in this war pretty quick now?"

"Do you think so, really?" Kitty asked.

"I know. And there's a lot of things I want to get settled before then without taking on a house." There was a light in his eye.

Why, he'll go, Kitty thought. He'll escape again into a man's world, the way he did that time in Bank Street, so long ago. And nothing's right. Or am I absurd? Am I just imagining things? Is Crandall?

She couldn't say any of it. She said, "We never went to Paris, did we?" Suddenly she began to laugh.

"What have we now?" said Johnnie.

"Nothing, nothing, nothing, nothing. It's just that you can't go back and I don't seem to know how to go forward."

ALL this was in the spring of 1941. It was in November that Kitty found out, late one very gay evening, that Johnnie was having an affair.

The party had dwindled till no one was left except the hosts, and Johnnie and Kitty, and a single girl named Delia Fuller. Delia was about twenty-eight and, without being actually pretty, she managed to be very attractive. She had a charming little pug face, a lovely figure and a very ready wit. Johnnie and Kitty had first met her during the summer in Connecticut when she had week-ended frequently with friends of theirs. She had turned out to have advertising ambitions, and eventually Johnnie had given her a job. Since then, she had been around a good deal. Kitty liked her in a mild, amused sort of way.

That November night, when Delia got up to go, Kitty was deep in discussion with her host.

Johnnie said, "You stay here, Kitty. I'll run Delia home and come back for you."

"Oh, I'll go now," Kitty said.

"Nonsense. You and Edmund must have that talk out. I'll be right back."

He wasn't.

Kitty, in a burst of laughter, conclusively lost her argument. Talk began to fail and time began to lengthen. Still no Johnnie.

Kitty's hostess got up and began to wander about the room. "You don't mind if I empty ash trays, do you?" she said.

Still no Johnnie.

"I can't imagine what's keeping him," said Kitty.

THEN, because they were both slightly behind her and because she turned at the precise moment, she saw the look that ran between Edmund and his wife. She saw the raised eyebrow, the pitying eye, the amused mouth and the slight shake of the head.

Oh, Kitty thought, oh. In that instant it all was clear. Feints and subterfuges and contrived meetings all were suddenly clear, and she remembered looks and words that had seemed to have no meaning. She could remember Johnnie helping Delia onto the Monday-morning train after the summer's week ends, and she thought of the long hot summer nights in New York. I must get out of here.

"Do you know," she said, "I'm sure something has happened to the car. I'll just get in a taxi and leave word with the doorman for Johnnie to follow me." Lightly, she kissed her hostess good night and, lightly, fashionably, she kissed her host.

"Good night," they said. "Good night, Kitty dear."

In the taxi, she began to shake. Stock phrases kept flashing into her mind. I'm betrayed, she thought. A woman betrayed. Then she thought, The reason they're stock is because they're the right ones. They fit. Only I never thought I'd feel like this. As though half of me were gone. She dropped her change all over the floor of the taxi.

Once in the house, she gathered her night things together and carried them into the guest room. This is stock, too, she thought.

When she heard Johnnie come in, she sat down at the foot of the guest-room bed. She heard him go into their bedroom, and presently she heard him cross the landing. He opened the door.

"Hullo, what are you in here for?"

"I'm going to bed," she said.

"Why in here?"

"Johnnie, is Delia fun?"

His shoulder slid down a little way along the doorframe. At last he said, "How did you know?"

"I've been very stupid. Everyone else has known for ages. It's obvious enough. But the wife is always the last to know." She bit her lip.

"Kitty, you must know that this means nothing. It has nothing to do with you and me."

She was shaking again. "How can you say that?" she cried. "How can you stand there and say that? Unless you've had other mistresses of whom I've known nothing."

She saw his face change. "Shut up," he told her.

"Don't speak to me like that."

"How about you? How about Jack Rugg?"

Still Me With Caresses

By Georgie Starbuck Galbraith

This way you have to silence me is pleasant,
A trick which keeps me tractable and meek.
When I would talk I find my lips quiescent
Beneath your kiss, and so I do not speak.

By all means, lover, still me with caresses.
Pour kisses on my mouth like wine to drink,
And drown the rush of syllables and phrases . . .
Lest I should tell you what I really think.

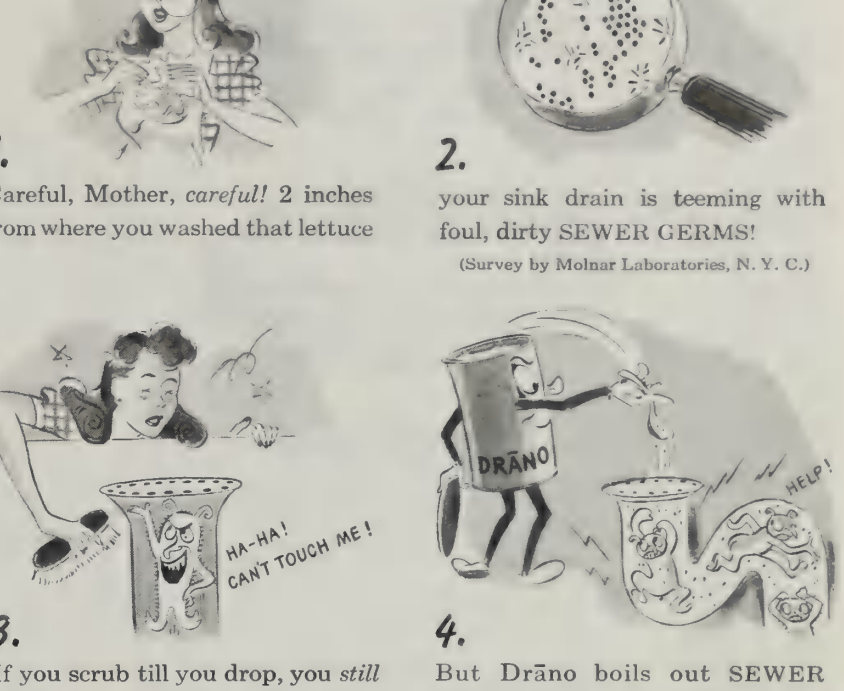
1. Careful, Mother, careful! 2 inches from where you washed that lettuce

2. your sink drain is teeming with foul, dirty SEWER GERMS!

(Survey by Molnar Laboratories, N. Y. C.)

3. If you scrub till you drop, you still won't scare off these disgusting drain-lurkers.



4. But Drāno boils out SEWER GERMS like a snap! Makes your sink safe—sanitary!

5. Remember, too . . . if you have a clogged drain in the house, Drāno opens it up fast—even a drain so stopped up a drop of water can't trickle through!

6. But why let drains stop up or harbor SEWER GERMS? Use Drāno regularly. Keep your drains free-running—free of SEWER GERMS.

Drāno

T. M. Reg. U. S. Pat. Off. by the Drackett Co.

Never over 25¢ at Hardware, Drug, and Grocery Stores.

OPENS CLOGGED DRAINS

CLEARS OUT SEWER GERMS

Harmless to Septic tanks: Makes them work better — cuts down odors

When You Buy —

ORGANDIE CURTAINS

Look for this Trade-Mark

SAYLERIZED
PERMANENT FINISH

Starchless!

SAYLERIZED curtain organdies keep crisply beautiful in damp weather — fresh and new looking after countless washings — throughout the useful service of your curtains.

SAYLERIZED process minimizes lint and fuzz — imparts soil resistance that assures less laundering and thus less wear, assuring longer life to your curtains, too. No starch required.

SAYLERIZED finish is also applied to many of the better types of fine cotton dress goods, and to cotton handkerchiefs, by Sayles Finishing Plants, Inc., Saylesville, Rhode Island.

SAYLERIZED finish makes good fabrics better.

*Reg. U. S. Pat. Off.

"It's really something special!"

Your sense of touch tells you Scott's new Soft-Weve is the perfect toilet tissue. It combines cleansing tissue softness and practical firmness. I'll never be without it!

A SCOTT TISSUE
Soft-Weve
White-Facial Quality

Cleansing tissue soft... toilet tissue firm

She looked at him incredulously. She said, "I didn't sleep with Jack Rugg. He wanted to marry me."

"Why didn't you?"

"Perhaps I should have," she said.

His blue eyes were wild. "Better you than the floozie he married."

"Get out," said Kitty. "Get out of here."

He turned on his heel and slammed the door.

"Never come back," shouted Kitty. "Never come back. Never come back."

She finally slept that night, and awoke early the next morning with doom suspended over her head.

When she rang for her breakfast, David, all ready for school, burst into the room.

"You woke up early," he said. "Why are you sleeping in here?"

"I have a cold," said Kitty.

"Do you know something?" said David. "Daddy went off without his breakfast."

"I guess he wasn't hungry," Kitty said. Oh! she thought to herself. Lies.

Vera came in, then, with breakfast and a curious eye.

David said, "Mummy has a cold, Vera."

"Oh, Mrs. Bates, I'm sorry," Vera said. Then she said, "Mr. Bates went off without his breakfast."

"He was in a hurry to get to work," Kitty said.

"And not hungry," said David.

When he had gone to school, she poured out a cup of coffee, and sat looking at it for a long time. Then she pushed the tray away and, turning her face into the pillows, she cried. When she was calmer, she still lay there, too spent to move.

I've got to get away from here, she thought. I've got to go where no one will ask me any questions. I've got to think this out.

Suddenly, she got out of bed. "I'm going home," she said aloud. "I've got to go where people love me."

She ran across the landing into her own room, and began to pull down the luggage from the shelf in Johnnie's closet. Tears blinded her again and, as she tugged, all the suitcases came down at once with a clatter. With them came a brown-paper package which burst as it landed. Typewritten manuscript spilled out.

"Why, it's the novel," Kitty said.

She sat down on the floor and began to read. After a while she began to skip. Finally she stopped. But it's not good, she thought. It's young and immature, and there's no real talent.

She thought of Bank Street and of the happiness and laughter and eagerness that she and Johnnie had known there. Bitterly she thought:

That's how we were—just young and immature. And no real talent.

She tied the manuscript up again and shoved it far back on the shelf. "That's where you belong," she said to it.

When she had dressed and packed she sat down and wrote this letter:

Dear Johnnie: If you and I can speak to each other as we did last night, I think we'd better be apart for a while. So I'm going to Decatur now. I plan to stay a week or so. When I come back we can decide what we want to do. Or if you want to you can always get in touch with me before then.

I'll stop at David's school to say good-by to him. He's better here, in his regular routine, than with me just now.

I've telegraphed mother, so she will be expecting me. I've said I was run-down.

KITTY.

She folded the letter and wrote Johnnie's name on it. Then she put it under his hairbrushes.

When she got off the train in Decatur the next morning, Evelyn and Lawford Paige and her mother were on the platform. Her mother kissed her, and then Evelyn did, and then her mother held her off.

"You do look peaked," she said. "Dark under the eyes."

"No. Just the same Kitty," said Lawford. He smiled at her. Then, as though it followed, he said, "I've got you some quail."

He's fine, thought Kitty. And so is Evelyn. They're happy.

"How is my grandson?" her mother asked. "And my son-in-law?"

"Both very busy," Kitty said. "It was a good time for me to come, so I took it." But no one's asked me that, she thought. No one's going to.

Evelyn drew her behind the others. "I want to tell you before anyone else does, Kitty. I'm having a baby. I meant to write."

"Oh, Evelyn, I hope it's a boy."

Evelyn smiled.

Why, she's in love, Kitty thought — all gently and sweetly in love the way she would want to be. Then, irrepressibly, she thought, But what about Lawford? I could have had Lawford. He wouldn't have been gently in love with me. She smiled a little. Absurd.

But she was still faintly smiling when, some minutes later, the car stopped in front of her mother's house.

"Lawford and Evelyn are staying for dinner," her mother said.

"Oh, dinner in the middle of the day," said Kitty.

She watched her mother and Evelyn go into the house. She stopped on the steps, and looked down at Lawford on the step below her. He put down her bags, and looked back at her. She drew in a breath.

"Lawford, it's so good to see you. It's so good to be back," she said.

"It's very nice to have you."

"Lawford, will you take me hunting one morning? I haven't been since I was a girl."

"Kitty, you're still the most fascinating woman I know, but I'm not going to take anyone hunting till my wife can go."

Their eyes met and hers fell. She lifted them again. "You're a very nice man."

"You can be very nice too."

She went into the house and, on the landing, she stopped and looked at her flushed face in the mirror. I've been put in my place, she thought. I've been told off. And so I should have been. What was I doing? Just to prove myself. Oh, Johnnie, Johnnie.

She joined her mother and Evelyn in the sitting room and there, in their unconcerned faces, she found an ironic comfort.

It could never occur to them, she thought, that I could do what I have just done. If they had seen me and heard me, they still wouldn't have known.

The incident stayed with her all day and, in her agitated mind, assumed an importance out of all proportion to what had actually happened. While she talked to her mother about David and to Evelyn about clothes, her thoughts kept going around and around: But I'm worse than Johnnie. I could have

(Continued on Page 118)

Rendezvous With Spring

By Eunice Mildred Lon Coske

How many shimmering springs have come?
How many springs have gone
Since I first ran the emerald path
At break of dawn?

Oh, I shall walk again this lane
Before it is too late;
For brisk important things of life
Can always wait.

And though my heart is wiser now,
And it shall never know
The youthful heartbreak that it did
Long years ago,

With this late meeting in the woods
With spring—white flame on flame—
I shall fling caution to the winds
And call your name!

Will you enjoy these comforts in YOUR NEXT NEW MATTRESS?

1. Down below . . . you'll read many reasons why it's wiser to wait for a Beautyrest.

When you read them, we think you'll agree. For a mattress is something it pays to buy wisely. And a Beautyrest is so much more than merely a mattress—it's actually years of rest and relaxation. Years of comfort, well-being to you.

That's why we think wise mattress-buying means waiting for Beautyrest!

Compare the coil springs! Comfort comes from the heart of the mattress—the coil springs. In the ordi-ry inner-spring mattress, coils are joined together, down together, forming slopes and hollows. But Beautyrest's 837 coil springs are independent—tied together! Each separately cushions your hips, oulders, legs. That's the secret of Beautyrest's glori-s, buoyant comfort. Wiser to wait for, isn't it?

3. Another thing to consider, too: Some mattresses "look good" in the showroom, "let down" later. But Beautyrest is built to last and last.

Its patented "sag-proof" border stays neat, firm, resilient. Its 8 side-ventilators inhale clean air, expel stale air, help keep it fresh and sanitary.

Beautyrest needs turning only 4 or 5 times a year—practically cares for itself. Wiser to wait for, isn't it?

4. Look at the label! Beautyrest, the world's most comfortable mattress—made by Simmons, world's most reliable name in bedding.

Yes, your Beautyrest's 10-year guarantee of "Luxury comfort" will be something to think about when you shop for that new mattress soon.

Makes it worth while to wait a little longer for your Beautyrest, doesn't it?

here again soon—BEAUTYREST—The World's Most Comfortable Mattress!

Made by SIMMONS COMPANY

Real
Cream of Tomato Soup

-as a dish by itself
it's delicious

-used as a sauce
it's superb

Heinz Condensed*
Cream of Tomato Soup

* One tin of soup, plus one tin of milk or water makes four portions of delicious soup

As a Sauce Base for meatloaf and spaghetti Heinz Condensed Cream of Tomato Soup gives a flavor folks simply can't resist.

(Continued from Page 116)

hurt more people. If Lawford hadn't always been on to me, if he hadn't been Lawford, I could have hurt them all. Without a moment's thought. Just to make myself feel attractive again. What have I come to? What have I lost? Where am I going?

In the afternoon she went to Evelyn and Lawford's house to see her nieces. It was a charming place and the children were pretty and natural. They're much more relaxed than David, she thought. That's because of New York. Or me. Perhaps it's me.

Presently Lawford came in and the room took on life and depth.

The man has come home, Kitty thought. Why, this is marriage. It used to be like this in our house. When did it stop? All the years of her marriage were suddenly upon her. She felt the ardor, the delight, the pain and even the indifference that had filled them. I can't leave it behind. It's part of me.

Evelyn, soft and blooming at last, was watching Lawford and listening to him.

She's interested, Kitty thought. Everyone here is interested in everyone else, and is kind to them and respects them. I haven't been interested in what Johnnie did, for years. I just was pleased that he was a success and made lots of money for us to spend. Suddenly she thought, Delia was interested. She sat upright. Passionately she thought, I don't want this quiet affection. I love Johnnie with all my heart. I want Johnnie back.

Lawford got up from his chair and went to the radio. "We'll get the news."

Evelyn turned her dark eyes on her sister. They were frightened. "If there's a war, he'll go," she whispered.

"Oh, no," said Kitty.

"He's a doctor," Evelyn said.

The tears came into Kitty's eyes. "Oh, Evelyn, oh, Evelyn." But the tears weren't really for Lawford.

That night, Kitty lay sleepless in her high, narrow bed. All night long she thought of her life with Johnnie. She went over it bit by bit and in detail and if, sometimes, unknown to herself, she dozed, she woke again with the place where she had left off fresh in her mind. Sometimes a half-forgotten word or incident would come back to her, and then she would put her finger on it, and think. After a while she was no longer half hysterical, but calm.

Every human being is born as an original and dies as a copy.

When it was light, she got up and dressed and went downstairs. She took up a coat, and went out on the steps. The early-morning air was sweet. Kitty pressed her hands to her heart. I wish this weren't so physical. I wish it would just crack and be done with it.

A taxi rounded the square and stopped in front of the house.

Johnnie got out. He stood at the bottom of the steps. "Hullo, Kitty," he said.

"I couldn't sleep," Kitty said.

"No," said Johnnie.

"Come in, won't you?"

"No. Come out in the square."

They crossed the street, and went into the square, and sat down on a bench.

"I didn't go home till yesterday," Johnn said. "Then I couldn't stand it and I wer home in the middle of the day. I found yo letter. So I came." He made himself loc at her. "Kitty, will you take me back?"

"I was going home today to ask you."

"To ask me?" he said.

"Something happened to me yesterda I saw myself as I've grown to be, and didn't like it. Delia is my fault as well yours. She's a result, not a cause. I haven been a good wife to you, Johnnie."

"You're the only wife I want."

"I've found something out. When w shook the dust of Decatur from our feet, w shook all the good away with the bad. Or we took it with us, we forgot it on the wa I mean being good people, and kind to eac other, and all those things that you lear when you're small. We got all mixed u in just having things and being bright."

"I've been thinking all that," sai Johnnie, "from my side." He paused a littl "And of course we aren't quite the wonde we thought ourselves."

She remembered the manuscript, far bac in his closet, and she put her hand into hi

"I love you so much," Johnnie said. "I'm so married to you. I never knew."

"So am I," said Kitty.

"Shall we try again, Kitty?"

"I think I'd die without you."

He kissed her. "That's the second time i this square. Do you remember? We coul do anything. We could face anything."

"Well, we can," said Kitty.

It was the beginning of December of 194

(THE END)

UNDER-COVER STUFF

(Continued from Page 5)

by Angela Thirkell, for those who enjoy the lighthearted doings of English countryside, this time concerned with an ex-governess in charge of a seventeen-year-old girl; and THE REASONABLE SHORES, by G. B. Stern, the more vigorous story of a seventeen-year-old girl's rebellion against her temperamental family. . . . Likewise English is NIGHT AND THE CITY, by the much-talked-about new writer, GERALD KERSH, a darkly dramatic tale of great intensity. . . . There are three interesting American novels: NEVER SO YOUNG AGAIN, the touching story of a bewildered American flier, by Dan Brennan; AND THE HUNTER HOME, by Joan Charles, who writes of the neuroses of two returned soldiers; and HER HUSBAND'S HOUSE, by Katherine Pomeroy Stewart, a novel of international marriage—an American woman wed to an Italian nobleman, with the complications of Fascism and war to face. . . . While GREAT AMERICAN SHORT NOVELS, edited by William Phillips, a collection of eight outstanding novelettes, is an excellent book to have beside the bed.

• • •

It's not only the new books that people are talking about. There's the comeback of Anthony Trollope, for instance. That's really literary news. He died in 1882, after writing some forty-one novels, and promptly his novels died too. For over fifty years Trollope was nu more than a name in ■ Nineteenth-Century English Lit. course. During the years there were occasional stirrings. Someone prowling on dusty shelves would rediscover him. In 1940 ■ publishing house in New York brought out THE AMERICAN SENATOR. But the public remained indifferent. Then came the war, and with the war Trollope suddenly materialized out of the literary ether, and after half a century became again ■ best seller. Reprints of his novels came out in cheap editions: BARCHESTER TOWERS is now out with full handsome illustrations: IS HE POPENJOY?—one of his less known works—was completely sold out on publication, and the libraries and bookstores from Boston to San Francisco have been unable to satisfy the demand.

Trollope was one of those writers who do not take themselves seriously. If there are any such in these days, we'd be interested to hear. Nowadays writers are writers. They autograph their books, they go on exhibition at fairs and bookstores, they get part rent and household expenses tax-free, they crouch over their typewriters, and when at large go about town getting copy out of their friends' domestic situations and out of their own importunities. Not so Mr. Trollope. He never claimed to write for posterity. He wrote for the day, the moment. But that is the kind of writer, as Henry James said, whom "posterity is apt to put into its pocket." Authorship with Trollope was only a means to an end.

He was a post-office clerk, and liked it. When the post office sent him to Ireland and he had to make his inspections on horseback, he discovered fox hunting. And he liked fox hunting even more than post-office clerking. But it required money. So, to eke out the extra pounds, he tried his hand at writing novels on the side. He used to get up at five-thirty in the morning and write until breakfast, two hundred and fifty words to every fifteen minutes. In odd moments, then, and in fifteen-minute lots, during the course of thirty years, he wrote his forty-one novels and amassed a fortune of seventy thousand pounds—just about enough to cover his fox-hunting bills. And he did not stop his post-office work. As positions became better, he took to traveling on a train instead of a horse, and had extra time for writing—on a portable desk with lamp attached.

Trollope claimed with ■ certain amount of pride that he wrote more words than any other man of his time. And it was the time, you'll remember, of Dickens and Thackeray and George Eliot, none of them what you'd call terse themselves. Likewise, Trollope's mother wrote (some one hundred and fourteen volumes), and his brother Tom—neither of whom considered Anthony a writing man at all. (Among them the Trollopes got out more books than any other family in history.)

What Anthony wrote about was the solid Victorian life around him, peers and squires and shopkeepers and beautiful moral young women—normal, average, secure people, living in the most completely self-confident period of the whole world's history. Which is beyond a doubt what makes him so popular now. Where the Victorians had to read melodrama for excitement, we read Barchester Towers to get back a little of that wonderful old feeling of safety—remember?

*Historical novels, that always used to be th last word in so-called respectable reading, a now branching out into the adventures of th heroine, rather than confining themselves t the swashbuckling hero, with the effect of a enormous rise in sales. Scarlett O'Hara prob ably started the run of self-willed devil-may care wenches. Amber went a whole lot farthe The Black Rose herself, veiled though sh should have been, found her way across a con tinent as no Trollope girl would have done And Honor Harris, in Daphne du Maurier's THE KING'S GENERAL, is no be ter than she should be, scandalizing the aristo crats of Cornwall with her carryings on.

But MY LADY OF CLEVES, an outstanding new historical novel, has returned to the old-fashioned good heroine. Just t look at the fine honest face of Anne o Cleves as Holbein painted her makes yo feel good—the unsophisticated twenty-four year-old girl from the little Duchy of Cleves that Henry VIII thought maybe he'd b willing to marry. But that was befor he saw her. When they met face to face Henry couldn't take it. "No better than Flanders mare," groaned the old rou monarch, so de pendent on th fripperies and side long glances o ladies in waitin as to be inured t dignity. But h lived to see his er ror. And the funn thing was tha Anne lived too— in a court wher heads were neve safe, particularl wives' heads.

Holbein's "Anne of Cleves"

The author o My Lady o Cleves is Mar garet Campbell Barnes, an intrepi Englishwoman. All through the war sh was writing—and against what misery and anguish! An earlier book, THE PAS SIONATE BROOD, about the period of th Crusades, she had dedicated to "my elde son Michael, who has gone crusading i

(Continued on Page 120)

EXCITING LENTEN DINNER!

*Extra-tasty fish feast for 6... only $2.31

MENU

Chilled Prunes and Pears
Delicious Fish Casserole‡
Green Beans Baked Potatoes
Red Beet Egg Salad Spread
Bread Lemon Meringue Pie
Coffee, Tea or Milk

‡DELICIOUS FISH CASSEROLE

1 pound fish, cooked and flaked
½ cup chopped green pepper
¼ cup chopped onion
1 cup finely cut celery
1 teaspoon salt
½ teaspoon Worcestershire sauce
1 cup salad dressing
2 cups cornflakes, crushed
2 tablespoons butter, melted
Paprika

Combine all ingredients except cornflakes and butter. Place in casserole. Top with buttered cornflakes. Sprinkle with paprika. Bake in moderate oven, 375° F., for 30 minutes. 6 servings.

NOTE: Fish for casserole: Halibut, Haddock, Mackerel and Cod. Cost of menu is estimated on price of whole dressed halibut. Fillets or steaks also may be used, and menu price will change commensurate with cost and type of fish used.

A&P TESTED

Menu and recipe tested and priced by the A&P Kitchen

FOR GOOD EATING AT MODEST COST . . . TURN TO A&P!

NOR a Lenten menu with a touch of genius, serve this savory fish dinner, complete th a tempting appetizer, delicious vegeles, and a luscious dessert. It's sure to isfy man-sized appetites. And it will please ur purse, too . . . for it costs less than 39c portion!

You can serve economical, praise-winning als like this when you do a little planning l regular shopping at your A&P Super arket. You see, because A&P sells so much d . . . and is content with small profit on h transaction . . . it can afford to give you lly big values!

Get acquainted with A&P's hundreds of tstanding offerings today! Learn why wise memakers say . . . "For good eating at odest cost . . . it pays to turn to A&P!"

A&P

A&P SUPER MARKETS

Cost based on prices in A&P Super Markets at time of going to press.

(Continued from Page 118)

modern armour." He was a tank officer of the Royal Armoured Corps, and he was burned to ashes in his tank getting the 51st Highland Division through to avenge St. Valery in the Battle of Normandy. My Lady of Cleves was half written when the telegram came. The younger son was in the navy—in Scapa Flow, the Arctic, Spitsbergen, Norway. And Mrs. Barnes herself was an ambulance driver. She had met the wounded from Dunkirk. She drove at night in blackouts packing a gas mask, around bomb holes, through shrapnel. They were just the things that Anne of Cleves would probably have done had she been living through the holocaust. For Anne became more Tudor than the Tudors, more English than the English, in her devotion to their country.

• • •

And speaking of GONE WITH THE WIND, as we were indirectly, we're reminded of Dr. Arturo Castiglione. He is the Italian doctor who wrote the definitive history of medicine, and whose current book, THE ADVENTURES OF THE MIND, is a scholarly work on the mental and psychic contagions and epidemics which he believes to be quite as prevalent and acute as the physical ones. When he first came to this country (he is now on the Yale Medical School faculty) he heard about the fabulous sales of Gone With the Wind. When he was told that Margaret Mitchell had made over a million dollars on that one book, he was dumfounded. "That," said Doctor Castiglione when he got his breath, "is more than all Italian authors put together have made from all their works, from Dante on!"

• • •

The publishers of Bruce Marshall's engaging novel,* THE WORLD, THE FLESH, AND FATHER SMITH, *are constantly having title troubles on incoming orders. One person wrote in for The Fleshy Father Smith, another for Heaven, Hell and Father Brown, and still another for Life, Laughter and Father Smith.

• • •

Spy stories are on the up and up, publishers tell us. One house has started what it calls the "European Espionage Novel Series," the first four volumes containing such gems as ROGUE MALE, by Geoffrey Household; ESCAPE, by Ethel Vance; NO SURRENDER, by Martha Albrand; and ABOVE SUSPICION, by Helen MacInnes. (Such a series ought to include sometime the two great Manning Coles stories, DRINK TO YESTERDAY and TOAST TO TOMORROW, and the dark shadowy reaches of Eric Ambler—especially A COFFIN FOR DIMITRIOS and JOURNEY INTO FEAR.) Another publisher has started a series of yearly collections of crime, mystery and detective stories culled from the pulps, the first collection called RUE MORGUE, 1945, edited by Louis Greenfield and Rex Stout, creator of Nero Wolfe—who certainly ought to know how to pick them. Though why we need detective stories these days, it's hard to say, what with the stories of real crime that fill the papers.

Apparently crime waves follow always upon the heels of war. Way back someone came out in print about "the state of morals, so much depressed by the American Revolution." Then, after the War of 1812, the New York State prison was overflowing with convicts. "The present number is 722," the Recorder wrote, "though the prison was calculated for 500." The same complaints and statistics followed the Civil, Spanish-American and the First World wars. Now crime seems to have spread over the world. Even in a country so thoroughly policed as we always assumed Soviet Russia to be, we hear that a Cossack division had to be sent to Moscow to stem the rising tide of juvenile delinquency. And in good old law-abiding England there is great concern. London reports for last summer 500 cases of beatings and robberies with violence (where our gangsters shoot, the cockney equivalent apparently pounds up his victim). But on the whole we needn't worry too much abo England's law enforcement. Not when hear of a fish-and-chips dealer who was fused a license because he fled the country the 1940 blitz!

• • •

Now that the boys are pretty well hor and most of us are at last recognizing t fact that they aren't the same boys w went away three or four years ago—not when we could do with some war bool It's hard to get the boys to talk, much they probably really want to, but ther no question that it's terribly important t us to know something about what they been going through. There are half-dozen short novels that give remarkal graphic pictures of what went on. A WA IN THE SUN, by Harry Brown, one: a thin little book about a squad boys landed in Italy that is as sharp the whirr of a bullet past your ear, a full of good soldier wisecracking. . . THE PERSIAN GULF COMMAND, by *Je

Book jacket from "The Persian Gulf Command"

Sayre,* shouldn't be missed: a thorough exciting hour's reading, like something another planet—a hot planet, we mig add. . . . BEACHHEAD ON THE WIND, Carl Jonas, is not nearly well enou known: also a short novel, about a lan ing in the Aleutians, as cold as the Persi Gulf was hot. . . . Then there's STRONG THAN FEAR, the little novel by Richa Tregaskis, about street fighting in German city. . . . And AMERICAN GUE RILLA IN THE PHILIPPINES, by I Wolfert, for those of us whose boys w down in the South Pacific. . . . It's n only important for us to know what they been through, but it goes without sayi that the boys themselves will fall on th books—just as they will buttonhole eve buddy who has shared the agony and t comradeship with them.

• • •

Some time back the Sunday papers w filled with lists made out by well-kno writers of their three favorite books. No we observed chose his own. But apart fr that discrepancy, the choices probal gave a pretty good line on each one's tas It was like that old game: each pers writes, in parallel columns, what he lik most and what he dislikes most, in each a set of categories—his favorite book a his unfavorite book, actor, dessert, style architecture, smell, color, animal, and on and on. The lists are collected, choices read anonymously, and everyo guesses the identity of the author.

And if the literary-minded see fit to lo down their noses at games, let them r member the great Turgenev playing ch rades. That was in the years when he w living in France and was hopelessly in lo with Paulina Garcia. Probably becau Paulina was an actress, she loved charad and a common sight at her parties was t big white-haired shaggy-bearded Russi down on the floor trying to be one of t boys.

Chopin, also, according to Franc Winwar,* in her book about George Sand THE LIFE OF THE HEART—*Chopi after hours of brilliant composing, would come out into the family living room dressed up like a governess or a jester or what not. He, too, was trying to keep alive the spark. But like poor old Turgenev, he got nowhere. Mme. Sand's big eyes were already beginning to stray.

George Sand

DEAR MRS. JOSEPH COTTEN:

We think you're lucky . . . to be so lovely yourself . . . and to be married to such a distinguished star of the screen.

Yours,
TANGEE

Mrs. Joseph Cotten says:

"At last I've found it— the perfect cake make-up!"

Scores of cake make-ups came to Hollywood ahead of Tangee Petal-Finish Cake Make-Up. Some were fine in one way...some in another. Then Constance Luft Huhn's newest creation arrived and took the motion picture colony by storm because it's ideal in every way. You'll find that Tangee Petal-Finish Cake Make-Up is so very easy to apply...stays on for so many extra hours...is designed to be oh-so-kind to your skin! And you don't look—or feel—as if you were wearing a mask.

* * *

The thrill of Satin-Finish!

Yes, it is a thrill to find a lipstick that does not run or smear...that means lips not too dry, not too moist...that stays on for extra hours. And that's what Constance Luft Huhn has done for your "lip-appeal" ...by creating the Tangee Satin-Finish Lipstick. Today's smartest colors are Tangee Gay-Red, Red-Red and Medium-Red.

CONSTANCE LUFT HUHN, Head of the House of Tangee and one of America's foremost authorities on beauty and make-up. Among Mrs. Huhn's most recent triumphs are the famous Tangee Satin-Finish Lipstick, and the new Tangee Petal-Finish Cake Make-Up.

Use Tangee and see how beautiful you can be

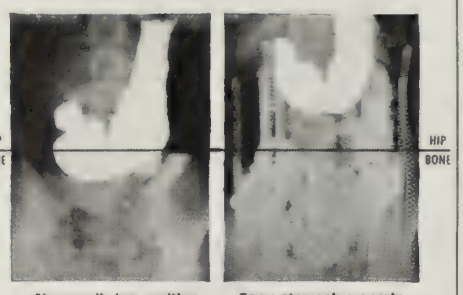
I've got the biggest, loudest welcome mat in town!



1 I guess I've been "funny" about people who called at my house on business. But from now on I'm putting out a big WELCOME mat for one business woman anytime she wants to call! Why? Because this woman is in business for herself, just like any storekeeper except she doesn't have a store. She brings her service to your house instead. And she brought me more than service. She brought me a new feeling of being young and alive again—

PRESS DOWN

LIFT UP

2 You've probably guessed it, she's the Spirella Corsetiere. And the first thing she showed me was the famous Spirella Press and Lift Test. I pressed down on my stomach. Ouch! It felt like the ordinary corset. Then I lifted up. Right away I felt better and less tired.

3 "That's the way a Spirella makes you feel," she said. "And here are some new doctor approved X-Ray pictures that prove Spirella supports you naturally inside as well as out, while other garments simply squeeze you in."

Abnormally low position of stomach (Ptosis)

Same stomach properly raised with Spirella

4 Then she adjusted the patented Spirella Modeling Garment on me to get accurate measurements for my new Spirella. And when she delivered my new Spirella it fitted perfectly. Now I feel and look years younger. Even my husband has noticed—and that's saying something! So you see now why I've got my welcome mat out for the Spirella Corsetiere. Invite her in when she calls at your house and you'll feel the way I do about this business woman who helps you to be young and alive again!

P. S. If we can help by giving you the name of your local Spirella Retailer, write Dept. J-26.

KEEP FIT AND LOOK TRIM WITH
Spirella
INDIVIDUALLY-DESIGNED FIGURE SUPPORT

In the U. S.
THE SPIRELLA CO., INC.
NIAGARA FALLS, N. Y.

In Canada
THE SPIRELLA CO., LTD.
NIAGARA FALLS, ONT.

YOU'RE MORE IMPORTANT THAN YOU THINK

(Continued from Page 45)

A world organized for peace, free from the vile curse of racial prejudice, free from the arrogance of master races and imperialistic nations, free from the fear of war, and moving out toward a day of co-operation for the good of all—such ideas have started, they are on the way, and they are mankind's hope. To say simply that their realization depends on a united world organization will not do. Of course it depends on that! But that, in turn, depends on enough people, ordinary, average folk, who tirelessly, undiscourageably believe in those ideas and stand for them.

We say that the ancient Greeks condemned Socrates to death, but it was not so simple as that. On the jury that condemned Socrates were 500 men; 280 of them voted for his death, 220 for his acquittal. There, in the small, is a true parable of history's public crises. If only a few individuals had changed their minds, what crimes could have been avoided and what gains made! So one of the least sentimental of writers on social questions, Albert Edward Wiggam, put it: "If hope and courage go out of the lives of common men it is all up with social and political civilization."

Never tell a young person that something cannot be done. God may have been waiting for centuries for somebody ignorant enough of the impossible to do that thing.

—DR. J. A. HOLMES: Wisdom in Small Doses. (University Pub. Co.)

The intimate, private reasons for lost morale are so shattering that anyone, pleading for sustained faith and courage, must think of some people, standing in whose shoes he would find faith and courage desperately difficult. Many have lost in the war everything that made life most dear to them.

Nevertheless, that very fact can issue, not in cynicism but in resolution. If infantile paralysis kills my child, all the more I should count infantile paralysis a public enemy, and with aroused faith and determination should back efforts to prevent it, for the sake of other children.

THAT kind of personal response to tragedy is one of the most hopeful factors in our time—men and women, namely, seeing with open eyes and feeling, it may be, with broken hearts the intolerable horror of war, aroused to such strength of resolution and morale as they never experienced before.

We had better make such response. That atomic bomb haunts us all. Henceforth this is what war means—the indiscriminate massacre of entire civilian populations. The idea that atomic energy can now be made illegitimate in war is a lame reliance. Humanitarians have habitually protested against every new agency of destruction used in war, as Luther protested against gunpowder, calling firearms that used it "cruel and damnable machines . . . the direct suggestion of the devil," and as British philanthropists wanted the automatic machine gun used by Kitchener against the Mad Mullah in the Sudan, outlawed because it was so terrible. War, however, always has gone grimly on, employing any destructive agency available to defeat an enemy; and that Mars, now having atomic energy at his disposal, will use it is a foregone conclusion.

Once wars were fought by champions, as the ancient hosts of Israel and the Philistines sat on the side lines and watched David and Goliath fight it out. Then, entering a new phase, wars were fought by professional mercenaries; the very word "soldier" comes from the Latin solidus, meaning a coin. Then, as centuries passed, citizen armies

Mother's lips and father's too need CHAP STICK when weather makes lips rough and chapped. It's the specially medicated lip balm that soothes and comforts quickly, lastingly. So handy—so easy to apply. Try CHAP STICK today—your lips will thank you.

T. M. Reg. U. S. Pat. Off.

On sale at drug counters 25c no Federal tax

KEEPS LIPS FIT

IT'S EFFECTIVE yet gentle
Nujol
MINERAL OIL
The easy-action laxative for ordinary constipation

Copr. 1945, Stanco, Incorporated

EXTRA MONEY QUICK
SELL $1 NAME IMPRINTED STATIONERY
FREE SAMPLES
Up to 100% profit taking easy orders from friends, fellow workers, others. Send for free samples of our new fast selling $1.00 line of Personal Stationery. Everybody uses. Also large line of popular Everyday greeting card assortments 35c up. Special feature 14 card $1.00 All Occasion assortment. Extra Bonus.
ODD GREETING CARDS 2½c UP
New England Art Publishers, North Abington, Mass.

rose; war reached its hands deep into a nation's homes and gathered up, first by volunteering and then by drafting, the nation's youth for battle.

And now total war has come, from which no one is exempt, and, implemented with air power and atomic energy, it means the obliteration of entire civilian populations.

The situation is appalling. Not idealism alone now motivates our desire to end war, but, as well, all the elemental motives of self-preservation. General Douglas MacArthur, in his speech at the Japanese surrender, said it:

"We have had our last chance. If we do not now devise some greater and more equitable system, Armageddon will be at our door."

In this, the most critical era in history, one decisive factor is the kind of personal response that millions of individuals around the world will make.

If enough of them collapse into cynical disillusionment, then the game is up. If enough are aroused to creative faith in decent possibilities and determined resolution to achieve them, then this may turn out to be one of mankind's greatest centuries.

In its essential nature ours is an old situation, reproduced age after age in mankind's story—the cynics and the great believers, two diverse groups, each appealing to individuals for their personal allegiance, with the fate of the future in the balance. In the eighteenth century Edmund Burke called slavery a fearful but incurable evil and thought there was no hope that the slave trade could ever be wiped out. Over against him, however, and his fellow disbelievers, stood another group, the great believers—Wilberforce, for instance, with his faith that the slave trade could be, and his determination that it should be, wiped out—and in that case the great believers won. On his deathbed they brought Wilberforce assurance that by act of Parliament the slave trade would be wiped out, as it was a month afterward. If ever in history that kind of event needed to be reduplicated, it is now.

Today, once more, the cynics and the men of faith and courage are appealing to the individual for his response. Which party shall we join?

THIS SIDE OF INNOCENCE

(Continued from Page 49)

Amalie and her daughter were returning to America after a few months in Europe. They had attended the Jubilee of Queen Victoria.

"I want Mary to acquire a feeling of stability, of the firm integration of history," said Jerome. "She is seventeen now, and has a mind. When she returns, she wishes to go to Cornell University. I hardly thought I'd live to see the day of coeducation in America!"

"Mary has a great soul," Philip answered. He looked away. "I only hope she will marry as good a man."

"Oh, I have plans for her." Jerome's expression was bright with pride and love. "But there's my boy too. He's to go to Groton soon. Will has the makings of a rousing businessman."

Philip departed for his father's bank. Alfred, as usual, appeared happy to see his son.

Philip told him, "I've been talking with Jerome of what we discussed last night, father. I think he will endow a few scholarships. With yours and mine, the thing ought to be impressive."

"You didn't mention my name, I hope?" Alfred asked.

"No," lied Philip.

Alfred said, "I haven't hated Jerome for years. Of course we could never be friends. We couldn't even be speaking acquaintances. I have never forgotten Amalie. I haven't forgotten Jerome's blackguardly way of managing the situation. But I don't blame

Be kind to your stomach when it is queasy, uneasy and upset. Take soothing PEPTO-BISMOL!

This pleasant-tasting preparation is neither antacid nor laxative. It spreads a soothing, protective coating on irritated stomach and intestinal walls, thus helping to calm and quiet common digestive upsets. Get a bottle from your druggist today. If you do not get prompt relief, consult your physician.

Pepto-Bismol

A NORWICH PRODUCT — Norwich

Now you can obtain Mifflin in 4 delightful fragrances... Lilac, Lavender, Pine and Wintergreen, as well as Unscented. Keep Mifflin handy always as an invigorating rubdown, for sterilizing sickroom instruments, for cleansing cuts and bruises, and many other uses.

For your own protection don't just ask for "alcohol"
INSIST ON GENUINE—

MIFFLIN
ISOPROPYL ALCOHOL
★ The National Rubdown!

EXTRA MONEY QUICK
FREE CORRESPONDENCE NOTES SAMPLES

SHOW ALL OCCASION BIRTHDAY ASSORTMENTS
UP TO 100% PROFIT
You just take easy orders from friends, fellow workers. 10 big money making assortments. Sell for $1.00 each—cost you 50c up. Extra bonus. Experience unnecessary. Special Offer. Write for leading $1 All Occasion on approval and free correspondence notes samples.
REQUEST $1 GREETING CARD BOX ON APPROVAL

HARRY DOEHLA CO., Dept. L-8, FITCHBURG, MASS.

Going Places with TUSSY | New York's El Morocco

Entering in Ermine: Um...um... He likes the way I look... it's no secret...Tussy is responsible for my grand entrance.

Striped Frock: Talk about a "detracting influence"...almost midnight and she's still radiant...bet she uses Tussy Safari Powder Base Cream!

Her Highness in Hair Band: Don't look now... but I'm holding my own, thanks to dreamy-light Tussy Rosy Rachel Safari Face Powder.

● A lovely evening was had by all! You can feel confident and charming in Tussy Safari Powder Base Cream, a tinted foundation that helps make-up look fresh and "even" for hours... $1 a jar, plus tax. Be sure to fill your compact with petal-soft Tussy Safari Face Powder. Choice of lovely shades, beautifully blended to match your skin. $1 each, plus tax.

Copyright, 1946, by Lehn & Fink Products Corporation, Bloomfield, N. J.

Tussy

Tussy Cosmetiques, 683 Fifth Ave., New York 22, N. Y.

FOR THAT YOUNG, YOUNG LOOK

Campana Balm

● Incomparables – Tina Leser's clever use of line and color...the miracle of Campana Balm's skin softening effectiveness. Campana Balm is different from all other lotions. Fast acting. Rough, chapped hands respond overnight—become whiter, thrillingly softer. Because Campana Balm really works – before or after household tasks, exposure to wind, water, weather. Always use Original Campana Balm, 10¢ to $1.00.

CAMPANA IS DIFFERENT

CANADIAN BORN: It had to be better at 20 below.

THRIFTY, TOO: Deep, rich, emollient – one drop covers both hands.

either of them now." He added, "I have a feeling that one of these days Jerome and I will meet, and—things—will be cleared up."

"Yes," said Philip, "I think they will."

Alfred went on almost mournfully, "You know, Philip, it seems vindictive of Jerome that he never allowed Mary to visit us again. I quite loved the child, and Dorothea did too."

"But you met her often in the road, quite accidentally," Philip reminded his father with a smile. "And at the homes of discreet and mutual friends. Mary can be quite subtle."

"I never thought that quite honorable," said Alfred uneasily. "If her father forbade it, perhaps she should have obeyed not only the letter of the law, but its spirit."

"Mary has a lot of sense, and she is a creature of reason," replied Philip. He told his father of Mary's impending return. "I had a letter from her this morning," he went on. "And a photograph."

He took an envelope from his pocket, and Alfred seized the photograph eagerly. He saw that fine and delicately carved face, haughty in its youth and beauty, the wide fringed eyes full of spiritual light and resolution. The pale hair was coiled in a thick, glistening chignon on the nape of her neck.

"What a lovely chin, so high and valorous," said Alfred. "Her nose is exactly like Uncle William's. She has his look too. What a sweet child."

"She is seventeen," said Philip. "Not a child. Not even in years, and certainly not in character."

Alfred put on his spectacles to read the inscription on the photograph which was written, in the sharpest, smallest script: "To my darling Philip with all my love, Mary."

"How touching. She is much attached to you, Philip."

Philip took the photograph. "And I love Mary too."

There had been a rain and the soft evening was all lilac and silver. Mary and Philip had gone for a stroll after the dinner hour. They walked down the road from Hilltop, reached a stretch of fragrant pines and spruce. Overhead the sky had deepened to a soft heliotrope, wide and calm. The moon was a white face in the sky, as she slowly climbed through tinted mists.

THE pine woods were very quiet as Philip and Mary walked, hand in hand. Her head was above his, and lifted with that prideful grace which he loved so much. There was such a tranquillity about the girl, such an integrity! They reached a small clearing in the little woods. There stood their favorite flat stone. They sat on it, still hand in hand, and did not speak for a time.

Then Mary said softly, "In February I shall be eighteen." She tossed her head, as if her silvery mane still lay upon her shoulders instead of being coiled in its shimmering knot on her neck.

"Yes. I know, my dear."

"I have decided not to go to Cornell, Philip. I thought I would, at first, and papa was pleased. But I want something else now."

Philip was silent. He lifted Mary's hand and smoothed each finger separately. She watched his bent head. Her lip trembled.

"You'll never ask me, Philip," she said, and her voice was low. "I don't know why. But I'll have to ask you, it seems. Will you marry me, Philip?"

He looked up, too moved for speech. Then, very simply, he said, "Mary, look at me."

She obeyed slowly and acutely. She did not answer, but only smiled, as if he had said something very foolish.

"Well, what did you see?" he asked.

"I see you."

Philip sighed.

"I think," she added, "that you are being stupid, Philip. You wanted me to see your back, didn't you? You wanted me to see the way your neck is set deep in your shoulders. Yes, I saw all this. But I see your face too. I see all of you. I didn't think you were so silly, Philip."

"I am nearly fifteen years older than you."

"What are fifteen years? I'm not a child. I don't think I ever was. And I don't like young people."

His heart was beating with great pain. He put aside her hand gently. "Mary, I want you. I think I always did. If I can't have you, I won't have any other woman. But you are very young. How can I know that when you are twenty, twenty-five, thirty, you won't want someone else?"

She looked at him with clear openness. "You are thinking of mamma and papa, and Uncle Alfred, aren't you? Philip, I know a lot of things now. I know that mamma married your father because he had what she wanted. I know all about her life. She told me everything when we were in Europe together. I know that I was born scarcely six months after she married papa. Mamma and I have grown very close. We never were, you know, until I was almost fourteen. Then we understood each other. Mamma held back nothing. When we were in Europe, I told her I was going to marry you. She was glad. She said she had begun to hope it. She loves you. She thinks that you and I are very much alike, and that we'll be happy. All my life," said the girl, with touching simplicity, "since I have known you, I have loved you, Philip. Mamma understood, and that is why she took me to Europe. She wanted me to see what there was to be seen of men. It was as if I had an—an armor over my heart. I thought of nothing but you."

She waited. His dark eyes were fixed on her face, amazed, not daring to believe.

"You'll have to trust me, Philip." She held out her hands and he took them. But still he looked at her almost fearfully.

"How can I take you, Mary? You are so young, so beautiful. It would be wrong."

"Oh, why!" she cried impatiently. "You are insulting me, Philip. Philip, my darling! Look at me, really look at me!" She laughed. "Are you going to marry me, dearest?"

She waited. He had become flushed and breathless as he stared at her. Then, sighing impatiently, and with indulgence, she put her young soft arms about his neck, bent her head and kissed him full on the lips. It was not for several minutes that he held her to him. It was as if he had waited for surety, for conviction.

(Continued on Page 126)

Second Love

BY MARJORIE LEDERER

Nothing as bright as daylight can be hidden
Back in the shaded cell that memory bars;
And night will come as always—wild, unbidden,
Filling your open hands with wanton stars;
And April is April as in every season,
Budded and young and prideful of her voice,
Singing her trembling odes for the sole reason
That you alone may hear them and rejoice.
There is no road but that awaits your turning,
Winding its leafy way with special grace;
Nowhere a hill that will not soon be learning
To match the height of wonder in your face.
No, nothing of love shall be withheld from you—
Save for the fact that none of it is new.

What is your EYE Q?

MONEY by the trainload couldn't buy your eyes from you. You know they're priceless. But what else do you know about them? You'll be far above average if you can answer the questions below. For despite the preciousness of our eyes, most people know alarmingly little about them or their care. Let's see how you do on the questions:

1 Do your eyes help you walk?

Just close them, and see how few steps you dare take! Eyes control 80% of all our motions, influence 83% of all our learning.

2 How many people have normal vision . . . 80%, 60%, 30%?

The lowest figure—30%—is correct. Seventy people out of a hundred are handicapped by faulty vision.

3 What is an Ophthalmologist?—An Optometrist?—An Ophthalmic Dispenser?

An Ophthalmologist is a medically-trained professional specialist who diagnoses and prescribes for eye and visual troubles, and performs surgery if necessary.

An Optometrist is an ophthalmically trained professional specialist who diagnoses and prescribes for visual troubles and who renders a complete service when glasses are necessary.

An Ophthalmic Dispenser (Optician) is a professional specialist trained to interpret prescriptions and to fashion, fit, and adjust glasses; and in conjunction with the Ophthalmologist to render a complete eye care service.

4 How fast do your eyes change?

Age, use and abuse change seeing power constantly. At age twenty, 23% of all eyes are faulty; at thirty, 39%; at forty, 48%; at fifty, 71%; and at sixty, 82%.

That's why it's wise to look to your eyes regularly. For your only pair of eyes must last your lifetime, and their need for care increases every day you live. See that they benefit from the best scientific services, skills, and training of competent experts.

5 When were YOUR eyes last examined?

BETTER VISION INSTITUTE, INC.
630 FIFTH AVENUE, NEW YORK 20, N. Y.

BETTER VISION FOR BETTER LIVING

Goodbye Dandruff

You'll be Delighted with the rich, creamy lather of Fitch's Dandruff Remover Shampoo . . . but you'll be even more pleased when you see how COMPLETELY Fitch Shampoo removes dandruff with the first application. In fact, Fitch Shampoo is the only shampoo made whose guarantee to remove dandruff the first time you use it is backed by one of the world's largest insurance firms.

RESULTS ARE DIFFERENT—BECAUSE FITCH SHAMPOO IS DIFFERENT

Even the method of application is different . . . Fitch Shampoo is applied directly to the DRY hair and scalp. The antiseptic qualities of Fitch penetrate and cleanse the thousands of tiny hair openings. Then when even the hardest water is added, Fitch Shampoo forms an abundant, creamy lather that carries away all dirt, dandruff and perspiration. No acid after-rinse is needed. Fitch Shampoo leaves all colors and textures of hair soft . . . lustrous . . . radiantly clean. It reconditions as it cleanses.

Fitch Shampoo is the largest selling shampoo in the United States and Canada. It's economical too! Use Fitch Shampoo regularly each week.

THE TRUTH ABOUT SOAP SHAMPOOS

This photograph shows germs and dandruff scattered, but not removed, by ordinary soap shampoo.

Soap Shampoo

All germs, dandruff and other foreign matter completely destroyed and removed by Fitch Shampoo.

Fitch Shampoo

After and between Fitch shampoos you can keep your hair shining and manageable by using a few drops of Fitch's Ideal Hair Tonic every day.

Fitch's Dandruff Remover Shampoo

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

THE F. W. FITCH COMPANY, Des Moines 6, Iowa • Bayonne, N. J. • Los Angeles 21, Calif. • Toronto 2, Canada

There's Art to the FIT of

Artemis*

The Figure-Perfect slip that's

THREE-WAY CUT

At leading stores everywhere
WEIL-KALTER MFG. CO. St. Louis
*Reg. U. S. Pat. Off. Pat. No. 2327662

WE PAY YOU $25
FOR SELLING FIFTY $1 ASSORTMENTS of Birthday, All-Occasion cards. Tremendous demand. Sell for $1.00—your profit 50¢. It costs nothing to try. Write today.
Cheerful Card Co., Dept. H-3, White Plains, N.Y.
WRITE FOR SAMPLES

PEACH APPLE TREES LOW AS 20¢
Pears, plums, cherries, nuts, berries, etc. Grapes 10¢. Evergreens, shrubs, shade trees low as 25¢. Catalog Free.
TENN. NURSERY CO., Box 16 CLEVELAND, TENN.

(Continued from Page 126)

no preliminary warning, except that Dorothea, who rarely complained, remarked to Alfred, the day before she died, that she was extraordinarily tired. It had been the holidays, she had said, as if in apology. Besides, she was not as young as she had been, and when a woman has lived fifty-four years she can be pardoned for feeling her age.

Alfred repeated after her, "Fifty-four years!" He was slightly older than Dorothea, and had not thought of time in relation to himself. He had been somewhat shocked and sobered.

He slept fitfully that night. When he awoke in the morning he was very tired. Feeling his age! He and Philip went down to breakfast and were informed by a maid that Miss Dorothea was not feeling well, and that she had requested a tray in her room.

Alfred and Philip prepared to leave for the bank. The sleigh was waiting, heaped with its furry robes. Alfred suddenly discovered that he had left his dispatch case on the hall table. Philip was already in the sleigh. Alfred's first impulse was to send the coachman for his case. Then he turned and went back himself.

The bleak hall was only duskily lighted by the radiance outside. Alfred's case was on the stiff oaken chair near the door. He lifted it. Then a strange thing happened. He felt that someone was with him in the hall.

He stood and listened. He heard nothing but the mysteriously accelerated beat of his heart. It sounded like a quickening drum. An odd tremor passed over Alfred's flesh. He looked about him searchingly. He felt the closeness of some unseen personality. Alfred involuntarily stepped back toward the door, his hand clutching his case. Then he could not move. Some other sense held him waiting, listening, feeling with an intensity he had never experienced before.

He said, aloud, "Uncle William!" He was no longer afraid. He was almost happy, almost excited. He exclaimed, "Uncle William! What is it?"

Was that a sigh, a murmur he had heard? He strained his ears. The personality was retreating from him. Alfred moved, too, as if hypnotized. Suddenly the personality had gone. Alfred reached the stairway, peered up into its dim height. Then something impelled him to race up the stairs.

A maid, her arms filled with sheets, turned and stared at Alfred with astonishment.

"Miss Dorothea!" he exclaimed. "How is Miss Dorothea?"

The girl, taken aback, stammered, "Miss Dorothea? I took away her tray just a while ago, sir. She was sleeping. She hadn't touched her breakfast."

Alfred opened the door of Dorothea's bedroom. Dorothea lay upon her pillows, very still, her eyes closed. There was no sound of her breathing.

ALFRED stood beside the bed and looked down upon her. A long time passed. He could feel nothing but numbness and quietness. At last he became aware that Philip was beside him, his hand on his arm, speaking softly. Alfred turned.

"Uncle William was here," he said. "He came for Dorothea."

"You are surely going to the funeral, Jerome?" said Amalie.

"No, I am not. Why should I?"

Amalie glanced at Mary, who sat at her mother's right at the breakfast table. But the girl was looking steadily at her father. She was quite pale, and her crimson wool frock enhanced that paleness.

"Aunt Dorothea was your sister, papa," she murmured.

Jerome, unperturbed, drank his coffee. But Amalie knew he was angry. He put down his cup. "Look here," he said roughly. "Let's not be sentimental. I haven't seen 'Aunt Dorothea' for over eighteen years. I don't care to see her now that she is dead. I'm no sanctimonious fool. Moreover, I want no member of my family going down there either."

Mary said quietly, "She is Philip's aunt, by adoption. We owe something to Philip. He was very fond of her."

Jerome struck his thin brown hand on the table. "Philip's fondness has nothing to do with us. He isn't a fool. He understands. Let that end it." He stood up. "I want to hear no more of this, do you understand?"

MARY rose silently and went out of the room. Jerome watched her go. Then he swung upon Amalie savagely.

"So you've finally succeeded in turning my daughter against me, haven't you? You've misrepresented me to her for years, done all you could to separate us. I presume you are happy at last."

Amalie stood up also, and leaned against the table. "How can you say that, Jerome? How can you be so cruel?"

But Jerome was enraged. "You deny it? You deny that you have poisoned my daughter's mind against me? I've seen it for years."

Amalie was paler, but she said steadily, "Your father would want you to go to your sister's funeral."

"Don't talk like a fool!"

Amalie drew in a deep breath. "There is another thing. You can offend a community's morals and be forgiven. But you can't offend its etiquette, its good manners."

"'Morals!'" ejaculated Jerome viciously. "You are an excellent one to talk of morals. If you had the slightest moral sense, you would not have gone behind my back and turned my daughter against me."

"You are wrong," said Amalie. She was trembling. "I did not turn Mary against you. If she is not what she was to you, that is your own fault, not mine."

She was stupefied, incredulous. Was this Jerome, her husband, the man she loved? Was this actually hatred which she saw in his eyes—a leaping and merciless hatred? How had she not known that he was cruel? Surely she had known! But she had crushed down the knowledge. She could keep it down no longer.

Her voice was steadier now. "You are a cruel man, Jerome. I don't think I ever acknowledged it before, even to myself. I can forgive everything but cruelty. Anything."

"So I am cruel, am I?" said Jerome in a pent voice. "So that is what you have been telling Mary all these years?"

Amalie could not speak. There was a pain in her breast that was almost past enduring. There was a sickness in her throat. She thought, How naive I am. How little I have ever known about the deviousness of any human soul! I don't know anything.

"No doubt," Jerome went on, "you are thinking regretfully of the tender first husband you so easily betrayed and abandoned. Why not tell him? It would give him a great deal of satisfaction, I am sure." His manner, his face, his glinting eyes were filled with ugliness.

Then a sudden great illumination came to Amalie, so that tears rushed to her eyelids. Why, all these years Jerome had been bedeviled by insecurity, by fear! No man, confident of himself, possessing a deep inner peace, could be cruel! When a man struck furiously at those he loved, it was from some inner torment, some terrible unease, some sleepless distress.

During all these years Amalie had believed that Alfred had been the one beset by a secret knowledge of inferiority and insecurity. Now she understood that she had been wrong. Alfred's insecurity had arisen from

(Continued on Page 130)

Two women sat one day on a wind-swept ocean pier. The first woman had three beautiful children, the other was childless. The latter, gazing wistfully out over the tumbling water, said, "I'd give ten years of my life to have three such children as yours!"

"Well, three children cost about that," the other woman answered gravely.

—TOM MASSON: The Best Stories in the World (Doubleday, Doran & Co.)

Taking Vitamins?

Try this Newer Way... for better results!

Take them in fortified food—the delicious Ovaltine way!

If the vitamins you're taking aren't doing you all the good you'd hoped, this may be the reason! Authorities now agree, vitamins do most good in combination with other food elements, which are absolutely necessary for best results.

For example, Vitamins A and C need protein. Vitamin $B_1$ needs energy-food. Vitamin D requires Calcium and Phosphorus, and so on—and you get them all in each glass of Ovaltine made with milk.

For Ovaltine is an all-round supplementary food-drink that supplies—besides vitamins—nearly every food element needed for robust health, including those elements needed for vitamin-effectiveness.

So why don't you turn to Ovaltine, as so many people are doing? If you're eating normal meals, 2 glasses of Ovaltine daily should give you all the extra vitamins needed for buoyant health—in a way they can do you more good!

ELDERLY PEOPLE, who need larger amounts of certain foods to maintain strength and vitality, often rely on Ovaltine! It gives them nourishing proteins, energy-food, vitamins and minerals in a delicious food-drink form—easy to take, very easy to digest.

Bottoms Up!

The chances are that each day, in your own home, a Federal "Park Avenue" tumbler makes many a safe journey between tiny hands and mouth. Yes, it's quite likely that you have often used the Park Avenue. It's the most famous tumbler ever made.

Each day also, in millions of homes, Federal-fashioned Tumblers, Tableware, Kitchenware, Occasional Pieces, Beverage Sets and Ornamental Pieces are round-the-clock companions of gracious living.

So when you buy glassware, remember the Shield of Federal is your assurance of outstanding design and craftsmanship continuously demonstrated during 46 years of precision-engineered quality manufacture.

Look for the Shield of Federal. It's the mark which stands for sparkling crystal in utility glassware styled to add distinction to your daily service.

THE FEDERAL GLASS COMPANY, COLUMBUS 7, OHIO

UTILITY Glassware Fashioned by Federal

ADDS DISTINCTION TO YOUR DAILY SERVICE

(Continued from Page 128)

his sense of gratitude to his uncle, from his devotion to William Lindsey. Otherwise, he had been strong. He had acquired wisdom. This she had learned from Philip.

But Jerome would never be wise. He would always be at odds with the world. He hated, because he feared. He hated, because he could never trust.

Compassion rolled over Amalie like a smothering wave. She held out her hands to Jerome. "Oh, please don't, darling!" she cried softly. "I am so sorry."

But Jerome could not be moved. He gave her another malevolent look. Then he turned and went out of the room.

Dorothea was buried in the family plot on January seventh. The day was all crystal and white and fiery blue. The black pines of the cemetery blazed with icicles. The grave was a raw black gash in the earth. Scores of Dorothea's friends had come here. She had never inspired much love, but she had inspired respect.

Some whispered that Alfred seemed very calm and resigned. He looked at the grave, at the heaps of ferns and hothouse flowers waiting on the brink. Some said he was stunned, inconsolable.

Philip stood beside him. Poor misshapen creature! thought the friends. Poor Alfred. He had little to comfort him. His first wife had died, his second wife had betrayed him. He had no strong sons, no pretty daughters to give him consolation or hope.

The minister had concluded his prayers. He threw a handful of mud and snow onto the coffin that lay in the grave. Suddenly there was a murmur of surprise and a stir. A tall young girl in a sealskin jacket and a round sealskin hat was moving toward the grave. Her arms were filled with hothouse lilies and roses. Mary Lindsey! She came directly to Alfred and Philip. She smiled as if there were no one there but herself and these two.

"Mary," murmured Alfred.

"My dear," whispered Philip. They gazed at her with open love.

She inclined her head graciously, then gently dropped the flowers upon the coffin. "Good-by, Aunt Dorothea," she said clearly. Then, with great simplicity, she kissed Alfred, then kissed Philip.

QUARRELS between Jerome and Amalie were usually hot and brief, ending in reconciliation and laughter. But this quarrel, though apparently passing, did not end in laughter. It ended in a kind of silent truce.

Amalie, with her profound understanding, knew that she had struck deeply at Jerome with her accusation of cruelty. He could not forgive her, because he knew that she had spoken the truth. She had made a breach between them which could never be filled.

The long days of January and February were wretched ones. Jerome went to New York on business. He did not invite Amalie this time. On this journey, he also took his young son away to school.

"At least," he said to Amalie, "you won't have much opportunity to turn William against me."

Amalie did not reply. She was very weary these days, sunken into despondency and silence. She missed her boy. But she missed something else more urgently. She missed what she had believed was Jerome. It did not matter that the man of her imagination had never existed. She felt the loss as intensely as if he had died, and a stranger had taken his place.

Mary was her comfort now, sweet, cool young Mary with her neutral voice and eyes that never clouded for very long. Amalie would watch Mary and Philip together with a content she had not known for years.

The sovereign voluntary path to cheerfulness, if our spontaneous cheerfulness be lost, is to sit up cheerfully, look around cheerfully, and act and speak as if cheerfulness were already there. To feel brave, act as if we were brave, use all our will to that end, and courage will very likely replace fear. To wrestle with a bad feeling only pins our attention on it, whereas if we act as if from some better feeling, the bad feeling soon folds its tent like an Arab, and silently steals away.

—WILLIAM JAMES: The Gospel of Relaxation (H. Holt & Co.)

Within a few days Jerome would return. Mary and Philip had decided that they must tell him now of their plans.

On the last night before Jerome's return, Amalie said to Mary, "Let us get it over with, child. I confess that I can't stand this much longer."

Mary smiled. "There is nothing to be afraid of. I am just going to tell papa that I am to marry Philip. That is all."

That is all. It was not so simple. Nearly half a century of hatred and animosity stood behind the girl's unworried words. What could she understand of that?

Jerome returned in better spirits than when he left Riversend. He had brought Amalie a beautiful cameo brooch. He had brought Mary an ermine jacket, a muff and a round hat to match. He brought messages from young William. He told of his visit to Jay Regan, and his other friends. He had dined with the governor. His women listened politely and with interest.

"There is something which Philip wished me to do in New York," said Jerome. "I thought he might be here tonight. I wrote him."

MARY said, "He couldn't come tonight." She paused, glanced at her mother. "Papa, may I talk to you alone, in my sitting room, later?"

Jerome was pleased. "Why, my darling, of course." He gave Amalie a look which was compounded of smugness and satisfaction and almost childish triumph. Jerome leaned forward to pinch Mary's ear. "One of my New York friends has a fine boy," he said. "I think I persuaded him to pay us a visit sometime this summer. That was when I showed him the pretty miniature of you that I carry in my watch."

Mary's smile did not change. She rose. "Now, papa?" she asked.

Amalie sat in her room, waiting. The house was very quiet. She could hear the notes of the grandfather clock as it struck the quarter hour, the half hour. She could hear the snapping of the trees outside in the intense cold. The curve of a brilliant crescent moon shone through the window. She listened. There was still no sound, no movement. A wind rose briefly, shook the windows, made the fire roar up, then passed.

Jerome and Mary had been together for an hour. What was taking place there? Amalie had not heard a raised voice or an exclamation. The clock chimed again.

Then the door opened. Jerome stood on the threshold, looking at her. When she saw his face she rose involuntarily. He spoke very softly. "You did this. I ought to have known that a woman like you, without honor or decency, would do a thing like this, behind my back. Well, you can't do it!"

Amalie straightened until she was very tall. She looked at Jerome unmovingly. Then, without hurry, she went to Mary. She found the girl sitting before her fire, motionless, very white and very still.

Mary stood up when her mother entered. "Don't worry, mamma," said Mary gently. "I am going to marry Philip. Nothing can stop me." She came to Amalie and put her arms about her. Amalie did not move. She had no tears. She had only this appalling suffering in her heart.

The cold broke during the night. It was followed by a wild storm, a blizzard that roared in on white wings from the north. By daylight, the world was one vast movement of wind and snow. Roads were swept bare in some spots, heaped high in others. The hills were blotted out behind an immense and agitated veil of gray. Riversend

(Continued on Page 132)

A GOLD MINE

of precious vitamin C-and genuine refreshment!

FLORIDA CANNED GRAPEFRUIT JUICE . . . how good it makes a loving wife and mother feel to know that with this delicious juice of Florida's tree-ripened grapefruit—so abundantly rich in vitamin C—she fortifies every body in her home EVERY DAY IN THE WEEK against dangerous colds, infections, over-fatigue . . . and flu.

AND WHAT A Helping Hand

in saving time . . . and trouble . . . and money!

MORE* Delicious Treats . . . *TRY THEM!

Florida Canned Orange Juice

•

Orange-Grapefruit Blended Juice

•

Florida Canned Grapefruit Sections

● In handy cans all ready to serve—you can buy the refreshing juice of Florida's luscious fruit most inexpensively. And all the squeezing and straining has been attended to. Just open the can and pour.

Here's a Helping Hand in preparing meals—in awaking good morning appetites. And best of all, this healthful juice—so rich in vitamin C—gives a Helping Hand in building health . . . in fighting infections, colds, and fatigue. It's a Helping Hand to reach for every single day!

● FLORIDA CITRUS COMMISSION • Lakeland, Florida

Canned

FLORIDA GRAPEFRUIT JUICE

NEW . . . a CREAM DEODORANT

which SAFELY

STOPS under-arm PERSPIRATION

1. Does not irritate skin. Does not rot dresses and men's shirts.
2. Prevents under-arm odor. Stops perspiration safely.
3. A pure, white, antiseptic, stainless vanishing cream.
4. No waiting to dry. Can be used right after shaving.
5. Arrid has been awarded the Approval Seal of the American Institute of Laundering — harmless to fabric. Use Arrid regularly.

39¢ Plus Tax

(Also 10¢ and 59¢)

At any store which sells toilet goods

MORE MEN AND WOMEN USE

ARRID

THAN ANY OTHER DEODORANT

(Continued from Page 130)

huddled under the fury; at midday it was dark enough to light lamps. The gas lamps on the streets flared with a wan and yellow light. But the streets were empty.

Philip and Alfred were sitting together in the latter's office. They had been talking for an hour, and their conversation was not about the bank.

"Yes," said Alfred, "go to his bank about three o'clock. Of course there is the possibility that he did not leave Hilltop this morning. This is the worst storm I have seen for nearly twenty years."

"I should have gone there last night," said Philip. "But Amalie and Mary especially requested me not to. It seems cowardly to let them face it alone."

Alfred turned to his son. His pale eyes were suddenly stern. "Philip, it appears to me that I should be the one to object—not Jerome."

Philip said nothing.

Alfred sighed. "Jerome, however, was always a vindictive and passionate man. From what I hear, he has not changed."

"It is hard enough for a man to give up a daughter he adores, even if—if everything else is satisfactory," said Philip with sadness. "I am relying, however, on our years of friendship. Jerome can't forget all that, surely."

"You would be surprised at what a man can forget under the stress of emotion," said Alfred grimly. "He can do and say things which can never be forgiven. Never." He waited a little, then said, "To many Dorothea might have appeared hard and unrelenting. But she wasn't, really. During her last years, especially, she became gentler. I only wish she had lived to see you and Mary married. It would have made her happy."

"You ought to have married Dorothea, sir."

Alfred moved restlessly. He flushed. "Well, I thought of it a few times, I confess. There was a deep affection between us. But it would not have been fair to her. You see, my dear boy, I couldn't forget Amalie." He looked again at the storm. "I still love Amalie, Philip. I think I always will." He said, as if speaking aloud to himself, "I have seen Amalie a few times, at a distance. I've never spoken to you of this before, Philip. But now I must ask you outright: Is she really happy with Jerome?"

The average person spends one tenth of life:

| | |
|---|---|
| Waiting for meals | 2½ years |
| Answering the door | 1 year |
| Standing in line | 6 months |
| Traveling to work | 1½ years |
| In useless repetition | 2 months |
| Answering the telephone | 1 month |
| In making up his mind | 1½ years |

—SEUMAS BRADY: Hibernia (Irish Digest).

Philip hesitated. "I don't know if Amalie has the capacity to be truly happy. Perhaps it isn't Jerome's fault."

Alfred quickened. "You say she is unhappy, Philip?"

"If she is, I don't think it is Jerome's fault."

"He doesn't understand her, then," said Alfred, greatly moved and urgent. "I didn't—long ago. But the years have made me understand. Amalie needs a sense of permanence, of safety. She never had it. Neither of us—Jerome or I—could give it to her. I don't know why. I think I might have, if things had been different." He said huskily, "Yes, I am sure I could have given it to her. Eventually. When I finally realized I didn't have to justify myself. But I didn't have time then."

Philip stared at his father incredulously, and knew the truth with a sort of blinding clairvoyance. Yes, Alfred could have made Amalie happy, happy as she had never been. A few years, only a few years, had been needed. Alfred would have gained in wisdom, in quietness, in peace, under the happiness of being married to Amalie, just as he had gained them under unhappiness. There were some who were slow in maturing, and some who would never mature. Alfred was the first, Jerome the second. If Jerome had never returned to Hilltop, there would have been peace there, and contentment, in a few years.

Philip's heart ached. Then he said to himself, But if that had happened, then Mary would have been my sister! Could he, Philip, be sorry? Something expanded in him. If he had the choice, would he wish things might have been different? Perhaps, he thought. Perhaps not.

The door opened, and an excited clerk appeared. "Mr. Jerome Lindsey is here, sir, and wishes to see you and Mr. Philip!"

"Jerome!" exclaimed Alfred, starting up. Then he paused, turned to Philip. "Send him in," he said.

The clerk went out. Philip put his hand on his father's arm. "Please," he said. "Let us be as calm as possible. I can rely on you to keep your temper, father?"

Alfred bent his head. He sat down again. Philip, standing, waited.

THE door opened again and Jerome appeared on the threshold, his hat brim, his shoulders white with snow. He did not look at Philip. He looked at Alfred. He closed the door behind him.

Over the space of dark warm carpet, over the space of years of hatred and madness and bitterness and hostility, the two men regarded each other in silence. Philip, always so adequate in emergencies, could not speak. His voice was stopped in his throat. For never had he seen such a face, nor could he have imagined it. Jerome was looking at his cousin with features that were black and distorted, with eyes from which all sanity and reason had been burned away.

And Alfred was returning that look very quietly. His own face was gray and rigid. Then Philip saw that his father was gazing at the bright red scars on Jerome's face. His shock seemed to increase. His lips jerked. One of his hands half rose as if to shut out the sight of those scars. Then it fell heavily to the table again.

Jerome was leaning against the door. His breath came sharply. He said, "I have only a few words to say. And they are all 'no.' No. No. That is all."

Philip moved. Jerome saw that movement and he turned like a cat on the younger man.

"You disgusting, miserable cripple," said Jerome. "Don't cross my path again. Don't ever let me see you. If you do, I will kill you. How dare you look at my daughter? How dare you think of her? You!"

Alfred saw Philip shrink back. For the first time in Philip's life he saw the light go out of his eyes. Alfred forgot everything but that this was his son who was being so hideously attacked. He stood up, walked around his desk and faced Jerome, so that there was only a yard or so between them.

"Listen, Jerome Lindsey," he said. "I, too, have only a few words to say. And I want to tell you that I forbid my son to marry your daughter. I want no blood of yours in my house." He turned to Philip, said sternly, "I forbid you to marry this man's daughter. Are you going to obey me?"

Philip pressed his hand against his father's desk. He said, "Yes, I will obey you."

Jerome looked from one to the other. Then he burst out laughing. There was no other sound in the room but the sound of that brutal and vehement laughter. "So," he said almost genially, "it is all settled then. I always like to see people being reasonable." He stared at them gloatingly. "This gives me much pleasure. I've waited for it for a long time." He concentrated his attention on Alfred. "You thought to worm your way into Hilltop, didn't you, through your deformed son? You thought that you would have full run of that house again. It was a nice plot, but it didn't turn out the way you thought it would. Yes, it was a nice plot, but it was a stupid one."

Alfred was incredulous. "There was no plot. That is just in your mind. I never want to see Hilltop again. I never wanted to see you again, either, or anyone who belongs to

Miracle-Tread

AND THE MIRROR REFLECT THE

Prettiest Ankles IN TOWN

Slender, feminine ankles are made to appear even more graceful in Miracle-Tread Shoes, designed with an eye for beauty and a skill that insures walking comfort.

THE TULSIE

THE GLEN

Miracle-Tread

SMART SHOES FOR GRACEFUL FEET

$5 and $5.50

Distant points slightly higher

Write for name of nearest dealer

MIRACLE-TREAD DIVISION

CRADDOCK-TERRY SHOE CORPORATION

LYNCHBURG, VIRGINIA

you." He paused, then he said, "I don't think we have anything more to say to each other. Except one thing: I beg of you not to be too harsh to that lovely child. She is young. This was a—mistake. Let her forget."

Jerome said nothing. Alfred looked into his eyes; he could see nothing there that he could read. Again he shook his head, and sighed. Jerome turned away, opened the door, shut it softly behind him.

Philip had sat down. He was leaning his elbows on his father's desk; his face was covered with his hands. Alfred studied him, and he thought to himself that this was the greatest pain that he had ever had to bear.

Jim was waiting in the sleigh for Jerome, huddled in the robes. The little old man was wretched. There was no standing this beastly weather, he thought. It was like the night that Mr. Jerome had come 'ome. It was still day, but the storm had so darkened the sky that it might have been seven o'clock. Jim was frightened too. Why had Mr. Jerome gone to that bank? He had not spoken from the time they had left Hilltop. He had just sat there like a graven image. Sat there, he had, in the sleigh, looking straight ahead with eyes like marbles. Something was wrong.

Then Jim heard Jerome climbing into the sleigh again. "We'll go home," he was saying. He pulled the robes up to his chin.

"Yes, sir," said Jim thankfully. "It's a bad day, and it'll be a worse night."

Jim turned the horses about. They floundered through piling drifts. The gas lamps flickered. The wind tore at the men's faces, at their hats, at the tight warm robes. Jim's nose was numb with cold; he sniffled, blinking reddened eyes.

It was almost impossible to see. Jim gave the horses their heads. The devils could find their own way home. The runners of the sleigh crunched through the snow; the vehicle rocked and swayed. Now Jim began to gasp for breath as the wind struck his face. Jerome, sitting far down in the sleigh, sat without moving or speaking.

THE yellow street lamps wavered by them like faint moons seen through fog. The snow hissed in the burning gale. Once a horse stumbled, and the sleigh jerked aside violently.

Amalie. Mary. Mary, Amalie. Jerome wiped the snow from his face. He roused himself a little. "Can't you make them go a little faster?" he asked.

"No, sir, it's beyond me, this storm," said Jim fearfully. "They're doin' the best they can."

"I must get home soon," said Jerome.

Jim slapped the reins futilely. Bells jingled. The horses, apprehensive, struggled up the slope from the valley.

I must get home, thought Jerome. Amalie, Mary. I must go to Amalie. I must tell her—what? What can I say to her? I can only ask her to forgive me. Mary. My darling, my dear. I have always been a fool, Mary. Your father is a fool. A cruel one.

"What's the matter now?" he cried aloud, as the sleigh stopped abruptly.

Jim's voice, muffled by wind, blew back to him: "Feels like a bad drift, sir. Horses havin' trouble, like. There. They're clear now."

The house would be warm and bright and snug. The grandfather clock would be chiming. There would be a fire in his room. He would call Amalie in, and he would say, "Forgive me, if you can. Forgive me for all these years, and all my folly and stupidity." Then Amalie would kiss him and say—what would she say? But he knew Amalie. Her face had been tired so long, and it was his fault. Would it brighten a little when he spoke to her? He saw the purple shining of her eyes before him.

They would talk together in the firelight, he and Amalie and Mary. And he would say, "Mary, if you want Philip, you have my blessing."

Philip. He saw Philip cringing away from him, turning away. Philip, who had been his

(Continued on Page 135)

DON'T SUFFER FROM SORE, CHAPPED HANDS!

Let nurses' discovery help YOU

Nurses were among the first to discover this wonderful relief for chapped hands. Hundreds have written to tell us their experiences. These letters are typical:

"Have you ever washed your hands a hundred times a day? We nurses in contagion do—and Noxzema is my only relief from rough, red hands."

Another writes: "My hands and arms were so irritated from scrubbing for operations that I couldn't be comfortable anywhere till I tried Noxzema. I got immediate relief and I've never been without Noxzema since."

Actual tests show chapped hands heal faster—*this medicated way!

• Actual clinical tests with Noxzema Medicated Skin Cream on scores of men and women with both mildly and badly chapped hands show that this soothing, greaseless cream helps heal faster—improvement in many cases being seen overnight!

That's because Noxzema is really a medicated formula. It contains medicinal ingredients that not only relieve the soreness, but help heal the tiny "cuts" and "cracks." Try Noxzema, not only for rough, chapped hands, but for chapped lips, windburn, painful chafing, weary, burning feet and other winter skin irritations. See how quickly it vanishes into the skin; how soon it brings grateful relief! At all drug counters; 3 sizes: 10c, 35c, 50c (plus tax).

NOXZEMA

Helena Rubinstein's new face powder Heaven-Sent

It's everything you've ever wished for in face powder. For Heaven-Sent Face Powder is MICRO-SIFTED to a celestial mist to surround your face with an aura of new loveliness. So sheer and fine-textured, it creates an alluring all-over glamour finish. Clings and clings. In the most beautiful powder shades you've ever seen. All this plus the unforgettable Heaven-Sent fragrance!

$1.50 plus federal tax

Remember—skin care is the basis of beauty. Be faithful to your Helena Rubinstein skin treatment for greater beauty through the years. For your best skin treatment, write to Mme. Rubinstein.

Helena Rubinstein

London • 715 Fifth Avenue, New York • Paris

© 1946, Helena Rubinstein, Inc.

First Choice on every count

. . . the easy way to have beautiful floors!

Remember! Tuesday night is the big night on the radio! Tune in Fibber McGee & Molly, NBC.

New! DRAX for clothes and fabrics

Johnson's DRAX is a protective rinse for clothes and fabrics that will make them resist dirt, shed water, keep fresh longer! 1. Look for the DRAX tag on garments you buy. 2. Many laundries and dry cleaners can give you DRAX service.

More women use Glo-Coat than any other floor polis

There must be a reason for Glo-Coat's tremendous popularity . . . and there is! Beauty, Cleanliness, Protection . . . that's a lot to expect from one product . . . but that's what you get when you use Glo-Coat on your linoleum and other floors. And what's more, Glo-Coat takes practically no work, requires no rubbing or buffing. You simply apply and let dry—come back in 20 minutes and find your floors gleaming with beauty, never streaked or uneven.

Glo-Coat adds greatly to the life of your linoleum . . . keeps its colors and patterns bright and new looking. The tough film of Glo-Coat protects the finish against dirt, wear, moisture. Spilled things are wiped up in a jiffy.

Yes, on every count—for Beauty, Cleanliness, Protection . . . to save yourself work and save your floors, too . . . take a tip from the millions of women who prefer Johnson's Glo-Coat.

FIVE FAMOUS JOHNSON POLISHES

Self-Polishing Glo-Coat, Paste Wax, Liquid Wax, Cream Wax, Carnu for car

© S. C. Johnson & Son, Inc., Racine, Wisconsin, 1946

(Continued from Page 133)

friend. Philip, who was so like Jerome's father. How could I have said that to Philip? What possessed me? I must have been mad. Tomorrow I will write to Alfred. There can be nothing between us, of course. There never can be, as long as we live. But I can write him: "Try to forget what I have said, and what I have done. And send your son to me, please, as soon as possible."

His cheeks were numb, and his feet and hands. The sleigh was rocking violently. He heard Jim cursing. From the tilting of the sleigh, he knew that they were rising rapidly. He looked up. Was that a light in the far window at Hilltop? It was just a faint yellow glow, lost in the snow and the wind.

Wait for me, he said to the light. I am coming, my dears.

Then he had the most curious thought. His father was waiting for him, up there at Hilltop. He would find his father in the library. He would be sitting there, smoking. He would look up with a smile, laying aside his book. What would he quote now? Jerome smiled in answer. Addison? Thoreau? Whittier? Emerson? It would probably be Emerson, the young Emerson.

Amalie heard the door open below. She heard a hoarse cry. She ran out of her room, and met servants running also. And then there was Mary. She ran downstairs.

Jim, bleeding from a dreadful gash on his cheek, stood below, shaking violently, his clothes covered with snow. He saw Amalie on the stairs, lifting her hand to her mouth. He screamed hoarsely, "Help! The ditch! He's down there, in the ditch!"

Philip came downstairs somewhat late this autumn morning. Alfred complained that his son was working too hard. But he was proud of Philip, proud of all that he had accomplished and was accomplishing.

Breakfast was waiting for Philip in the small narrow room overlooking the gardens. Alfred had gone to the bank. Philip ate his breakfast without appetite. There were letters for him. He ran through them quickly, then caught up one with an eagerness he could not control. It was from Mary, written from New York.

"Darling Philip," she wrote, "you will doubtless be surprised that mamma and I are now in New York. We had to leave New Orleans to bring William back to his school. But that was not the only reason. Mamma suddenly decided that she wished to return to Hilltop. She is not looking well, and I am very anxious about her. But she does not appear so numb and listless as she did during the first months after papa's death."

Philip's eye ran swiftly over that sharp small script with its clear legibility.

He continued to read: "Perhaps I imagine it, but your letters are so short and distant. Is it because you are working too hard? If that is so, then mamma and I will feel conscience-stricken. But we are also proud. How wise it was of papa to appoint you executor of his will and his estate, and to name you as president of his bank! He knew that you and General Tayntor were good friends, and that he, as vice-president, would have no quarrel with you."

Philip paused and looked before him. I can't go on with it, he thought. But he knew he must. He could not abandon Amalie and Mary. Love for them, and duty, as his father had pointed out, must keep him in Jerome's bank, as president, until young William had attained his majority. Even then, according to the terms of the will, Philip was to be chairman. The years stretched before Philip as a great weary desert is spread before exhausted eyes.

Mary's letter continued: "It has been so long since we have seen you. Eight months! But, as you know, I had to take mamma away. I was afraid that she would die during those weeks of illness after papa's death. She has become so thin you would hardly know her, and it breaks my heart. She smiled for the first time, about a month ago, when William said something very ridiculous. Now she even reads occasionally.

"Dear Philip, I am counting the days until I see you again. How wonderful it will be! I do not know the exact day, but it will be soon."

Philip slowly laid aside the letter. Again he looked through the narrow window at the garden. Mary. Someday she would be grateful that she had not married him; she would be grateful to Philip himself. The dull stone that always lived in his chest became heavier. He rubbed his tired eyes.

Mary. Mary. But when he thought of Mary he thought of Jerome.

What had Alfred said pleadingly? "Philip, you are too imaginative, too sensitive. If Jerome had truly meant those wicked things he said to you, he would not have written his will like this. He reveals all the trust and affection he ever had for you in every line. Poor Jerome. You see yourself how he trusted you."

But he never dreamed of me marrying his daughter, thought Philip. I was his friend, his confidant, his adviser. But he never saw me as the husband of his daughter.

★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

Drawing-Room Scene

By Eleanor Alletta Chaffee

We were discussing love, treating it lightly,
Tossing sophistries with an easy grace,
Disguising our emotions as unsightly.
There was a mask like lacquer on your face.
"Love doesn't hurt," you smiled. "I know. I've tried it."
Your eyes were twin flames under your smooth hair.
"As for a scar, who would trouble to hide it?
Let any passing idler stop and stare."
Then suddenly you cried, "It isn't so!
Love never knew me, but I have known him. . . ."
Your stricken, sobbing breaths were like the slow
Seeping of wounds. And in the interim
Like Peter, I sensed the sound as one who hears
The impotent tribute of repentant tears.

★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

He went out of the house. The weight in his heart extended to his body. He walked like an old man.

He stood in the road and looked far up the hill at Mary's home. His feet carried him up the hill. The warm October morning lay in shining wideness about him. Leaves scurried ahead of him, like small gay creatures. He turned once and looked at the valley below, floating in a silvery morning mist.

He was approaching Hilltop now. The house stood above him, strong and gray against the cobalt sky. He saw that the windows were wide open, that smoke was blowing from a chimney or two. They were preparing for the family's return.

He moved silently along the side of the house toward the gardens. The wall of trees was a tapestry of dark and pale green mingled with the blaze of maple, the yellow of elms, the crimson of oaks. The grass was high and thick, and deeper than it had been in the very heart of August. The faint wind had a hint of chill, but it was fresh under the warmth of the sun.

A deep and tender comfort came to Philip, a comfort as rich and full as the October day. He bent and picked a yellow blossom. He looked about him with contentment. He would always remember this garden.

He felt the lightest touch on his arm. He had heard no one approaching him. He turned quickly, to see Mary. She stood there, her silvery head bare to the sun, her clear face smiling, her blue eyes full of tears. She waited for him to speak; there was a breathlessness about her, a gentle and valiant glory.

"Mary," he murmured. "Mary, my dear."

She laughed a little then. "Oh, Philip. We came home last night! How did you know?"

I did not know, he thought. But did I know, instinctively?

She saw that he was looking at her gravely, almost somberly, his dark eyes steady and withdrawn. She took his hand. "Philip," she said, "when we found papa that night, in that terrible ditch, he wasn't dead. We brought him home. He—died late, at midnight. But before he died, he whispered to me, 'Send for Philip. I want to see Philip. I want to see you together, you and Philip.'" Her eyes widened. "You didn't know, did you! But I thought you did!" She held his hand in both of hers, and he felt the sweetness of her flesh, the strength, the sadness. She cried, "Is that why your letters were so strange?"

"I didn't know," he said. And then again: "I didn't know!" The brilliant air brightened so that it blinded him. He kissed her hands and her wrists. "Mary!"

Alfred exclaimed, out of his pain, "No, Amalie must not do that! She cannot do that! Leave Hilltop? That's impossible. There is plenty of room there for you and Mary and Amalie."

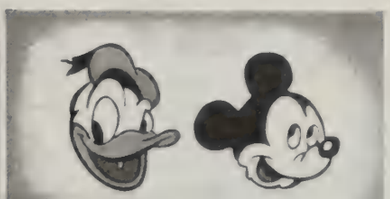
"That is what I told her," said Philip. "But it is no use. She said that the house had never 'accepted' her, that there was no peace for her inside its walls. She will live in a little house somewhere in Riversend, she says. You would hardly know Amalie," continued Philip. "She is so thin and white. It is more than grief for Jerome, I feel. Poor Amalie. I cannot remember when I saw her happy. Was she ever happy?"

"But she cannot leave Hilltop," said Alfred. He added with pathetic simplicity, "I couldn't bear to think of Hilltop, and Amalie not there." He waited, and his voice trembled when he spoke next. "Philip, tell me: is she grieving for Jerome?"

Philip sighed over and over. "I don't know. Of course she is grieved. But I think it is something else too. I don't know what it is."

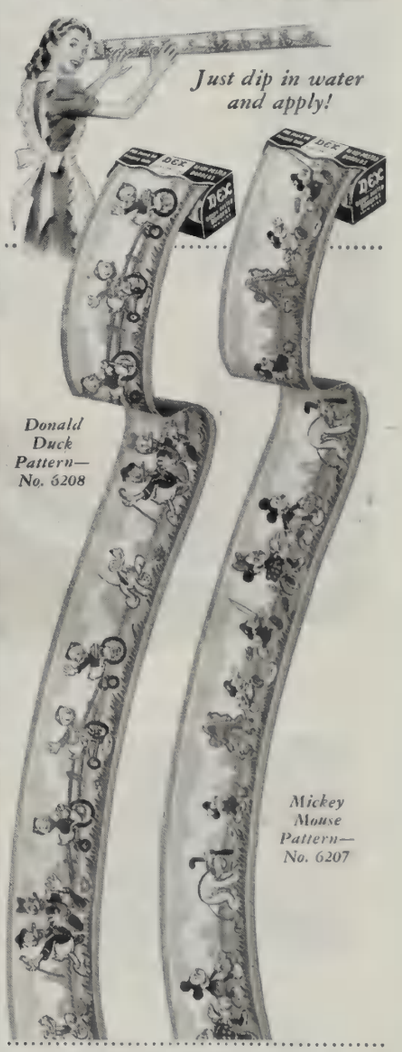
Alfred was silent. He could feel, rather than see, his son in the dusk. He felt Philip's happiness, which was like a glow, and his renewed strength and life. God be thanked for that! God bless that sweet girl! She and Philip would live at Hilltop together. He, Alfred, might see them there occasionally. At this thought something lifted and brightened in Alfred.

He stood up. By straining his eyes, he could see a glimmer of light up on the hill. Hilltop! In a way, it was home again for him.



Then he stood very still, his hands at his sides, his heart hammering. He said abruptly, "I must go out for a while, Philip. Wait here for me."

There was no moon, but the stars were so bright that a long spectral shadow of frail silver lay over the earth and the hill. Alfred climbed slowly. He had to pause, to rest a heart that persisted in pounding and fluttering. He went on. The windows of Hilltop glimmered more clearly. How often he had seen them like this, full of golden light!



The night was cool, but Alfred's face was damp, and there was a prolonged trembling in him. When he reached the gates, he did not go in immediately. He stood and looked at the house. He saw the old familiar brass lamp shining softly in one of the library windows. Surely Uncle William was sitting under that lamp, reading.

When he lifted the brass knocker on the oak door, the sound came back to him across the years. He touched the gray stones on either side of the door as he waited. They

(Continued on Page 137)

NOW!
WALT DISNEY'S
Donald Duck
AND Mickey Mouse
IN DEX TRADE
READY-PASTED BORDERS
FOR PLAIN, PAINTED OR PAPERED WALLS

- Gay touch of Disney genius for walls, furniture, cabinets—around doors, windows, mirrors!
- Washable, fadeproof, guaranteed to stick.
- 34 other stunning patterns, too—for every room.
- Cost as little as 15c per 12 foot roll.
- At hardware, chain, drug, department and wallpaper stores everywhere.

Another Product of UNITED WALLPAPER, INC.
Chicago 54, Illinois

COPYRIGHT 1946, UNITED WALLPAPER, INC.

Here's more than meets the eye!

Good eating means more than a feast for the eyes. It means fine flavors, and good nutrition, as well! That might seem like a large order—when you consider how easy it is for flavors and certain vitamins to be "cooked away" in the home preparation of foods.

Also, these precious qualities are often impaired by long transit from farm to table.

One good way to guard against such losses, say food authorities,* is to trust foods in cans. Below you'll read why.

*For example, see August 10, 1944 "Journal of Nutrition"

Good eating . . . mushroom soup, baked beans and frankfurters, brown bread, grapefruit segments for salad, apple sauce, cookies, coffee . . . "and they all came out of a can!"

AIR AND SUNLIGHT are fine for fruits and vegetables while they're growing. But once they're picked, prolonged exposure can rob them of flavors and vitamins! Of course, that doesn't happen with foods grown for canning—because they're rushed from the farm, quickly prepared, and cooked right in the can. Each can is really a miniature "pressure cooker"!

YOU'D BE AMAZED to see the many tests given foods in modern canneries. Fruits are scientifically tested for ripeness, flavor, color, nutritional values. Finished products are tested to make sure they retain their good qualities in the steel-and-tin can. No wonder you serve modern canned foods proudly! And when you open a can, you know it's never been opened before!

FOODS IN CANS ARE

SAFE from dirt, germs, odors.

SAFE from air, light, moisture.

SAFE even after a can is opened—because, in the canning process, both the can and its contents are sterilized. Simply cover the top and place in the refrigerator.

No other container protects like the Can

FISH PRODUCTS exemplify the efficiency of modern canning. Salmon, for instance, is canned the day it's caught! And how convenient and economical it is always to have on hand a wide variety of tasty sea-food products and meat specialties! Processed canned foods do not have to be stored under refrigeration before opening.

CAN MANUFACTURERS INSTITUTE, INC., NEW YORK

(Continued from Page 135)

were warm and old and strong against his hand.

The door opened and a maid admitted him to the big hall. A fire was burning on the hearth. The grandfather clock struck nine, with its old resonant notes. Firelight and lamplight gleamed on the paneled walls. Why, he had been here only yesterday, only this morning! The clock was his friend, the fire welcomed him.

He was conducted to the library. He stood before the hearth, and saw the brass andirons. Nothing had changed. But why should it? He had never left this house. It was home.

He heard a faint rustling sound, and again his heart began that strong sure beating. He turned slowly. Amalie was near him. But it was an Amalie grown thin and white and withdrawn. It was an Amalie with a snowy lock of hair running from her forehead to her nape.

They looked at each other in silence. Amalie was holding out her hand to him.

"Alfred," she said.

He took her hand. He felt dazed, stricken, overcome with love and compassion. "Amalie," he murmured.

She withdrew her hand. "Please sit down, Alfred." Her voice sounded faint and without its old rich timbre. She sat down across from him, and they looked at each other without speaking.

At first her eyes remained dull and empty. Then they began to see him. She saw his strength, she saw his maturity, she saw the peace that had finally come to him across years of pain and suffering comprehension. Wonder touched her face.

She said dimly, "You have changed, Alfred."

"Yes. I think I have, Amalie." It was intolerable to him, to see her like this. He wanted to go to her, to press that stark face into his shoulder, to hold her to him and comfort her. "You see, Amalie, I know so many things I never knew—before."

She twisted her hands together on her knee, and he remembered that old gesture of restlessness.

"Alfred, I think I know why you came here. It was to say that you do not approve of Philip marrying Mary?"

He was so astounded that he could not speak.

Now she was leaning toward him, her eyes full of desperate pleading. "Don't say it, Alfred! Let them be happy! They love each other."

His voice trembled when he replied, "My dear, I didn't come to say that. I am glad about Philip and Mary. I hope you are glad too."

"I am, I am, Alfred," she said softly. She turned aside her head. "And I know that Jerome is glad too."

"Yes, I know he is," said Alfred.

Again there was silence between them. The low fire crackled. The old elm branch scraped along the eave. Alfred started. It was like the knock of a friend on an old, forgotten door.

Alfred spoke: "Amalie, I came here tonight to persuade you not to leave Hilltop."

She turned, dimly startled. "I must, Alfred. I really must. You see, it was never really my home. It is Philip's home. And Mary's." She paused, then she cried faintly, "It is yours, too, Alfred! I have no right here!"

He went to her then, and took her hand. It was cold and damp. "It is your home, Amalie. I can't bear to think of you not being here. Will you stay here, for my sake? Will you let me continue to think of you in this room, and in those gardens, and looking through these windows?" His voice began to fail him, so that it was almost a whisper. "You don't know how it had comforted me, all these years, to imagine you here, Amalie," he told her.

His hand was warm and firm as it held hers, and its strength was good to her. She clung to that hand; tears were spilling over her face. She was trying to smile again. But she shook her head a little.

"Alfred, you are only trying to be kind ——"

"No," he said. "No. I am trying to keep my memory of you, Amalie. That is all."

Full of wonder, incredulous, she looked up at him. Their eyes held together. Now there was only the sound of the fire and the scraping of the elm branch in the quiet.

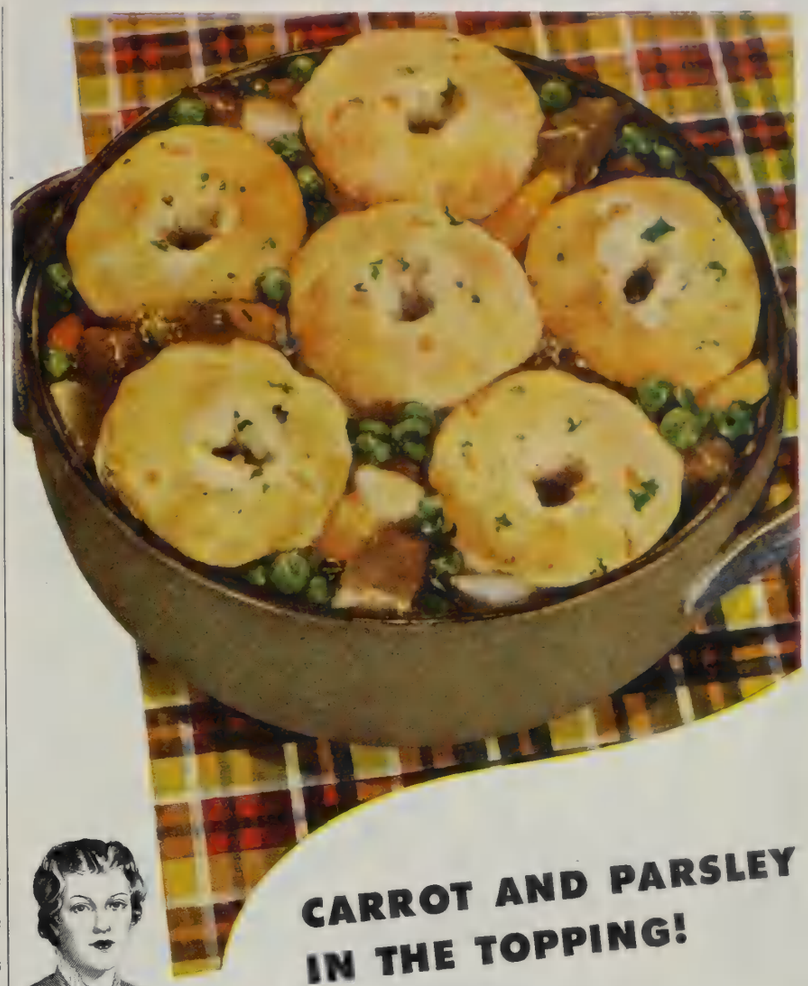
He bent his head. "Yes, Amalie," he murmured.

She got to her feet, still clinging to his hand. She could not look away from him. She tried to speak, but her lips shook. She could only whisper, "Alfred, you ——"

He said, "Amalie, will you let me come again? Someday soon? You will let me see you? Amalie?"

Had she really moved? Had she come a little closer to him? He could see the wet purple of her eyes, and the brilliant iris.

She was saying, "Yes. You may come again. And soon. You must come again, Alfred. You must always come."



(THE END)

The complete novel, This Side of Innocence, is soon to be published by Charles Scribner's Sons.

LITTLE GUY

"Gee, I wonder what it is we're missing!"

CARROT AND PARSLEY IN THE TOPPING!

BY Betty Crocker

● HOT MEAT PIE with new Spring bonnet! Crusty biscuit rings, gayly flecked with carrot and parsley. So quick, too, with Bisquick (a handy blend of six ingredients).

Add ½ cup grated raw Carrot
2 tbsp. finely minced Parsley to 2 cups Bisquick
Stir in ½ to ⅔ cup Milk

That's all! Mix according to directions for biscuits on Bisquick package. Cut with doughnut cutter. Place on hot pie filling. Bake about 25 minutes in hot oven, 450°. Try this new Bisquick topping.

• • •

● SO HOMEY TASTING! I'm referring to all Bisquick bakings. They have that home-made goodness—because those Bisquick ingredients are the quality you would choose yourself. They're skilfully proportioned and blended, too. And each batch of Bisquick is tested by our General Mills foods staff. Grand to know you're baking a sure way, isn't it? So sure, and so easy.

ALL OF WHICH suggests a supper that's nice to come home to:

Meat Pie
with Carrot-Parsley Topping
(Quick with *Bisquick)
Individual Salads
(Grapefruit and Orange Sections on Lettuce or Watercress with Sweet French Dressing) Old-Fashioned Burnt Sugar Cake
Coffee Milk

• • •

● JUST ADD MILK to Bisquick, too, for dumplings. Or any biscuit dough. And have you tried Bisquick muffins? Waffles, pancakes? They're delicious. And so quick and easy. Simple directions for ten basic bakings come on the Bisquick package.

General Mills, Inc.

"Bisquick" and "Betty Crocker" are registered trade marks of General Mills, Inc., Minneapolis, Minn.

QUICK WITH BISQUICK

ONE MOTHER TO ANOTHER

There were difficulties during the war in supplying mothers with a complete variety of prepared baby foods. Happily, these days of scarcity are almost over. Today you will find your dealer's shelves plentifully supplied with the varieties you need.

Mrs Dan Gerber

When baby looks like this...

It means food's on the way—and it better be good! Enjoy peace of mind like so many young mothers who, at doctor's suggestion, serve Gerber's Baby Foods. For Gerber's is made to taste extra good, with uniform, just-right texture always. The choice vegetables and fruits are carefully washed in pure, artesian water, then cooked the Gerber way by steam . . . to retain precious minerals and vitamins. Every step is laboratory checked. Be sure to get Gerber's—with "America's Best Known Baby" on the label!

Baby Cereals, pre-cooked, rich in iron

Serve Gerber's Cereal Food and Gerber's Strained Oatmeal at alternate feedings to give variety, and help baby's appetite. Both cereals are rich in added iron and B-complex vitamins needed by most babies over three months old. Serve by adding milk or formula, hot or cold.

Remember, it is always wise to check your baby's feeding program with your doctor

Gerber's

FREMONT, MICH. OAKLAND, CAL.

15 kinds of Strained Foods, 8 kinds of Chopped Foods, 2 special Baby Cereals

Baby Foods

Cereals Strained Foods Chopped Foods

Free sample ..... © 1946, G. P. C.

My baby is now ..... months old; please send me samples of Gerber's Cereal Food and Address: Gerber Products Co., Dept. 83-6, Fremont, Mich.

Name .....

■ ARMSTRONG ROBERTS

Wheezes and sneezes are no laughing matter—specially in childhood. This little girl fights back with lots of rest, a tissue-building diet.

Treat the Common Cold With Respect

BY DR. HERMAN N. BUNDESEN

President, Chicago Board of Health

SCARLET fever, diphtheria, meningitis, infantile paralysis—these are the diseases mothers fear most, the names that cause panic. Yet it is a fact that the lowly cold, which many mothers regard as nothing more than a temporary nuisance, is responsible for more sickness, more time lost from school and play than any other disease.

Doctors still do not know the whole truth about colds. But many facts are known—so many that if mothers would only take the steps in preventing and treating colds that are known to be worth while, most colds could be limited to mild infections lasting only a few days, and many could be prevented altogether.

Although a specific "cold germ" has never been positively identified, most doctors agree that colds are caused by a filterable virus—a living organism so tiny that it slips unseen through the pores of the finest earthenware filter. Easily, swiftly the virus passes from one person to another, often carried on the almost invisible droplets of moisture that are sprayed into the air when a child with a cold sneezes or coughs, and sometimes when he just talks. Most children, too, put their fingers in their mouths many times during the day; thus cold germs are frequently deposited on towels, doorknobs and other objects—to be picked up by someone else in the well-known "hand-to-mouth" chain of infection. These facts suggest one simple way for mother to cut down on colds: Banish playmates who show any signs of a cold! Use strict precautions in contacts with your child when you have a cold yourself; remember, a little cold in a big person may become a big cold in a little person. To avoid infecting others, keep the child home by himself when he has a cold. Carelessness in these rudimentary disciplines is the most powerful ally of the cold virus.

Many children who seem to have frequent "colds" are known today to be suffering from allergic symptoms rather than true colds, and allergy will be investigated and ruled out by the careful doctor who is treating a child for constant cold symptoms. But there are also wide variations in susceptibility to actual colds; some children are continually catching cold, while others rarely seem to be afflicted. The generally accepted explanation for this is that some of the germs which cause colds are present most of the time, but certain children withstand them more successfully than others, either because their general health is more robust or because the mucous membrane lining the nose and throat is more resistant to the invaders. So here is another cue for mother: To build resistance against colds, see that your child gets plenty of sleep and rest; give him nourishing, well-balanced meals, stressing fresh fruits and vegetables, which are rich in the vitamins that help build healthy membranes.

Sudden changes in temperature and exposure to cold, with chilling and dampening of the skin, are widely recognized as factors which predispose children to catching colds; in some way, these conditions lower the body's effectiveness in fighting off infection. Children who spend long hours in dry, overheated homes and schoolrooms, too, are especially prone to colds; their membranes become dried out and lifeless—easy prey for

(Continued on Page 140)

GRATEFUL young mothers from Maine to California tell us that Doctor's Bundesen's baby booklets have been of the greatest help to them in caring for their own babies. The first eight booklets cover your baby's first eight months. They sell for 50 cents. The second series of booklets covers the baby's health from nine months to two years—seven booklets for 50 cents. The booklets will be sent monthly; be sure to tell us when you want the first booklet. A complete book on the care of the baby, a necessary supplement to the monthly booklets, OUR BABIES, No. 1345, is 25 cents. A booklet on breast feeding, A DOCTOR'S FIRST DUTY TO THE MOTHER, No. 1346, sells for 6 cents. Address all requests to the Reference Library, LADIES' HOME JOURNAL, Philadelphia 5, Pennsylvania.

For nearest Poll-Parrot dealer, Classified Phone Directory, or write us.

Boys and Girls of All Ages Pre-Test Poll-Parrots in Actual Wear!

To be sure your children get shoes that look right, fit right, and wear right, scores of lively youngsters are constantly Pre-Testing Poll-Parrots in actual wear.

Do uppers keep their shape, resist scuffs, heat and moisture, wear and tear? Do soles wear straight? Do counters stand up? Do stitches hold at vital points? All this we find out in Pre-Testing.

After these shoes have taken all the scuffing, sliding, kicking, and other rough treatment these boys and girls can "dish out," then—and only then—they're produced in quantity for your children.

We've done this for 18 years. That's why Poll-Parrots have extra reinforcements in vital parts. That's why they give service ordinary shoes can't equal! That's why they fit so well—and keep their fit.

ROBERTS, JOHNSON & RAND, ST. LOUIS, MO.
Division of International Shoe Company

EVERY IMPROVEMENT PRE-TESTED!

Poll-Parrot
& STAR BRAND SHOES

with BUILT-IN FIT for Boys and Girls

How to keep a high chair sanitary

You don't have to set fire to baby's high chair to keep the tray perfectly clean and germ-free! Of course, it's hard to keep food particles out of crevices and corners of a wooden tray, but the answer to that problem is simple.

It's the handsome new THAYER HI-CHAIR with THA-LITE, the enduring Plastic Tray. The tray is permanently chip-proof, acid-resistant, and washable with boiling water for perfect cleansing. Tiny hands banging with a spoon cannot pound food particles into its enduring super-hard surface. And plastic adds gleaming beauty to the tray and fittings.

That's just one of the unequaled advantages of a THAYER HI-CHAIR. Its low center of gravity and rugged, square-faced joints make it safer for baby. It's a fine piece of furniture, too, with Velva-sheen wood finish in Maple, Waxed Birch, or Bone White, luxuriously upholstered in red, pink, or blue.

Most models are instantly convertible to a low play-chair-and-table. With a chair that's high for meals and low for play, baby never gets bored.

Thayer Hi-Chairs are made by the makers of the famous Thayer Folding Coach. See them at your favorite store —and write to us for your free copy of the amusing and helpful "PRIMER FOR PARENTS." Thayer Company, Dept. LH-611, Gardner, Mass.

FOLDING COACHES • STROLLERS • TODDLERS • HI-CHAIRS

(Continued from Page 138)

attackers. Mothers should see to it that room temperatures at home are kept at 68 to 72 degrees, and that there is enough moisture (humidity from 40 to 60 per cent). Also, it is a good idea to find out whether or not the schoolroom air is healthful. If it isn't, get together with other mothers and go to the school authorities with a request for improvement.

In spite of these general measures, some children continue to get colds. For such children, many more specific preventive steps may be suggested. Vaccines made from germs commonly found in the nose and throat are recommended by some doctors; these may be taken in capsule form or as "shots." They are not successful in many children, but for an occasional child the vaccines do seem to diminish the duration and severity of colds, if not the number of infections. When vaccines are used, the doctor starts treatment well in advance of the "fall cold" season, which usually comes in October. While it cannot be demonstrated that taking supplementary vitamins will help prevent colds, many doctors think that the addition of vitamin preparations to the child's diet is good insurance that nourishment is adequate. However, special conditioning programs, such as cold showers or the practice of going barelegged or bareheaded in the coldest weather, are valueless in preventing colds and may even be harmful if indulged in too freely.

When, no matter what has been done to forestall it, a cold threatens or strikes, the old rules for treatment are still the best rules:

Whenever a friend of Sydney Smith was tempted to give way to anger, the wise and witty clergyman had a sure-fire method of restoring him to good humor. "My friend," the great divine would counsel, "never lose your good temper. It is one of your most agreeable qualities." —Lyre: Quoted in Quote.

Put your child to bed and keep him warm and quiet. Give plenty of water (half a glass every hour) and citrus-fruit juices. If he has a fever, a sponge bath with lukewarm water will make him more comfortable. Aspirin or other medicine—the kind and amount your family doctor suggests—may be given for added relief. A full, nourishing diet is needed, but feeding should not be forced; mother needs to use her ingenuity to make the meals appetizing and attractive, so the child will eat well. There is no truth in the old adage about "starving a fever"; actually, fever speeds the rate of tissue combustion, so that more, not less, food is required.

Steam vapor may be used to relieve stoppage of the nasal passages, but nose sprays and medicated inhalants should not be used unless the doctor specifically advises them; these act by drying up the nasal fluids and shrinking the blood vessels in the nasal area, and while they unquestionably bring temporary relief, they may also have harmful aftereffects if they are used excessively or improperly. It is wise to discourage nose blowing as much as possible; let the nose run and "blot" with a disposable tissue instead of the harsher, germ-ridden handkerchief. Above all, teach the child never to blow his nose with the nostrils held shut; this may force infected mucus back into the sinuses and into the Eustachian tube leading into the middle ear.

So far, science has not discovered any drug which kills the cold virus or the germs, believed to be similar in nature, that cause influenza. But while no purpose would be served by giving sulphonamide drugs to the child with a simple cold, these and other drugs are effective against other organisms, such as pneumonia germs, which often attack when a cold has lowered the body's guard. The constant threat that these other, more powerful infections will strike makes every cold potentially dangerous. The mother who treats colds with respect will never have cause for regret.

Prescribed and Recommended

℞ For close to four decades physicians and surgeons everywhere have been prescribing and recommending Camp Scientific Supports to their patients for a variety of conditions*. Camp-trained fitters are equipped with the professionally approved Camp Supports and background knowledge necessary to follow physician's instructions precisely and conscientiously.

*Postoperative, Maternity, Pendulous Abdomen, Visceroptosis, Nephroptosis, Hernia, Orthopedic and other conditions.

LOOK FOR THIS Camp Authorized Service symbol at good stores everywhere. Remember these supports are never sold by door-to-door canvassers. Always priced to intrinsic value: $5 to $12.50. S. H. CAMP and COMPANY, Jackson, Michigan. World's Largest Manufacturers of Scientific Supports.

Authorized Service CAMP Scientific Supports

© King Features Syndicate All Rights Reserved

QUINTUPLETS
always rely on this great rub for
CHEST COLDS

To Relieve Coughs—Aching Muscles

At the first sign of a cold—the Quintuplets' chests, throats and backs are immediately rubbed with Musterole.

Musterole instantly starts to relieve coughs, sore throat and aching muscles of colds. It actually helps break up painful local congestion. Makes breathing easier. Great for grown-ups, too!

MUSTEROLE

HAVING A BABY?

Start right with this improved, easy-to-clean, Hygeia nursing unit. Fewer parts—just nipple, bottle, and cap. Prepare full day's formula at one time. Only necessary to remove cap when feeding. Cap keeps nipples germ-free. Handy for out-of-home feeding. Useful as container for baby's other foods. Famous breast-shaped nipple has patented airvent to reduce "windsucking." Sold at your druggist's complete as illustrated or parts separately.

Hygeia NURSING BOTTLES NIPPLES WITH CAPS

CONSULT YOUR DOCTOR REGULARLY

Keep His NURSERY ODOR FREE... SPRAY D'SAPEER

es, spray a little 'SAPEER fre- ently to keep air n the nursery weet and clean. pray it to kill crib ad or mattress dors—just as you se it throughout e house to kill ersperation odor on clothing, cooking dors, stale smoke, bathroom odors, dog- ie odors on furniture and clothing, and fact practically all obnoxious odors.

'SAPEER is an effective, economical, uick acting deodorant—harmless to finest brics.

rices (with atomizer) 4 oz. bottle, $1.25; oz. bottle, $1.65; Refills: (without atomizer) 4 oz. bottle 60c; 8 oz. bottle $1.00: Atomizer, 65c.

Ask for D'SAPEER at drug, department, hardware stores and beauty shops—or mail your order direct.

AILEY, PRIHODA & CO., MFRS. 03 W. Kalamazoo Ave., Kalamazoo 11, Mich.

The Aristocrat of Deodorants D'SAPEER

Baby's s in a jiffy Quicaps rs over ophane

QUICAPS DISPOSABLE NURSING BOTTLE CLOSURES

terilizing. asted time. re dispos-

FREE SAMPLES! Write Dept. J-16, The Quicap Co., Inc., 233 Broadway, N.Y.C.

Their Minded MATERNITY DRESSES From Jean of HOLLYWOOD

newest in smart Maternity es for home and street wear. ng frocks for comfort and concealing lines. All at singly low prices. A dress for every occasion.

REE from HOLLYWOOD New catalog sent upon request in plain wrapper, free. Write today. E OF HOLLYWOOD, Dept. 23, 5071 Hollywood Hollywood, California.

Flash ALL-AMERICA MARIGOLD

For only 5c a trial packet of this sensational Marigold "Flash" and 1946 Garden Guide and Catalog. Ask Your Dealer for BUIST'S Seeds

20c PKT 5¢

FREE GARDEN GUIDE ROBERT BUIST CO. Dept. C Phila. 5, Pa.

SEEDSMEN FOR OVER A CENTURY

NITTING YARNS Prompt Mail Service

Send for FREE Samples

LONIAL YARN HOUSE, 1231-R Cherry St., Phila. 7, Pa.

ELFINE AND THE THREE-FOOT FORK

(Continued from Page 46)

a three-foot fork strapped to his right arm. So of course they couldn't get the food to their mouths. Then the scientist went up to heaven. And there he found that the food was just the same—very good, lots of it—and everybody was well nourished, fat and happy. But"—he paused—"the queer thing was that everybody in heaven had a three-foot fork strapped to his right arm too. . . . Now"—he looked around him—"can you explain it?"

There was puzzled silence. Then Mrs. Goodwin said uncertainly, "Ambrosia. I mean, it was supernatural."

Her husband shook his head. "Nothing supernatural about it." He looked hopefully at Candy.

"I love it, daddy, but I can't imagine ——"

"Fred?"

Mr. Fancher's small blue eyes were very bright. "What's the trick?"

Mr. Goodwin shook his head. "No trick. I've given you all the facts."

Bill spoke quietly. "I think I see," he said. "In heaven they helped each other."

"Ha!" Mr. Goodwin slapped the table delightedly. "He got it! Good work, Bill!"

"Why, Bill, dear!" His mother-in-law was enchanted. "How terribly smart of you!"

"Clever answer," said Mr. Fancher. "Ha, ha."

"I don't think it's cleverness," Mr. Goodwin assured them. "Watson says very high I.Q.'s often don't get it at all. Just depends on your approach to things—so he says. The best integrated personalities are always the ones who guess it."

"Is that so?" Mr. Fancher looked with speculative approach at Bill. "Very interesting. I must remember that."

Soon after dinner, Mrs. Goodwin was called to the telephone by a committee chairman. The three men had embarked on a political discussion, and Candy, knitting quietly in one corner of the sofa, had time to think. What she thought about was Elfine. Elfine Marie Fancher: underneath her father's boasting, one could imagine the sensitive, eager child, too aware for her years, excited by her first glimpse of a fairy-tale city—and sickeningly disappointed because after only a day or two of it, she was to be packed off home for a funeral. Candy's heart ached for little Elfine Marie, who was the daughter of a flour king and who loved to study.

I wish there were something I could do, she thought.

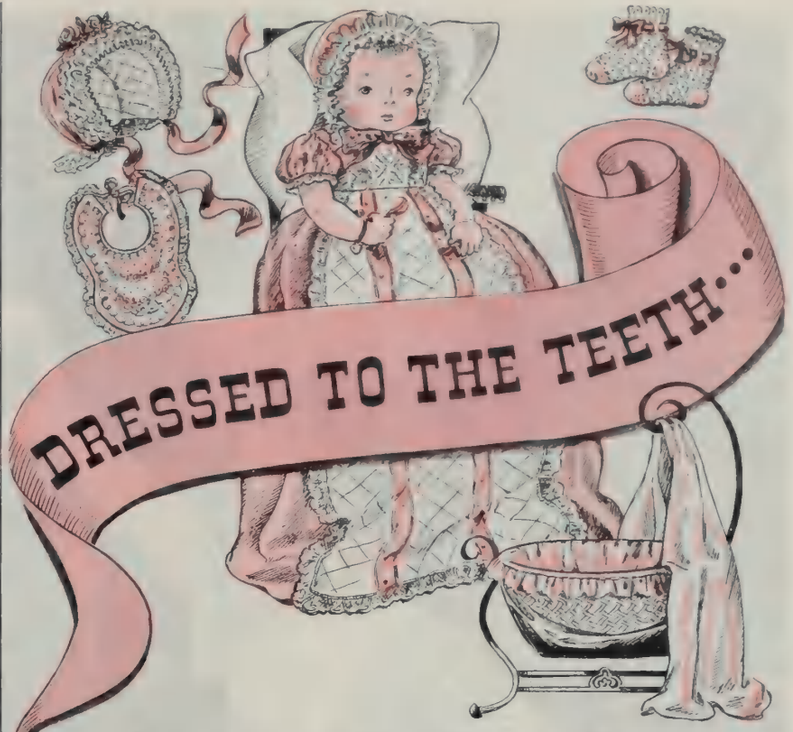
Bill laughed and she glanced over at him. He had said, "In heaven they helped each other." How exactly like Bill.

And in a flash of perception, Candy saw just what she could do for Elfine—just what she must do. She got up from the sofa and crossed the room.

Her father looked up. "Get lonely, Candace?"

Candy smiled at Mr. Fancher. "I just came over to make a suggestion. Mr. Fancher—would you let Elfine come and stay with us instead of going back to Minneapolis? We'd take very good care of her, and we'd love to have her—wouldn't we, Bill?"



She was rather taken aback at the expression on Bill's face—but perhaps it was only surprise. Certainly he was cordial when he agreed that of course they would love having Elfine.

Mrs. Goodwin, returning from the telephone, was told of the plan and smiled upon her daughter warmly. "Candy is really very good with children, Mr. Fancher. She has a darling baby. My grandson, David. He's two and really, he's the most ——"

"Now, Cornelia," said Mr. Goodwin.

"My husband," said Mrs. Goodwin, "is just as silly as I am. He comes to see me

(Continued on Page 143)

That was baby in 1860 — beribboned, beruffled . . . beyutiful! But fashion isn't everything. And even an 1860 baby wanted to kick and twist and squirm and couldn't!

No, fashion isn't everything. But the Vanta baby is smartly turned out, too—in cute 'n cuddly Vanta styles.

The difference, then, between 1860 baby and happy Vanta baby? Just this — Vanta baby clothes are scientifically designed for babies. Vanta baby clothes are designed by baby experts for active babies—healthy babies. Designed to give babies just the right amount of protection—plus real birthday-suit freedom of action.

Mother, too, finds lots of adVANTAges in long-wearing, easy-to-launder Vanta baby clothes. And mother knows that a Vanta-trained expert (look for this emblem—) in her favorite store is ready to show her Vanta garments for all of baby's needs. In fact, Vanta babies' mothers say—"My baby is the best dressed baby in history!"

Valuable Book. "Baby's Outfit," 80 pages, covers 55 subjects of vital interest to expectant mothers. 500 name suggestions. Send 10 cents to The Vanta Company, Dept. J-3, Newton 58, Massachusetts. (In Canada, J. R. Moodie Co., Ltd., Hamilton, Ontario, are Licensees.)

The time of their life they need you most

So carefree, your blessed little ones! So dependent on you to build the foundations of their well-being! These are the years, while they're growing, when your care for their diet counts so much.

Never forget that a spread for bread is one of the seven basic kinds of food children should have every day. It does more than make other foods taste good—it is an important source of food energy and Vitamin A needed for normal, sturdy growth.

So no wonder mothers are thankful for delicious, nutritious Nucoa! Nucoa supplies as much food energy as the costliest churned spread for bread. And no spread can be counted on as a finer source of Vitamin A. For in every pound of Nucoa, winter and summer, at least 15,000 U.S.P. units of Vitamin A are guaranteed. Two ounces (about three generous table servings) supply 62% of a child's minimum daily requirement of Vitamin A!

Nucoa's chief ingredients—pure vegetable oils and fresh pasteurized, cultured skim milk—are riches from America's own farms. But the making of Nucoa is laboratory controlled, so that Nucoa's quality is always the same. And there's no "storage" Nucoa. Freshly made the year round, on order only, Nucoa tastes sweet and fresh on the children's bread, on your breakfast toast, in all your cooking. It's so good it fairly "melts in your mouth."

Appetizing Tricks with Nucoa

Nucoa-d New Potatoes: Season boiled new potatoes with melted Nucoa generously laced with chopped parsley. It's a spring lyric!

★

Nucoa in ■ Mold: Nucoa's texture is so lusciously smooth that it is easy to soften and tint it yellow with the pure Color-Wafer inserted in each package. Pack in small gelatine mold, chill and turn out for pretty table serving. (For cooking, use Nucoa as it comes—pure white.)

Nutritious NUCOA

(Continued from Page 141)

nce a week and he eats his supper all by imself without spilling a drop. He's per-ctly adorable."

"Fred has just had the pleasure of watch-ig me eat my supper all by myself without pilling a drop. Wasn't I perfectly adorable, red?" Mr. Goodwin inquired.

"You know perfectly well what I mean," Mrs. Goodwin said calmly. "Well, I think hat's lovely, Mr. Fancher. Candy will have uch fun with your little girl."

"It'll be lovely for Elfine," said Mr. ancher; and it was on this note of anticipa-on and mutual esteem that Mr. Fancher ft, to go back to his hotel and put Mrs. ancher on the train for Minneapolis.

Later that evening, Candy was brushing er hair with her head hanging down, the ay the articles on beauty told you to.

"Bill!" she said. He emerged from the athroom, toothbrush in hand, foaming at he mouth, his eyebrows inquiring. Candy ooked at him anxiously, upside down. "You on't mind about Elfine?"

Bill made an indeterminate sound and aved his toothbrush. Then he went back nd finished his teeth. Candy followed im—right side up.

"It's just that Mr. Fancher is from Min-esota, that's all," she told him. "In New ork we're all so complex and highly strung, e forget what simple, hearty people are ke. They scare us."

Bill, who was now able to speak, said with me decision, "I've met a lot of people from Minnesota. Also from Visconsin, Idaho, In-iana and even Colo-ado, and they weren't bit hearty. In fact hey were, without ex-eption, complex and trung up to quite a ormal pitch." He ent and sat on the dge of the bed.

"I thought you'd ike me to ask her," Candy said sadly. "Do ou think I was too mpulsive, Bill?"

He grinned at her. "I think you're crazy ut sweet."

"You used to think I was sweet but razy."

"It's the effect of years of marriage. It lulls the fine edge of affection. You know ow it is. Gosh, this bed feels good."

Some minutes later, Candy said sleepily, 'I hope Elfine will like our guest beds. They aren't nearly as nice as mother's."

Bill grunted and said thickly, "Don't worry. In Minnesota they're simple. They sleep standing up."

LATE the following afternoon, Candy whipped open the front door and called out gaily, "Well, hello! You're here at last!"

Bill and Elfine walked sedately up the front steps, hand in hand, and into the hall.

Elfine said politely, "How do you do, Mrs. Stewart?" and stood pulling off her mittens while Bill carried her suitcase up-stairs.

Candy had an instantaneous impression of exactly the sort of child she had expected: long, thin legs; fragile, nervous hands; a rose tweed coat, rather too lavishly trimmed with fur, a little round hat to match, and under it a small pale face that would someday be pretty. Elfine's eyes were enormous, bright hazel in color, and alarmingly intelligent. Her dark hair hung to her shoulders and was cut in a heavy bang across her forehead. Candy suggested that they go upstairs so that Elfine could see her room.

Elfine smiled. "Thank you," she said. "I suppose that would make me feel more at home. Not that I don't already." She climbed the stairs behind Candy, talking easily. "Mr. Stewart was awfully nice to me. He gave me lunch. I always order a lot in a restaurant and then I can't seem to eat it all, but I tried not to do that today because I know you aren't awfully rich. I mean, I realize your family has a lot of money, but Mr. Stewart hasn't. I guess you married for love, didn't you? What a lovely room." She looked carefully about.

"Thank you," said Candy weakly.

"You must be awfully clever. I imagine you did all this on very little." She got out of her coat. "Shall I help you with the baby? Or are you going to get dinner?"

Candy said suddenly, in a voice which surprised her by its volume, "In a few minutes Ellen will give us tea. Ellen is our cook. She was once my mother's kitchenmaid, and then she helped Cobb, the butler, so she is very well trained and she doesn't need any help. In fact, she doesn't very much like to be helped. But it was nice of you to offer."

"Oh, that's all right," said Elfine graciously. "I just love to help people, don't you, Mrs. Stewart?"

"Er—yes," said Candy. "Yes, I do. Shall we go downstairs?"

THE rest of the afternoon was pleasantly uneventful. Elfine loved David, and David, although discriminating in his choice of companions, not to say captious, also loved Elfine. Bill's suggestion that they go to the Peggy Ann Garner film was greeted by Elfine with enthusiasm.

It was when they had come back from the movies and were taking their things off in the hall that Elfine said, "I just love it here, Mrs. Stewart. I'd like to stay a long time. And thank you for the movies—but I wish you'd let me pay."

Candy smiled. "Oh, I guess we can manage that, Elfie," she told her guest.

There are few of the great philosophers who have made a greater contribution to the science of happiness than the hard-working Negro woman who had a thoroughly lazy but likable husband. When she was asked why she put up with him, she answered: "Well, it's this way; I makes the livin', and he makes the livin' worth while."

—OLIVER HERFORD: Quoted in Modern Humor for Effective Speaking: Edward Frank Allen (Citadel Press).

Elfie looked up at her earnestly, her eyes brilliant. "When Mr. Stewart goes to work for my father, you'll have a lot more money."

From the hall closet, where Bill was hanging up his coat, there issued a thick silence which had the quality of an explosion.

Candy laughed nervously. "Where did you get that idea, darling?"

"Oh, daddy told mummy he was going to offer Mr. Stewart so much salary that he wouldn't be able to turn it down. Will you braid my hair, please, Mrs. Stewart? It gets all awful if it's not braided at night."

"I'd love to braid your hair," Candy said numbly. "Come up to your room, dear."

Halfway up, Elfine paused and peered through the banisters at Bill. "He said he didn't know what that place you were working at was thinking about, Mr. Stewart. That's what he said. It'll be nice when you're living in Minneapolis. I can come and see you practically every day."

Bill said, "I don't think I'd count on it if I were you, Elfine. I don't believe we'll be living in Minneapolis."

"Well, maybe St. Paul is better," said Elfine. "There's not quite so much money there. Good night, Mr. Stewart."

Half an hour later, Candy shut the door of her bedroom with a certain amount of apprehension, which was not soothed by the sight of Bill's face. He was sitting up in bed, smoking a cigarette.

"That," he said, "is an awesome child. If you can call her a child. How old did you say she was?"

"Ten," Candy replied meekly. "But she's very bright in school."

Bill put out his cigarette. "No, no. Oh, no. That child hasn't been in school. She's been down in Oak Ridge, personally attending to the atomic bomb. You must ask her for the formula in the morning. I can think of a nice way to use it."

Candy lay awake for rather a long time. She's just a little girl who's listened to too many grownups, she told herself sensibly. She's pathetic, because she so obviously needs affection and a normal life. We only have a week, but perhaps, even in that time —— And if Mr. Fancher should offer Bill a new job—well, it might be very exciting. And it would be partly due to me, because I helped. And she fell romantically asleep.

A Secret of Natural Growth!

Mothers, we know you believe delicious, whole-grain Quaker Oats helps your child's natural, sturdy growth.

Do you know why your belief is so right and so wise?

Nature favored Quaker Oats in certain key food elements every growing child must have.

Nature gave true whole-grain oatmeal more Protein, more natural Vitamin $B_1$, more Food-Energy—than any other natural cereal provides!

Even made Quaker Oats amazingly rich in food-iron that children need—more, ounce for ounce, than even raisins or spinach!

Quaker Oats is so loved for delicious flavor—help safeguard your youngster's growth with "nature's favorite"! Look for the big, economical package of Quaker Oats today!

Quaker Oats and Mother's Oats are the Same

QUAKER OATS

The World's Best-Tasting Breakfast Food

So light,

so soft, so absorbent

Incredibly light for quick drying and handling, yet thirstily absorbent as ever.

Martex Zephyr, newest idea in fine long-wearing towels, makes laundering easy, simplifies stacking on linen shelves.

Martex

ZEPHYR

A PRODUCT OF THE Martex WEST POINT MFG. CO.

She woke on Sunday morning to the sound of high-pitched childish chatter, and turned over with a relieved sigh. Elfine was talking to Ellen in the kitchen; and as Candy well remembered, any kitchen over which Ellen presided was an enchanted place, full of batter and raisins and endless gossip about Ellen's fascinating family. But fifteen minutes later she was startled to full wakefulness by the pounding of Ellen's feet on the stairs. Ellen marched in and put Candy's breakfast tray on her knees. Her Irish blue eyes were hot, but when she spoke it was in a hoarse whisper, out of respect for himself, who was still inert.

"That one!" she said. "Her! She says Chamberlain brung on the war! I says he was a great man even if he was an Englishman, God help him, and he tried the soul out of him to get peace for us all—and she says that he did just what Hitler wanted him to! I wish I'd the handling of her. I'd Hitler her."

"Oh, don't pay any attention to her, Ellen," Candy soothed. "She's only ten. I'd like to get her to behave more like a normal little girl."

Ellen shot her a fiery glance. "Ten, is it? That one will never be normal—and the sooner she goes back to whoever is responsible for her, the safer we'll all be." And she pounded off, breathing steam.

Bill stretched luxuriously. "Hello, angel. Nice day." He threw back the covers—and the door flew open to admit the bouncing figure of Elfine, her little face shining with good will and her great hazel eyes sparkling. Bill froze on the edge of the bed.

"Good morning!" she said. "Hello, Mr. Stewart. I've come to help you shave and take a shower and get dressed."

Bill stared at her in undisguised horror. "Thank you, Elfine," he said hoarsely, "but I learned some years ago to do all those things for myself, and I think I'll just go on that way." He rose to his feet and hastily wrapped his dressing gown round him.

Elfine looked up at him earnestly. "Oh, Mr. Stewart, when you have a little girl of your own, you'll have to let her help you. It's more healthy. That's why I help daddy. You'll get used to it. He did."

Bill threw one wild look at his wife, collected his clothes and vanished into the bathroom. Elfine, always a graceful loser, settled down violently on the end of Candy's bed. The coffee in Candy's cup shot into her eggs, and Elfine said:

"My daddy cuts his toenails all over the floor and when I step on them they hurt. What do you think of MacArthur?"

By late afternoon, Candy felt that the week stretched before her like a black abyss which she must cross on a narrow plank. Elfine, however, had a very pleasant Sunday. She was sympathetic about Candy's best pearl choker which had somehow got broken while she was entertaining David with it; but all the pearls had been found except the two big ones. And it had been only eager willingness which had caused her to spray perfume on Candy's beaver cap with so generous a hand that the beaver would probably never quite recover; besides which, Candy arrived at the Bunnells' party in an aura of lily of the valley which Bill—struggling for breath—said was rather like a general anesthetic, except that it took longer.

Candy realized, to her dismay, that it was a heavenly relief to be in a house where Elfine was not: she and Bill stayed at the party until well after seven. When they reached home, they found that Elfine had improved the time by tenderly spreading bread crumbs all over the lawn for the poor, cold little birds—and there would be no French toast for supper, as planned. Ellen was inflamed beyond speech.

As they were going to bed that night, Bill remarked contemplatively, "It's a very funny thing about that child. She isn't violent, she isn't bad—she's just ubiquitous."

"I never know exactly what that means," Candy said apologetically. "I always think it means stingy, but I know it doesn't."

"In Elfine's case, it definitely doesn't. Elfine is, in her quiet way, everywhere.

"I CAN'T TALK

...but if I could, I'd tell every moth about the wonderful kind of diapers th do away with diaper-washing!" DISPOSII are extremely soft inserts made with laye of very absorbent cellulose and Masslinn a unique, non-woven cotton fabric that strong and firm—won't mat or fall to piec when wet. Never sticks to baby's ski Light and not bulky, these improved i serts hold moisture and stay comfortabl about time-and-trouble-saving DISPOSIE Imagine having no diapers to bother wit and no tiresome daily diaper-wash." Oth laundry is cut down, too. The well-fittin waterproof holders take the place of ru ber panties and won't rub or chafe. Inser and holders both come in two ample siz —give baby comfortable, complete diap protection.

"I HAVE LOTS TO SA

Send for helpful Free Booklets on "Co mon Sense in Dressing Baby" and "Co mon Sense in Training Baby."

*U.S. Pat. No. 20393

Chix

DISPOSIES

THROW-AWAY DIAPER INSERT WITH WATERPROOF HOLDER

CHICOPEE PRODUCTS

Chicopee Sales Corp.
47 Worth St., New York 13, N. Y.

OTHER CHICOPEE PRODUCTS

CHIX Down-Weve Gauze Diapers. Fine cotton in bird's-eye weave for superior, soft, light, absorbent diapers.

CHUX Complete diaper, completely disposable. Excellent for travel, busy times, vacations, emergencies.

She's like total war: even if you're neutral, you can't escape the effects. It's almost a gift. I hope she's spent herself today."

When Bill came home on Monday evening, he wore an expression which caused Candy to drop her mending and follow him upstairs to their room. He looked up and down the hall. Then he asked warily, "Where is she?"

"In the kitchen with Ellen. Why?"

Bill shut the door. Then he sat down on Candy's chaise longue and ran a hand through his black hair.

"Candy, that child was right. Fancher took me to lunch and practically offered me a job."

Candy's mouth opened slowly. "He didn't!"

"He most certainly did."

"What job?"

"Sales manager of Fancher's Flawless Flour."

Candy sat down unexpectedly on the end of the bed because her knees were buckling. "Bill! What—what are we going to do?"

Bill said, "The salary he mentioned is just exactly twice what I'm getting."

"Bill! My goodness! But you can't just turn down an offer like that, can you?"

"Elfine said I couldn't." Bill got up and walked over to the window, where he stood staring out at the dark garden and rattling his keys. "I don't know, Candy. It's a good job—it's a wonderful job, of course. But I've been with International Airways for ten years. I've never worked anyplace else." He turned toward her. "What do you think?"

Candy hesitated. Bill valued her common sense; even more, he valued her happiness. He would listen to her, for both reasons—and what she said now might well affect their whole future. She thought hard. If Bill accepted Mr. Fancher's offer, it would mean leaving their little house and all their friends, moving away from the part of the world she knew and loved best; and yet if she urged him to stay, it would be from cowardice and nothing more.

In our choice of friends some special virtue ought to attract us; we should not examine as to whether they are rich or poor; but if we are persuaded that we could follow them into adversity, then we may boldly cultivate their friendship in their greatest prosperity. —JEAN DE LA BRUYÈRE.

"Darling," she said slowly, "is it true what Elfie said? I mean what her father said? That you should have gotten a promotion from International before this? That they aren't paying you what they should?"

He moved restlessly across the room. "Gosh, Candy—I don't know. I nearly spoke to you about it a couple of times. I sort of wondered about it myself. I mean, after Henderson went and they gave me all the traffic work, and called me in on the conferences and everything. But Mr. Denstone has been swell to me. You know that. I figured he'd give me a raise when he thinks I'm worth it."

Candy swallowed and stiffened her spine. "I don't think that's good enough," she said bravely. "Bill, maybe they're sort of taking you for granted. Maybe it's time to make a change. A new experience—new problems—it's a sort of challenge, isn't it?"

He looked at her for a long moment and then he smiled, in the way that was Bill's own. "Maybe," he said. "Maybe you're right. You're a good sport, Candy."

She felt her cheeks color with pride. "Have you—have you spoken to Mr. Denstone about it?"

His smile faded. "That's the catch. He's in Washington, and he won't be back before the end of the week. Fancher wants to talk to me again on Thursday or Friday; he'll want to decide—and he'll want me to decide—before he goes West again next Monday. That means putting pressure on Mr. Denstone—and I hate to do that." He rattled his keys again. "But what else can I do?"

Candy got up decisively. "Nothing. Come along down to dinner, darling, and stop worrying. I think you're wonderful."

"Wait," said Bill. "I want to wash and put on my moccasins. What did Fancher's Flawless Flower do today?"

"Hardly anything," said Candy. "She just helped Ellen by cleaning her own room and spilling a bottle of ink on that nice gray carpet that Aunt Ella gave us."

"Ink! But ——"

"Oh, she thought very quickly," Candy assured him wearily. "She poured David's special milk on it. It only took me forty-five minutes to go down and get some more. And the ink is still on the rug."

Bill took a package of razor blades out of the bathroom cupboard and looked at them with affection. "Anything else?"

"Oh, nothing much. She just informed Ellen that the entire Irish nation were weak, unreliable and bad-tempered. Ellen gave notice. But I didn't hear her, so it doesn't count. Come down to dinner, darling."

"I suppose she's too intelligent to eat rat poison?" he asked.

"Hush. It's only five days more."

Tuesday was comparatively uneventful. Elfine broke one of a pair of Wedgwood vases, blew a fuse and went off to play with little Amy Bunnell. Some time later Candy got a telephone call from Amy's mother to say that Elfine was on her way home, having just made a short but cogent speech on the inferiority of the public-school system, with especial attention to New York State. She herself, it seemed, attended Miss Mann's School for Girls in Minneapolis (Tuition, $1400); Amy Bunnell, who was a prominent member of the fifth grade of P.S. 12 in Mustard Hill, had proceeded to violence, in the course of which her spectacles had become irrevocably bent. Candy offered to pay for the spectacles; Amy's mother rather coolly declined. Elfine, on her return, observed that the Bunnell child was dumb. The incident was closed.

It was on Wednesday that the climax came.

Elfine had spent a quiet morning, putting Ellen's Sunday gardenia into boiling water to preserve its freshness, and taking David for a brief stroll up Main Street while Candy did the marketing. A policeman returned them an hour later. They had been watching the installation of a sewer down by the water front, because, as Elfine reasonably explained, that was the sort of thing boys liked. Whether David had enjoyed the sewer or not, he was unable to say; he went to sleep on the way home from sheer exhaustion, and Candy's knees continued to shake until after lunch.

In the middle of the afternoon it began to rain, and Candy settled Elfine firmly by the living-room fire with a pile of old magazines and a pair of blunt scissors. She herself retired to her own room.

At five o'clock she was deep in a particularly satisfactory spy story, curled up on her chaise longue, when the sharp demand of the doorbell snatched her out of Middle Europe and brought her back to Mustard Hill. She heard Ellen cross the hall and open the front door; heard a man's deep voice and Ellen's respectful murmur, and then her hasty feet on the stairs.

"Sure, it's Mr. Denstone!" Ellen hissed, beckoning wildly.

If Candy had gone at once, the whole thing would never have happened. But she caught a glimpse of her ruffled hair in the mirror, and then took an extra moment for lipstick and powder. After all, Mr. Denstone had never just dropped in like this in all his life; and to have him come this afternoon, at just exactly the right time—well, it couldn't have been arranged better. Bill would be home very soon. Candy gave one last glance at her reflection. You didn't have to sparkle demurely at Mr. Denstone; you could just be yourself, Bill Stewart's wife.

She was halfway down the stairs when she heard Elfine's high, clear voice: "So my daddy is going to pay Mr. Stewart an awful

4 reasons why FLETCHER'S CASTORIA is the right laxative for your child.

1 Fletcher's Castoria is made especially for children. This is very important because children's delicate systems need a special laxative.

2 Fletcher's Castoria is pleasant to take. Children like the taste—so you don't have to force them to take it, and there's no struggle over getting it down.

3 Fletcher's Castoria is safe and mild, and thoroughly effective. It works efficiently, gently, without upsetting the child's sensitive system.

4 Fletcher's Castoria is free from harsh drugs. There is nothing in Fletcher's Castoria to cause griping or discomfort.

Fletcher's Castoria answers every need in a child's laxative. Ask your druggist for the package with the green band and laboratory control number on it.*

Always take a laxative only as directed on the package or by your physician.

Chas. H. Fletcher

CASTORIA

The original and genuine

What serious thing

are you trying to tell me?

That you wish to grow up more than pretty, with a vital, glowing strength that quickens those who know you? I dream of a substantial beauty for you, too, and will help you build these lasting assets now...

a well-shaped head ★ a fine, full chest

a strong back ★ sound teeth ★ straight legs

THE BASIS FOR YOUR BABY'S BEAUTY starts at birth, and every day she needs structural Vitamin D to help her build a beautifully proportioned framework. Because Squibb Cod Liver Oil supplies Vitamin D, it often is called "baby's beauty bottle." Get Squibb's for your baby today!

BABY BOYS GROW FASTER. At 6 months of age, boys average 33.7% taller than at birth, girls 32% taller. Since both grow rapidly these early months, they need Vitamin D, Squibb Cod Liver Oil, regularly every day.

SQUIBB cod liver oil

a name you can trust

Small Girl's Bedtime

BY ETHEL BARNETT DE VITO

In the mother-daughter hour upstairs,
Between the bathing and hearing
prayers,
Elizabeth's chatter always sped,
Like a homing bird, to a boy named
Fred.

His name was a well-known third-grade thing
That stood for mischief and whispering,
But even when it was sharply flung
She liked its sound on the teacher's tongue.

His looks weren't much—with his hair bright red
And stiff as wires around his head,
He was freckle-faced and thin and tall,
But she didn't mind his looks at all.

And she knew, she knew, he liked her, too,
By his valentine, scrawled with
"Guess who?"
By the way he noticed she was there
And called her "chubby" and pulled her hair.

And often the mother had to pause
To wonder a bit just what it was:
A child's light prattle, a child's chitchat
Or something beyond the bounds of that,

And wondering, wished she might be sped
To a day some dozen years ahead,
To know if truth or a child's brief whim
Was saying, "Someday I'll marry him."

lot of money and I guess they'll live in St. Paul. At least that's what they said. Won't that be nice? It's too bad you didn't pay Mr. Stewart enough, isn't it? Couldn't you afford to?"

Candy walked into the living room, absolutely cold from heels to head. "Mr. Denstone," she began, "I——"

But Mr. Denstone, who had got to his feet, interrupted her with a kind of ruthless courtesy. "I think, Candace, you'll understand if I run along, won't you? There doesn't seem to be much point in waiting for Bill, and under the circumstances——"

Candy said, "Mr. Denstone—please—I don't think you understand the circumstances at all."

He bowed a funny little old-fashioned bow. "Oh, I think I do. It's a good thing, Candace, that child was here. Good-by."

Candy turned slowly from the thud of the front door, and confronted Elfine.

"He was mad, wasn't he?" Elfine observed, with obvious pleasure.

"Go to your room," Candace told her levelly. "In the morning you are going back to your father."

Elfine's little face emptied of all expression except that of shock; and then it gradually crumpled. For one instant, Candy's heart felt the pinch of remorse. You can't be brutal to a child of ten. It's not her fault. Suppose it were David, Candy thought fiercely; I'd spank him. If she's so terribly clever, then she must know what she's done—and if she doesn't, she ought to. Elfine needs a hairbrush, and never mind about child psychology!

"Go upstairs," she said.

Elfine went, her shoulders quivering under her sobs. Candy stood at the foot of the stairs and watched her disappear.

"What's going on here?"

She whirled around to meet Bill. "Everything," she said grimly. "Everything you can think of. The absolute worst."

Bill stood very still, and his face looked queerly white. "David?"

CANDY drew a shaky breath. "No, darling—David is all right. This may take a little while. Would you like to wash first?"

The color returned slowly to his face. He sat down on the hall chair and took out a cigarette. "It hardly seems worth while, since I shall probably be committing suicide before dinner. Go on, angel. Tell me."

Candy told him. Before she had finished, Bill had ground out his cigarette and was sitting quietly, his hands in his pockets. Always, in a crisis, he shut his feelings closely within himself, so that she was quite unable to guess what he was thinking. His face now was without expression, his eyes unreadable.

"Well—that's all," Candy said at last.

"You didn't tell Mr. Denstone that I hadn't accepted Fancher's offer? That I was waiting for him to come back from Washington?"

"I never had the chance," Candy told him miserably. "He just—— What are you going to do?"

Bill had gone into the living room and was sitting down at the desk. He pulled out a sheet of paper. "Write my resignation from International Airways," he said.

A cold hand clutched Candy's heart. "But, Bill, I'm sure if you explained——"

"If Denstone can't trust me to behave decently and honestly toward the company, he can get somebody else he does trust," said Bill. "He's going to get this resignation in the morning mail."

"Oh," said Candy.

"AND another thing," Bill added, over his shoulder. "Elfine is not going back tomorrow. She's going back tonight."

"Oh," said Candy. "All right."

Dinner was a ghastly meal, punctuated by Ellen's triumphant breathing. But it was not until they were actually on their way up to Mr. Fancher's room in the hotel elevator that panic hit Candy like a high wind.

"Bill," she whispered, "Bill—what did he say when you telephoned?"

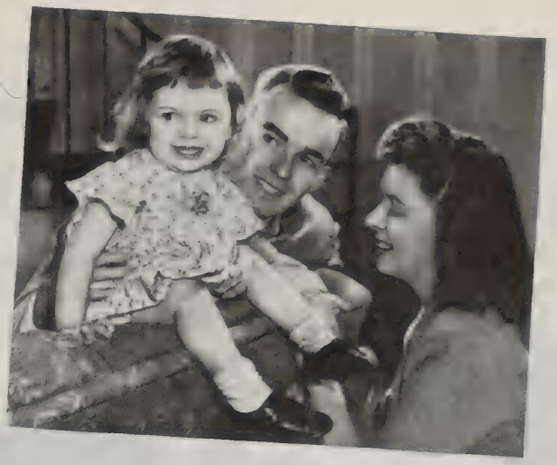
Bill glanced at Elfine's pallid little face and swollen eyes. "Nothing. Just that he'd be here."

Mr. Fancher opened the door at once. Elfine hurled herself upon him, bursting into fresh and penetrating sobs. "Maybe you'd better come in," said Mr. Fancher. "Now, what's this all about?"

Candy and Bill stood just inside the door, while Mr. Fancher sat down and took Elfine on his lap.

"I didn't do a thing!" she cried wildly. "I was just helping, daddy. You did say you'd pay him a lot of money to work for you, didn't you? You did! It wasn't my fault if that man got mad!"

Mr. Fancher looked at Bill over Elfie's head. "Perhaps you'd better explain, Stewart."



"Certainly, sir," Bill said quietly. "Elfine has caused us a good deal of trouble and inconvenience. We thought she'd be happier here with you than with us."

"I certainly would!" Elfine wailed.

But Mr. Fancher stood up abruptly; he was a very angry man. "I'm sorry to hear that," he said.

(Continued on Page 148)

"We were raised on Clapp's – and look what it's doing for our baby now!"

"I guess there's nothing very unusual in babies being raised on Clapp's and doing fine.

"But I wonder if there are many babies eating Clapp's today whose mothers and fathers ate Clapp's when they were babies the way Susan's father and I did," writes Mrs. Walter Williams, Jr., of Irondequoit, New York.

eeing our daughter Susan now, you'd never guess e's been a 'problem' baby. But indeed she was! The st few weeks she cried continually, and was such a inny little thing, we thought we were in for real ouble . . .

"But at 6 weeks the doctor put her on Clapp's cereal —and she started to pick right up. Soon afterward she got Clapp's strained foods, and we could hardly believe our eyes when we read the scales. At 1 year she weighed 22½ lbs.—more than triple her birth weight.

"Here's what I really wanted to tell you, though . . . About the time Susan started on Clapp's, and our feeding problems were really over, my husband and I were comparing notes about what our families had mentioned about our babyhood . . .

And we realized that both of us had been Clapped babies, back in the days when Clapp's made the ery first baby foods! So that makes two generations in ur family brought up on your wonderful foods. And e've all thrived!

"Our Susan is 22 months old now. She started walking at 10 months, and sometimes it seems as if she hasn't sat down since! I know her well-rounded diet has a lot to do with her good health and bounding vitality. So you can see why I'm so grateful to Clapp's!"

Why your baby will thrive on Clapp's!

- Ever since Clapp's originated baby foods 25 years ago, we've made all our foods to fill doctors' requirements.

- We've constantly improved our formulas, added new foods, according to doctors' suggestions. Now we offer "the world's largest baby menu."
- We make every test we can, because we want to.
- We discard many fruits and vegetables that would be perfectly acceptable for adults, but not, in our judgment, for Clapp-fed babies.

- All our foods are pressure-cooked – to help retain vitamins and minerals, fresh color and flavor.
- We have seen two generations of babies raised on Clapp's. Our business, we believe, is the most important business in the world. It is our sole business, not a side line.

- Perhaps this is why so many doctors prescribe Clapp's regularly.

CLAPP'S
25th Anniversary

CLAPP'S BABY FOODS

25 YEARS OF THRIVING BABIES!

PRODUCTS OF AMERICAN HOME FOODS, INC.

Little Broadway Actress
DIANE WOODS
says "Here's the reason milk makes a big hit with me!"

DIANE WOODS, in the cast of "Song of Norway," New York stage success

Diane's joined up with that fast-growing young set—Bosco's "public"! She's found out nothing makes milk taste so "yummy" as delicious chocolate-flavored Bosco. And Diane drinks lots of Bosco-and-milk—for eight shows a week keep her stepping! Bosco will make milk a "big hit" with your children, too—so get some soon!

Bosco adds Iron and Vitamin D, too!

Yes, Bosco is more than a chocolate-flavored syrup to turn milk to "glamour stuff" for your youngster! Just four teaspoons in the "daily quart" supply both the Iron and Vitamin D a normal child must get every day. Because Bosco is a syrup, it takes only a jiffy to mix . . . blends smoothly with milk. Bosco is economical, too! Treat your child to Bosco!

Today's Bosco is the same high quality product as ever. You may not find it at your grocer's at all times, due to sugar shortage, but when you do—what a satisfaction to know you're getting the best!

(Continued from Page 146)

"I'm sorry to have to tell you," Bill answered, still quietly.

"But I don't consider it an explanation, by a long shot," went on Mr. Fancher. "You people take this child for as long as it suits you and then come in here, late at night, with some cock-and-bull story about her causing trouble—a child of ten."

Quite suddenly Candy's temper snapped. She tossed her hair back over her shoulder in a gesture which her brother Johnny would have recognized at once. Johnny would have departed swiftly. Mr. Fancher did not.

"I can give you an explanation, Mr. Fancher," she said icily. "I think it's high time someone did. Elfine is a very spoiled little girl. She can't keep out of other people's affairs, she repeats everything she hears—and she hears everything. Elfine," said Candy, her cheeks burning, "isn't nearly so clever as you and Mrs. Fancher have let her believe."

"I have an I.Q. of a hundred and thirty-six!" Elfine shouted.

Candy looked at her with cold distaste. "I don't care if you have an I.Q. of a hundred and sixty—and that's genius. You don't know how to make other people happy. You break their things and spill them and boil gardenias and you talk!"

"Boil gardenias? Talk?" Mr. Fancher looked stunned.

Candy felt Bill's hand under her arm, and she subsided, shaking but silent.

"Mr. Fancher," Bill said, "I don't think you'd understand if we could tell you."

"I guess not," Mr. Fancher agreed heavily. "I guess not. I don't know what to say to you, Stewart."

"You don't have to say anything, sir."

Mr. Fancher glanced at him sharply. "I don't want you to think there's anything personal in this. I'm not often wrong in my judgment, but sometimes I make a mistake like any ——"

Bill spoke brusquely. "Nonsense, Mr. Fancher—of course it's personal! You're not going to hire a man who maltreats y child."

Mr. Fancher turned unexpectedly on daughter. "Stop that sniffling, Elfie! You home now. Daddy'll take care of you." turned to Bill again. "I'm mighty sorry t had to happen. But as I see it ——"

Bill opened the door abruptly. "Let's j say we both made a mistake. Good nig Mr. Fancher."

Candy could hardly keep up with him he strode through the hotel lobby. To sp to him was quite impossible: every facu was concentrated on keeping her emoti under decent control until they could inside their own front door. Once there, pulled off her hat and collapsed on the h chair. Slow tears rolled down her face, an silly, irrelevant thought wandered miserab through her mind: When I first got marrie used to bawl like Elfine when things got aw Now I just sort of drip tears. I suppose growing old.

Bill put his arm around her. "All rig baby, go ahead and cry. I don't blame yo Candy drew a long, painful breath. "I not crying because of what happened. I crying because it's all my fault."

"Oh, don't be silly," said Bill, and mopp her face with his handkerchief. It was traordinarily comforting—so comforting t Candy wanted desperately to throw her on his shoulder and give way to grief co pletely. Instead, she forced herself to sit right on the stiff chair; she made the te stop crawling down her cheeks. She sw lowed hard and said:

"It was all because of heaven and hell the three-foot fork."

Bill stared at her in anxiety. "Co you—er—clarify that a little?"

"Don't you remember? That story daddy's—people in heaven helping e other. I was just trying to help."

Bill grinned suddenly. "Oh, I see. Y were being kind to Elfine."

Candy clutched his arm. "But you d see. I wasn't being kind to Elfine—tha

Mrs. Eva Johnson, Akron, Ohio, with baby son her soldier husband has not yet seen

Getting Big For Daddy!

With Evenflo's efficient valve-action nipple, mothers know their babies will nurse in comfort, finish their bottles better and gain more weight. And they appreciate Evenflo's handy nipple, bottle, cap all-in-one unit that's easier to use and saves time. Evenflo Nursers 25c at baby shops, drug, dept. stores. Separate nipple, bottle or cap 10c each.

Evenflo
America's Most Popular Nurser

GIVE THIS FAMOUS BABY BOOK
The GIFT New Mothers Love!

"OUR BABY'S FIRST SEVEN YEARS"

A PRICELESS RECORD of a child's growth, and a beautiful gift—with valuable scientific records and guides for child care. Filled with charming illustrations in full colors—just the gift for new mothers!

In pink or blue cloth. ONLY $2.50

Now in 16th Edition · Over 450,000 Copies Sold

If Your Dealer Cannot Supply You—Order Direct From—MOTHERS' AID—CHICAGO LYING-IN HOSPITAL
3842 MARYLAND AVE. • CHICAGO, ILL.

e whole point. I was being kind to El-ıe—for a reason. I was really trying to ease Mr. Fancher."

Bill glanced at her, and away. "Tell me mething, Candy. Did you know he was ›ing to offer me a job?"

"No—no, of course not. But I sort of—ıessed. And I thought if we took care of his ttle girl ——"

Bill grinned again. "You mean you ran to a little trouble with mixed motives?" andy nodded miserably. Bill laughed out-ght. "Don't you know you'd have taken ıre of Elfine anyway—whether there was a ›b for me attached to it or not? Your mo-ves are less mixed than anyone's I know."

"But I've ruined every-ıing! You haven't got a ›b!"

Bill said with unaccus-›med fervor, "You're rong, woman. I haven't ot two jobs."

"But what will happen › us, Bill?"

"We'll starve to death," Bill said cheer-ılly. "So let's go have some of Ellen's hocolate cake now."

"I couldn't eat," Candy moaned.

"This isn't the way to behave when your usband's fresh out of work." Bill was stern. You're supposed to be quietly heroic."

She took a deep breath and stood up. "All ight, I'll be heroic. It's the least I can do."

But it was all very well to laugh with the ›roper degree of gaiety while they ate cake nd drank milk and Bill suggested slogans or Fancher's Famous Flour. (You've Made Your Bread, Now Lie on It. . . . Say It With Flour. . . . And So to Bread.) To keep it up was another matter. Candy was rightened. Bill only knew airways—he had ıever worked at anything else. It wasn't a question of having no faith in Bill—it was he future itself she doubted. Always it had ›een a clear panorama, stretching peacefully ›efore them. And now there was no future ıt all—just a curtain of fog.

She thought, with an aching sympathy, of other women whose men were jobless, who had not one baby but two or three, and no parents to fall back upon. (But Bill would die before he accepted help from Mr. Goodwin.)

In the morning she was dressing to go to town. She and Bill were having lunch together.

In the mirror she met her own eyes. Just a few days ago she and Bill had been completely happy. And now —— Candy decided to put on bright red fingernail polish. Something had to be done.

When the telephone rang, she answered, and heard Bill's voice; and there was something in it that made her nerves tingle in response.

"Darling," he said, "are you wearing your best hat? The beaver one?"

"No. Why?"

"You better."

"But why, Bill?"

He cleared his throat and her heart seemed to have risen in her chest. "Mr. Denstone," he said, "is taking us out to lunch."

Candy screamed, "What?"

"Ouch, stop it! I can't talk now." His voice sank to a murmur. "He—he apologized. He came in last night to tell me ——"

"To tell you what?" Candy shouted.

"A—well, a promotion. I can't talk."

There was a silence on the telephone for several seconds.

Then Candy said, "I'm coming, darling. Right away. Bill!"

"Yes?"

"I've just thought of something. My helping was sort of like Elfine's, wasn't it?"

"What? What are you talking about?"

"Elfine," said Candy, feeling suddenly drunk with happiness, "wore a three-foot fork too."

"Sure," said Bill. "Only hers was a pitchfork. Put on your hat, and come!"

A hospital is a place where they wake you up at 5:30 to tell you breakfast will be ready at 7:30.

—J. POPE CLUGSTON.

Don't try to blow that cold away

When those nostrils are clogged with thick mucus, and breathing through that cold-sick nose is almost impossible—don't try to blow the congested passages open! Hard blowing makes tender membranes sore, may even increase the stopped-up discomfort!

No cure for a head cold has yet been found, but that tormenting, smothering stuffiness, that smarting irritation around nose and mouth can be relieved quickly. See how Mentholatum helps.

Easy Way To Open Stuffy Nostrils...Soothe Irritation

Applied right in the nose and snuffed well back, Mentholatum strikes promptly at nasal discomforts with 4 vital actions:

1. Helps thin out thick mucus—your nose starts to clear.
2. Soothes cold-inflamed membranes—nose soreness eases up.
3. Helps reduce swelling, congestion—soon you can breathe again.
4. Helps Nature heal by increasing circulation in "sick" area.

Don't go on "suffering" right through a heavy cold. At any stage, use soothing, cooling Mentholatum for quick relief!

SEND FOR FREE TRIAL SIZE

The Mentholatum Co.
Dept. L-23, Wilmington 99, Del.

At no expense to me, please send a free sample, so I can prove what comfort Mentholatum can bring.

*Name*_____

*Address*_____

Get MENTHOLATUM!

"I'm tellin ya, honey... No Double Trouble for us!!"

JACK: I'm givin' ya the real lowdown . . . every Mommy who wants her baby to have the smoothest, healthiest skin should be sure to give baby these twin blessings of Mennen Antiseptic Baby Oil . . .

JILL: Works double! One: bein' antiseptic, Mennen Baby Oil helps prevent diaper rash, urine irritation, lotsa other skin troubles . . .

JACK: Two: Good-bye roughness an' dryness; Mennen Baby Oil helps keep skin soft an' smooth. Follow the advice of most doctors and hospitals, double-bless your baby with Mennen!

JILL: Us Mennen babies smell so sweet. Get Mennen Baby Oil and Baby Powder now to have on hand for baby's first day home!

4 TIMES AS MANY DOCTORS PREFER MENNEN ANTISEPTIC BABY OIL AS ANY OTHER.*

MORE BABY SPECIALISTS PREFER MENNEN ANTISEPTIC BABY POWDER THAN ANY OTHER.*

Twin Blessings for Baby—

MENNEN

*Nationwide surveys

BE SURE TO USE MENNEN ANTISEPTIC BABY POWDER to help keep baby's skin comfy and healthy. Super-smooth! New scent makes baby smell sweet. 3 out of 4 doctors say baby powder should be antiseptic, and MENNEN *is!

Johnson's Baby Lotion
ANTISEPTIC

★ So great an advance in baby skin care that it's replaced old methods in hundreds of hospitals!

★ So much pleasanter that mothers are saying good-by forever to sticky, messy preparations!

Glorious day for mamas and babies!

Meet Johnson's Baby Lotion—a most wonderful, hospital-tested lotion that does every job of baby skin care and does it better!

So smooth and white that nursery tasks are worlds pleasanter! So scientifically right that baby skin irritations are cut down to a new low!

Protect your baby's skin this modern lotion way. Quick, mother—a bottle of Johnson's Baby Lotion!

Hospital Tests Show Far Fewer Irritations!

When tested in hospitals on newborn babies, Johnson's Baby Lotion reduced incidence of common skin irritations by sensational percentages!

Records prove far fewer cases of prickly heat, urine irritation, etc. than with old-style preparations.

Johnson's Baby Lotion lets baby's skin breathe! It's a homogenized emulsion of specially selected mineral oil, lanolin, and water, with an antiseptic added. Leaves a network film on baby's skin—not a solid layer. Perspiration can escape. Yet urine can't get in to irritate!

No wonder hundreds of hospitals have switched to Johnson's Baby Lotion!

Good-by to Sticky, Messy, Old-Style Preparations!

Now—find new pleasantness in caring for baby's skin!

Forget those messy, heavy, oily preparations. Instead—at bath time, at diaper changes, whenever baby's skin needs protection—smooth on this white, clean-smelling lotion! Nicer for you—nicer for baby!

No wonder mothers everywhere are switching to Johnson's Baby Lotion!

Johnson's Baby Lotion

Johnson & Johnson

H. ARMSTRONG ROBERTS

It's two-way devotion. The puppy waits for his young master to romp and play. And Junior turns to his pet when the adult world becomes too demanding.

A Pet is Part of Growing Up

By Evelyn Sager

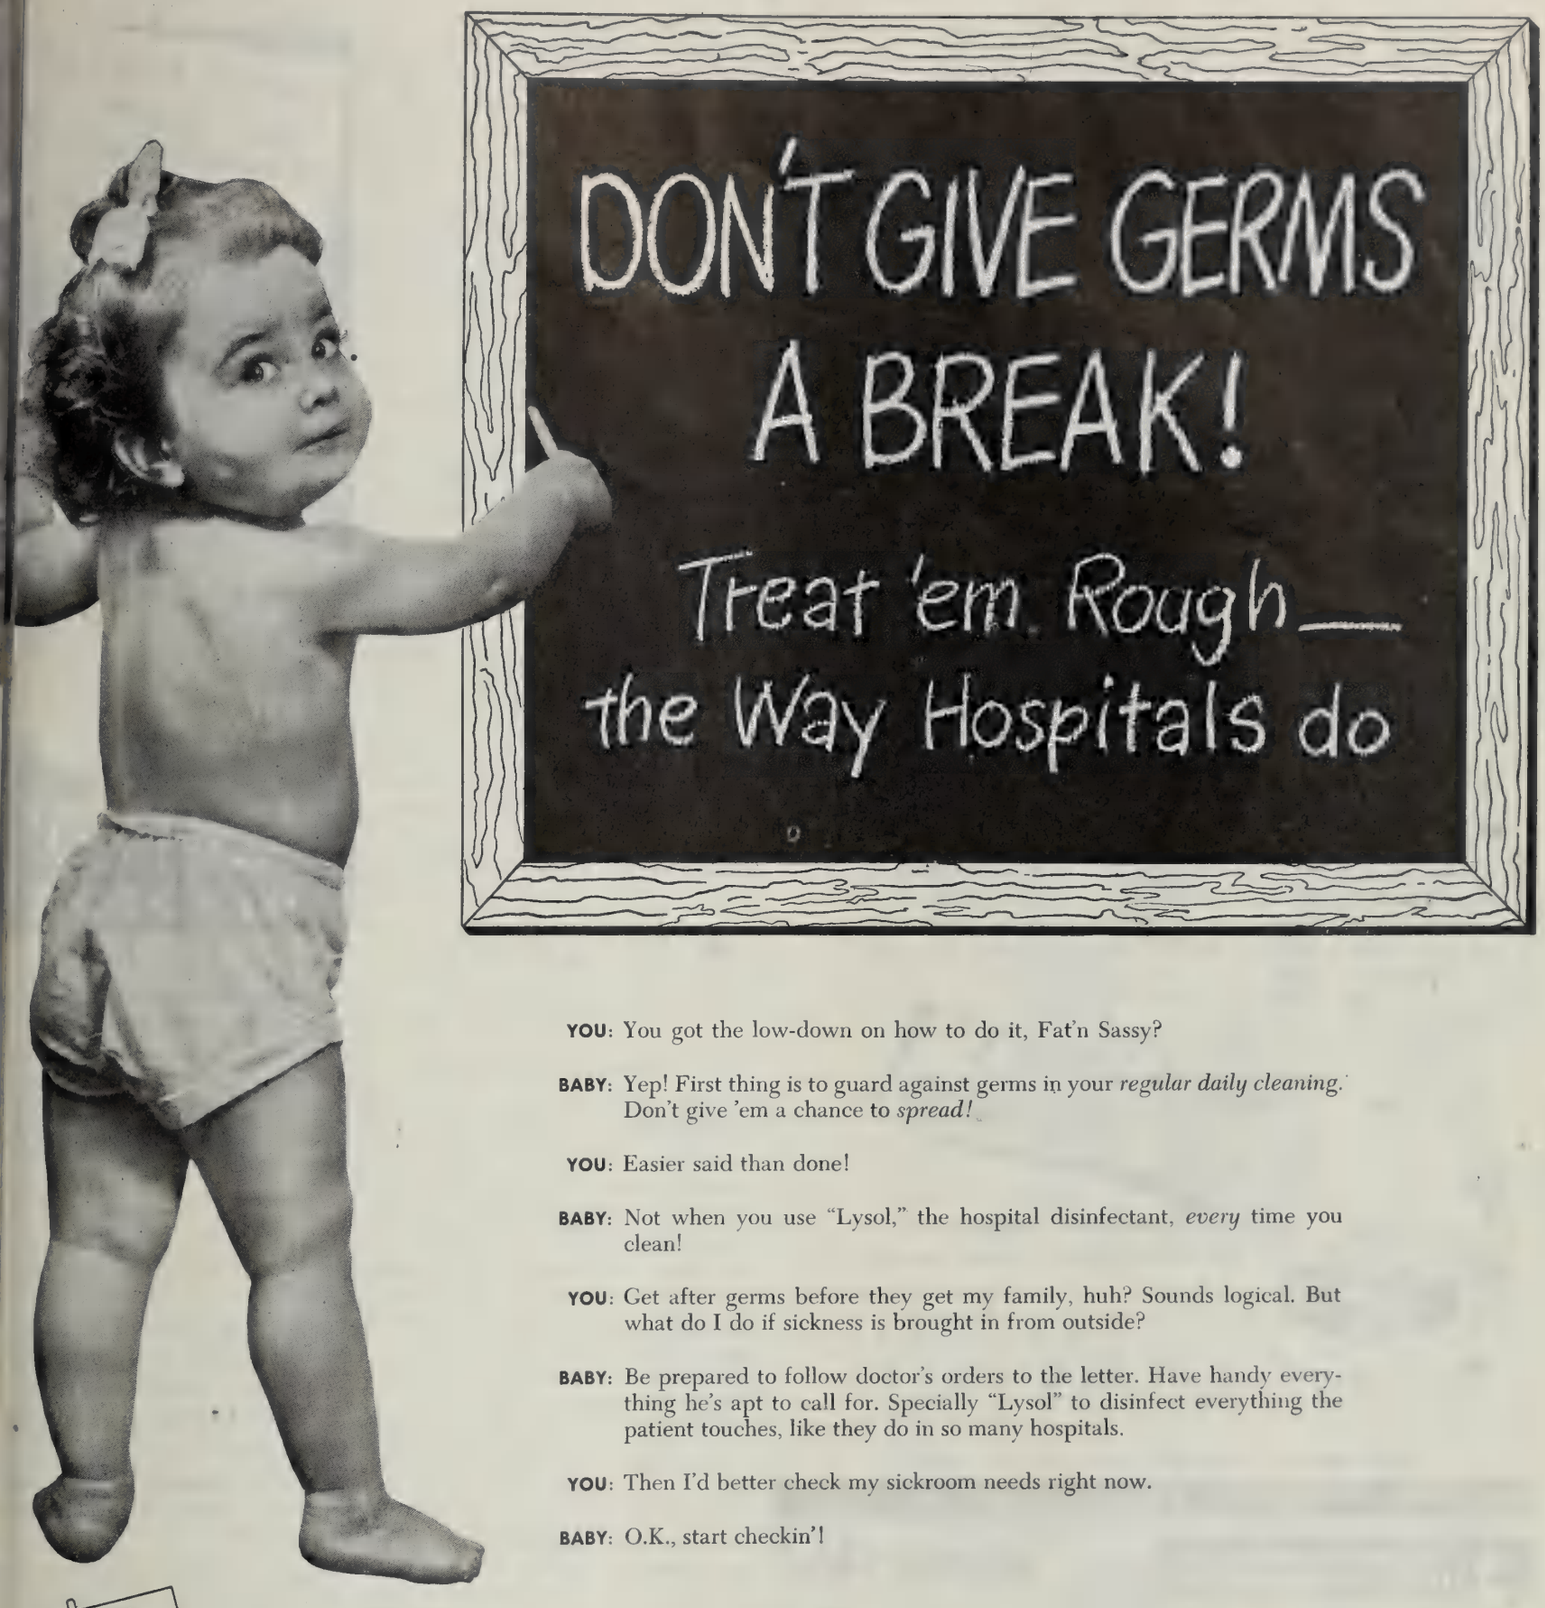
RECENTLY a small boy in Little Rock, Arkansas, heard a radio commentator report that the Philadelphia zoo was seeking a foster home for three orphaned lion cubs. The youngster promptly sent the following letter to the zoo:

I will take the cubs and give them a good home. I can get enough for them to eat. Please send them as soon as possible. I am enclosing $1.00 postage.

A lion cub may not be your idea of a suitable animal companion for your child. Or you may raise an eyebrow at the thought of widening your domestic circle to include a trained cockroach, a one-eyed mule or a deskunked skunk. You may even balk at having your ordered existence cluttered up with the more conventional pets—the prolific rabbit, the doubtful alley cat or the hard-to-care-for pedigreed pup. But if your child has his heart set on a pet—and if there is no hardship involved—let him have it. He will be missing an integral part of childhood if you refuse. A pet is part of growing up—and a functional part too.



That underslung guinea pig your son is boarding in the back yard can be as vital to him as milk, orange juice and carrots at mealtime. The pig is stimulating the growth of something in Johnny that cannot be checked with weekly pencil marks on the nursery wall. It is building your child's ego.

First and foremost, a pet satisfies a child's need for an uncritical, undemanding playmate—a friend. No matter how sharply Johnny has been scolded for his latest fall from grace, his puppy still greets him with adoring recognition. His puppy does not issue a constant staccato of orders—as grown-ups are wont to do—or designate himself "boss" like the bigger boy next door. A puppy will take orders. And a puppy belongs to and depends upon its young master for fun and affection.

Boys' Clubs of America have recognized that "puppy love" can be a powerful force for buttressing an insecure ego. Rusty is a case in point. Rusty wasn't a problem child. He was more of a thorn in the flesh for the tolerant club workers. Rusty's sullen, I-don't-care attitude was steadily wearing away their patience—until the afternoon he appeared in the director's office with a flea-ridden mongrel and traces of fresh tears smudging his cheek. Please, sir, Rusty asked, could he keep his dog at the club? His mother would not allow the animal in the small, overcrowded apartment. The director consented—not without deep misgivings—to Rusty's request. But within a few months the director's moment of weakness paid large dividends. Rusty had become an active, affable club member. The warmth and pride he derived from his new friend supplied the emotional support he had been missing in an overcrowded, overworked household.

Your youngster's pet may be more than his first love. It may be a safety valve for a too-muchness of energy and feeling. It may provide what psychologists learnedly term "an outlet for aggression." They remind us that countless times a day a small child is subjected to a succession of adult do's and don'ts. Necessary restrictions, it is granted. But the child's suppressed energies are bound to find outlets elsewhere. That is one reason why tiny tots will pull a dog's tail or tweak a cat's whiskers—until the animal rebels. Under wise guidance a youngster can divert this aggression into more constructive bypaths: into teaching his dog a new trick, renovating the rabbit hutch or merely taking a companionable walk with his pet to the corner grocery store for "something for supper."

If you are a social-minded parent, eager to encourage the traits that will mold your offspring into a solid citizen of the future, you may discover an unexpected ally in a pet. Responsibility is one of the primary social traits a pet can foster. (Continued on Page 152)

YOU: You got the low-down on how to do it, Fat'n Sassy?

BABY: Yep! First thing is to guard against germs in your regular daily cleaning. Don't give 'em a chance to spread!

YOU: Easier said than done!

BABY: Not when you use "Lysol," the hospital disinfectant, every time you clean!

YOU: Get after germs before they get my family, huh? Sounds logical. But what do I do if sickness is brought in from outside?

BABY: Be prepared to follow doctor's orders to the letter. Have handy everything he's apt to call for. Specially "Lysol" to disinfect everything the patient touches, like they do in so many hospitals.

YOU: Then I'd better check my sickroom needs right now.

BABY: O.K., start checkin'!

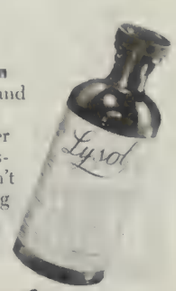
Fever Thermometer

Hot Water Bottle



Bedpan

Absorbent Cotton

First Aid Kit

More women use "Lysol" brand disinfectant than any other household disinfectant! Don't ever risk being without it!

MORAL: Every single time you clean . . . disinfect with "Lysol" Brand Disinfectant

REG. U.S. PAT. OFF.

"LYSOL" is the registered trade-mark of Lehn & Fink Products Corporation and any use thereof in connection with products not made by it constitutes an infringement thereof.

Copr., 1946, by Lehn & Fink Products Corp.

childhood posture

Your doctor will tell you tender baby bones need every care. Just as proper diet makes them grow strong, so can the proper mattress help them grow straight. The Kantwet crib mattress is especially made for this. Its firm level design means baby will be supported where support is needed. There's extra filling where the weight is greatest. The patented sealed tufting means the support will last as long as the mattress. And being wetproof, Kantwet saves work for Mother. Just wipe it clean in the crib.

For a straight, sturdy back

KANTWET Innerspring Crib MATTRESS

*Reg. U. S. Pat. Off.

FOR THE OLDER CHILD

RITE-HITE, JR. SEAT

It lifts little chins comfortably over the table when babies graduate from high chairs. And (confidentially, Mother) you and Dad will find it handy for roadside picnics, boating, watching outdoor sports, or a dozen and one other uses. It's waterproof, washable.

Avoid substitutes—insist on products labeled "Kantwet"

Nursery Furniture Pads for all Purposes

Design Smart Fashions
LEARN AT HOME-SPARE TIME

Fascinating field. Design own wardrobe at considerable saving. Gain experience designing for others. It may lead to thrilling career—even a shop of your own some day. Basic "learn-by-doing" course under guidance of qualified teachers provides excellent starting point for a career. Send for free booklet, "A Career in Dress Designing."

NATIONAL SCHOOL OF DRESS DESIGN
1315 So. Michigan Ave. Dept. 1373 Chicago 5, Ill.

Is yours an Allergic Skin?

In cosmetics, too, physicians know best. Ask your doctor about AR-EX Cosmetics. At leading drug stores. Write for FREE BOOKLET: "New Facts on Skin Care."

AR-EX Cosmetics FOR SENSITIVE SKINS

AR-EX COSMETICS, INC., 1036-A W. Van Buren St., Chicago 7, Ill.

The smartest looking youngsters wear

DE LIS *fashions!

Outfit your Infants and Children the DE LIS way by Mail . . . It's as convenient and simple as sitting in an arm-chair!

Our brand new Spring and Summer catalog is out . . . with a gay, charming selection of modestly priced clothes for the crib-crowd to the roller-skating gang . . . and so beautifully illustrated that you and the young fry will read it like a book!

For your free copy, write to: DE LIS FASHIONS, 218 Chartres, New Orleans 16, Louisiana. Dept. M86

KEEP BABY SNUG AND SAFE with *Ducky Blanket Fasteners

FEDERAL TOOL CORP.
CHICAGO 12, ILLINOIS

(Continued from Page 150)

As one psychologist explains, there are almost no genuine chores left for a youngster to perform in a household under our mass-production, mechanized way of life. Bringing in the milk bottles in the morning is merely a token task—harking back to the days when a young boy would have milked the cows or carried the brimming milk pails up from the barn. But taking care of a pet—the regular and sometimes irksome jobs of feeding, exercising and grooming—these are tangible rather than token responsibilities for a young person. He can learn and grow in performing his routine assignments. Of course the tasks have to be graded according to size. A child can start at three by putting out the cat's saucer of milk; by the time he is eleven or twelve, he is able to take on the entire job of feeding his pet.

The most faithful of youngsters may slip up occasionally. One mother we know has developed an effective reminder system for young and short memories. When her son forgets to feed his voiceless white rabbits, the mother "forgets" her son's lunch. A healthy, hungry youngster soon realizes how unhappy his rabbits are—because he is experiencing the same gnawing emptiness in his own innards.

Even highly observant parents may not realize that a youngster's absorption with his pets—which can be both a bore and a bother to grownups—is leading him along the road to other commendable traits such as perseverance, patience and concentration. The child doesn't know his character is being shaped when he is caring for his animals. He's just having fun!

There are also lessons to be learned in the social niceties and necessities. Following in the unpredictable wake of his pet, a child may stub his toe on such solemn adult precepts as privacy and property. The study door is closed to a noisy dog and his young master when daddy is working. And Junior is called down when his puppy chews the cook's day-out shoes, when his enceinte cat injudiciously selects the guest-room bed for her lying-in, when his rabbits nibble carrot tops in the neighbor's garden. He may stumble on the do's and don'ts of the world outside his home too. These are called city ordinances, and are concerned with leashes, licenses and laws against keeping guinea pigs in city cellars.

Of the ten million things which a discreet married man should not do, the most dangerous of all is to attempt to surprise his wife.

—EVAN R. CHESTERMAN: Things Mundane. (Neale Pub. Co.)

When your child steps beyond the accustomed safety and security of his house and garden, a pet may be his passport to the society of other children—as it was for young Bobby. Bobby was a shy, backward seven-year-old, who always stood on the outside of the group. But after a spindly-legged police puppy loped into his life, a new note of assurance was evident in Bobby's voice and bearing. He was soon demonstrating his protégé as the "smartest and best dog in the whole world." With ungrudging admiration, the boys admitted Bobby to the group.

There is still another door through which any pet—be it fish, fowl or feline—can take your child and lead him far beyond the nursery, the corner sand lot or the complex city around him. An animal will introduce your child to the limitless world of Nature. Your youngster may strike up an acquaintance with a chattering squirrel or a hungry robin in the back yard and wonder why these friends will not share his house—like the canary, the kitten and the collie. Or when he's older, he will collect cocoons that miraculously become caterpillars—caterpillars that surprise him by becoming butterflies.

With the aid of an unself-conscious and helpfully explaining parent, a child can learn about reproduction through his pet. In fact, Mary T. Penshaw, of the educational OLD-FASHIONED diaper scrubbing—so hard on hands and back—is gone forever when your baby wears surgical-weave Curity Diapers. These diapers are not only washed easier and faster, they have other important features, too.

1. Faster drying speeds diaper laundering, indoors or out.

2. Highly absorbent — surgical weave absorbs more thoroughly.

3. Foldline, woven permanently in to fabric, makes it easy to adjust the fold to growing babies.

4. Have no hems to irritate baby's tender skin.

5. Easier to wash — open weave speedily cleansed with pure Ivory Flakes.

Mothers, medical authorities, and leading hospitals use and endorse Curity Diapers. Buy Curity Diapers at your favorite infants' store.

KENDALL MILLS, Walpole, Massachusetts

A KENDALL PRODUCT

NURSERY PADS · BIBS · MASKS · COTTON

Curity Surgical Dressings at drug stores

division of the A.S.P.C.A., suggests that parents make a point of getting a pet that will have offspring about the time they're planning to explain a few things to a curious child. But psychiatrists sound a warning note here: too many children, they say, grow into and out of adolescence unable to make the logical connection between sex in rabbits and sex in human beings—a failure stemming directly from an embarrassed adult attitude and an avoidance of facts.

Parents are not spectators in the child-pet relationship. They have an important behind-the-scenes role to play. Most of them began to play the part when they gave their infant his first pink velvet bunny, guided him through his first barnyard picture book, took him on his first tour of the zoo. Hollywood helped with this superb public-relations job by making such pictures as Bambi, Mickey Mouse and Lassie Come Home. Thus when a child meets his own puppy or panda for the first time he is prepared for an affectionate and loyal playmate.

A note of caution or precaution would not be amiss in arranging that first meeting between the youngster and his new friend. They will probably be soul mates from the first moment. But it is helpful, in introducing a small child to his new pet, to choose an auspiciously pleasant moment. If a child loves his bath, have the puppy make a debut when the youngster is sloshing around in his tub. A kitten-ice cream tie-up might do the trick. Make the first meeting short, successive meetings longer. Be careful that the puppy does not overpower a toddling tot with an uninhibited display of affection and energy. But even more important, do not be afraid for the child. If he is momentarily frightened, remember his experience will last but briefly in his childish memory. Adult fears, on the other hand, may prove more consistent and more contagious, and may lay the groundwork in a child for a lifelong fear of animals.

When the question of a pet comes up in your household, think a bit beyond such inconveniences as trained mice in your cupboards, puppies underfoot and canaries in your hair. If you put up with this merry menagerie—with a mixture of long-suffering tolerance and long-lasting amusement—you will be giving your child an important part of childhood. A pet is an integral part of growing up—and fun too.

OUR READERS WRITE US

(Continued from Page 13)

South that Cid Ricketts Sumner shows in Quality, there would be no problem. . . . I, the daughter of a Civil War veteran and slave owner, feel personally grateful for her story. Sincerely, JANE N. BARKER.

More Boxes for Babies

Indiana University, Bloomington, Indiana.

Dear Mr. Gould: You may be interested to know that between 75 and 100 apparatuses ("Baby in a Box") are now in course of construction by your readers. I have been sending out mimeographed material giving details of the apparatus I built to those who asked for them. How many of these will be actually completed I cannot say, but the letters still coming in certainly indicate a desperate need for some such device.

Sincerely yours,

B. F. SKINNER,
Chairman, Psychology Dept.

Music to Our Ears:

Glen Ellyn, Illinois.

Gentlemen: I consider "Making Music Fun" the finest article on a subject dealing with music education, to appear in a leading "lay" magazine in many years.

Sincerely yours,

RAYMOND N. CARR,
Chairman Press Relations Committee, Music Educators National Conference.

We don't think it that good, but do enjoy hearing our readers exaggerate. ED.

Try to Find Babies for Adoption!

New York, New York.

Gentlemen: During the last six months I have been making the rounds, here and in the District of Columbia, in the attempt to find a baby or young child for adoption. Babies have become so involved in bureaucracy, and procedures so rigid, that both children for adoption and would-be parents are going to suffer very seriously. My own experience would not, of course, be significant it it were unique. But other people hunting for babies, as well as some doctors and officials, feel that while the new laws undoubtedly correct an obvious evil, they have already created other and perhaps more serious evils.

Sincerely,

MARJORIE CLARK EGLOFF.

The woman who, wanting babies, cannot bear them herself, will find that there are more aspiring parents than adoptable babies and that, in a legitimate effort to protect babies from exploitation, social workers tend to strangle both parents and children with red tape. ED.

Jobs are a Living Memorial

Mechanicsville, Iowa.

Dear Editors: Two years ago the American Legion Post of Mechanicsville was left $20,000 by the late Henry Siever. Teams of men and women canvassed the town of 600 and the surrounding countryside raising $30,000, which, added to the $20,000 bequest, will build a community recreation center as a living war memorial dedicated to our veterans.

We also hope to provide jobs for some returning veterans by employing them in the building of our memorial.

Sincerely,

MRS. HAROLD L. GIBEAUT.

Free Lots for Veterans

Cody, Wyoming.

Dear Editors: The Buffalo Bill Memorial Association of Cody (pop. 3000) has started a fund for the construction of a War Memorial Building. There will be a large central room for housing records, pictures and trophies of heroes from this area. A wing will house the geology exhibit and library; other wings will be meeting places for veterans and a place for art exhibits.

Also Mr. Charles Henson is offering to war veterans fifty free lots desirable for building homes. Yours sincerely,

MRS. GLENN E. LIVINGSTON.

Brahms "Hot Licks"

Toronto, Canada.

Dear Sirs: A cheer for Rachel Kemper! I, too, am a teen-ager who has yet to find a modern that can beat out "hot licks" equal to Brahms' Hungarian Dances. I'd give almost my last cent for any record of Glenn Miller's, but those hashes of Chopin's "Polonaise" make me want to throw things. Yours sincerely,

"JACKY" THOMPSON.

No Mood for Wagner

Seattle, Washington.

Dear Editors: Miss Kemper makes me angry. We have certain moods which neither Pinza nor Wagner would fit.

Popular music fits in with the temper of the days; classical, with that of the years. But we seem to need tunes that make our fingers snap and our feet tap. That's part of being young. Sincerely,

JACKIE EVANSON.

Parents Can Help Teachers

Willoughby, Ohio.

Dear Editors: If Mr. McIntire ("Check List for Parents: II") wants the schools to be completely responsible for the physical and mental health of the next generations, he must persuade the public to

(Continued on Page 155)

Cinderella's
"MAGIC TOUCH"
is the Touch of Beauty in Dresses for your Child!

Let your own eyes discover why Cinderella Frocks are the most popular of all children's dresses! Simply compare with any dress at any price. See the beauty—the clearcut superiority of Cinderella Frocks in . . .

STYLE! Observe how authentic and original these colorful styles are. And notice Cinderella's "smart style details" in applique-work, embroidery, etc.
WORKMANSHIP! Notice finishing of hems, seams, buttonholes, sleeve and neck-bindings. Compare size of stitches . . . see how much finer Cinderella's are.
MATERIAL! See how much better quality you get for your money! (Cinderella's fabrics are guaranteed fast color—including the striking, colorful Dan River Fabrics illustrated above.)

Next time you buy children's dresses, look for the famous Cinderella label—your guarantee of Cinderella's "Magic Touch" in design, detail, durability. You cannot make or buy a better child's dress at this price!

Sizes 3 to 14

About $3 in leading stores

Cinderella
FROCKS FOR GIRLS
FEATURING THE FAMOUS DAN RIVER FABRICS

Rosenau Bros. Inc., Philadelphia

Beautiful Hair

B R E C K

Beautiful Hair always seems to add to the beauty of a little child. The care of your children's hair, whether in the home or at your beauty shop, is much more important than mothers may sometimes realize. Your Beauty Shop owner or one of her assistants will be glad to help you with the care of your children's hair. She will also be glad to tell you about a complete line of preparations made for the care of the hair – the Breck Preparations – Shampoos, Hair Lotions, Hair Creams and Specialty Preparations. These Breck Preparations are used in the Breck Method Hair and Scalp Treatments. Your Beauty Shop owner will not only help you with her skill when you are in her Beauty Shop, but she will also be glad to suggest the right shampoo, hair creams and hair lotions for you to use when you care for your hair in your home.

Breck Preparations are available in Beauty Shops, Drug and Department Stores throughout the United States and Canada

JOHN H BRECK INC · MANUFACTURING CHEMISTS · SPRINGFIELD 3 MASSACHUSETTS
CANADIAN ADDRESS 47 CLARENCE STREET · OTTAWA

(Continued from Page 153)

spend the money to provide the necessary facilities. We all know that teachers are underpaid. Not only that, they are expected to live in a manner suitable to their professional standing. Is this the fault of the school systems, or of the community which votes the tax levies?

We all know schools where the children think it is "smart never to crack a book." In my experience those schools have existed in communities where parents criticized and even ridiculed the teachers and the educational systems, in front of the children.

There is a great deal that parents can do to improve a school system, not by castigating it for its "viciousness" or by refusing to support "the tyrants, the teachers." They can do a better job of bringing up their children: give them good work habits, firm yet understanding discipline and a healthy mental and emotional attitude—at home. They can get acquainted with the teachers, and integrate the home and school treatment of each child's difficulty. Beyond that, they can attend school-board meetings, work for better pay for teachers, and, above all, be sure that their school system has the money and facilities to carry on the comprehensive program which Mr. McIntire, among others, feels our children need and deserve. Very sincerely,

LOIS RAEGE WASELKOV.

When Dreams Come True

Worcestershire, England.

Dear Sirs: Several of the typists at a factory here were looking through your JOURNAL during lunch hour.

One girl said: "Fancy trying to make some of the recipes with one ounce of fat"—our weekly ration—"it's enough to break a girl's heart."

Another said that to buy a pair of shoes (provided one has the coupons) it was necessary to catch a train at 7:30 A.M. to the nearest shopping centre and form a queue by 9 o'clock. At 9:30 A.M. you're told, "Our monthly allocation has been sold."

The general opinion seemed to be that such delights even on paper were like fairyland. However, they all agreed the JOURNAL gives a good idea of "things to come." Yours faithfully,

ARTHUR J. OAKLEY.

About Those French Girls

Coronado, California.

Dear Editors: Major Merrill Panitt definitely underrated the French women.

I was born in France and have been happily married to a Yank since 1919. I think and live as Americans do, but I know the French girls, and, Major, your article shows that you did not meet the right ones at the right places.

It is true that the French woman needs more than one "I love you." Who doesn't? Sincerely yours,

MARIE TICHARD ISRAEL.

It's Straight From the Feed Box

Los Angeles, California.

Dear Sirs: Ruth Mills Teague brings out several points too often overlooked.

One: the hostess must at all times let the left hand know what the right hand is doing! Every detail planned. Salad greens turn up chilled. French bread warm.

Another: the importance of the hostess appearing at her most glamorous and casual self. We all know that takes a bit of doing. But here is a writer who explains how to do it. And why!

Very sincerely,

MRS. L. B. DILBECK.

Are Bullies Human Too?

Strathmore, California.

Dear Editors: Margaret Weymouth Jackson, in "Big Shot," settled the problems of the timid boy, but those of the bully were only intensified.

Bullies are human beings. Society has to put up with them, their problems, and possible cure. Sincerely,

L. STOLTENBERG.

▶ How different the world if, forty years ago, someone had straightened out a little bully named Adolf. ED.

THIS is one of the silliest creatures a Watchbird ever watched. It is a Dark-Hater because it is scared of the dark. Even though there is nothing in this Dark-Hater's room at night that isn't there in the daytime, it thinks there are all kinds of queer things. That isn't so at all. So it is really being very foolish and scared of nothing.

Let's look around in the daytime and remember what was there for the nighttime, and just go to sleep without being scared of the dark. That can be a lot of fun.

TIME-SAVING DRESS FOR A BUDDING FAMILY

What could be sweeter than a bouquet of babies dressed in Carter's? Those patented → Nevabind* underarms with seamless Jiffon* shoulders make dressing quick and fussless . . . prevent binding and chafing. All Carter fabrics tub so beautifully, too . . . stay soft and in shape. *Reg. U. S. Pat. Off.

(Reading from tree-top to happy bear)

Jiffon-Nevabind shirt. Birth to 3 yrs. . . . . 50¢ to 75¢

Panti-dress Twosome for creepers. Pink, blue, or buttercup. 6 mos. to 2 yrs. . . . . Set, about $1.65

Jiffon-Nevabind gowns. Designed with open or closed backs. Birth to 1 yr. . . . . $1.15 to $1.25

Tyke and Tyke Top training sets. Note Carter's new "no-droop" pant†. 1 to 8 yrs. Each garment, . . . . . 55¢ to $1.

Knitted kimonos. Pink, blue, white. . . . Birth to 1 yr., $1.15

GOOD-BYE DROOPY DRAWERS

See Carter's New Tyke Pant.† It's shorter . . . trimmer . . . has more action room. Here's why. Crotch-section "give" is up-and-down as the body bends. Side sections give around the body. It's a brand new Carter idea. Ask for it soon. † Pat. Applied for

Write for Carter's DRESS FACTS baby booklet.
The William Carter Company
Needham Heights 94, Mass.

Uninviting color
Here's a good combination of flavors, but it's not good, hunger-making color. Too much brown and sameness—no bright contrasts.

Color spurs appetite

The tender green of Green Giant Brand Peas* promises *good eating . . . and then delivers it with unique flavor and tenderness.

Yes, that Green Giant is a symbol of flavor and tenderness. But he's a symbol, too, of a scientific farmer. Special seed (S-537, exclusive with us). Scientific soil feeding and crop growing. Precision timing of harvest and canning to get Green Giant Brand peas from vine to can in less than three hours—at the fleeting moment of perfect flavor.

"Eat-me" color
Isn't this happy color? See the appetite promise in the red of catsup, the yellow of turnips, and the fresh, sweet green of those good Green Giant Brand peas.

Green Giant Peas
BRAND

Packed at the fleeting moment of perfect flavor

Packed only by Minnesota Valley Canning Company, headquarters, Le Sueur, Minnesota; and Fine Foods of Canada, Ltd., Tecumseh, Ontario. Also packers of the following brands: Niblets Whole Kernel Corn, Niblets Mexicorn whole kernel corn and peppers, Del Maiz Cream Style Corn and Niblets Asparagus.

"GREEN GIANT" BRAND REG. U. S. PAT. OFF. ©MVCCO.

MINORITIES

(Continued from Page 6)

persecution mania. And paranoiacs can ery dangerous people; paranoiacs, and cruel and unscrupulous and evil dema- es, not paranoiacs themselves, who take intage of the paranoid tendencies in all s. For all sensible men and women, of se, have to a greater or lesser degree in- rity complexes; a sense, that is, of their inadequacy in the face of life and its lands, a humbleness. And on how they le their inferiority complexes depends ther they join the congenital paranoiacs ot. So watch yourself—especially where orities are concerned. Minorities, being ser than majorities, have always been favorite and traditional victims of or- zed paranoiacs, born or self-made. It's . The especial sport of cowards is attack- the weak.

he study of minorities is a strange, inating study, anyhow. A minority is e more, as a rule, than roup of human beings, and women like our- es, which, being a mi- ty, does things a little erently. Minorities are er the same. They de- d on the longitude and ude. They have no es- ial meaning. In Egypt, ericans are a minority; in America, Egyp- s. North of Mason and Dixon's Line nocrats, in many places, are suspect; south Mason and Dixon's Line the same things, ctly, are said about Republicans. On the st Coast it is the citizens of Japanese cent, no matter what wonderful Amer- is they have proved themselves to be. In ffalo, it is the Poles. In Minnesota, the edes. In New York, the Jews. Along the Mexican border, the Mexicans. And once upon a time it was the Irish. And then the Italians. And so on endlessly. And all these people are very much like ourselves, and most of them are first-class Americans. Left alone, not insulted, not thrust back into their minorities, pretty soon they become indistinguishable.

This is a strong country, with a strong tradition. Look at our Army and Navy!

There are two things it is well to remember. First, that every one of us, every man or woman, belongs to something that at one time or another was persecuted. Protestant, Catholic, Democrat; the rich and aristocratic, the poor, the quiet middle class—at one time or another they have been persecuted. Second, which one of us is not in some relationship to life, often in several, in a minority of one? Merely as individuals each one of us is in a minority of one. And what about the lonely minority of death? All alone, each man and woman must come to it, with no companions but the memory of good and gentleness done, or of cruelty and evil.

> The nation who loses her liberty is not aware of her misfortune at the time, any more than the patient is, who receives a paralytic stroke.
> —PETRARCH.

Prejudice is a wart; rub it and it grows. Prejudice is a black mole; as it spreads it becomes a cancer. Prejudice is a prairie fire; a spark can make a conflagration.

When the present king of Denmark was asked if Denmark had "a Jewish problem," he smiled. "We have no minority problems in Denmark," he said, "because no Dane considers himself inferior to anyone."

Nor does any sensible American.

AND THAT CAN BE AMERICA.

WANTED: LEADERSHIP

(Continued from Page 6)

sistent philosophy, many leaders arise in h revolutionary times with contradictory bitions and aims, to split society into ir- oncilable camps which make any unifying ional leadership impossible. Then, in- ad of being masters of events, the people come their victims.

Despite all revolutionary changes and im- cations, leadership in all countries, unless posed by force, must offer continuity with dition. This does not mean reactionism— type of mind that flees from present re- ies. But true progress never commands human race to start over again from atch. Civilization is an accumulation of ing values, an organic thing. Without inge there can be no growth; but without dition there can be no civilization. The st radical of our early revolutionary lead- , Thomas Jefferson, the great friend of ance, though he sympathized with the ob- tives of the French Revolution, was dis- sted by its excesses, did not want it dupli- ed on American soil, had no patience with agents here, and recognized that violent erturns are social catastrophes.

Whatever changes come must be new anches on the ancient stem, if they are to ve deep roots in the American mind and t be destructive. It is never so necessary in epochs of great change to rediscover hat it is a nation really lives by, in order construct a bridge, and not blast a chasm, tween the past and the future.

Americans, for instance, and the most volutionary Americans at that, have al- ys feared the overweening power of the ate, knowing that the power to levy trib- e, conscript to arms, judge, punish and lice is already an immense delegation of wer from the people, and have realized at if to these powers were added any ap- eciable ownership and control of the onomy or the cultural life, the people uld stand to lose their freedom.

The American revolutionary spirit has ways disputed the concept of classes. Historically without an aristocracy, and originally with private productive property very generally distributed in an agrarian economy, the American dream of free men in a free society never envisioned either an economy where a minority would own and control the chief instruments of production while the rest sold their labor for wages, which is what capitalism has brought us; nor a society in which no one would own anything, which socialism promises us.

There is an authentic American radicalism whose object has been to make men both secure and free, and which has recognized that economic freedom consists of access to and use of productive property, and that the basis of all relations must be free contract. Thus, if we should rediscover Jefferson, instead of Marx, as our theorist and guide in these challenging times, we would devise programs leading, not toward socialism, but toward a co-operative commonwealth.

We would continue further to prevent, by taxation, inheritance of great fortunes; we would devise taxation to favor the producer over the rentier and speculator; we would make laws to protect the farmer and homestead owner against foreclosure; we would have banking practices to make credit as easy to co-operative groups of worker-producers as to great corporations; and we would insist that the worker, in addition to his wages, share in the profits and responsibilities of ownership.

We would equalize educational opportunities in all states, by grants in aid to the poorer ones, and make higher education available to every American youth with a scholastic record warranting it. We would, at the same time, make it stiffer, in order to weed out those who profit from college degrees through their parents' income instead of their own capacities and efforts.

We would encourage home construction and cheaper rents, by taking real-estate taxes off improvements and raising them from ground rentals bearing heaviest on Wonderful for Waffles!

WEST OF THE ROCKIES IT'S DURKEE'S TROCO

So Mild... So Sweet... So Country-fresh in Flavor!

Meals seem more gala Margie's economical way! You can spread delicious Durkee's Margarine liberally on breads and griddle treats—without being extravagant. Ideal for cooking and baking, too. It's so mild, so sweet, so country-fresh in flavor. Unusually smooth because it's a modern margarine made by Durkee's own scientific process which churns the pure, nutritious vegetable oils right in with the fresh pasteurized skim milk. Important as an energy food and enriched with Vitamin A.

Now—try Durkee's Margarine in these Sunshine Waffles

| | | |
|---|---|---|
| 2 cups sifted cake flour | 1 tablespoon sugar | 2 eggs, separated |
| 4 teaspoons baking powder | 1 cup milk | ½ cup melted |
| ½ teaspoon salt | ½ c. evap. milk or cream | Durkee's Margarine |

Sift together twice the flour, baking powder, salt and sugar. Add milk slowly, beating until blended after each addition. Add evaporated milk or cream. Beat mixture only until smooth. Separate eggs. Add well-beaten egg yolks to the batter. Add Durkee's Margarine which has been melted and cooled. Stir until thoroughly blended. Fold in stiffly beaten egg white. Bake in preheated waffle iron until crisp and golden brown. Makes 4 or 5 four-section waffles.

Something really extra special—
DEVILED EGGS
with DURKEE'S DRESSING!

Canapes and hors d'oeuvres taste better made with Durkee's Dressing. Try this easy recipe. Mash 6 hard-cooked egg yolks, mix in 2 generous teaspoons Durkee's Dressing slightly thinned with cream. Refill whites, garnish with Durkee's Paprika. Chill before serving. Write for EASY-TO-DO RECIPES, Durkee's, Dept. LJ3, Elmhurst, L. I.

Durkee Famous Foods . . . Division of the Glidden Company
Other Durkee Favorites: Durkee's Spices . . . Cocoanut . . . Worcestershire Sauce

She puts navy sleeves in a red sweater, knits one side of her cardigan green, the other beige. She sprinkles sequins on a pastel for evening, has at least one vivid sweater in her collection. Why not do the same? And do your color tricks with famous Bear Brand Quali-Tested Yarns because they're always color-right, proven sunfast and tubfast...so lively...so long-wearing. You'll see the difference when you knit.

Instructions for Knitting This Sweater may be gotten by sending 5c in coin to Bear Brand Yarns, 230 Fifth Ave., New York 1, Dept. JY-3.

Bear Brand QUALI-TESTED Yarns

230 FIFTH AVENUE • NEW YORK 1, N.Y.

Washed in WOOLFOAM

Nothing washes sweaters so clean—leaves them so soft and fluffy as WOOLFOAM—since there is nothing quite like it! This soapless powder makes the ideal beauty bath for sweaters, sox, blankets and baby things because it is so gentle—so kind to woolens. Colors stay bright—fibers stay alive!

QUICK! EASY TO USE! WOOLFOAM not only saves woolens—it saves time and money, too! One 25¢ box washes as many as 16 sweaters or woolen equivalent. Sold at Dept., Drug and Grocery Stores. Buy a box of WOOLFOAM today. 25c

Economy Size 50c

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

Made for Wool by a Wool Firm

WOOLFOAM CORP., New York 11, N. Y.

slums and unused land. We would support social securities by taxes on machines, not on workers, in order to encourage the employment of men.

Instead of hoping for reform by increased regulation of private lives, we would give every encouragement to people to have private lives and opportunities to acquire modest properties, and our aim would be neither the superstate nor superconcentration of wealth, but a superpeople.

And the quicker we would get atomic energy into productive use, the less we would fear it for war.

Success in foreign affairs can only be the reflection of our inner strength, and the greatest source of inner strength is the security and happiness of the people, and their unified enthusiasm for a practical and realizable goal.

No nation can exercise world leadership except from the base of a domestic life rooted in a clear social philosophy. American leadership abroad wavers because the American philosophy, once so clear, has become confused at home. Yet our national life aim, though more clearly articulated here than elsewhere, was always the expression of a universal yearning, particularly by the western peoples.

Because Western Europe and America belong to each other in an exceptionally intimate way, we must aid and encourage European reconstruction, in harmony, there also, with new facts and forces implying change, and with deep traditions as well.

Traditional Europe is the expression of both unity and diversity. In the last century of national differentiation, the diversity destroyed much of an older, and again necessary, unity.

We should energetically support everything that leads in the direction of reunifying European life and economy, such as the Europeanizing of the great industrial basin of the Rhine and Ruhr, by a distribution of shares to France, Britain and all the European states. Germany cannot fight another war without the Ruhr industry, nor recover as a going concern if cut off from it. But there is no reason why she should have exclusive ownership and control. It is actually the center from which a new and unified European economy can be built.

Equality of right for colonial peoples should be a clearly announced and honestly intended aim of American policy. This does not mean that every agitator who rises as an independence leader, to challenge the existing trustees by force, should be supported. Domestic tyrannies can be as onerous as foreign controls. It does mean that liberti rights, education and responsibilities shou be methodically extended, looking towa complete liberation and self-government of certain dates. Wild rebellions are t products of distrust, fear, lack of faith a uncertainty of goal. Unity and calm d velopment can exist only when peoples c clearly envision the future.

Toward the Soviet Union, our great rival for men's enthusiasms, we should ma tain the greatest respect compatible w our own self-respect, realizing the infle bility of the Russian and Communist wo philosophy. Safe and friendly relations b tween nations, as between persons, can p ceed only out of reciprocity and mutu respect for each other's rights. We shou not concede something one day and try take it back the next. But we should be ve hesitant to concede anything that affe the lives and societies of other peoples. A we should never concede to the idea that c concession invites another.

We should not concede within our borde to the nationals or agents of any nation wh they will not concede to us within their ow War is less often the outcome of clarity th of confusion.

Weakness breeds contempt, and contem of others leads nations to overreach the selves, in the speculation that where mu has gone unresisted, nothing ever will resisted. But unless a people are complete decadent, without any commonly held p losophy or aim of life, resistance will alwa occur at some point. It is better that concerned should clearly know, and in a vance, at what point.

Leadership of a free people consists in d cerning what is necessary, possible and d sirable, taking all facts and forces into a count, articulating for the people, or overwhelming numbers of them, what is ready present in their own minds, and e bodying a social goal in a coherent progra It does not contemplate the striking of ave ages between basically incompatible int ests, but the fusing of interests in a new sy thesis. The unifying force of war is conce tration on a clear objective. Peace deman clear objectives no less than war. The obje tive is that vision without which, the propl foretold, the people perish. They perish b cause each individual and each organiz group, blindly pursuing its own limited go smashes head-on into other individuals a groups going in opposite directions. Wh that happens, especially in a world of clas ing ideologies, the nation, as a people and culture, is in danger of its life.

★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

Names in a Tree

By Robert P. Tristram Coffin

No one had told the boy. Somehow he knew,
Since he had a mind bright as a honeybee,
That he was doing a deeper thing than carve
His name and a girl's name in a tree.

The freckles on his face were close to the beech's,
The tree's warmth and his own were one whole thing;
He cut the names deep and put a heart
Around the names together like a ring.

It was forever. The girl might hope to change
As often as the moon or tides of the air,
But he had bound her with a living rope.
This was for keeps. She was forever there.

The girl would grow; but the tree she lived in now
Would grow, the chain would never come apart,
Would widen alive. The swallows would quit their young
Easier than she could go free from his heart.

He had put his deep secret in the deep Secret of a tree; these joined names should Grow into a wildness and one circling strength
Like the rings of white years in beech wood.

He had the sun and stars upon his side
Now he had asked a live tree to attend him;
Spring that brings the lambs would swell his love,
All rainbows, winds and showers would befriend him.

It was for keeps. She never could escape,
The long roots of the beech would bring up powers;
He had planted himself like seeds in her
Their sons would come as surely as the flowers.

"WON'T DADDY BE SURPRISED?"

The big new Norge probably could clean Daddy's hat, at that . . . for the big new Norge not only washes—it rinses and dries for the line as well! Oceans of sudsy water are set in motion by the action of the exclusive, feather-light Ro-ta-tor . . . garments are rolled down and around, time after time after time. And there are other advantages too: the roll-rim, non-splash tub; the steam-sealed, heat-hoarding cover; the non-clog drain; the final gentle "pressure cleansing"—advantages which result in far happier washdays and far brighter washes! Look in the classified section of your phone book for your nearest Norge dealer. He is waiting to tell you more about this washer, and about the other new Norge products too—all of them products of experience, precision-built and practical.

Steam-Seal Cover—holds heat longer for whiter washing.

Damp Dryer with eight-position safety interlock—can't swing while wringing

Featherweight plastic Ro-ta-tor—with the "roll-around" wash-action.

Oversize capacity handles a week's wash in fewer loads.

A BORG-WARNER INDUSTRY

Norge is the trade-mark of Norge Division, Borg-Warner Corporation, Detroit 26, Mich. In Canada: Addison Industries, Limited, Toronto, Ontario.

SEE NORGE BEFORE YOU BUY

"I refused to look old at 23!"

—says Mrs. Kathryn Folts of Tuscaloosa, Alabama.

Young mother takes DuBarry Success Course at her doctor's suggestion—loses 53 pounds, learns how to stay lovely.

TO SEE Kathryn Folts now—a slim, tiny, typical Southern beauty—it's hard to realize that only a few months ago she weighed 175.

"I looked old and felt old at 23," she says, "and had to struggle to get into a size 38 dress. Too often it was a 40. For three years I had tried, without success, to lose weight. Then my doctor recommended the DuBarry Success Course." Three months after starting, Mrs. Folts had lost 45 pounds and was wearing a size 15. Now she is down to 122 and slips into a size 14.

"What a thrill it is," she says, "to wear short sleeves and snug skirts and to know you have the figure for them. The Success Course has shown me how to have good posture, a radiant complexion, a becoming hair-do. Most important of all, I feel better than ever before.

"My doctor told me the DuBarry Success Course was exactly what he would prescribe, but that the Course is written in a manner that makes you like it.

"How right he was! I'm not ever going to stop it—it is wonderful."

This snapshot of Mrs. Folts was taken in the spring of 1945 on her little boy's first birthday. Shortly after, she started the DuBarry Success Course and in 3 months reduced her weight from 175 to 130.

Before

HEIGHT (AFTER) 5' 4½"
LOST 53 POUNDS
BUST 6" LESS WAIST 7" LESS
ABDOMEN 12½" LESS HIPS 11" LESS

After

At right, the slim, lovely Kathryn Folts of today, radiant with vitality.

HOW ABOUT YOU? Haven't you wished that you could be slender again, hear the compliments of friends, wear youthful styles, feel like a new person? Then send the coupon or a letter or postal at once and find out, without the slightest obligation, what the DuBarry Success Course can do for you.

The plan is intensely practical. It fits into your daily life. You get an analysis of your needs, a goal to work for and a plan for attaining it. You learn how to achieve your ideal weight, care for your skin, style your hair becomingly, use make-up for glamour—look better, feel better, be at your best. You follow right at home the same methods taught by Ann Delafield at the Richard Hudnut Salon, New York.

First Step toward Success —mail this coupon now.

Accepted for advertising in publications of the American Medical Association

DuBarry Beauty Chest Included!

With your Course you receive this Chest containing a generous supply of DuBarry Beauty and Make-up Preparations selected for you.

DuBarry Success Course
ANN DELAFIELD, Directing

RICHARD HUDNUT SALON, Dept. SC-2
693 Fifth Avenue, New York 22, N. Y.

Please send the booklet telling all about the DuBarry Home Success Course.

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping — REPLACEMENT OR REFUND OF MONEY IF DEFECTIVE OR NOT AS ADVERTISED HEREIN

Miss
Mrs. _____

Address _____

City _____ Zone No. if any _____ State _____

The Ideal Husband and The Ideal Wife

BY JUDITH CHASE

DIFFERENCE of opinion makes life interesting, and it differs most when it comes to speculation as to the ideal mate. For no one agrees on marital perfection. Some set their sights for success and security, some for domesticity and docility. Others are convinced that the ideal mate is always the one who got away. To pry into their personal thoughts on the subject we asked these 40 celebrities—some married, some single—for their conceptions of the perfect spouse. All their answers are pretty definite—yet no two are alike. And we'll wager your own ideal is something else again.

"The ideal husband may be any old goop I happen to fall in love with. He'll be physically attractive to me, not necessarily handsome, but not so peculiar that we'd have cross-eyed children. He's going to be tolerant—not rough with waiters is what I mean—and fond of people . . . the type who likes to talk with taxi drivers, but not for too long."
—Charlotte H. Fitch.
Red Cross Recreation Worker

"A lover as well as a husband. I think they can keep the affections of a woman forever."
—Myra Kingsley.

"The ideal husband will be perfectly understanding and trusting. He'll make plans for the future, be a good companion, and even if he doesn't agree, he'll be tolerant of my point of view."
—Virginia Cusworth.
PhM 3/c, WAVES

"An ideal husband should have a keen sense of humor, be ambitious, sincere and have a super amount of love for his wife."
—Shirley Temple.

"The ideal husband? Any man who believes he has the ideal wife."
—Helen MacInnes.

"The ideal husband, like the prize fish, is the one who got away. The ideal husband is the man you did not marry."
—Betty Smith.

"The ideal mate is the man who remembers all those little nice things he did during courtship time." —Dorothy Lamour.

"I'm in the market for my fourth husband. My idea of the ideal husband would be one who is in business for himself (apart from mine), who would give me the comfort and companionship every woman desires. To date—'A good man is still hard to find.'"
—Sophie Tucker.

"The ideal husband? How about this combination: Clark Gable's features, Johnny Weismuller's body. Frank Sinatra's voice. Van Johnson's smile. Charles Boyer's savoir-faire. Plus Rockefeller's mazuma."
—Judy Canova.

"A man whose shoes are shined, whose clothes are brushed and who is presentable at all times is what every woman feels she wants in a husband." —Louella O. Parsons.

"The ideal husband is one who recognizes that his wife should be a personality in her own right." —Estelle M. Sternberger.

"The only thing I'm sure about is that he always seems to be married to another woman." —Vicki Baum.

"The ideal husband is no husband at all."
—Rachel Crothers.

"He should be the sort of human being you'd like a lot even if you hadn't happened to love him." —Margaret Widdemer.

"The ideal husband must be considerate and must have a sense of humor. He has to like the things I like, but he'd better not always agree with me."
—Frances Baldinger.
Sp (S) 3/c, WAVES

"He's the fella who makes the little woman feel, even in an apron peeling carrots, that she's still the kid that's all the candy, the queen of the summer prom."
—Ruth Hussey.

"The ideal husband is someone you like, as well as love." —Bidu Sayao.

"The ideal husband has character. Dress and good looks aren't important, but a sense of humor is, and mutual trust and thoughtfulness." —Clara Peterson.
Ens. (NC) USNR

"The ideal husband must have:

1. Firm religious beliefs, but at the same time must be very tolerant toward other religions.

2. An understanding of and sympathy for modern social problems—especially the problem of minority groups.

3. Education (formal or informal) to equal mine.

4. Desire for six children.

5. Good position and money enough to support, comfortably, a family of eight.

(Continued on Page 163)

(Continued from Page 160)

6. Cheerful personality.

Desirable but not necessary:

7. Good looks."

—T/3 Eileen F. Daly.
(WAC)

"My ideal husband—what a question! My own, of course."

—Ruth Adams Knight.

"In emergencies, he is there."

—Emily Hahn.

"My idea of the ideal husband is—my husband. When I first saw him, in December, 1924, and was assigned to him as his stenographer, I made up my mind that I was going to marry him. It took me several years to convince him that I was his dream girl, but I finally did. Then he thought it was his idea all the time. That shows how much brighter we women are than men. He is my ideal because he encouraged me to continue writing, when I had about given up in despair. He gave me, in full measure, encouragement, belief in my ability and a never-failing conviction that someday I would 'arrive.' If I have really arrived, then he is responsible."

—Taylor Caldwell.

"The ideal husband must possess intelligence, leadership, thoughtfulness, fear of God, love of sports, good looks and self assurance enough to keep me constantly aware that I've someone possessing such outstanding qualities that it's not only duty but a genuine pleasure to keep fit mentally, physically."

—T/3 Helen "Gig" Smith.
(WAC)

"Were I ever to embark pour Cythère I would take a good look at mother-in-law, not for fear of her but as a forecast of what I would have to live with thirty years on—for my vista would be a long one, without a hotel in Reno in it. You can't find the ideal wife in public places showing off. The ideal wife unhappily does not blossom in the showcase. She lies tucked away on the bargain counter and must be looked for."

—Cecil Roberts.

"I would say that the ideal wife would never make a man feel that he is married—but make him fully realize how fully wonderful it is to be married to her. You might say she is a combination of wife, sweetheart, mistress."

—Paul Henreid.

"The ideal wife is a woman married to some other fellow—and he, poor dolt, never knows it."

—Eugene Lyons.

"As far as I am concerned, the ideal wife doesn't exist, because once she's married she changes."

—Bob Hawk.

"The type of woman I like is whatever type is with me at the moment."

—Gildersleeve.

"Above all else, she must have a sense of humor and the ability to laugh at oneself. That is the most important single virtue that any woman can possess."

—Edward Everett Horton.

"The ideal wife is the one who is smart enough to find the ideal man."

—George Abbott.

"My idea of an ideal wife is a woman who sees no evil, hears no evil and speaks no evil about her husband."

—Phil Baker.

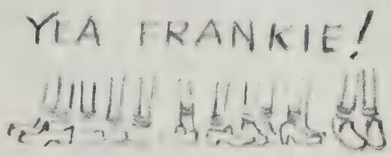
"The ideal wife must be:



1. A good listener. The only time the average wife listens to what her husband has to say is when he talks in his sleep.

2. One who isn't two-faced: one for home and one for street wear.

3. Unaffected. One who doesn't grow old before her time trying to look young after her time.

4. Economical dresser—not one who never has a thing to wear but still has to have three closets to put it in!"

—Phil Cook.

"The ideal mate is one who will never wear bobby socks."

—Bing Crosby.

"The ideal wife is the Oriental because she obeys her husband, never quarrels with him and brings up her children to respect their parents. In so doing, she achieves the sublime social relationship. In the Orient they have no domestic problems. All a Mohammedan has to do to divorce his wife is to tell her to 'Go home' three times, but he never does it."

—Robert Ripley.

"The Chinese sage who said that 'a wife, like a gong, should be beaten regularly' had the wrong slant. He was a misogynist. Probably because he was poorly mated. Marriage is a partnership, and the thing I look for in such a relationship, just as in a business, is compatibility (see Webster). Find a compatible woman and you'll find marital happiness."

—Alexander Knox.

"The ideal wife has got to have a sense of humor. She needs a little understanding, tolerance, and she'd better be a good cook."

—Michael J. Ryan.
BM 1/c USNR

"The ideal wife is pleasing to look at and intelligent, but not any brighter than I. She's a good dresser, has a good sense of humor, and we have mutual interests."

—Robert L. Crawford.
Pvt. USMCR

"My idea of the ideal wife is my own."

—Cole Porter.

"It's difficult to describe the ideal wife, for the simple reason that there isn't any such thing. The ideal wife is the one you happen to be married to that you get along with. In other words, marriage is wonderful. If you're married to the right girl, there's nothing like it; and if you're married to the wrong girl, there's nothing like it!"

—Galen Drake.

"It seems to me that the ideal wife would be honest, intelligent, attractive and, above all, bright and cheerful with a rollicking sense of humor."

—Gregory Peck.

No other shampoo leaves your hair so lustrous, yet so easy to manage!

Romance in the air! Dates in the making! And you . . . looking irresistible with shining-smooth hair. There's something about Drene-lovely hair that goes straight to a man's heart. "Change your hair-do to match the moods of many wonderful evenings," says famous Cover Girl Madelon Mason. She shows you these alluring hair-dos that you can try yourself at home or ask your beauty shop to duplicate. Your hair is so easy to fix, so smooth and manageable when you use Drene with Hair Conditioning Action. No other shampoo leaves your hair so lustrous, yet so easy to manage!

IF HE'S A SOPHISTICATE and loves you to look glamorous, try this brilliant upsweep. "I use Drene," says Madelon, "because it leaves my hair far more lustrous than any soap." Actually as much as 33⅓% more lustre! Since Drene is not a soap shampoo, it never leaves any dulling film on hair as all soaps do. The dramatic neckline of this Ceil Chapman gown sets off this striking hair-do, that you can arrange by gathering all hair to side-top, tie and divide into twin swirls.

IF HE PREFERS SPORTS like bowling, he'll admire a tailored hair-do like this sleek shining braid. "I like to wear a scarf for active games," says Madelon, "but still show plenty of hair." Of course you'll want to show your hair too, when it's so lovely. All the natural brilliance is revealed by Drene with your first shampoo!

IF HE THE FIRESIDE TYPE who enjoys records? Then your hair must be ever so lovely for close inspection. No unsightly dandruff to spoil your smartly groomed look . . . no wisps when you're a Drene girl! For this simple, graceful hair-do criss-cross your hair in back and hold with bobbed clips.

Drene

Shampoo with Hair Conditioning Action

John and Kitty Quinn were in their early twenties, very much in love, and $100 in debt when they were married twelve years ago. Rock bottom, Kitty recalls, came in 1936 when there were two babies and a third on the way—on a total income of $12 a week.

PHOTOS BY MUNKACSI

Family with Nine Kids

...AND LOTS OF FUN! PRETTY KITTY QUINN CAN PROVE IT. WITH PARDONABLE PRIDE SHE PRESENTS HER NINE ENGAGING YOUNGSTERS AND A HANDSOME HUSBAND AS EVIDENCE.

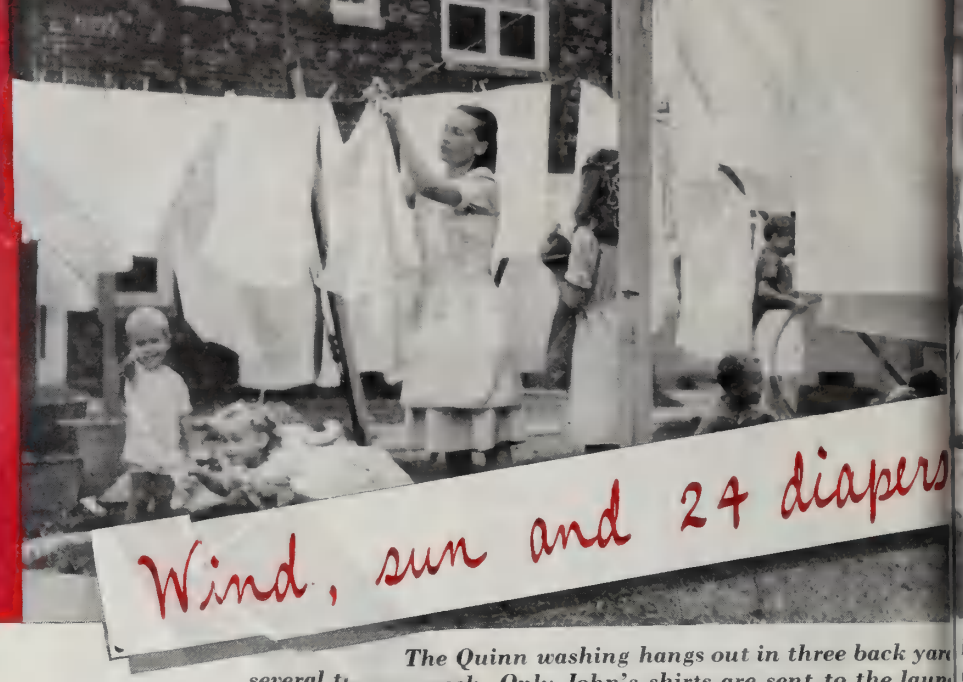
BY KAY BOYLE

FOR a great many Americans, reconversion from wartime to peacetime jobs isn't the happy thing it ought to be. For far too many it means less money, or even a period of unemployment during which bills will pile up, or War Bonds will have to be sold to meet the needs of daily living. But for Mr. and Mrs. John T. Quinn, of Wilmington, Delaware, this isn't true.

You might have the luck to see them facing each other across the table of one of the dining booths in the brightly illuminated lunchroom on Market Street where they occasionally drop in after a movie or after John's overtime at night is done. It may be around eleven o'clock, and the ceiling lights glare mercilessly down on them, on as attractive a young couple as you could wish to see. He is broad-shouldered, black-haired—handsomely, extravagantly Irish, but with something more sober than blarney on his tongue when he speaks to Kitty, who sits opposite, and a sterner look than a cocky Irishman is supposed to have in his blue-gray eye.



"Is the sandwich all right?" he may say to her, concerned about her even if she is sitting up straight and

6.3% of American families have incomes of $3500 to $4000 a year.

The night shift

There's one bathroom, and not much dawdling in the tub at the Quinns'. Baths come before supper; every day in summer, every other day in colder weather. Kitty bathes the youngest children by hand, but can always call on husband John or eldest daughter 'Stasia for some expert assistance.

Wind, sun and 24 diapers

The Quinn washing hangs out in three back yard several times a week. Only John's shirts are sent to the laund Kitty uses veteran washing machine, would love new, silent one so she could hear u Kathy and Michael are doing upstairs. Leftover ironing is Kitty's constant nightm "because there it is on Monday when the next batch of dirty wash is facing yo game-looking in her aqua wool dress—the first new dress in two years. " white meat, Kitty?" he'll say.

KITTY QUINN KEEPS HER CURTAINS WHITE, HER CHILDREN NEAT AS NINEPINS, AND HER SENSE OF HUMOR IN WORKING ORDER—ALL ON $75 A WEEK AND TWENTY-FOUR HOURS A DAY.

She is slender (wears a size eleven), and her eyes, beneath the wisp of f black veil which drifts across her hair and brow, are alert, quick, humor
There is a little lip rouge on her mouth, but nothing else of artifice. Everyt about her is somehow forthright, undaunted, bespeaking at the same time stanchness of character and Irish love of raillery.

"Of course it's white meat, John," she'll say as she puts the top sli toasted bread back quickly on the sandwich so that he needn't see. He be dropping a nickel into the juke-box dial on the wall just then, so he w have noticed. "It's absolutely delicious," she'll tell him with the first bit in her cheek, and now he can sit back and relax on the leather bench and for Bing Crosby to begin to sing. Kitty is like that; things aren't going t wrong, ever, because she's isn't going to let them.

It's been a good evening: John is out of his war job as supervisor of mat control at the Davo shipyards, and he's back in the automobile business ag on the salesman end of it. He's had a long day; he's been down at the showr since nine that morning, and then two prospective customers to call on supper. One of them placed an order; the other one seems pretty sure to.
is wearing his feather-striped gray suit, and is feeling good about thi Kitty's not going to spoil all that by any question about the kind of meat chicken sandwich.

"Bing Crosby," John says, and the music and the sight of each other m a little pool of peace and quiet in the clamor of the crowded place. "Poo Bing's got only four sons," he says, saying the name with affection, as if sp ing of someone he knows well.

"But he's got a voice, Bing has," says Kitty, making a smart little grim

Off to school

"How do I keep the peace?" Kitty echoes frequent question. "When they get too noisy, I just sit on them." There'll be more room for rumpus in new home Quinns hope to build.

Quiet before the storm

PHOTOS BY MUNKACSI AND MINKER

Kitty draws deep breath, is ready to serve John his bacon-and-egg breakfast once five older children are off to school. 'Stasia helps younger ones with buttons and shoelaces before rushing to catch up with Mary-Ellen and the boys on mile walk to Christ Our King parochial school.

★ HOW AMERICA LIVES ★

"No favorites" is Quinn formula. Ice cream, after-dinner chores and nicknames are handed round on equal basis. Kitty calls little ones "puddin' head," is not demonstrative with older children, says "I prefer to show my love by doing things for them." Large proportion of family finances must go into food, rent and thirty pairs of shoes a year. Kitty has trim figure, loves clothes; before marriage put every cent she earned as file clerk "on her back"; in past eighteen months spent thirteen dollars on herself.

"All right," says John, "all right." He offers her a cigarette across the le, and she takes one from the packet, and he strikes the match and ds it for her in his well-shaped hand. (Cigarettes—not quite a pack a —and soft drinks are her two relaxations.) All her gestures are vous, quick, alert. His are calculated, steady, slow. "Bing Crosby's only four sons," he says, saying it stubbornly but with humor. "And asn't got a single daughter." And then they look at each other and laugh. t's easy enough to see that they are two people in love; perhaps two ple who haven't been married very long, not long enough for the fun eing together to have gone stale. What no one could possibly guess is t they have been married since 1934, and now, in 1946, they are the ents of nine children—five boys, four girls.

There are fewer than two children in the average American family ay, but, according to a Gallup Poll report, 68% of Americans think "ideal" family is one with three or more children. One hundred and ty years ago the average American wife bore eight children.)

When Kitty, aged thirty-three, has finished her sandwich, and John, d thirty-eight, his second cup of coffee, they will drive back to East e, in the automobile the Wilmington Auto Sales Company provides him , to their trim little home in the Government housing development re their nine children are asleep upstairs. Perhaps one of Kitty's ty younger sisters (both are married to servicemen and have no chil- of their own) will be sitting up to watch the children while Kitty and n stay out late together for a change; or perhaps the high-school girl across the open courtyard will be waiting in the tidy, attractive living m when they come in. The nine children will be safely asleep upstairs: vin, the baby, in the crib in Kitty's and John's room; Mary-Ellen,

For our kids, a better break

nine years old, and Rose Ann, five, in the double bed in the bedroom next to Kitty's and John's, with Anastasia, eleven, on a cot beside her sisters; Michael, four, and Kathy Jane, two, sleep in two white cribs in the room next to that; Timothy, ten, Jimmy, seven, and Leonard, six, sleep in the "boys' room" on the front.

The moment you step into the house you know that an orderly and active hand is at the helm. The floor linoleum in the two downstairs rooms is waxed, there are white net curtains at the cottage windows, blue cotton curtains in the kitchen-closet doorway and concealing the shelves beneath the gleaming sink. The electric refrigerator and the gas stove are immaculate. The drainboard beside the sink is scrubbed clean. In the closet, behind the blue curtain, canned goods are stacked as neatly and orderly as in a grocer's window. The electric washing machine is pushed out of sight into this closet, and rolled into the kitchen when in use. It is used three times a week. Sometimes there are as many as eighteen sheets on the line at a time, all washed by Kitty; the only things she doesn't wash are John's shirts. There are twenty or more diapers every other day; the curtains in every room are changed once a month. The bedspreads are all white and, although not new, they are spotless. The laundry is hung out in the sun to dry, in three back yards of the housing row. Ironing is done at night, three times a week. Kitty will start in at seven, after the dinner dishes are done, and never finishes before eleven-thirty, and sometimes not before one.

In the football season, however, if a Notre Dame game is being broadcast, she'll put off one batch of ironing to do on Saturday afternoon while she listens to the game. "When Notre Dame makes a touchdown," she says, "I start yelling with the crowd, and all the kids yell with me, even the ones who are too young to know what it's about." 'Stasia can iron, too, but Kitty won't have that. "I started ironing at her age," she says, "and I've never stopped since." But, at eleven, 'Stasia can bake a good cake, she is a model student at school, and she has a remarkable talent for painting landscapes in oils.

It is not only the house which has a happy, well-scrubbed look; the children have it as well. The house is small—six rooms—the children many, and discipline is strict. No climbing up on chairs or sofas. (But Kathy Jane has perfected her own method of climbing; she climbs to the top of any crib she is put in, carefully lets herself down to the floor, makes a dash for the doll she wants, whether it be a treasured one in 'Stasia's preciously kept doll carriage, or a goggle-eyed one on the dresser, and climbs expertly back into the crib with the doll in her arms.) There is no secret to this happy look: everything functions to the tempo of a good-humored, efficient routine; everything in the house, from the sprays of green ivy which have been planted up high on shelves and tops of cupboards to mask the look of water or drain pipes down to the brightest blond curl on the children's heads, is looked on with devotion.

Of course, there are moments when Kitty says, "Now just let me get a cigarette. I must, for just one second, get a breathing space." That is when all nine of them are in the small kitchen all at once, with nine different demands to be filled. But there is a look of humor in her eye, a her mouth is ready to smile. When the bedlam of voi around her is too great, she will say, "Now, we'd bet get this question answered and out of the way, beca Michael (or Leonard, or Rose Ann, or Kathy Jane, whoever it may be) won't stop asking it until it is." one by one the questions are answered, the issues dispo of, with spirit, with understanding and with discipline.

But perhaps this is beginning at the wrong end of t story. Perhaps it should begin with Kitty as a girl, t eldest of six children herself. Her father, now fifty-five James C. Riley, a Wilmington detective in her childho and now police inspector. When she speaks of what s likes to read, Kitty says, "No serials, no mystery stori nothing like that. I had enough of that at home in r life with dad!" Kitty's mother worked hard to bring her lively, good-looking family, and Kitty learned t ropes from her. Eleven years older than one brother w is in the service, Kitty says, with sentiment, of him, brought him up by hand." She mothered all the young ones, just as 'Stasia is doing now, and she grew up wanti babies of her own, and even now, with nine under the ro she wants "as many as God will send."

Kitty Riley met John Quinn at Kate McCafferty Dancing Academy when she was seventeen. John sa that when he started taking her out, he felt he was "ro bing the cradle." He was twenty-two. His mother h died when he was eighteen months old; only two of l eight brothers and sisters grew to maturity. His chil hood had not been a particularly happy one on his fathe

PHOTOS BY MUNKA

All seats reserved

Supper is social hour, often ends with family sing. Even youngest learn two musts in manners—must eat everything on the plate, must not leave the table till everyone's finished. Favorite dish, spaghetti and meat balls. "No onion in mine," requests John.

"She's not as angelic as she looks," is Kitty's wry comment about blond, blue-eyed, five-year-old Rose Ann. "She used to say she'd run away, but she dropped that idea when I threatened to leave home." Leonard, dark, quiet, and a year older, is Rose Ann's buddy; he's teaching her to write.

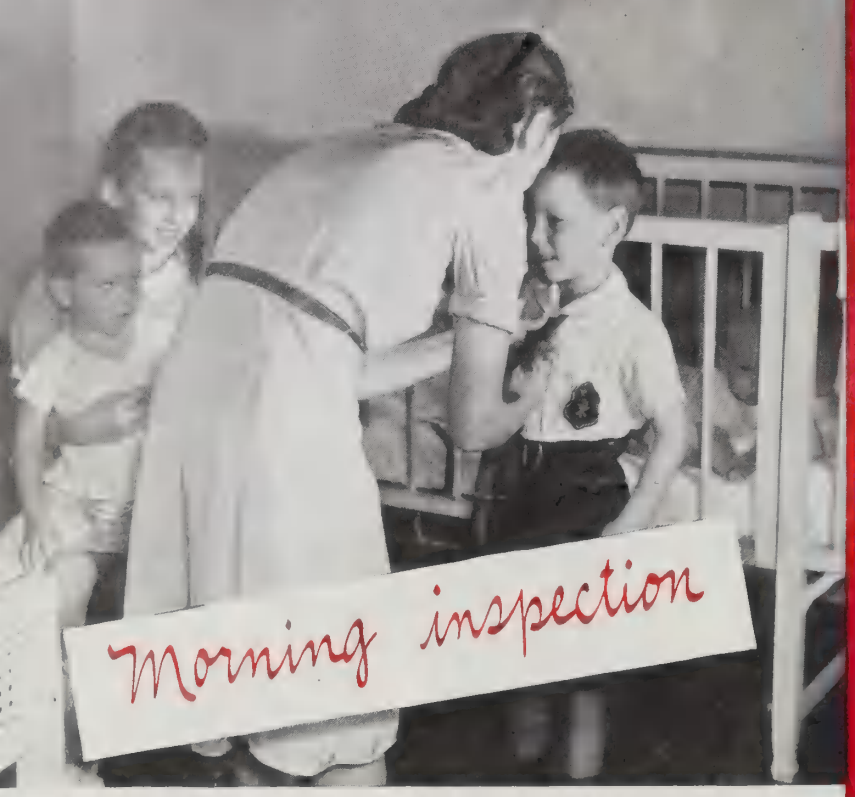
farm, and Kitty's "real qualities," John says, were what drew him to her from the beginning. She was employed as a file clerk in the duPont offices; he, a young man off a Galena, Maryland, farm—"a cocky Irishman," as he puts it, "who had been to Philadelphia and New York"—had no steady job, but he was God-fearing, self-respecting, ambitious, and he saw in Kitty the stanch, loving things he had always wanted and never had.

"I wanted to have kids for John's sake more than anything else," Kitty says, and she says it in an undertone so that John may not be embarrassed by the sound of tenderness in it. "He didn't have much care or loving when he was growing up," she says.



They were married in Christ Our King Church in 1934, the two of them alone. She wore a royal-blue crepe dress and a "bellhop-red hat," and lizardskin shoes. She remembers how she worried about whether or not the button was undone on the back of her dress. They were in debt when they married, about a hundred dollars, and they bought everything "on the cuff" for the first four years. There were times when John brought home only fifteen dollars a week from the various jobs he held; after the first two children were born, and another on the way,

Angels for two minutes

'Stasia's second in command, accepts responsibility on her own; stays home from school when mother is ill, cooks competent dinner, keeps Kevin on bottle schedule. Kitty points out 'Stasia's oil paintings to visitors. "She doesn't get her artistic streak from me. I guess children are my art."

"Yes, sir, he's my baby"

THERE ARE STACKS OF DISHES TO BE WASHED, BEDS TO BE MADE, AND ALL THE CHORES AND CHORTLES THAT COME WITH WORKING AND PLAYING TOGETHER.

There's method in the morning. Mother prepares hot-oatmeal breakfast, 'Stasia puts up school lunches, Mary-Ellen makes beds, John keeps order in the bathroom. No one leaves the house without Kitty's stamp of approval.

How The Quinns Spend Their Money

| | | | |
|---|---|---|---|
| Rent ($45 per month) | $ 540.00 | Cleaners | 80.00 |
| Insurance (all kinds) | 360.00 | Haircuts | 80.00 |
| Food | 1020.00 | Church Contributions | 75.00 |
| Milk | 420.00 | Fuel | 64.00 |
| Bread | 120.00 | Magazines, Newspapers | 50.00 |
| Telephone | 31.20 | Doctor, Dentist, Medical Supplies | 240.00 |
| *Clothing | 300.00 | Recreation | 100.00 |
| Shoe Repair | 48.00 | Miscellaneous | 71.80 |
| | | | $3600.00 |

*Mrs. Quinn explains: "My clothing budget may seem a little low for a big family, but we make out nicely because we have quite a few generous gift-giving relatives and friends. Also, some of the clothing is still good when an older child outgrows it and it can be passed on to the next in line. A large family does have many advantages."

PHOTOS BY MUNKACSI AND MINIKER

"I don't expect to see John at all when the cars start coming in," Kitty forecasts. John often stays "on the floor" till ten at night, wishes he had time for bigger share in raising children. Kitty takes a bath, puts on fresh dress and lipstick before John gets home, wants to look her best "even if I am thoroughly married and very much a mother."

John "dates" Kitty on Saturday at favorite downtown grill, they dance and almost forget to worry about whether children are asleep, warmly covered. Kitty won't dance with anyone but John, says she's the family income was as low as twelve dollars a week for a time. "But we managed," says Kitty. "We had to." And then, after some preliminary sales experience, John got the job with the Wilmington Auto Sales Company. He was making seventy-five dollars a week until the war put a stop to the selling of new cars.

"When John went back to selling cars in September," Kitty says, leaning over Kevin's crib to change his diapers, "all the kids—even Kevin here—seemed to know that things were picking up again. John loves buying toys for them—little things, you know, just to show he's been thinking of them when he comes home at night. At the shipyards, it wasn't easy. He put in a lot of overtime in order to average seventy-five a week."

Or perhaps even that isn't the right beginning for the story of the Quinns. Perhaps it should begin with a flourish at seven o'clock in the morning when, as Kitty says with a twinkle in her eye, "John gets up first and lets me snooze a few minutes longer." (It is John, too, who insists on getting up to attend to any disturbance during the night—Kevin needing another change of diapers, for instance.) While John shaves in the tidy, efficient little bathroom (Kitty has stenciled the wainscoting with a bright nursery frieze), 'Stasia, small-boned and slender, with a delicate, heart-shaped face like mother's, helps mother get breakfast and pack lunches of sandwiches, cookies and fruit for the five who go to the parochial school. Timmy, ten years, strong and handsome and the football player of the family, makes the beds in the "boys' room" (one double bed, one single); Mary-Ellen, nine, who looks like daddy and excels at spelling, makes the beds in her room (one double bed, one single). The five big ones dress themselves, but Kitty must braid 'Stasia's and Mary-Ellen's hair. At eight-thirty, John and five children leave the house, and with the closing of the freshly curtained little front door, comparative peace settles on the nearly empty rooms. There are only four children left: Rose Ann, five, a blond, curlyheaded beauty; Michael, four, trusting and sensitive, consoling himself with two fingers in his mouth because he would like a little more attention for himself alone; Kathy Jane, two, silky, light curls and soft green eyes, who would like to sit in Kitty's lap most of the time; and Kevin. Kevin's day is divided between his spacious crib and his baby coach on the patch of grass outside the door. He is sturdy and blond and looks as husky as a football player, but ever since birth his health has been a great worry—an enlarged thymus gland slowly improving under X-ray treatment.

In the first months after Kevin's birth, Kitty was in such a state about him that she would never leave him alone in a room, but kept him in a basket close to her wherever she happened to be working. "It almost got me down," she says. And then one evening, after a day on which Kevin's wheezing seemed particularly bad, John came home and even without her saying a word he knew that the done-in look in her face was something new to Kitty—Kitty the undaunted, the gallant, the boss of the whole show. "Look, Kitty," John said, and he put his arm around her. "We've had nine of them. God has been good to us. But you've got to treat Kevin like a baby in normal good health, the way you treated the others." And now he's getting better. "It must have been the accumulation of illnesses that got me down for a while," she says apologetically. "You see, there was Kevin's birth, and since Christmas we'd had five cases of mumps, one bronchitis, two cases of tonsillitis, three of them had their tonsils out, one pneumonia, one bad case of grippe." She had the visiting nurse in during that bad period, for the baths and alcohol rubs. "John, with the grippe, was the worst patient of them all," she says, making the humorous grimace.

The days and the evenings are so full that Kitty has little time for reading. But she likes women's magazines, and she buys them when she knows she'll have a chance to read them. She tries to arrange her day—and usually succeeds—so that there is a space for relaxation between one-thirty and the time the children return from school at half past three. Then the rush begins again: out (Continued on Page 191)

When Travel

IS A FAMILY AFFAIR!

First thought, safety—and there's no safer travel than train! Next, cost—and here no one need sacrifice modern comfort to save dollars. For in addition to its great fleet of all-Pullman and Pullman-and-coach trains, the Pennsylvania Railroad provides such famous all-coach trains as . . . The Trail Blazer, New York-Chicago . . . The Jeffersonian, New York-St. Louis . . . Liberty Limited (second section), Washington-Chicago . . . The South Wind, Chicago-Miami . . . The East Wind, Washington-Maine, in summer season. With reserved individual reclining seats, observation-lounge car, radio, popular-priced meals among many features. At your Pennsylvania Railroad ticket office you will find pleasant, experienced aid in helping you personally to plan delightful tours.

PENNSYLVANIA RAILROAD

Serving The Nation

BEHAVIOR CHART FO

JOHN and Kitty Quinn with their nine children have about all the problems with children that every or any family can muster. They have already learned that problems which once concerned them about some of the older children have disappeared by the time they have grown up as much as they have, and that other problems continue to increase and show no signs of disappearing. Kitty and John are both disturbed, for example, by the at-times lack of family affection that seems to exist among the children. There is so much fussing and spatting, and the older children seem to be doing more and more fighting as they grow older and the brood expands in size. It's hard for John and Kitty to understand this because they themselves practically never quarrel, and the children at times are so devoted to each other. Kitty hopes that close quarters—only six rooms for eleven people—explains the difficulty and that a proposed larger house will solve this problem.

I suggested to the Quinns that since it was impossible to record all the virtues of so desirable a clan of youngsters, it would be equally unfair to single out for discussion any of the problems of any particular child. I suggested that it might be helpful to the Quinns, and to other parents, if I drew up a kind of chart of a few of the commonest problems that puzzle, worry and distress parents. It could help parents to evaluate the seriousness of any of these difficulties at different age levels, and I could at the same time offer some suggestions for solution of these particular trying problems.

Any such chart must have the defect of any oversimplification; it cannot hope to cover the cases of unusual children in unusual circumstances. Every child is an individual, and his problems can be judged best and most accurately by evaluating him individually. The chart presented is prepared only as a guide by which a parent can measure and judge whether his child's problem is off the beaten track and needs special consideration and perhaps more expert advice.

It must be insisted that the time to handle any problem is in the now. Time, because it often corrects, cannot be counted on, alone, to eradicate difficulties. Childhood is so complicated and its problems so manifold that it is valuable to have some general simplified yardstick to help decide if the problem requires drastic action, or whether the parent can afford to wait while other more urgent and perhaps more constructive training is being done. A simple example would be the problem of thumb or finger sucking. A psychiatrist would inform the parent that the average child, if he starts finger sucking, will stop it in the ordinary course of events by the age of three. It need be a matter of some concern in the rarer case if it is continued up to the time the child starts to school. Until that time the problem should not warrant any great stress or the neglect of other more important habit training. I have selected Quarrelsomeness, Lying, Stealing, Shyness and Temper Tantrums—five problems—for this chart. I have included questions for parents to ask themselves and have suggested some corrective advice which follows from these questions.

★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

QUARRELSOMENESS

Within the home it is almost abnormal if there isn't some quarreling among brothers and sisters even after the age of 14. The larger the family and the smaller the house, the more quarreling there is likely to be. Quarreling frequently outside the home with other children is not normal after the age of 10 or 11. Quarreling in the home is abnormal after 12 if it goes into feuds or long-drawn-out battles. Quick fights that terminate as quickly are part of learning how to get along with one's own desires and the desires of other people. It is a kind of learning to adjust in the place—the home—where you have little social disapproval, little shame and few or no inhibitions. After 10 or 11, if the child is constantly quarreling with his outside playmates he is in need of special training.

Parents should ask themselves the following questions:

Do the children see and hear quarreling between their father and mother? If they don't see or hear it, do they sense it in silent tension and because there are no signs of affection? If the parents, like the Quinns, can say they almost never quarrel and that the children constantly see marital happiness, then they have no cause for ultimate alarm.

Do I stop my children's quarreling quickly enough to prevent its becoming fixed and habitual?

Do I expend too much energy and interest trying to decide who is right and who is wrong instead of disapproving and punishing both or all the children involved?

Do I permit tattling or informing, or do I rightly assume that I can find out better who is right and who is wrong?

Do I tend to overprotect one child against the other and thereby give the impression of favoritism and unfairness?

Do I ignore some of the quarreling so that children can learn by themselves how to settle issues and conflicts?

Do I distinguish quarreling from meanness as thoroughly as it deserves?

Do I put irritable children to bed or to rest instead of allowing them to quarrel?

Parents, in answering these questi can obtain a guide to their handling quarreling and can discover if they n have any fears about the seriousness of problem. If quarreling gets long drawn-out, if it goes into meanness or liberate hurting or injury, if it persists long on the outside of the home, then it behavior problem. It should be hand as any other bad behavior: Never le pay! Concrete advice about reducing amount of quarreling: Break it up quic if it begins to get out of hand. Don't to apportion guilt, punish everybody. nore minor short-lived fussing. Don't m any issue of it when the children do r It's unpleasant to listen to, but most o disappears of its own weight when child get to high school. You need have li fear about family affection when you f children defending their brothers and ters against strangers, even if they co home to fight among themselves.

LYING

Not serious up to the age of 5. A gr deal of prekindergarten lying is due fantasy and dramatic exaggerations, make events more interesting. The ly which is far removed from reality, such imaginary playmates, clearly fanta stories and obvious exaggerations, is serious and can be handled jokingly without too serious a manner. It doe hurt to let a child blow up a balloon imagination if you are certain playfully put a pin in it finally.

Lying which is used by the child to cape consequences is more serious even fore 5 years of age and is a cause for ala after the age of 9. Lying after five t gets others into trouble, whether it other children or adults, is very seri and should be handled as a major proble No other problem should take preceder

Much of lying is unwittingly sponso by parents. Parents should ask themsel these questions:

Do I give the child a chance to lie demanding confession when I alre know or can easily suspect that the c is guilty?

Are my punishments so severe tha force the child to try to escape by lyi

Am I making lying successful for child by not punishing when he de guilt and finds me gullible and himself warded for lying because he escapes j punishment?

Do I find it difficult to believe that child could be lying?

Do I take up children's quarrels w other children or neighbors and mak profitable for my child to exaggerate throw me off the trail of the true facts

Am I always careful to tell the truth that the child doesn't catch me lying?

The average child will give up ly when it clearly is demonstrated that doesn't pay. Much of lying starts a means of avoiding punishment. Do ask a child to confess a "crime" when know he's guilty, because you are likely have in the end to punish not only for misbehavior but for the lying as w (Tattling, which is ugly reporting of others' misdeeds, easily goes over into lying and should be thoroughly discouraged.) If you can be sure you are not being oversevere in punishment, you can safely punish when you suspect lying misbehavior and you won't be wrong many times in a hundred.

CHILDREN

BY COMDR. LESLIE B. HOHMAN, MC, USNR
Assistant Professor of Psychiatry, Johns Hopkins Medical School

STEALING

(It is the same whether you or your child call it "pilfering" or "swiping" or "snitching.")

From the age of 2 until school age of 6 or 7, stealing is not a serious matter, although it needs prompt correction so that the child gets early training in distinguishing what is his and what is not his personal property, and to teach the child general respect for ownership. From 7 to 11 or 12, stealing is a more serious problem. Theft from his own home and from his own parents is much less serious than theft outside his home. Theft from other children is less serious than theft from individual adults. Certain types of "social" theft, as from the ten-cent stores or corner grocery store, are serious and reprehensible, but do not need to cause too serious alarm, because it may be fear of failing to follow the group leader in his false cleverness and bravado. After 12, any type of stealing warrants serious and sustained attention.

Stealing always needs searching parental questioning and evaluation. Ask: Is the child stealing to get attention? Then the problem is to correct undue need for the center of the stage, or else to furnish good attention and stop parental neglect. Does the child steal because the parent is careless in furnishing proper example of whose property is whose? For example, does one parent borrow or take money from the other or the children without proper explanation?

Is the child stealing willfully or without point? If so, it is in more urgent need of correction.

Is the child following the lead of admired playmates in order to gain social approval? Then it's less serious, but there is need for changing companions.

Is the object stolen more valuable in my eye than it is in the child's? Then the stealing should not be regarded as more serious than what it means to the child. A valuable piece of china may ruin your neighbor's prize set of dishes, but it's only a sand-box toy to the small boy.

Do I permit stealing (of food or my tools) at one time without correction and suddenly demand a rigid standard of property rights at other times when I am angered by the loss of some needed objects? Stealing in such circumstances is less serious.

Did the stealing have some elements of misguided generosity? For example, buying candy for other children. If so, it's less serious than if purely for selfish reasons.

To correct stealing, never let stealing net the child a gain, either in keeping the stolen possession or by getting attention. Exact a penalty more than commensurate with the seriousness of the theft. Depriving a child of one week's allowance of 25 cents is not sufficient penalty for the theft of 25 cents which has already been spent on buying ice-cream cones. A wise parent insisted that a 25-cent theft from a church poor box be replaced by a hard-earned 50 cents. Stop association with children who have the habit of stealing as soon as you've seen your child is not the ringleader. Be sure you are sufficiently generous so that a child is not driven to take what you should give. Try to find any indirect or hidden motive for stealing, and correct motive, but never excuse any real theft.

SHYNESS

Natural in preschool years, especially the initial shyness on first meeting strangers. After age of 3 or 4, should not last longer than a few minutes. Not natural after child starts grade school.

But shyness at 3 to 7 should be a source of anxiety to the parent if it represents unfriendliness in the child, overattachment to the mother, jealousy of the mother, or is the result of a habit of fear.

Reappears naturally in adolescent period when social contacts between boys and girls develop with parties and dating. Undesirable if it lasts more than a few months and if it interferes with normal social adjustments. Parents must remember that this social adjustment requires many new kinds of behavior and attitudes, as the handling of sex awareness, learning new lines of talk, changes in cleanliness and dress, new manners, and so on.

Parents should recognize that undue shyness is not desirable and not to be sympathetically accepted as a fine sensitive quality. Parents should ask themselves:

Do I accept and understand shyness in my child, but I myself have been shy?

Do I permit my child to hide unfriendliness behind the guise of shyness?

Do I grant the child too much of my company and time because shyness prevents contacts with others?

Am I being flattered by the child's devotion to me to the exclusion of other people?

Am I letting abnormal fear of new people grow up by excusing shyness?

If the answers to these questions are searching and honest, the solution of the problem is not difficult. Although the shyness may be part of the child's personality to start with, its continuance is almost invariably the result of unwitting secondary rewarding of the shyness. The child gets more and too much parental attention and companionship. The child is likely to get sympathy from the parents because of the child's obvious unhappiness when being forced; and/or the child may succeed in maintaining unfriendliness because the parent thinks the child is merely shy. Shyness should be handled as an undesirable trait not to be rewarded or "understood." Treat it as you would stubbornness or a temper tantrum.

Adolescent shyness requires much tact and patience. Helping the boy or girl overcome shyness, helping to select and advise about proper clothes, inviting boys or girls to picnics or supper so that social contacts can be bridged by adult contacts, use activities in the home or church or school that are not totally different from what the boy or girl feels accustomed to—for example, cultivation of clubs which have a focal point of interest such as bird tours, current topics, dramatics, and so on. Cultivate boy-and-girl contacts which make them see and understand each other as people and not only as members of the opposite sex.

TEMPER TANTRUMS

Temper tantrums and temperish aggressiveness are undesirable at any age, and universally the result of poor training. Red light definitely if tantrums continue after the child reaches the age of 6. If aggressive temperishness goes into cruelty after the age of 3½ or 4, there is genuine cause for alarm, whether the cruelty is directed toward animals, other children or adults.

Overtiredness and sleepiness are partial excuses for temperishness. The parent should excuse it only in part because it is easy to learn to use the same pattern of getting its way when the child is not overtired.

Tantrums are less serious in the somewhat volatile, excitable child. This does not mean that they are not serious. A really great general can almost destroy his usefulness by loss of temper.

The parent should ask himself these questions in the problems of tantrums:

Do I let the child win the stick of candy or get a cooky by lying on the floor and screaming?

Does the child finally get to go to the movie or the circus after he has put on a scene?

Do I always make tantrums fail?

Do I supervise the child's play sufficiently so that when he mistreats another child or bullies other children with anger outbursts, he doesn't get away with it?

Do I never excuse my child on the ground that he is too young to understand? (Tiny babies stop screaming if they're not sick if they don't get picked up.)

Am I losing my own temper or having tantrums myself from which the child can pick up the example?

Am I nagging and unreasonable to the point that I stir up anger in the child?

Am I making issues which the child is unable to solve because I am whimsical in my orders? For example, letting my child stay up late one night after I've told him to go to bed, and insisting upon obedience the next night.

I have never known a well child who continued to have tantrums if the parent saw to it that the child lost any battle that he tried to win with a tantrum. The pattern of tantrums melts into nothingness in an extraordinarily short time if this rule is followed. Parents should avoid making issues when the child is tired, and they should avoid confusing and lax directions especially after the evening meal, because the whole family is apt to be most tired and on edge at that time.

Angry threats are particularly to be avoided. The child may respond to anger with anger, and may have a personal sense of justification because the angry threat is likely to be unjust.

If the parent is temperish and can't control himself, he can make the effort not to let the child see it. I have no prescription for the parent who loses his temper except to put a policeman with a club behind every door.

PHOTOS BY MINKER, MUNKACSI

"The trip she ought to take is a trip to her Singer Sewing Center!"

New faces, new scenes are all very well, but a little new scenery on Susan wouldn't hurt.

A crisp jabot for that old suit, a make-over job on last year's wool, a new print frock—that's the ticket for Susan! And where else can you find so much help, so many ideas as at your Singer Sewing Center? In fact, all women get a lift from this famous series of shops-within-a-shop, full of pretties and practical advice.

Look over this list yourself—and remember, these are only a few of the finds at your local Sewing Center.

Make a dress while you learn to sew. can do it in 8 easy lessons at Singer. you master the fundamental steps, set for life. Single 2-hour lesson, $1.50. plete course, $10.

Findings and fixings. Need a special of thread or binding? Or shoulder pa your dress? Singer has everything fro sors to tailor's chalk, right at their N Counter.

White Frosting. Give your suit a new look with a crisp dickey. Or add a pair of button-bow frills to an old frock. We've got new things, too, in scarves and flowers, in hankies and other dress accessories.

We cover buttons—and belts, too—right from your own material. We'll even make your buttonholes for you, hemstitch or picot, do all kinds of finish-up work. Prompt service, reasonable prices..

Order a double and forget about dress fittings. Takes only a comfortable 30 minutes to have a Singer Form molded to your figure. And it's you, to the last curve! Complete with adjustable stand, $19.75.

How to stitch a zipper. Just screw thi Zipper Foot on your machine, and s along, close to the metal. Most Singe tachments are back now, including famous Buttonholer!

Singer Sewing Cabinets. If you like to own beautiful things, and keep your sewing gear neat—a Singer cabinet is the answer! This one, in Chippendale style, has a sliding tray in the top, fitted with sewing essentials. Walnut or mahogany, $19.95. Other models from $15.95.

For your protection: Singer continues its policy of selling machines only through Sewing Centers identified by the Red "S" on the window, and never through department stores or other outlets. Check address of your local Singer Shop in phone book—Singer Sewing Machine Company.

We don't know how many wedding dresses and baby clothes have been lovingly stitched on Singer sewing machines. It was back in 1851 that the first Singer appeared, and ever since then, Singer has endlessly striver improve its product. Shown above is Featherweight Portable—the sewing wo that weighs only 11 pounds.

SINGER SEWING MACHINE COMPANY

Copyright, U. S. A., 1945 and 1946, by The Singer Manufacturing Co. All rights reserved for all countries.

IRS. QUINN TALKS ABOUT CLOTHES...

"I love to change from simple tailored clothes to a pretty feminine hat with my afternoon dress."

suit and coat must be practi-classic—to last several years."

PHOTOGRAPH BY LESLIE GILL

Slim as a twenty-one-year-old in her black dress with fitted midriff and soft skirt. Mrs. Quinn will wear it the year round, with many changes.

"I touch up my suit with bright scarfs or blouses, white gloves."

"I slip into something bright and pretty for dinner at home." A rayon shantung, $10.95.

"If I have a gray suit and topcoat and a black dress, everything else in my wardrobe falls neatly into place. Every color goes with gray, and a good black dress is right for any afternoon, or a small evening party."

Mrs. Quinn, amazingly young mother of nine children, always looks fresh and well dressed. This spring, she chooses a simple gray woolen suit and topcoat to last several years; a shantung dress in turquoise blue; and all-important house cottons. "I buy good ones," she adds, "because they wash more successfully, wear longer, and are nice enough for me to wear out to market." ★ BY NORA O'LEARY

"A good cotton dress saves money in the long

"Washable rayons are pretty and practical,

CUTEX

Young Red

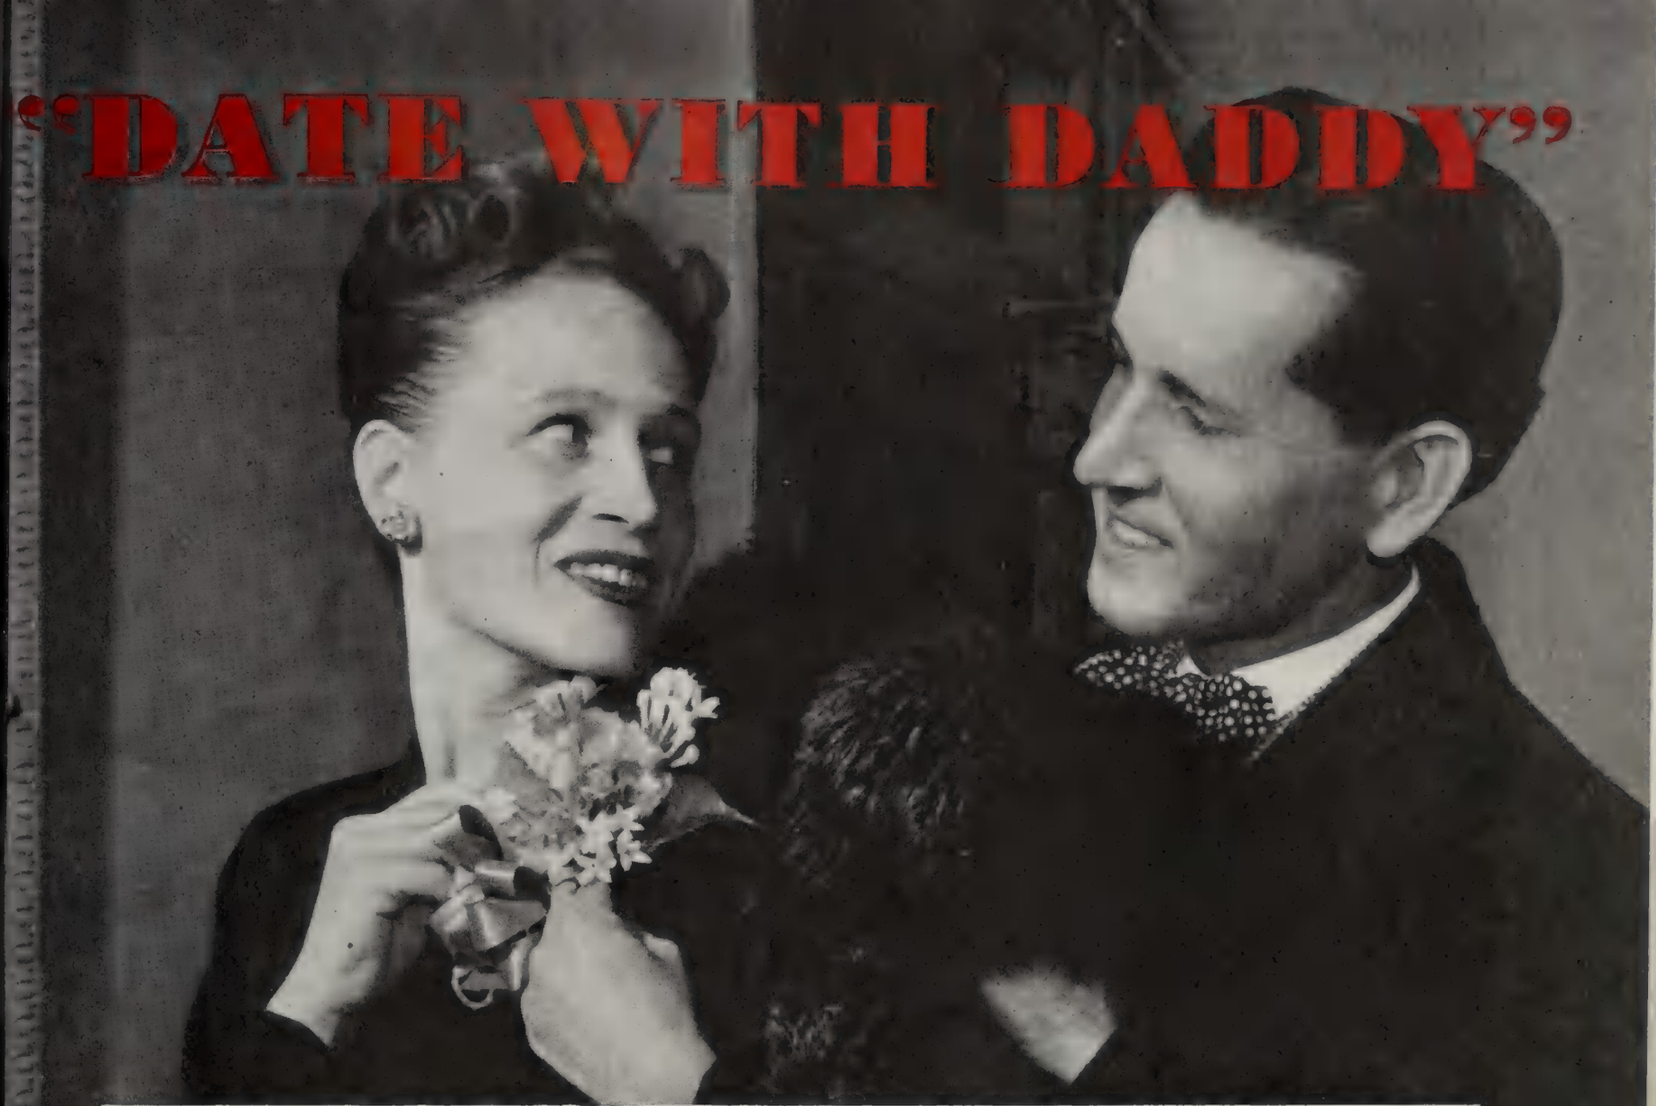
inspires



SCHIAPARELLI

LOOK OUT—you're courting romance . . . wearing daring Cutex "Young Red." Such a spellbinder . . . Schiaparelli chose it for her bonn with the roses on it. Flaunt it on your taper-long nails. P. S. To match—keep your cuticle divinely smooth with Cutex Oily Cuticle Remov

"DATE WITH DADDY"

STUART

Big date ahead. John and Kitty Quinn step out on Saturday night as enthusiastically as a courting couple—and have just as much fun. Their nine children at home give added zest to the occasion!

BY LOUISE PAINE BENJAMIN

Beauty Editor of the Journal

IF ever there was a couple who proved that where there's a will there's a way, it is John and Kitty Quinn. With a large family, a small house and a medium-size income, they have to be expert managers of time and temperament, as well as money, to make a go of it.

And they are—and they do. Their nine small fry are well cared for and happy. Their house is neat and friendly. Best of all, the parent Quinns have maintained between themselves the spirited companionship which is too often lost when marriage brings a succession of children, and inevitable bills and illnesses. John and Kitty still think of themselves as people as well as parents. Their devotion to their children has been an added value in their lives, not a substitution for their own early love, which still burns with enviable brightness. After twelve years of marriage they are still the best of friends as well as sweethearts. As Kitty says, they have such a good time "just talking" they don't know where the time goes! They are still each other's favorite "dates." To them, a real marriage means a sharing of work and worry, but it also means a wholehearted sharing of play.

When Saturday night comes, the children are whisked off to early bed, after a simple cereal supper. A schoolgirl comes in as a sitter, and daddy and mother shed their fireside responsibilities for a few hours and go dancing, or to the movies, or just to sit quietly in a near-by grill, enjoying inexpensive refreshments and making comments on the passing scene.

Naturally, they put on their best clothes and manners. What other audience is as important as each other? Kitty pins up her hair in accordance with the latest fashion illustrations, and wears her new lipstick. She would have made that much effort for her handsome John while he was courting. Why should she do less now? His open adoration is rich reward. A husband isn't so different from any other male. He responds in kind to the treatment he gets.

There should be more Johns and Kittys, contriving gay dates away from their families from time to time, and each making the same genuine effort to be attractive and likable that they did in honeymoon days.

Why aren't there more? No time? No money? No one to mind the children?

Those are the familiar defenses. But if you have been making them, take heed. A trained psychologist may catch you and tell you some surprising things about yourself, revealed by these excuses. Your protests may be simply cover-ups for a deeper lack in your marriage, which may in turn be directly traceable to a lack in you. If you have been feeling sorry for yourself because your married life seems to be developing into an all-work-and-no-play proposition, don't confess it publicly, at least not until you have taken a careful look at your own conscience. Your bid for pity may be prompted by a less-than-lovable trait in your own character, which you could—and should—do something about.

Here, for instance, are some of the reasons most often advanced by women complaining they are bogged down by marriage, or that they "never go any place" any more. Here, too, are some questions to ask yourself if you by chance have been feeling the same way, even secretly!

"I NEVER HAVE ENOUGH TIME."

Well, time is what you make of it. People make time for the things they want to do most. History has proved that humans, including housewives, insist on doing whatever is of primary importance to them. Hard-driven men and women have always managed to study, read, invent and do creative work around the edges of their crowded days. Harriet Beecher Stowe was busier than most present-day housewives. She had seven children and no modern kitchen equipment, yet she made time to write Uncle Tom's Cabin.

Maybe you spend too much time on your house and are one of those overexacting housekeepers with an insistence on perfection that tires everyone around you. Or you may give your children too much attention. Excessive maternalism is a thoroughly selfish indulgence, since youngsters, like all growing things, cannot develop properly if they are smothered.

Worst of all, it is possible that you deliberately throw yourself into an orgy of work because you have a martyr complex and want to be able to tell everybody about the miracles of effort you are required to perform.

(Continued on Page 202)

★ For America Lives ★

PHOTOGRAPHS BY STUART

There's more to this than meets the eye! The big refrigerator, placed strategically just inside the delivery door, has for its nearest neighbor deep storage drawers where extra cans of fruit juices, bottles of cola and such await their turn at being chilled. Above the counter, bowls and all the fixings for crisp salads. . . . Surprise corners, where pots and pans below, cups and glasses above, come to meet you with no more effort than a twirl of their turntable shelves! When you want them out of sight, solid panels form a corner closing. . . . Next to the sink, everything for vegetable preparation—knives sheathed safely yet ready, a man-sized pullout chopping board sturdy enough to hold a meat grinder. And bliss indeed, all topside cupboard doors roll up.

Sweet and varied are the uses of such a little "breathing space" as this! How we wish every woman might have one! Wouldn't it be heavenly to have a comfortable couch where a tired back could rest while cake was baking, where a housebound child could be tucked up with books or paper dolls, within talking distance of mother as she hustled round the kitchen? Here, too, in this cheerful room, we've placed the electric ironer, along the wall opposite the sewing machine. It's just the place for such quiet "afternoon jobs" as ironing, mending, account keeping or cookbook reading. Wide drawers beneath the built-in couch are for storing toys or extra blankets.

Plenty of Help in the Kitchen

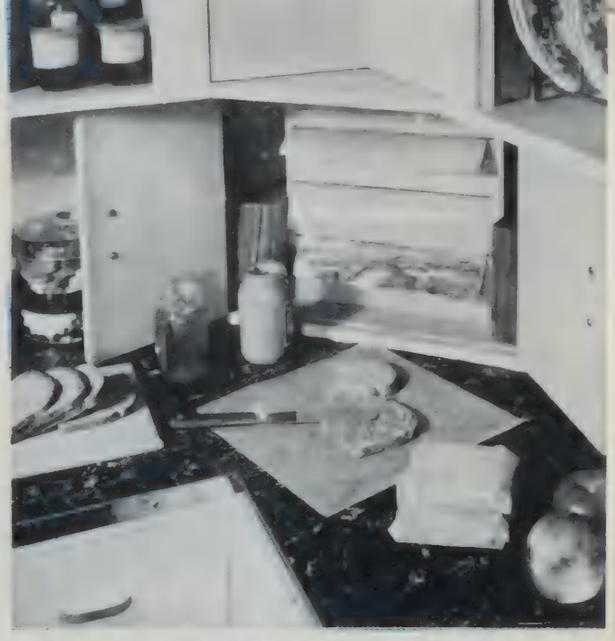
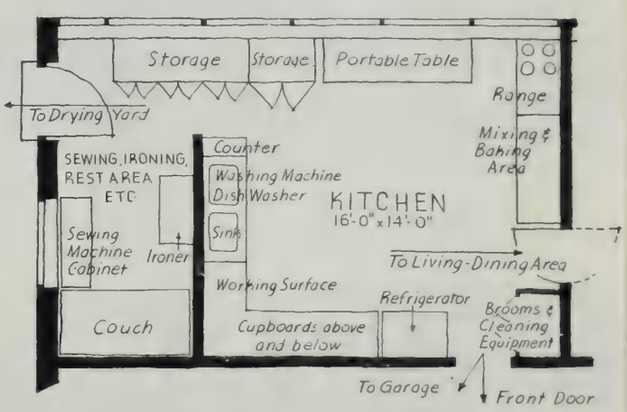
BY JUDY BARRY



NINE lively children, one pint-sized mother to cook, clean and care for them and for one busy husband, solo! Mrs. Quinn needs plenty of help from her kitchen. That's the sterling quality this kitchen has—it helps! It's like a capable, efficient friend, the kind who'll roll up her sleeves, pitch right in and really work when there's a job to be done! There's not a lazy spot in all its sun-warmed space—every inch is planned to help toward some definite purpose. Even its red, white and blue-sky beauty is helpful. After all, think of the hours a mother spends in her kitchen, and woman cannot live by bread alone.

Most important is the way it's laid out in self-sufficient little work islands for "finger-tip control" so that everything which contributes to a certain task is get-at-able without taking an extra step.



Baking, for example, could be a pretty formidable job for a family that size, in a helter-skelter kitchen. Think of the birthday cakes alone! But when everything that's part of the art of mixing them is gathered together in one well-lighted spot, baking bread and pies and cakes is fun because it's so creative. It's the "step 'n' fetchit" flurry in most kitchens that makes it seem hard to face. (Our bakery isn't pictured, but you may see it on the floor plan. Notice, too, the family-size portable table, placed at the window wall so mealtimes will be bright and sunny.)

Job planning like this is why, even though this kitchen is big enough for the Quinns and their nine little Quinnlets, it's all as hard-working, as thrifty with its mistress' steps and energy as the snuggest kitchenette. Lots more considerate of her back and temper, however, for wearisome bending and stooping, maddening search for places to store extras are almost completely eliminated.

Plan it well, and you needn't fear, if you, too, yearn for a kitchen big enough to match your family, that you'd need roller skates for transportation!

Close-up of the sandwich shop, inspired by the fact that Mrs. Quinn has five lunches to pack each morning! Behind the doors of a catercorner cupboard, waxed paper, aluminum foil and wrapping paper speed the morning getaway. An adjacent shelf offers tempting sandwich spreads. Above, the turntable shelves are shown as they look when closed. In the cupboard within easiest reach of the dishwasher, china stands in racks.

Where there are children, there also is mending. This easily made modern cabinet keeps all its ways and means conveniently together. The sewing machine wears a plastic dust cover during rest periods. There's a rack for scissors inside one door, ditto for spools inside the other. The bottom drawer is divided file fashion for patterns; the center one holds "to be mendeds"; the top drawer provides patches and mending tapes.

Here's one double feature you'd enjoy! A brand-new duet of electric dishwasher and automatic washing machine, made in combination with a big, deep sink, in one trim casing. Here it's hard at work doing dishes, while the laundry unit waits beneath the sink for washday.

On laundry day, the washing unit, which weighs only fourteen pounds, settles into place to deal with the family wash and spin it damp-dry. The dishwasher rests up beneath the sink. Each is a complete separate unit, but both are driven by one motor for space and money saving.

New Design for Living

MRS. QUINN gave us the prescription for a new kind of room in which to bring up children. "Large and sunny," she said, "a huge place where children can play games, study, read and have neighborhood parties. It is important that they all be together when indoors, so the mother can keep an eye on them without running about like the old woman in a shoe. Not a nursery, of course, for parents would want to use such a room along with the children." Finally she summed up, "I should want this to be just a huge room for a family such as ours to grow up in, without being restricted by the decorations." Then she added wistfully, "Of course I should like to have a really decorated living room with a heavenly scheme so John and I could express our own personalities occasionally. I've never liked to see parents hand over the home entirely to their children, but with the youngsters still so young I suppose that will have to wait."

The Idea. Out of Mrs. Quinn's yearning for both the practical and the beautiful came this new design for living: a big room with sturdy furnishings for family use; the small decorated traditional room for parents and their friends. The small room to be attractive, well groomed and orderly for visitors at all times; the big room to be a club, a place where interesting things happen, where children play or read without interruption, and the emphasis to be on the family instead of the furnishings.

The Traditional Room. First, let's look at the traditional room of Mrs. Quinn's dreams, for there are two features which make it decoration news of first importance. One is the all-over use of a basic color—walls, ceiling, draperies, upholstery and carpet—to create a feeling of space. The other is strict adherence to scale, using furniture pieces of exactly the right size for the particular spots they occupy. The room is quite small, measuring 11′ 6″ by 14′ 6″, yet looks much larger because of these two features.

A color used in this way must always be a "space" color: soft gray-green, dusty pink, aqua, powder blue, mimosa yellow or Persian lilac. These are grayed tints, made by toning down clear, bold pastels. Buy your fabric first, mix your paint to match, if you want to be sure of a perfect job. Don't be afraid of using too much of the same color, for that is the particular magic of such a scheme. Actually you are trying to create unbroken areas by not stopping the eye at any point in the background.

Accent colors and bits of decoration and design become increasingly important in such a scheme. We used dusty pink and grayed chartreuse as our accent colors, as they were prettiest with the big areas of aqua. Over the mantel is a painted mirror which "ties in" all the scheme colors, and both the design and colors of the painted mirror are repeated in the screen, sketched right from the mirror design. This is an idea you can use in any room, picking up the colors in a painting, rug or other treasure and repeating them in your draperies, upholstery or specially designed spot, such as a screen. And, in case you are wondering, the lamps with dusty pink shades are mirror glass, hand painted. This is an old craft revived which manages to look as charmingly modern as tomorrow.

Since much of the new furniture will be smaller in scale than for some years past— it's original eighteenth-century size, by the way—you won't find it hard to select pieces to suit your particular needs. The smaller scale adds comfort rather than sacrifices it, and you can have more pieces in your room. Oversized furniture, roundly padded, was a style, a vogue now on its way out.

If you have a small room which is a decoration problem, use this little traditional room as a pattern and follow the plan of an all-over basic color and smaller pieces of furniture.

The Family Room. Now for the new kind of family room as suggested by Mrs. Quinn's idea. We made a scale model of such a room designed by a sympathetic architect, in order to become acquainted with the idea and to find out if such a (Continued on Page 237)

This is the parents' private room, decorated in traditional style around Mrs. Quinn's favorite color scheme. Small, 11′ 6″ x 14′ 6″, it looks spacious because all areas are the same color, furniture is in perfect scale but comfortable and will not date the room. The painted mirror and screen are luxury touches.

Here is a new-type room for the modern family. Planned especially for children, it has space for play, study, recreation and other activities. The furniture slides, reassembles to suit an occasion. Floors are linoleum for hard use and streamlined housekeeping.

A BIG FUNCTIONAL ROOM FOR THE CHILDREN AND A HIDE-AWAY FOR PARENTS IS THE MODERN SOLUTION TO COMFORTABLE AND HAPPY LIVING.

By Henrietta Murdock

Interior Decoration Editor of the Journal

PHOTOS BY HAROLD FOWLER

The dining end of the room has a sectional table to be used for games or study between meals. The end wall is planned as an interest spot which changes now and then to keep pace with family enthusiasms.

Mr. Quinn and Henrietta Murdock study the model Mrs. Quinn experiments with arrangements.

Rhapsody in WHITE

"When I unwrapped it—it smelled so good—I thought I must try it right away." . . .

"I didn't realize any soap could be so effective on shirt collars and cuffs.". . .

"There is simply no other soap for doing up baby things." . . .

"Everything came out shining white and with half the work." . . .

"My neighbors all ask what I use that makes my clothes so white." . . .

"I could not keep house without Fels-Naptha Soap and Chips." . . .

In these and in thousands of similar phrases, American women write the Story of Fels-Naptha Soap—a never-ending tale of praise and appreciation. It is, in simple truth, a nation's Rhapsody in White.

Fels-Naptha Soap

BANISHES "TATTLE-TALE GRAY"

It takes $1500 a year to feed the eleven Quinns. Here's $25 worth at a cr

'Tis a Big Orde

By Louella G. Shouer

A PEEK at Kitty Quinn's pantry shelves and you think she's bought o the grocery store. She keeps this abundant supply going on just o shopping trip a week. "You have to make your head save your heels," s says, "with a gang like mine to feed."

The shelves of the cash-and-carry where she shops are her reminders as s goes up and down the aisles with a carrier buggy—she fills several. The we we followed her around she had three big cartons loaded into the car. Hor again, it takes her a good hour to put the week's purchases away. That's a other reason she's able to keep things going so well. She's a great believer a place for everything—everything in its place.

Milk comes to the back door by the case. They get away with eight to t quarts a day. Bread—three loaves a day—is delivered too. In the summe vegetables and fruits are bought from a vender.

It's quite a trick to run this show. How well could you do under simil circumstances? I'd call Kitty Quinn manager first-class. She deserves honest American blue ribbon, if not the cordon bleu.

Seven times eleven. Meals on her mind seven days a week for the eleven of them. It seems no burden for Kitty. Her success in getting through this three-a-day routine so admirably she attributes to the fact that the children are trained to eat what's put on the table—no monkey business allowed. Her meals consist of hearty food the family likes and is accustomed to. She sticks to the specials she's made so often she never needs a recipe.

To buy a fat pig. Meat isn't the biggest item in the Quinns' budget. It can't be. Kitty allows about $6 to $7 weekly for meat. One week Kitty bought a 4-pound pot roast. She had hoped it would provide slicings for sandwiches or a starter for a stew. It didn't. The youngsters polished it off at one sitting. In addition, she purchased 1 pound of bacon, 1½ pounds of round steak, ground; 1½ pounds of frankfurters; 4 pork chops, plus 2 thin steaks (all s could get—wonder who got which? Fish figures in once a week; a chicke when she can find one; and once month half a ham is the meal of t month. Kathy and the baby, of cours don't eat meat.

Rush hour. 'Stasia is Kitty's rig hand. She helps get the breakfast fruit juice, toast, milk and a big bow of cereal for all. Eggs are omitted. Yo can't eat your egg and have it to Kitty saves them for the main dish f dinner or a sandwich filling for t lunch box. The small children, how ever, get an egg for breakfast once week. When the breakfast rush is ov this kitchen team gets to work on th sandwiches that will go to school wit store-bought cookies (no time to bak them) and some sort of fruit—usuall apples and oranges. This goes like clock work, for Kitty keeps everythin d right at her elbow. Stasia's on her side to wrap and pack. They'd am and peanut-butter sandwiches day in the week—but that's just g. What goes between the slices re apt to be just peanut butter, na, jelly, egg salad or cheese—times lettuce and tomato.

top flight till dinner. Be- the day's dawning and dinner, goes from one chore to another she were equipped with a motor. never get through if I didn't." htime comes too soon. Then it's y sandwiches and milk or soup and ers for the young stay-at-homes. to start dinner catches up with t 4:15. It's back to the range for . The children have come home school by then, rosy-cheeked and ry. From 5:30 to 6 the main ess is eating.

ee-ring circus. All the Quinns n't possibly squeeze around the linette table. Kathy gets the high Kevin the crib. The four next young- have a small table to themselves. overflow sit at the grownups' table. n everyone has a different tale to talking and eating get all mixed up. y and Stasia help the little ones and o keep the show going. Serving is from the big table. Mary-Ellen and thy take turns at being maid or r, call themselves "Sadie and Alf." really makes the racket a little ear-splitting, and the children beg lay this game. When a child wants her serving, he must ask the server harge. Shouting brings an empty . Kitty says it's really working their manners have much im- ed. On occasions when the hulla- o gets out of hand and Kitty can that the youngsters are just tense need loosening up, she starts a g." This smooths out the "mads" he "hurts" and the children quiet n as they should before going to bed. Whew! By this time Kitty's ready some peace and quiet, and often she John dine alone after the house is . When John must be back at the e at 5:30, she eats early with him le the children play. But when the ily all eat together the calm comes r.

rybody loves stew but father. now and then dad has to give in at's the bill of fare. Menu planning sn't take much of Kitty's time. She a main dish, vegetable, a salad or vegetable. The children love raw ots—even raw Lima beans. Des- is a treat. About three times a week makes a simple pudding. Their main n depends on what she can get and at they can afford—something to fill m up. The Quinns don't mind fre- nt repetition of their favorite main es—meat loaf, roast pork, macaroni cheese, spaghetti with meat balls, becued "hot dogs," Swiss steak and aked beans—canned baked beans ssed up with Kitty's own special sea- ings. The youngsters eat and like ny dishes with mustard or catchup the seasoner. Whether you choose to d these dishes to your small fry or t, they are all hearty and good for eryday meals, mostly quick and easy prepare.

KITTY'S BAKED BEANS

pty 4 cans baked beans, either riety—Boston baked or those packed tomato sauce—into a casserole. d 1 cup dark corn sirup, 1 cup tchup, 2 teaspoons prepared mus- rd. Mix well. Slice 2 medium or 3 all onions and lay on top. Bake in oderate oven, 350° F., about one our. Twelve average servings—nine you have a Quinn appetite.

REBBUTED "HOT DOGS"

First make the sauce: Add ½ cup vinegar, 1 cup hot water, 1 teaspoon prepared mustard, ½ teaspoon salt and 1 teaspoon sugar to 1 14-ounce bottle catchup. Brown ½ cup chopped onions in 2 tablespoons shortening and add to the sauce. Split 1½ pounds of "hot dogs" (9—12) and pour the sauce over them. Simmer together about thirty to forty minutes. Serves ten. The Quinn children love this gravy on their mashed potatoes.

CHEESE MEAT BALLS

To 1½ pounds beef round steak, ground twice, add 1 large onion, chopped, 3 beaten eggs, ½ cup milk, ½ cup dry bread crumbs (Kitty buys the packaged ones to save time) and ½ cup grated hard Italian cheese. Mix thoroughly and season well with salt and pepper (1½ teaspoons salt and a little pepper). Shape into small balls. It makes about 38. Melt 4 tablespoons shortening in skillet with a clove of garlic. Add the meat balls and fry until brown, turning frequently so they will brown evenly. Remove garlic and drain off all the fat. To this Kitty adds canned spaghetti sauce and water to make a good gravy, simmers the meat in the sauce and serves with spaghetti and extra cheese. After the meat is browned, she sometimes makes a pan gravy instead of adding sauce. This is good with boiled potatoes. Serves ten to twelve.

Cake on Sunday. When she can spare the sugar, Kitty bakes a cake on Sunday. Not a crumb left by Monday. Homemade cookies, biscuits, pies and rolls don't figure in her life at all—too much time and bother. She buys cookies for the lunch snacks and lets it go at that.

Kitty has her own system and sticks to it—finds it's perfect for the Quinns. Here are some hints that will help you develop a marketing system of your own.

MARKETING MEMOS

1. If a price is low, be sure that it doesn't indicate low quality.
2. Buy in quantity what and when you can. If you can use half a bushel of potatoes in a week, by all means buy them that way. One large can of fruit juice is sometimes cheaper than the equivalent in smaller ones.
3. You can usually buy at lower prices at a cash-and-carry, but count up your time and gasoline. Be sure that they still leave you a good margin of saving.
4. Though Kitty may plan in her head from long practice, a paper and pencil will save the average person extra trips for forgotten items. It's a good idea to keep a pad handy to jot down staples that are getting low on the kitchen shelf.
5. If you shop in a cash-and-carry regularly, it's a good idea to arrange the items on your list in the order they are displayed in the store—aisle 1, aisle 2, and so on. This way, you can go up one aisle and down the other without making detours for the baking powder or canned peaches.
6. Carry a pencil when shopping—mark the prices on your list as you go along. When you get to the adding machine, you can keep up with the quick calculation and will be prepared for what your bill is to be.
7. Whether you keep your menus in your head or on paper, some sort of skeleton grocery list is essential in order that all the nutritional qualities are well represented in your market basket. When money must stretch, this has a plus importance.
8. While "make it yourself" saves money, the ready-mades save time. There are going to be more and more quick-to-serve items on your grocer's shelves. Choose what best suits your way of life.

HE WRESTLED
the wind...and won!

A man of many talents, Robert Fulton promoted canals with his able pen...painted portraits, excelled at drawing..., invented new dredging devices, perfected a torpedo for under water warfare, built "diving boats", and designed the Clermont... the steamboat which outmoded the wind, did much for the rising commerce of the rapidly expanding nation.

Fulton wrote with crude quill pens. Now men have far finer writing tools...the Inkograph, precision-made, fast-acting, easy-flowing, with a 14kt solid gold ball-like point that writes with the ease of a soft lead pencil on any quality paper...fits any style of writing, and is adapted to every hand.

Reliable, sturdy, durable yet light, the Inkograph pleases the eye, has the good-looks and superior workmanship associated with high priced pens, but costs only $2.00.

At leading dealers. Inkograph on barrel and clip marks the genuine.

Exclusive features...

Suits any hand or style of writing...Writes smoothly on any quality paper...Withstands child's roughest usage... Unequalled for clear carbon copies with original in ink. Point won't bend or spread ... Does lettering or ruling without smudge or blot... Gives years of unfailing service... Fully guaranteed.

INK-O-GRAPH $2

Inkograph Co., Inc., 200 Hudson St., N. Y. C. 13

GOLD RUSH

(Continued from Page 25)

This roused me. The instinct of self-preservation is strong. "Look, I'm too young to die. Isn't there somebody who will take me in—even for one night?"

All three of us got the same idea at the same time. I felt Valerie wriggle with annoyance, but she did not actually register her vote to drop me in a snowdrift. I figured all I had to do was sit tight too. I did. We coasted a couple of miles in complete silence. The heater, as advertised, had gone dead.

"You're a hard man, Timothy Kyle," I said finally, and added in a very small voice, "Gee."

"Maybe Cousin Mary can fix you up someway at the farm for tonight," said Tim, as calm as if I wasn't practically crawling all over the floor boards clutching at his knees.

Toward dawn I had a horrible dream I was dying of cold in the middle of a vast frozen wilderness. Then I realized I was awake and not dreaming. I was in Vermont. I sprang out of bed and my feet, numb as they were, touched bare floor that seared their soles like dry ice. I emitted one faint squeak. But with teeth chattering and my breath going in highly visible short gasps, I reached for my clothes. The gray light would be morning. I was in Tim Kyle's house. Tim Kyle and Valerie Fletcher and me. And "me" was Minks Randall, the girl who always gets her picture.

When I stumbled down the back stairs to the kitchen, there were lights, a hot stove and Cousin Mary Kyle.

"There now! You're blue," said Cousin Mary. "I saw it was thirty-four below this morning and I said, 'There now, that poor skinny little thing had ought to have had another quilt.' What's that around your neck?"

I showed her the camera. She was pleased, but not optimistic.

"What are you going to take pictures of around here?"

It was a good question. I scratched frost off a kitchen window and peered out. There was snow. I don't mean there was some snow around on things. I mean there was snow, period. Cousin Mary said, however, that a barn could be found outside somewhere and Tim was in it.

"You aren't going out like that?" she said.

First I thought she was cracking my last year's but genuine karakul jacket. Then I saw her eye was on my nether parts. "Look," I said, "you and your Cousin Timothy make like I'm a kewpie dressed in a fireman's hat. Sure I'm going like this. If the cows don't like it, it's time they learned."

I swept out the back door, stepped onto ice and sat down. What I busted was not my camera. For the benefit of sportsmen who may follow in my crumbling footsteps, I'll announce that the need of boots is for traction, not waterproofing. There's no water anywhere at thirty below.

THE light was brightening, and by good luck I found Tim, squatted under a cow to hook on his permanent-wave machine, where light from a window struck down. It was a honey. Dramatic.

"How's about lifting your face this way?" I said.

He glanced up. I clicked. Fortunately, the shutter was closed before he saw who it was. His face went definitely sour.

"Quite a hobby," he said. "Pictures."

"I wouldn't know," I said, and told him who I worked for.

For the first time in my experience the magic name backfired. People often say they don't want publicity. Tim didn't say. He looked. And he meant it. I shriveled, who don't shrivel easily.

"Oh, now," I objected, "this hurts me worse than it does you. I don't palpitate to candid shots of boy milks cow, but if the editor sticks a pin in a map and says, 'Minks, go shoot Sims River,' I go. Cousin Mary says I'm a skinny little thing; and remember, I have to buy that stuff you're pumping. In bottles. At eighteen cents per."

"Sure." Tim was busy under the cow again and his voice had no expression except meaning what it said. "I'll run you in to the village as soon as we get this milk out. Eat some breakfast if you haven't, and get your bag ready."

This interview was over. I hung around and wistfully snapped one combination shot of Tim's and the cow's rear ends, then drifted back to the house—if "drifted" is the word for me on glare ice. Things didn't look so good.

Val Fletcher was in the kitchen, and I hereby admit I've never seen anything cuter-looking, with her tailored ski pants and flannel shirt and big blue eyes—fixed on my camera.

"Uh-huh," I nodded, "I'm a reporter."

Her eyes didn't go any wider, because they couldn't, but her stare all of a sudden wasn't ignoring me this morning.

Return

BY BERNICE SLOTE

Past the neon street, melting through
The picket fences, coming here to stand Without a shadow in the doorways—(Do
You see the green vine reaching for my hand?)

The men return who now are dreams, made whole
In dreaming only. Lonesome is no word
For what they are, yet here the dark will roll
A little way apart when they have heard

Our voices speak a name, have seen us turn
A moment, listening, to the door where They might come. . . . For all the shadows, burn
A welcome in your eyes. (Who touched my hair?)

Cousin Mary was rattling pans in the pantry. I said in the same low voice, "I'm in sort of a spot. Why couldn't we slip into another room and talk a minute?"

The kitchen was the warm room on the Kyle farm. In the sitting room Val and I could see our breath, but neither of us wasted much.

"I'm afraid Timothy doesn't like me," I said.

"He could hardly like or dislike you, could he? And what difference ——"

"Only that I want to board here for a day or so."

"The Kyles don't take—well, of course I'm a boarder, but I mean I'm also an old friend."

"That's it. So maybe you could persuade them to let me stay here."

"Why ——"

I interrupted with a headshake. "I'm a reporter. My job is to get information, not give it—to you or Tim Kyle or anybody. I mean, I wouldn't break a news story. Unless I had to. What I'd like best is to keep my mouth shut. I'll do that as long as I'm left alone to get my pictures."

It was a raw proposition. If she'd keep me in the house, I wouldn't tell Tim about his money. She couldn't help understanding. But I looked into those wide, innocent baby eyes and I felt my flesh crawl and I had to give the pretty kid an out. I managed a genial smile.

"Help the poor working girl. I'm sent to Sims River to get pictures. By all accounts nobody wants a boarder. Can you persuade the Kyles to keep me?"

"I'll speak to Miss Kyle," said Vale.

Cousin Mary had the normal reaction about a member of the staff of our well advertised weekly magazine. She was all at "And don't you worry about Tim," she assured me. "He always says he runs the ba and I run the house."

WHEN Tim came in and got the tremendous news he neither looked at me nor said word. Both were fine by me. I wasn't at posed portraits. I got four good candi shots of the gangling frozen-puss doing chores. Then Valerie went to work on h to take her skiing. "Frozen-puss" is ju by way of handy insult. Valerie thawed hi all right. When she dimpled up at him, smiled.

"I thought farmers had to work," I sa to Cousin Mary when Tim and Valerie dro off in the station wagon to some alpine s lift miles and miles away.

Mary laughed. "I don't guess Tim wou go off mornings for anybody but Valer He's had a soft spot for her since she wa little tyke."

"Yeah, so I see. And she looks pretty w ing herself."

Mary peered at me sharply. "There no did you notice it too? Seemed to me she w different this time someway. It's how s smiles at him."

"Ah, the dawn of love. Very sweet."

Cousin Mary didn't answer my grin. "( course you didn't know—but Valerie's f ther is rich. A millionaire, I guess. The couldn't be anything between Tim and V Fletcher."

"Well, Valerie may feel ——"

"Oh, I'm not talking about her feelings. mean Tim wouldn't have anything to do wit her that way. He's funny about money. rich man came over here from York Stat Tim breeds Jerseys and this man wanted buy the whole herd. When he got up to offe ing twice what they were worth, Tim sai 'Mister, I don't want to sell my herd for wha it's worth, and I don't want money for noth ing, either.'" Cousin Mary laughed. "'Cours that didn't stop Tim next day from makin a hard trade on George Forstman at th Depot. But that's different. That's busines Tim's got no use for anybody after eas money."

"Um," I said, and dropped it. Friend Tim was going to find himself hooked and the have a lifetime to wonder if the gal had bee after easy money. Which, I reminded mysel was absolutely no skin off my nose.

I phoned New York. "This is Mink Randall," I told Mr. Cobb. "How's every body's health?"

"He's the same this morning. That mean worse. I'll be phoning in a few hours at most What ——"

"My number here is Sims River five-two ring two-two. A girl named Valerie Fletche and I are boarding at the Timothy Kyl farm ——"

Mr. Cobb began a sort of strangled whoop so I cut in firmly: "Remember, this is a party line, so we mustn't talk too long."

He got it. "Well, I'm glad you found some shelter from the weather."

"If you'd cared a hoot about me and weather you'd never have sent me."

"Don't pretend you aren't having a wonderful time, Minks. Now you go right or having a lovely holiday. I'll phone."

I hung up full of dark thoughts. I could see that lug Cobb, lolling in his steam-heated office and rubbing his hands in glee. He'd caught the Valerie angle quick enough. Disappointed heiress pursues elusive fortune under the camera's eye. Very funny. But I

(Continued on Page 186)

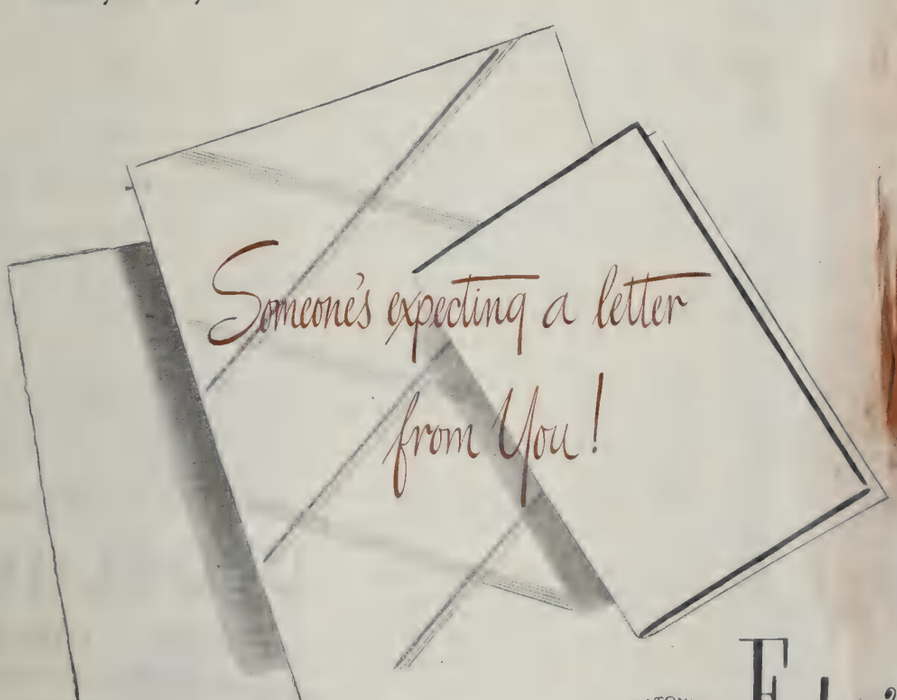
Did you ever see a Woman Standing in a Doorway ... reading a Letter?



We're not trying to say that you should write more frequently to someone you love. You know that.

We're not trying to say that you should write home. You know that, too.

We're saying that you, of all people, know exactly what a letter means. Because you like to get letters yourself. Because the war taught you, and so many others, that without letters there is an emptiness which nothing else can fill.

Everybody forgets — so maybe this will help you remember — two things: that someone's expecting a letter from you ... that someone will appreciate your letter more if it is written on stationery that expresses you ... the individual you. So look at your letter paper carefully. Is it you? Does its quality say "I am doing well"? Does its fashion say "In my letters, too, I want to look my best, for you"?

The better stores have a full personality-range of Eaton's Fine Letter Papers in Open Stock — which means you can always renew your supply of the Eaton Paper you choose to make your very own.

EATON'S · FINE LETTER PAPERS · 1818

Eaton's fine Letter Papers

Pittsfield, Massachusetts.

The turn of a cheek translucent as fragile porcelain, the quick whisper "Who is she?" This you'll get wearing DuBarry Face Powder. Like a veil of velvet gossamer, it screens out tiny imperfections, clings light as mist for lovely hours. Yet, under it, your skin always feels soft as rose petals. Scientists have formulated this powder to agree with all skins and the DuBarry Success School* has proved this with thousands of women. Exciting? Exciting as your first solo flight in the bright tomorrow.

* The DuBarry Success School at the Richard Hudnut Fifth Avenue Salon, where so many women have been helped to greater loveliness, offers you a free DuBarry Success-O-Plan. Ask for this guide to the most effective beauty care, for you at your favorite cosmetic counter.

DU BARRY BEAUTY PREPARATIONS
BY Richard Hudnut NEW YORK

(Continued from Page 184)

was where the people were real, not pictures. Sure, Valerie was mad at her pa, but old Albert Fletcher was her pa, and he was dying in New York while she chased his money in Vermont. And that was the baby-faced angel who came riding into the kitchen that evening pickaback on the unsuspecting boob Tim Kyle.

"Timmee! Put me down, you," she squealed, keeping a strangle hold to make sure he didn't put her down till Cousin Mary and I had got the picture and sort of made the union legal.

Mind you, I wasn't jealous—except as any stunning girl like me knows a man's a fool if he doesn't even see her.

Tim was late for the evening milking, of course, and I followed him out to the barn, while Val went upstairs to change for supper.

"You haven't mentioned my new trousers," I said.

"I figured that was the kindest way," Tim answered solemnly.

"Gee. And I paid six-fifty for these iceman's delight and walked a half mile to the village and a half mile back to get 'em."

Tim nodded. "Aya. I stopped by the store on the way home and Harlan said you'd been in. He gave you a nice easy fit."

My massive woolen pants were gathered in a bold sweep at the waist and more or less held up by a belt from a kid's soldier suit.

"They're big," I admitted. "I thought maybe they made me look tiny and, you know, appealing."

Tim happened to get up to move a milking machine. So he gave me a full two seconds of his undivided attention. Then he shook his head and reached for his machine. "There's padding enough, but someway you still don't look soft."

I went back to the house grinning. You could say it wasn't much of a talkfest, but I was beginning to learn about these Vermonters. They can drawl out a couple of insults and you've really got something.

VALERIE gave me a careful look as I came in. Maybe she didn't quite trust me to keep my mouth shut, or maybe she figured the way I did—that even a little side diversion might delay her game. She couldn't afford much delay.

Or so I thought. But the phone didn't ring that evening, nor all the next day. To be more exact, the blasted thing rang continually—for everybody else on the line except the Kyles—and every time it tinkled I lost six breaths. I suppose Valerie did too. She didn't let it slow her down though. I came into the sitting room where Tim had built a fire in the stove and found her racing down the homestretch.

"But, Tim," she was saying, "that's so silly. If I loved a boy, I wouldn't spoil everything just because he happened to have money."

Cousin Mary and I had been doing dishes and she was right behind me in the doorway and I heard her give a little grunt.

Tim didn't answer. His eyes stayed on Val as though Mary and I hadn't appeared. Val was cross-legged on a cushion on the floor, not really at his feet but sort of suggesting it.

And Val was smart. The more witnesses the quicker it was "understood how things were." She did a long liquid gaze into Tim's eyes, then tore her look away to smile wistfully at Mary Kyle and say in a forlorn little voice:

"Cousin Mary, do you believe Tim would be stubborn and cruel? Oh, as if a little money made any difference compared to—to loving somebody!"

It was too much for me. I'd promised to hold my tongue and I don't break promises. Neither did I have any notion I was a match for Val Fletcher in the clinches. The most I could hope for was to stall Tim Kyle till the big news came. Then he could clasp her to his manly bosom and to heck with him. But Val Fletcher wasn't going to shoot the guy in the back while I had my fair white body to fling in the bullet's path. At least I hoped she wasn't.

Val had Tim's household leisure sewed up, so I took over the barn for my operations.

Stops Perspiration Troubles *Faster

THAN YOU PULL ON YOUR NYLONS

Perhaps even better news than Nylons . . . a new super-fast cream deodorant that stops perspiration troubles faster than you pull on your Nylons.

Change to new Odorono Cream Deodorant; contains science's most effective perspiration stopper.

Affords many other greatly needed blessings too—really protects up to 3 days. Will not irritate your skin or harm fine fabrics, or turn gritty in the jar.

It's excitingly different. It's new, super-fast Odorono Cream Deodorant.

NEW, *Superfast

ODO·RO·NO

CREAM
DEODORANT

39¢
Also 59¢ and 10¢
Plus Federal Tax

ODORONO ICE is back from the wars . . . 39¢

the most surprising thing...

about Tampax

TAMPAX holds many surprises for the woman accustomed to all the external rigging of belts, pins and pads during "those certain days" every month. Probably the most impressive discovery is the fact that you need not give up your daily shower if you use Tampax. For Tampax is worn internally and cannot interfere with your regular bath in either shower or tub.

But Tampax brings other benefits too. For instance, no odor can form and there is no chafing. When you wear tight-fitting slacks or a dress of sheer material, you can be absolutely sure no ridge-lines or edge-lines can show through, because with internal Tampax, edges and ridges do not exist! Millions of women have switched over to Tampax in recent years and are now enjoying new freedom from this embarrassment.

Invented by a doctor, Tampax is made of pure surgical cotton compressed in dainty insertion-applicators. No pins, belts, external pads. Easy disposal. At drug and notion counters. (Whole month's supply goes in your purse.) Tampax Incorporated, Palmer, Mass.

NO BELTS
NO PINS
NO PADS
NO ODOR

3 absorbencies { REGULAR SUPER JUNIOR

Accepted for Advertising by the Journal of the American Medical Association

TAMPAX INCORPORATED LHJ-36-F
Palmer, Mass.

Please send me in plain wrapper a trial package of Tampax. I enclose 10¢ (stamps or silver) to cover cost of mailing. Size is checked below.

( ) REGULAR ( ) SUPER ( ) JUNIOR

Name_____

Address_____

City_____ State_____

A barn was probably better suited to my dainty technique. Also, Tim had to spend a lot of time there. Of course he never stood still. When I say I pursued him, I mean pursued. My soft cooings had to be panted out on the dead run from pig shed to silo to milk room.

The cows didn't mind, though. And I was an absolute natural with Abdullah Bulbul Ameer, Tim's prize Jersey bull. Ab adored me.

"You've got the right approach," Tim said pleasantly. "Direct."

As far as Tim himself was concerned, there wasn't a flicker. Not only did he refrain from licking my face all over, in Abdullah's forthright manner. His look at me, when he looked at all, was precisely the same as on the first evening at Porter Depot, when he'd said, "Guess you haven't got much on from the middle down." "Bland" is the kindest word. That is, he didn't actually scowl at me.

I had one single encouragement. He took to watching me out of the corner of his eye when I made with my camera, which is definitely little Minks at her best. My best, but doggone it, no allure.

No. It was Valerie who peddled the allure. And, while I couldn't know all that went on between Val and Tim, I had to see that Cousin Mary considered the affair settled.

"'Tisn't as if Tim had nothing of his own," Cousin Mary told me excitedly. "And a body can see she's real set on him."

"A body can," I agreed.

Then it happened.

Okay, everybody but me would know it was happening. What I knew was being

---

The time to be careful of the end is at the beginning.

Patience is bitter, but its fruit is sweet.

---

waked up by the phone bell jangling two-two, two-two, two-two. There was a beginning of gray morning light. Four days I'd been waiting for the New York call. I lay stiff, hearing Mary Kyle answer. And when I heard Mary saying, "Why sure, Lena," and when my breath let out in a glad whoosh, the whole thing hit me. I didn't want that New York call. The call would come and the story would break and Tim could take care of himself. My excuse for chasing Tim Kyle ended when he knew the truth. That would end it, and I couldn't bear it!

I jackknifed out of bed to get away from myself. Still half asleep and rattling with cold, I poked legs into my cavernous wool pants. I just wanted to get to the barn. Without thinking. I just wanted to see Tim.

I don't know what I thought it was going to do for me. But I know what it did do. Tim heard the scrape of the big door and glanced over his shoulder. I said he was a frozen-puss, but he'd gotten to expect I would come, and he smiled, then turned back to the cow he was finishing. I leaned against the door and wanted to die. I loved him so I couldn't breathe and thought probably I would die. Sure. I know it never really happens all of a sudden like that. Leave it that I'm simple-minded or a case of arrested development. It was sudden as far as I knew.

I was hanging on to the door on account of my knees had come unstuck, and of course eventually Tim looked around again to see why I wasn't right in there pestering him as usual. That had to be the morning he smiled again. It was a record. Two grins in succession.

"Better get over here where I can keep an eye on you, Minks. Makes me jumpy, waiting to get hit from behind."

I don't suppose that sounds like "But soft! what light through yonder window breaks? It is the east, and Juliet is the sun." But you see, he'd never called me Minks before. And it sounded so darling and different and nice in his flat drawl. And it wasn't quite accident, because Tim never said things by accident. And sure, yes, I was in an utterly liquid state anyway.

Why

POWERS MODELS

have such naturally lustrous shining-bright hair!

Miss Ann Wickham, resplendent Powers Model, finds Kreml Shampoo keeps her hair so much easier to arrange in the stunning new hair-do's

Positively Never Leaves Any Excess Dull Soapy Film

The way Kreml Shampoo thoroughly cleanses every tiny strand of hair and brings out all its natural shimmering highlights is sheer sorcery! Here's a shampoo that really KEEPS ITS PROMISE.

Those divinely beautiful Powers Models famous for their shining bright locks use Kreml Shampoo and how they rave about it! They claim there's nothing better to leave hair softer, silkier and easier to arrange. Kreml Shampoo leaves the hair so sparkling clean—fairly dancing with its natural glossy brilliance that lasts for days.

Helps Keep Hair From Becoming Dry or Brittle

Kreml Shampoo positively contains no harsh chemicals to dry or break the hair. Instead, its beneficial oil base is simply wonderful to help soften dry, brittle ends. It rinses out like a charm and never leaves any excess dull soapy film which makes hair look so muddy and lifeless.

So glorify your hair with beautifying Kreml Shampoo—then see how quickly "he" succumbs to your added charm. Buy a bottle at any drug, department or 10¢ store.

You, Too, Can Shampoo Your Hair Like Beautiful POWERS GIRLS

Kreml Shampoo brings out your hair's natural shimmering highlights and silken sheen

Leaves hair with its silken sheen that lasts for days

Makes hair easier to set and arrange in any style

KREML SHAMPOO

FOR SILKEN-SHEEN HAIR—EASIER TO ARRANGE

MADE BY THE MAKERS OF THE FAMOUS KREML HAIR TONIC

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

A product of R. B. Semler, Inc.

Well, I oozed backward out the crack behind me, pushed the big door closed from the outside and stumbled and skidded to the house. This time in my bedroom I was awake all right. I didn't wring my lily hands and moan about it was hooey, it didn't make sense, it couldn't happen to me. I packed, and fast.

I sneaked down the front stairs, pushed a little note with my board money under the kitchen hall door, let myself out the front door and headed for the village. Don't misunderstand. I wasn't casting myself for the lovesick maid, the blighted rose, this world all lost for love. I meant to square myself and keep my job someway. I meant to grab myself by the neck and tell myself what I really thought of gangling hicks and Vermont farms and mornings at thirty below. That would come later; safe in New York, I'd remember to loathe it all again—so help me, I'd remember if it took a lifetime.

But this morning if I had to watch Val Fletcher lay her paw on my gangling hick I knew I'd kill her with my bare hands. This morning if that gangling hick smiled at me once more I'd crawl inside his shirt and cling there till he beat me to a pulp. I had no rosy wistful doubts about the beating, as soon as he knew. "Tim's funny about money. Tim's got no use for anybody after easy money." Gold digger. I had even hoped Tim might get disgusted with Valerie—a girl he'd always known and liked who'd maybe never admit she'd known about his money who maybe even didn't know. But I knew. That's where little Minks came in. Minks knew which side the butter was on and there'd never be any question in anybody's mind about that.

With a good-sized suitcase I walked the half mile to the village without knowing I was walking at all. The mail, and passenger if any, truck always left the post office at eight and the post office was in the store. So the store was open when I got there at seven-forty. I put in a person-to-person call for Ellory Cobb to get him at his home.

"Sorry to wake you up," I said. "This is Minks Randall. Look, Mr. Cobb, I'm folding up on you. I—I wouldn't if I could help it. I—you'll have to send somebody ——"

"MINKS—well, say. I was going to phone when I got to the office. Fletcher died half an hour ago. But I was going to phone when I got downtown because—well, he regained consciousness, Minks. Reinstated the old will. There's no story. Your farm boy is out. But now don't take it too hard. Maybe we can use some of ——"

I'm not sure whether I hung up or not. I do remember Harlan Pease yelling something about didn't I want my suitcase as I shot through the store and went pelting off up the middle of the road. Never having trained for the half mile, I wouldn't naturally have done much thinking on the sprint home, but besides, it was my day for dashing places without deciding what for.

I banged through the front door I'd left unlocked and down the hall toward the kitchen. Cousin Mary's voice stopped me, in the kitchen doorway. Tim, with his back to me, stood on one leg like a wobbly stork, wrestling with a boot. But Cousin Mary's face was a study in befuddlement.

"But why?" she was squawking at him. "Why do you have to go after her? I tell you she's gone clean back to New York. See, here's what she wrote. She's gone ——"

"Maybe I can catch her! Got to get her back! I mean—well—well, we wouldn't want her just to go away ——"

"Tim, what's got into you? Why shouldn't she go if she ——" Mary saw me then.

And Tim must have seen her see me, because he dropped his boot and swung around. For a second he looked at me the way a kid looks at a Christmas tree. I guess I was looking at him the same way, except I'm not so cute with my mouth left open.

"Gosh, I thought you'd gone," said Tim. "Looked like you hadn't taken much of a shine to us around here."

SO I told him. Ah, that little Minks, so coy, so shy! I was still gasping like a winded fish, but by speaking on outgoing and incoming breaths I stood and delivered. "I love you, you swivel-jointed scarecrow. I love your stupid cows and your stinking barn and your freezing house. Oh, gosh, I—I love you so I'm a horrible ache all over. Tim, I guess I—I guess I've fallen in love with you."

"Have you really?" It was Valerie, from the bottom of the back stairs. I swear, with her sweet loud voice and wide blue eyes, she looked perfectly darling that minute. There was no murder in her eye. "Tim, perhaps I better tell you about this before you say anything."

Tim wasn't within a mile of uttering a word, but his face had a sheepish look and Val must have understood it.

"This—this reporter," said Val, "is here because somehow she has found out that my father has left his money to you."

"To Tim?" squeaked Cousin Mary. "Left his—is old Mr. Fletcher dead?"

"He died this morning," I gulped.

Val never even winced as she turned on me. "So you couldn't waste any more time with your little games out in the barn, could you? You had to grab Timothy any way you could."

"Look, but ——" I flapped my hands idiotically. "Look, it's all right. Your father fixed his will again. You get the money. That's why I came back. I mean, it's all right ——" The phone in the front hall tinkled two-two, two-two, and I beamed like a pleased child. "There, I'll bet they're calling you about the money now!"

I honest Injun didn't intend any dirty dig, and Val herself started for the phone right on Cousin Mary's heels. But Val paused and looked back at Tim. I realized later why his calm eye turned her face an unbecoming magenta hue. She gave a sort of snort and went after Mary.

"Gosh," I said to Tim, "I don't suppose all this makes much sense to you."

"Well, now, I thought that was a pretty comprehensive statement you made right at the beginning when you came in."

I saw he was going to grin and I really realized what I'd said to the lug, and I turned hot from the neck up and down. "Listen," I said desperately, "I just realized. It's not so good for you not to get all that money. I'm sorry. I ——"

"I expect maybe we'll have enough to get you some long wool underdrawers. That fit."

I got it. Even in my then semiconscious state, I got it. "Oh Tim!" I squealed. "Oh Tim, oh Tim, oh Tim."

And I did crawl inside his shirt and he didn't beat me. I mean, he hasn't so far.

★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

Questioner

BY ETHEL JACOBSON

Little girls shouldn't ask questions—
Not a hundred times an hour!
Why is a weed a thistle?
Why is a rose a flower?

Little girls are all eyes
And "why's?"
Why are bugs
With crawly legs?
Why do frogs
Lay pollywog eggs?
Why is a rainbow?
Why can't I fly?
Why am I?
Why?

Little girls shouldn't ask questions—
It isn't the thing to do!
At least, not questions that mothers
Don't know the answers to.

★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

Laden with the "forbidden" fragrance

FACE POWDER TABU BY Dana

Now . . . Dana takes face powder out of the purely visual . . . lades it lushly with Tabu perfume to give your beauty an indescribable aura . . . a third dimension . . . something that complexion beauty has never had before . . . the added dimension of intoxicating and lasting fragrance . . . TABU! The shades? They're the ones you love.

© 1946 Dana Perfumes, Inc.

hold everything!

Patent* Matchmates

by Rolfs

Double-talk—but true! Here's fashion news you'll love — beloved sparkle of patent in wonderful new inside-your-purse accessories created for you by Rolfs. And they do hold everything! "Large to hold lots" Directress billfold, patterned after the famous Director for men. Boodle Bag—neat organizer for cosmetics and stuff—or pocket-size pinch-hitter for a purse. Cigarette case to hold a full pack. Matchmates—with your favorite handbag, your smartest pumps. More "unmistakably Rolfs" fashion firsts!

STITCHED WITH Nylon FOR LASTING BEAUTY

cigarette case $3

boodle bag  with patented facile closing $4 plus tax

Directress billfold $5 plus tax

Other models to $25

Plastic Patent—in black with red, black or saddle leather trim.*

Trade Mark Reg. U. S. Pat. Off.*

AT FINE STORES EVERYWHERE

DISTINCTIVE LEATHER ACCESSORIES FOR MEN AND WOMEN

Rolfs WEST BEND, WISCONSIN ▪ 330 FIFTH AVE., NEW YORK

YOU NEED NOT FEAR THE MENOPAUSE

(Continued from Page 33)

it should be so. Many missing parts in the puzzle have to be found before the cause of the symptoms is clearly understood. It is known, however, that if the right amount of this hormone is administered, under the guidance of a physician, the balance is restored and the symptoms will disappear. This hormone provides a specific treatment which will give relief for almost every patient. It is this hormone that so many women have received by injection during the past fifteen years.

During the past three or four years new forms of this hormone have been discovered, all of them effective when taken in tablet or capsule form. Some are synthetic substances prepared in chemical laboratories, some are natural and all are inexpensive.

Some of the first orally given substances to be made available had a tendency to upset the stomach so that nausea and sometimes vomiting followed their use. Many of the more recent ones, however, rarely cause these symptoms, and this is particularly true of those of natural origin. It can truthfully be said that injections for the menopause are becoming a thing of the past.

If you are unfortunate enough to have menopausal difficulty, you may expect that it can be controlled by taking one or two tablets or capsules daily, and that for the most expensive of these the cost per day will not be more than that of a pack of cigarettes. There are a sufficient number of products available that your physician will be able to find the right one for you. If you don't like tablets or capsules, you will be able to get your medicine in palatable liquid form. Most doctors who have written about this subject in recent years maintain that injections are practically never necessary—indeed, some never use them any more.

Injuries we write in marble; kindnesses in dust.

You will naturally ask, "How can I get such treatment if I need it?" The answer is, "Consult your physician." The preparations used do not lend themselves to self-medication. For this reason there is a statement on the label of each package to the effect that the medicine is to be used only on the prescription of a doctor. This is not a scheme devised to force you to pay a doctor's fee to get relief. It is a very wise safeguard of your health insisted upon by your Government, under the food-and-drug law. You can make trouble for yourself if you try to circumvent this rule. The dose you require can be arrived at only on the basis of your doctor's skill and experience. The amount given varies considerably from one individual to another, and may have to be adjusted to suit you.

Among the difficulties you can encounter if this advice is not taken is a recurrence of menstruation. This is not a normal menstruation, but is generally the result of too large a dose for you. However, if your physician has not examined you before treatment began and has not had an opportunity of seeing you from time to time, he will not be sure of the cause and an operation may be necessary to be certain it has not been caused by organic disease. No—don't try to treat yourself; you may not get away with it.

There is another advantage if you cooperate with your doctor: you may be able to shorten the period of treatment. Remember, if you had no treatment at all you would be free from symptoms in possibly a year or two, and treatment is usually designed to shorten rather than prolong this time. Further, if you are willing to put up with a few symptoms, physicians believe you will require less treatment than if you insist on having all your trouble relieved.

At some time or another you will have to stop taking the medicine, but you may not

MARIAN STEPHENSON

Slimming Femininity by Martha Manning

No. 1326—A wide scalloped panel of party-pretty white eyelet embroidery is Martha Manning's spring and summer fashion note for you who want to look taller and slimmer and at the same time daintily feminine. Jungle Spun Rayon in "Illusion" half sizes 14½ to 20½. About $13.00. Exclusively at one fine store in most cities.

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

You're at Ease

NIGHT AND DAY!

Sleep IN 'EM

Play IN 'EM

Loaf IN 'EM

Individually Yours by Dutchess

Downy-soft for slumber. Free-as-air for play-action. Cool as well water for beach-combing, sun-worship, or loafing. And figure-flattery . . . always!

Mix 'em . . . match 'em. Four color combinations make endless sets:

- White Top – White Bottom
- Kelly Top – Navy Bottom
- Red Top – Black Bottom
- Maize Top – Kelly Bottom

For outdoor wear . . . add Dutchess Buddy Briefs in matching color.

Petite, Small, Medium, Large About $2.00

At all good stores, or write

DUTCHESS UNDERWEAR CORP.
Empire State Bldg., New York 1, N. Y.

Dutchess Loaftimer

be able to until the balance in gland function has been restored. Too much treatment can prolong this time. So your co-operation in reducing the dose when you are advised to do so is important. Give your doctor a chance and he will be able to help you.

One wonders why it is that nowadays when such wonderful relief is so readily available not all women take advantage of it. Perhaps it is in part related to the feeling that this is a disagreeable part of life and one is in duty bound to grin and bear it. It may be analagous to the history of the use of anesthetics during labor. Righteous women believed it wrong to blunt the pain of childbirth until, it is said, Queen Victoria altered things by taking chloroform for the birth of one of her children. You owe it to yourself and to the happiness of your family to take advantage of what medicine has to offer. So many people remember the tension that existed at home when mother was going through her change of life. Yes, it can almost be called a family disease. So don't wait if your symptoms are upsetting the even tenor of your home life; go to your doctor and you will be overjoyed at what he will be able to do for you.

FAMILY WITH NINE KIDS

(Continued from Page 170)

of their school uniforms and into old clothes, then homework (Kitty is firm about not helping them with it, but she looks over all the written work when it is done), then out they go to the sunny courtyard to play. Supper begins at five-thirty, after seven children have been bathed and are in their pajamas. Kathy Jane eats in the high chair (from which she can climb just as agilely as from a crib); Rose Anne, Michael, Leonard and Jimmy sit on benches before the miniature table covered with red oilcloth. 'Stasia, Mary-Ellen and Timmy eat at the regular kitchen table; Kevin gets his bottle in his crib at seven, given him by 'Stasia or Mary-Ellen if Kitty hasn't time. Kitty and John eat together if and when John gets in. Frequently he has to rush off after supper to see a customer; sometimes he picks up something to eat in town and comes home late.

His work keeps him pretty steadily out of the house, so the family discipline is left to Kitty almost entirely. Recently, when John had an afternoon off, he took seven of them on board an aircraft carrier. He says the whole crew of the carrier had to pitch in and help him get the children over the gangplanks safely, and up and down the steep iron ladders. He doesn't think he'll try that again.

Stockings are not a problem in Kitty's life. She has trim, shapely legs, and she wears bobby socks (borrowed from 'Stasia) and brown-and-white saddle shoes around the house. She received three pairs of stockings for Christmas and they will see her through the year. This is true of nightgowns and underwear, too; gifts at Christmastime make it unnecessary for her to have to spend a penny on them.

The answer to a low clothes budget, she says, is to keep everything in good condition. She didn't have to use all their shoe stamps during rationing because she has all the shoes in the family regularly resoled and reheeled. She doesn't let dirty clothes lie around the house; it's bad for the clothes and makes the place untidy. And although mending is one of her big headaches, because there isn't enough time to sit down and do it, she manages to keep things in repair. She's proud, for instance, of how through careful washing she has made the children's pajamas last year after year.

Anything spent for clothing must be for the children or John. John has to be well dressed; a salesman has to make a good appearance—and, besides, he loves good clothes. Kitty has spent thirteen dollars on herself in the past eighteen months, and she doesn't expect to have to spend anything in the near future. She has a pair of brown high-heeled shoes which she wears when she

To a Woman of Vision

Dr. Margaret Mead, Anthropologist of the American Museum of Natural History, has been awarded the Avon Medallion of Honor for Women of Achievement.

Margaret Mead, noted scientist, author and lecturer, traveled for many years in such outposts of civilization as Bali, New Guinea and Samoa. Her original research has increased greatly our knowledge of other races and their customs. Understanding the needs of other peoples, her work has been of greatest importance to our country.

Well-informed women regard beauty as a private affair . . . to be guarded and cherished in the seclusion of the home. This is the desirable beauty service Avon sends you through the friendly Avon Representative who calls directly at your home with exquisite Avon cosmetics. Welcome her. Seek her advice in selecting Avon's costume-correlated makeup to make you a vision of loveliness!

Avon Medallion of Honor awarded to women of achievement chosen by the following committee of prominent women:

C. MILDRED THOMPSON
Dean of Vassar College
FANNIE HURST
distinguished novelist
GLADYS SWARTHOUT
Metropolitan Opera star

BE HOSTESS TO LOVELINESS

Avon COSMETICS

AT RADIO CITY, NEW YORK

goes out to dance at the duPont Grill (perhaps once a month), or to her fortnightly bridge club. She wears them to church on Sunday morning, too, when she goes to the eleven-fifteen Mass with John and sometimes four children, sometimes six. 'Stasia will have already been to the eight-thirty Mass and stays at home with the babies when Kitty and John set off for Christ Our King.

But it would be a mistake to think that Kitty, with a twenty-six-inch waistline, a size-thirty-four bust and hips measuring thirty-five and a half inches, doesn't like clothes. She loves them, and the three or four wash dresses (all smartly cut) which she wears around the house, with bright aprons over them, are sufficient to demonstrate her flair for dress. She loves gray—dreams (if ever there is a moment to dream) of having a gray chesterfield coat. She doesn't want jewelry, and no fur until she can afford sheared beaver. Her black fitted winter coat is now on its eighth season. She hates that coat, but she doesn't waste time or energy thinking about it. She prefers tiny hats—a curl of ostrich and a veil—and borrows 'Stasia's brown felt when she does the once-a-week marketing at the chain store.

But perhaps the real story of the Quinns should begin somewhere else entirely, in another century even, and not in Wilmington, Delaware, at all. Perhaps it should begin when America was still little more than a wilderness, when covered wagons moved across the prairies, with women sitting erect, steady-eyed, intrepid in the driver's seat, holding the reins. Their children rode in the wagons behind them, and their husbands, with rifle and whip, rode just ahead. They were setting out, as Kitty and John are setting out today, to make real those things they want for their children, those advantages which they themselves had missed when they were young.

Kitty wants a piano so that the girls can learn music; John wants a college education for the boys. "We came up the hard way," Kitty says, "but it was wonderful. Only we don't want it to be quite so hard for them."

There's only one thing that Kitty and John Quinn would do differently if they had their lives to live again. They would not have waited three years before getting married. They would have done it the year they met so as not to have missed two years of being together, and two years of little Quinns.

Living in a Hurry

Versatile, effervescent Georgiana Feeney has thrived on her four and a half years of marriage to chemical engineer Bob Feeney, but she warns the less hardy of what's ahead: "We've lived in thirteen houses—including one trailer; set our clocks to Eastern, Western and Central Standard Time; have cooked on wood, coal, gas and electric stoves. We've had seven refrigerators and four iceboxes—but never a bathtub. Our son was born in California, christened in Nevada, celebrated his first birthday in Tennessee and his second Christmas in Pennsylvania. See what I mean?" And she loves it.

The JOURNAL invites you to take a deep breath and

Meet the Feeneys

HOW AMERICA LIVES, in the April issue.

BUTTON DRAMA

Stud B.G.E. Originales on suit pockets; sprinkle them around winged sleeves. Their original designs quickly "high-style" the simplest wardrobe—or turn a "make-over" into a triumph! Used as gay-spirited earrings, bracelets, chokers—B.G.E. Originales make exciting accessory accents! Your favorite button or notion counter is showing these lovely buttons in a variety of colors and sizes.

B·G·E Originales

"Buttons, buckles, and clips in original designs"

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

you love Nylons... nylons love IMRA

BEAUTIFUL NYLONS DESERVE BEAUTIFUL HAIR-FREE LEGS

Now you need IMRA* more than ever! For IMRA is the odorless, painless depilatory that keeps your legs smooth and hair-free under the sheerest of hose. Just smooth it on—then rinse it off, together with all that unsightly fuzz. No bad smell, no razor knicks, no ugly bristles. One application does the trick!

2½-oz. jar — 65¢ (plus Fed. Tax)

ARTRA Cosmetics, Inc., Bloomfield, N. J.

* REG. U. S. PAT. OFF. U. S. PAT. NO. 2352524

A SUB-DEB KNITS FOR SPRING

(Continued from Page 43)

Left: V-neck cap-sleeved sweater. Knit in color to harmonize with dresses and skirts. 2248. Above: Multicolored yarn braided for gay sash. 2249.*

PHOTO BY LESLIE GILL

DESIGNS BY BEATTIE

Red-and-white-striped cardigan with white back and sleeves. Ties at neck with matching yarn. Slim and pretty with tailored skirts or dresses. 2250.

Above: Colorful cummerbund to crochet for yourself or as a gift. Directions 2251. Right: Knitted sweater to wear with full skirts for spring. 2252.

YOU'RE LOVELY...

YOU'RE LIVELY...

you're Twice as Smart with Vitality SHOES

For that lovely, new lift in your life, get Vitality Shoes. Smart two ways. In the newest styles. In their gentle, heel-gripping, cozy fit. Another Vitality secret—finer materials, wrought with infinite skill, mean lasting beauty and longer wear. At distinguished stores throughout America.

$6.95

Complete Range of Sizes and Widths
Vitality Open Road Shoes for Outdoor and Campus Wear, $5.50 and $6

ROSALYN

EVE

FARICE

Vitality Shoe Company, Division of International Shoe Company, St. Louis, Missouri

Grampa is lucky he was "hung" near the jar of PEANUT CRUNCH PEANUT BUTTER!

Yes, folks have had to look sharp to find delicious Peanut Crunch brand Peanut Butter the last year or so. But now . . . ah! . . . more and more Peanut Crunch is showing up on your grocer's shelves. Peanut Crunch is so very popular with all the folks who have tasted its rich, tempting flavor. It's such a treat!

Peanut Crunch, you know, is a different and improved peanut butter . . . filled with crisp, chewy bits of fresh roasted peanuts that add to its delightful flavor. Look for Peanut Crunch at your store . . . your family will love it!

Peanut Crunch

Brand

PEANUT BUTTER

Filled with "chewy" bits of fresh roasted peanuts.

Packed only by
HOLSUM PRODUCTS
Brooklyn . Cleveland . Kansas City
Milwaukee . Albany, Ga.

A TIME OF LEARNING

(Continued from Page 27)

"That your horse and rig by the bridge?"

"Yes," said Emmett.

"I'll help you carry your paints."

Emmett handed him a bucket. "Watch your step," he advised. "That's valuable."

The boy planted his bare feet as carefully as if walking through nettles. He looked over the amount of material in the back of the buckboard. "Takes an awful lot of paint to paint signs," he said.

"I paint houses, too," Emmett told him.

"Barns?" asked the boy.

"Sure," Emmett said.

"We got a barn to be painted."

"Who's we?"

"Us. My father. He wanted the other man to do it, but Ivy said his paint looked like scum on a frog pond."

"Who's Ivy?" Emmett asked, thinking she'd picked the right word for it.

"My sister. But ma said, 'There's things worse than scum, Miss Ivy.'"

"Don't your mother want the barn painted?"

"Oh, sure."

"I'll apply for the job," Emmett said. "You want to ride on home with me?"

They went by the river road. Red dust clung to the lush green growth that arched above their heads, and Old Clay methodically lifted more of it to their faces. Even in the gloom of red dust and green shadows the boy bent over the catalogue, reading. Emmett himself was rehearsing a sales talk; reassuring himself, before he tried to convince others, that he was the man for the job.

WHEN they turned away from the river, made for the open, rolling farm lands, Emmett asked the boy his name.

"Oral," he said, not looking up from his reading.

"'Oral,'" Emmett repeated. "How do you spell that?"

Oral spelled it. "I'm named for a bird," he said, keeping his place in the catalogue with one finger. "A yellow, singing bird that sang where my mother used to live."

Emmett looked at the cannon-ball boy, his black eyes and white hair. "You're not very yellow, Oral," he said. "Can you sing?"

The boy didn't smile and he closed his catalogue. "No," he said, "nor lay eggs, neither."

"Excuse me, Oral," Emmett said.

There was no more talk for a time. Finally Oral said, "You're not very big for a man."

"Big enough," said Emmett.

"You ain't bad-looking, though."

Emmett grunted and nodded his thanks.

"You got a girl?" Oral asked.

"No girl," Emmett said. "I'm off girls."

"Not me," said Oral. "I got two."

"You don't look very old to be having girls," Emmett told him.

"Old enough," said Oral and went back to his reading.

He roused to point out his home before they got there. It and its outbuildings were planted on a gentle rise of land—a substantial brick house and a big weather-beaten, two-story barn. Three-story, it proved to be when they arrived, the hillside on the back having been scooped away to make room for stalls for the animals.

Oral's father, who was Oral expanded and coated with hoarfrost, heartily welcomed Emmett.

"I'm C. B. Lish," he said, after Emmett had stated his own name and business, "and I'm pleased to make your acquaintance. The barn needs painting the worst way."

Emmett then delivered the rehearsed speech, speaking of the quality of his paints, of his own work, skillful, experienced, painstaking. But C. B. Lish was reading.

"'Candle Powder'?" he said wonderingly. "Now the way I always heard that was candle power."

"This is something different," Emmett explained, wishing the catalogue had never fallen into Lish hands. "This is a powder."

"Now how," said C. B. Lish, "do you reckon they go about getting a candle powder? Grind 'em up?"

"I don't know," Emmett said. "I just paint the signs."

"'Bible Boquet Oil,'" C. B. Lish said, reading on and sniffing as he read. "There's a concoction ought to be mighty sweet. You sell this, boy?"

"No, sir," Emmett said. "I'm a painter. I'd like to get the job painting your barn."

C. B. Lish was turning the pages. "'Jinxers. Four inches tall.'"

"I don't sell that stuff," Emmett reminded him. "I paint."

C. B. Lish nodded, but didn't look up. "That's what you told me before. You walk on up to the house and talk to Emma and Ivy. They're the ones to decide."

Emmett never forgot the room he stepped into. After the summer dust and heat it was as if he had plunged into water, shadowed and cool. He closed his eyes once or twice as he would have done under water, to feel the coolness on his eyelids. The bricks, he supposed, were what made the room cool; the pulled blinds kept it dim.

The room was a kitchen, because it had a stove in it: unlit, cool-looking even, black and shiny like a stoat fresh from a shady wallow. But beside the kitchen furniture, the safe, the cabinet, the set table, there was much else in the room. There were a sofa, a small bird in a big wooden cage, a secretary, its space about evenly divided between books and dishes. Beneath one of the pulled blinds, Emmett guessed, a prism was hanging, for onto the bleached floor boards fell shafts of multicolored lights.

And there was a girl in the room. Emmett saw her last of all. She stood in the darkest corner of the room, leaning against the sink, grating nutmeg onto the top of a pudding. Emmett could smell the vanilla, above the sweet muskiness of the nutmeg.

The girl looked up at Emmett, then grated away, not saying a word. Emmett prepared to speak, but could not for a minute. He knew what a beautiful girl should look like; he had often thought about it—he knew exactly what it took. So far as he could see, nothing was missing.

The girl had on a white dress. She curved in and she curved out. Her waist went in to a span as narrow and supple as a grapevine; elsewhere she had the fullness of the clusters. Her hair was like Oral's, but her eyes when she looked up at Emmett were like the best milk agates he had ever owned.

O God, Emmett prayed, I thank Thee for not letting me stay home and study mules.

She was a calm-looking girl, but seeing Emmett, she dropped the nutmeg, and the sound it made rolling along the bare floor boards brought him back to speech.

"Your nutmeg, miss," said Emmett, getting it before it stopped rolling. "I'm Emmett Maguire, house painter."

"I'm pleased to meet you," said the girl. "I'm Miss Ivy Lish."

THAT night in the south upstairs chamber, a hot little room where a full-leafed chinaberry tree shut all the air from the single window, Emmett lay in a kind of trance. Sometimes he slept, but more often he was awake, and every time he awakened he rejoiced as though he were Lazarus newly come to life. Sleeping, he dreamed of Ivy, but awake he thought of her. And since he reckoned thinking to be one step nearer reality than dreaming, he hated to lose time in anything so secondhand as sleep.

He would awaken, wonder for a minute where he was, hear the leaves of the chinaberry tree, moving outside his window with a watery ripple, say, "Ivy, Ivy." Inside himself he would feel a happiness so great it made him a little sick: a feeling like that he had tobogganing each winter on Sugar Slide, when at the final curve he always thought, I'll die, this is so wonderful; joy and pain being at that point so delicately balanced.

Once he got out of his bed, laid the palms of both hands first against the west wall of his room, then against the east, telling himself, as he did so, One inch of wood may be all that separates us. But all he heard as he stood, hands pressed to either wall, was a serene snoring: too delicate for Oral, probably C. B. Lish himself.

He had been in love before but always unlucky, and never able to do much but suffer. Once with a girl who was engaged, who had bent down and kissed him twice on the eyelids but would have no more to do with him; once with a girl whose father had promised to shoot any man or boy who came on the place, and Emmett had never been able to feel the same about her again after hearing the first load of buckshot whistle past his legs; the last time had been with a girl in Mercer, but before he had a horse of his own, and in the weeks when he had not been able to see her she had met and married a coffee salesman.

But now he was lucky: in love and beneath the same roof with the girl he loved. And going to be beneath the same roof with her for two more weeks at the least. For the barn painting, if he did a good job, would take that long; and he intended doing not only a good job, but a job so wonderful people for miles around would marvel at it.

The last time he awakened the summer night had ended. The air in the room had cooled and outside in the chinaberry tree the awakening birds were whetting their bills and stretching their throats.

I could paint her, Emmett thought. I see just how to do it, where she should stand, how she would turn her head. I would paint her in her white dress, full length, a shadow at the base of her throat; and in his hand he already felt the brush and the strokes it would make so that Ivy would stand curving in, curving out, alive upon cardboard. Alive with a reality beyond life, because to her store of realness he would add all of his own.

There was nothing in the next week he did not do well. He was so filled with power and sureness he walked

(Continued on Page 196)

"But I don't believe in getting engaged, Horace. I've lost so many good friends that way!"

This thrilling kitchen can be yours and it's well within your budget

Change your kitchen into this attractive, convenient room, at small cost and without expensive remodeling. You can do it easily with Youngstown equipment, and you buy only as many units as you need. The beautiful Youngstown Kitchen shown here, fitted with spotless enameled steel units including a modern twin-bowl sink, convenient wall cabinets, and roomy floor cabinets, can be installed quickly and easily in your present kitchen, or in a new home, for less than $12 a month on F. H. A. payments.

A Youngstown "KITCHENAIDER" will bring sparkling new beauty to your kitchen and save you countless steps. Almost two-thirds of your kitchen tasks are done here. The twin-bowl sink makes dishwashing much simpler. Large work surfaces with well planned drawers and ample storage spaces keep everything within easy reach. As little as $3.75 a month installs a "KITCHENAIDER" in your home.

Wall and floor cabinets, giving extra working surfaces and more storage space, can be added as you need them. Gleaming white enameled steel Youngstown units can be combined in any way that suits your plans and the size of your kitchen. This compact, good-looking arrangement for a new $6500 to $7500 house will combine beautifully with any range and refrigerator . . . costs about $7 a month!

IMAGINE having a beautiful kitchen like this . . . with plenty of convenient working surfaces and storage space . . . where every kitchen task is easier.

Well, here is your chance to make that dream come true, in your present home or the new home you plan to build. Gleaming white enameled steel Youngstown units, made to the finest quality standards, will fit with your present range and refrigerator, or can be arranged to suit any new plan you may have.

You will get the latest type of cabinet sink, with many time-saving features, and all the floor and wall cabinets you need. And the entire cost will be surprisingly low!

Installation Is Quick and Easy

This is possible with Youngstown equipment because no expensive remodeling is necessary. The Youngstown cost figures given here are for typical installations in medium priced homes, and there is nothing else to pay.

How can Youngstown offer these beautifully finished, carefully built kitchens for so little? The answer is simple . . . they are produced in quantity, in the traditional American way. Like everything else you buy for your home, the purchase of Youngstown equipment helps maintain national prosperity by keeping men and dollars at work.

These and other Youngstown designs are fully described in the interesting "Min-a-Kit" Book. This contains 46 cut-out models of Youngstown equipment, and a background in which to arrange them. Send the coupon and 10c in cash (no stamps, please) and start planning your new work-saving kitchen now.

MULLINS MANUFACTURING CORPORATION
Warren, Ohio.

Porcelain Enameled Products, Large Pressed Metal Parts, Design Engineering Service

Youngstown Kitchens, Mullins Mfg. Corp.
Dept. L-346, Warren, Ohio.

Send me the "Min-a-Kit" Book (price 10c in cash).
☐ I plan to remodel ☐ I plan to build

NAME (PLEASE PRINT)

ADDRESS

CITY ZONE

COUNTY STATE

Youngstown Kitchens
BY MULLINS

NEITHER a new hat . . . nor the most perfect make-up alone can give your face that finished, yet unstudied air that is American beauty at its best . . . Only the right basic skin care with the right preparations can do that. For time marches over your face, unless you keep after your skin every single day.

Right for dry skin: Dry-Skin Cleanser (Cream 683), $1, $2, $4 . . . Orange Flower Skin Lotion, $1, $2, $3.75 . . . Special Dry-Skin Mixture, $2.25, $4, $8.

Right for normal skin: Salon Cold Cream, $1, $2, $4 . . . Orange Flower Skin Lotion, $1, $2, $3.75 . . . Special Dry-Skin Mixture, $2.25, $4, $8.

Right for oily skin: Liquefying Cleansing Cream, $1, $2, $3.50 . . . Texture Lotion, $1, $2, $3.75 . . . Suppling Cream, $1, $1.75, $2.75.

All prices subject to tax

Dorothy Gray

AMERICAN DESIGN OF BEAUTY

Copyright, 1946, by Dorothy Gray, Ltd.

(Continued from Page 194)

about his scaffolding as if gravity were a force from which he was exempt. He laid the brush against the barn each day in strokes so solid that the barn rose up clear and bright again, rebuilt, it almost seemed, as well as repainted. At night he washed, first in turpentine, then in water, and talked with the family.

Privately, he said to C. B. Lish, "I'll paint the tool shed free if I can borrow your buggy, Sunday."

"What you want of the buggy?"

"I want to take Ivy to church."

Mr. Lish whistled. "So that's the way the wind blows."

"Yes, sir," said Emmett, "it is."

"Ivy's no churchgoer," Mr. Lish told him.

Emmett was taken aback. He had supposed all nice girls were churchgoers. He had no idea where else he could take a girl on Sunday, or what other entertainment she could want. Though he would never have denied that for himself coming and going would be the best part of it. Still, this was Bucklin County, not home, and he hated a man who was set in his ways.

"Wherever she wants to go, I'll take her."

"The novelty of it," her father admitted. "might appeal to her."

Ivy said yes when he asked her, as if the novelty of it had nothing to do with it.

UPON himself, upon Old Clay and the buggy Emmett had done an amount of polishing just short of abrasion. A stroke or two more and varnish and hide, human and horse alike, would have given way. Tender and glittering, they drove churchward.

There was nothing Emmett could think of to say which did not seem too personal for words. His mind was filled with Ivy: her sweet, flowery smell, which it was wrong, probably, even to notice, let alone mention; the blue vein in her forehead; the way a fold of her full skirt lay across his shinbone, where its lightness weighed upon him like a burning glass.

They drove through heat waves rippling like lake water. Already the leaves hung downward, giving the sun only their sharp edges to taste. Old Clay was discolored by sweat, and on the fence rails the birds rested with lifted wings.

"Ivy," said Emmett, "will you let me paint your picture?"

"Can you paint people too?" Ivy asked. "Besides barns, I mean?"

"Yes," said Emmett, with sudden knowledge, "I can," and he used the word he had forbidden his father. "I'm an artist."

"Perhaps you would make me look funny."

"Funny," repeated Emmett. "What do you mean, funny?"

"Queer," Ivy told him. "Not pretty. Maybe you would make my eyes look funny. Eyes are very hard to paint."

"I know how to paint eyes," Emmett said. "I know how to paint all of a person. I would make you look the way you are, Ivy."

"How am I, Emmett?" asked Ivy.

"Beautiful," said Emmett, trembling with frankness.

The drive to church, from there on, went by in a flash; the church time, too, though Ivy was unable to attend the services with Emmett. In the churchyard Arod Johnson had awaited her. His mother was sick, pining to see Ivy, and with Emmett's permission he would drive Ivy to his place, have her back by the time church was over. He was considerably later than that and Emmett was sorry for Ivy, cooped up with a sick old woman while he sat in the shaded churchyard. Still, he had been so deep in thought about his painting of her that he had not had time for much pity.

"Let's go home the long way," Ivy said when she got back.

They went home the long way through the hot afternoon.

"Tell me about my picture," Ivy said.

"I will paint you," Emmett said, "in the parlor bay window. I will push the lace curtains back so that on each side of the picture will be just their ripple. You will stand in your white dress before the clear glass, and behind you will be the mock orange."

★Here's relief for the agony of

COLD WEATHER JOINTS!

Help increase the flow of nature's own lubricating fluids

★ Yes—you can do something to relieve the aching misery of joints that creak with every cold spell! You see, cold weather actually constricts tiny blood vessels, cutting down the supply of nature's own lubricating fluids to your joints—that's why they creak and feel stiff. Rub those aching joints with Absorbine Jr. and your local circulation speeds up. That wonderful "warmth" helps those tiny blood vessels feed your joints with more lubricating fluids—and you feel just grand! Be sure to keep Absorbine Jr. on hand. $1.25 at your drugstore.

W. F. Young, Inc., Springfield, Mass.

ABSORBINE Jr.

1846 THE 100TH ANNIVERSARY OF THE FOUNDING OF THIS BUSINESS 1946

Children who brush their teeth regularly have learned a habit that will stand them in good stead through life. Their dentifrice should be one that is pleasant to use, like Arm & Hammer Baking Soda, which not only cleans the teeth effectively but leaves the mouth with a refreshing after-taste.

★ ★ ★

ARM & HAMMER BAKING SODA

OR COW BRAND BAKING SODA

★ ★ ★

"Arm & Hammer" is pure Bicarbonate of Soda, good to use as a mouth wash or gargle. To encourage the family to use this effective, low-cost cleanser, regularly, keep it handy in the medicine cabinet. Its cost is just a few cents for a package that will give months of service.

CHURCH & DWIGHT CO., Inc.
10 Cedar Street, New York 5, N.Y.
Please send me FREE BOOK describing uses of Baking Soda; also a set of Colored Bird Cards. (Please print name and address)
This offer good only in the United States
E-86

Name

Street Address

City or Town State

"How will I look?" asked Ivy.

"You will look," Emmett said slowly, seeing her like a white column budding for flowers, "fine."

"We came home the long way," Ivy told Oral, who was in the barnyard when they drove in. "We came home the long way and had to go slow because of the heat." She gave Emmett both her hands when he helped her from the buggy and walked at once to the house.

Oral helped with the unhitching. "I reckon you seen old Arod," he said.

"Arod Johnson?" asked Emmett.

"You know any other Arods?"

"No," said Emmett, "I don't. His mother was sick."

"She seems to be a mighty weak old lady," Oral told him, leading Clay to the barn.

In the second week Emmett began work on the barn each morning at sunup. In that way he made time for his painting of Ivy. He had never supposed hand and brush could work so well together. It was as if the lines of Ivy's body flowed downward of themselves, through his arm and hand, and onto the cardboard; it was as if her colors stained his fingers and he had only to touch his brush for them to be left where and as they should be.

"What do you think of while you are painting?"

He thought of very little. Then he was lost in the work; in the brush strokes, in the leaf-shaped shadows on the white dress, on the way Ivy's roundness and solidness were transferred by means of his skill so that in thin paint, and upon a flat surface, still she was round and solid.

A London newspaper offered a prize for the best definition of money and awarded it to the following: An article which may be used as a universal passport to everywhere except heaven, and as a universal provider of everything except happiness.

—JUDGE BUXTON ROBERTSON:
Gems of Truth.

Afterward, when he was not painting, he thought, In later days the picture will hang in a special place in the house and I will say to visitors, "That is my beautiful wife, Ivy Lish Maguire"; and to the children I'll say, "That is the first picture I ever painted of your mother." And I will never part with it, no matter what I should be offered for it.

"I would like my eyelashes made longer," said Ivy.

"No," said Emmett, "that would be wrong."

"Wrong," said Ivy. "They are longer."

"But not looking at you," Emmett told her, "this way against the light."

If someone had told him, "You have never said the word 'love,'" he would have been surprised. Everything he did said the word, every look, every tone, every gesture. He himself heard no other sound.

"Is it finished?" asked Ivy.

"One more day. Do you like it?"

"The eyelashes should be longer," said Ivy, but Emmett could tell by the way she stood looking at the picture, turning her head, smiling, that she liked it.

That night he worked until late on the barn and went early to bed. He lay in his upstairs bedroom listening to the chirr of summer insects, and thought, Tomorrow night the picture will be finished and I will put, in one corner of the picture, my name; in the other, hers.

He was still awake when Oral came in, noisy in his unaccustomed shoes, and sat on the edge of his bed.

"Well, Oral?" asked Emmett.

"I got me a date with one of my girls," said Oral, as if answering the question.

"Which one?" Emmett asked sleepily, not caring, thinking, He's got no one else to talk about his girls.

(Continued on Page 199)

the magnificent gesture . . .

Chivalry still lives in the gracious raising of your hat to a lady. This small, almost effortless gesture, means so much. ■ To her, it is a symbol of your respect and good breeding. To you, it is a way of saying hello with an extra measure of grace, self-assurance and flair. ■ Next time you raise your hat to a lady, be sure it is worthy of your magnificent gesture. Be sure it's the right hat . . . the right shade, the right shape, the right style, for you. ■ You can be sure you're getting the right hat when you consult a Recognized Hatter—wherever this plaque is featured.

This Plaque Identifies a Recognized Hatter

The store that displays it is staffed with experts trained to fit you with the right shape, the right shade, and the right style hat for your personality.

wear a hat . . . it gives you poise

This is a Lokweave carpet, a sealed-seam, locked-tuft Bigelow construction.

It's new! It's beautiful! It's Bigelow!

SPRING is coming! This year it can bring new beauty inside your home. For Bigelow rugs are coming too!

Clear, inspiring colors, exciting new patterns and rich, wonderful textures prove that Bigelow designers and craftsmen did a lot of forward thinking during the past four years.

Rolling off the looms in ever-increasing quantities, your choice of fine Bigelow patterns will be greater each month. All Bigelow rugs are made of Lively Wool. They are priced from about four to twenty dollars a square yard.

You will find the just-right rug at the just-right price marked by the blue and gold Bigelow label.

Go see the brand new collection...now being shown at better department and furniture stores in your own town.

Firmtwist #31101 Beauvais #1727 Beauvais #1763 Doric #918

(Continued from Page 197)

The best one. Two's too many," Oral
., "if you've got one good girl."
One good girl's enough," Emmett agreed, ling. "How's the other one taking it?"
She's down in the mouth," Oral admit-
"but she'll get over it."
Sure," Emmett echoed out of his drowsis, "they all get over it."
Emmett," Oral asked, "who's that pice belong to, you or Ivy?"
Ivy," Emmett said, wanting to say her he, though he had thought of the picture heirs together.
That's all right, then," Oral said, getting the bed.
It's Ivy's and mine together."
She's given away your half, too, then," l told him. "Both halves together to Arod nson."
Emmett sat up in bed. Oral was standing ere the moonlight from the window fell oss his broad and sorrowful face.
I could've told you," he said, "but there sn't ever a time
en you'd hear to It's gone," he ured him, as mett got out of
. "Wrapped in cher paper and en away."
Emmett sat down
in.
My girl's waiting me," Oral said. At door he turned
k. "Ivy's a born
-timer. You ain't first."
For a long time after l left, Emmett sat
the edge of his bed.
felt numbed, bend feeling anything, when he stood up hands and face
re wet, and he saw t without knowing
e had been crying.
The thing to do, he ided, is to get out,
k and leave. Get
e before I have to k on any of their es again.
Outside, his carpet-
g in his hand, he od for a time in barnyard. He ld see that it was l early, a moonlit mmer night, cool-off now so that river mists were wing up into the ws. He could hear soft, slow movents of the animals in their stalls. Old Clay ne quietly to the fence, hung his head oss the top rail, and with eyes glassy in moonlight looked at Emmett.
"Let's get out of here," Emmett said. But en he saw the ladder and scaffolding still ainst the barn, and the unpainted section ound the haymow door, he determined, ibbornly, to finish the job. "I'll not go and ve a stroke undone," he told Old Clay, as is horse had argued with him about it.

NCE upon the scaffolding, brush in hand, other idea came to him: She took my pic-
e and gave it away. I'll leave another here
t can't be given away, and I'll paint her this e as she really is, so no eye can miss it.
He went down the ladder and brought up other paints, and while he was doing this was filled with hate and scorn, thinking, l put her on the barn so that everyone can see at a slut looks like. But he could not do it.
He did not know which way it was:
ether he was unable to paint and hate at e same time, or whether actually he would ver be able to hate Ivy, no matter what e might do. Whichever way it was, the ush strokes taking away his hate, or with-t real hate to begin with, he was painting a cture now much different from his first.
And better, too, he knew; though whether on that surface, with the paints he had, it would show as such, he couldn't tell. There would be no rippling lace curtains in this picture, because it would be Ivy herself unobscured by any of his imaginings. He remembered what he had thought: a tower of white, and budding; and remembering, spat with disgust over the edge of the scaffolding.

FROM below someone whispered, "Look out for me," and there in the moonlight, gazing upward, was Oral.

"What you doing out this time of night?"

"Getting home," Oral whispered, so that Emmett, answering, whispered too, though the house was far enough away to keep anyone from hearing.

"You better get on to bed. You'll catch a strapping, staying out all night this way."

"Strapping," Oral scoffed. "I'm not sleeping in the house anyway," he said. "I'm sleeping in the haymow." He stood, stocky legs far apart, head thrown back so that his white hair shone in the moonlight's glow like dandelion fuzz. "What you painting her again for?" he whispered scornfully. "Whyn't you paint something pretty up there? A big sunflower or a rooster?"

"Be quiet, can't you?" Emmett said. "This makes me feel better."

Oral went inside the barn and Emmett could hear him mounting the ladder into the haymow, then rustling about as he hollowed himself a place to sleep.

Long after Emmett had supposed him to be sleeping, he heard Oral's voice very near at hand as if he were speaking with his mouth close to a knothole or crack. "Emmett?"

"What you want now, Oral?"

"Whyn't you get some of them powders, Emmett?"

"Powders?"

"The ones from the catalogue. They work good, Emmett." Oral's voice was filled with kindness.

"I didn't know they'd come."

"Oh, sure, they came. They're strong and good. I wish you'd try some, Emmett."

"No," Emmett told him, "they wouldn't work for me. No powder'll do me any good. I've just got to learn."

"Don't waste any more time on her," urged Oral. "Paint something nice. Paint a picture of a field of punkins."

"When I finish this, I will."

The moon was still bright when he finished, but the stars had begun to dim and the sky's darkness was fading. He hitched and loaded his stuff into the buckboard, but before he drove away he stood looking up at his work.

"I can paint," he said, looking at his picture of Ivy, forgetting Ivy herself.

He had driven down the slope from the house and up the first little rise when he heard a clear but controlled hallooing behind him. Turning about, he saw that Oral had opened the door of the haymow so that his picture of Ivy was cut in two: a head, then, where the upper part of her body should have been, the empty space of the open door, and below that the swelling white skirt.

"Emmett," Oral hallooed quietly.

Emmett waved to show that he heard.

"You forgot your catalogue, Emmett."

"Keep it," Emmett called back. "You keep it, Oral. I can get another."

Betrothal

BY CATHERINE HAYDON JACOBS

I shall not say I have not loved before
Because today I pledge my troth to you.
I have loved much as other women do,
Nor have I suffered any less or more.
Whatever hurt I gave, whatever bore,
Today I know the boon of thinking through—
The older loves are mentors to the new.
There stands a closed gate—here an open door.
My love has learned the strength of little things;
If one small link is broken in a chain,
I shall remember how to mend the rings,
That it may bear its happiness again.
My love has woven with a lasting prayer
A pattern worthy of your heart to wear.

Craftspun Curtains

are back home again . . . lovelier than ever!

Here, at last are the beautiful Craftspun* Curtains your windows have been longing for! New designs are smarter than ever—many expressly made to harmonize with period furnishings. All are fashioned of 2- and 3-ply yarn with that same tied-in-place weave that kept prewar Craftspuns on duty while our looms were busy weaving camouflage nets.

If you're planning your first home you'll thrill at the gracious air these lovely net curtains give a room. They're correct, up-to-the-minute—yet so inexpensive. Many patterns come ready-to-hang in 6 standard lengths, with expertly tailored hems and headings. See them at your dealer's now.

*Reg. U.S. Pat. Off.

SCRANTON

CRAFTSPUN Curtains

"THE NET OF THEM ALL"

Their gentle voices carried on the quiet morning air. The last stars had faded and the river smell was fresh and sharp.

"Good-by, Emmett," Oral called as Emmett, waving, drove on.

For as long as Emmett could be seen C stood in the open doorway, not himself w ing, but following the buckboard with eyes until finally it topped a distant rise dropped from sight.

BLUEPRINT FOR A MEAL

(Continued from Page 50)

minutes a pound. For a medium cut—my choice—roast away at twenty-five minutes for each pound. And for the well done, which isn't done very often, I guess, plan on around thirty minutes a pound. These timetables ought to get you over any hurdles and produce the kind of roast of beef your family is mouth-watering for—that is, if it's that kind of roast in the beginning.

With the roast beef there must be potatoes. And to my mind, next to creamed potatoes (done my favorite way), the most delicious potato dish known to man is Franconia potatoes. Though when there is no roast beef, I'll settle for a perfectly baked potato any day.

FRANCONIA POTATOES

Peel as many potatoes as you need and bring them to a boil in salted water. Let them boil only two or three minutes. Drain them, season, and place in the roasting pan around the beef, about forty minutes before the roast is done. Take out the rack from under the beef first. Baste with the fat. Roast them until golden brown and tender, turning the potatoes now and then so they will brown evenly. They are delicious, and something about the roasting makes them extra mealy, extra fine and full of flavor, most divine.

> If one is really interested in the technique of giving pleasure to a patient (and why else should anybody wish to visit one?) he may remember first that the sweetest word in all the world to a sick person is "you." The second most delightful word, of course, is "your." With these two words to work with, one may build up a fine afternoon for an invalid.
>
> —GERTRUDE WARNER: Pleasures and Palaces. Frances and Gertrude Warner (Houghton, Mifflin).

Back to the beginning. I shall speak a few more words about the roaster and what goes into it, but I really ought to begin at the beginning and not get all het up over something that comes later. But when I have a roast of beef, I want to get it in the oven. Now that's done, let's get on to what really starts this meal on its way. And that, my dears, is mushroom consommé.

MUSHROOM CONSOMMÉ

For this you need a rich beef stock. You may use canned consommé, meat paste or cubes for your stock, but we made a good strong beef stock from the end of the ribs and added a good soup bone, put in 4 quarts of water, a handful of celery and parsley, a carrot, an onion, herbs, salt and pepper. Let simmer about five hours. Strain the stock. Do this the day before. Chill overnight. Take off the fat that will come to the top. (This overnight stand produces a well-jellied stock.) If stock has reduced too much, water or canned consommé may be added to make 1½ quarts. Heat stock to boiling. Add 2 unbeaten egg whites. Let boil several minutes until the whites are set. Let stand one hour to settle. Then strain through double thicknesses of cheesecloth. Chop 1 pound of peeled mushrooms very fine. Cook in just enough water to cover, season with salt and pepper. Add, without draining, to the consommé. When you heat and serve it, add slices of lemon.

One more breath of England. No Englishman (they don't go out in the midday sun, you know) and neither do they go in for roast beef without—guess what?—why, Yorkshire pudding, of course. Now Yorkshire pudding, having been translated to our shores, is really a popover idea. Looks like it, tastes like it and, once neatly set beside a generous thick slice of the aforesaid beef, somehow ties in as naturally as corn on the cob at a barbecue or lobsters at a clambake. Yorkshire pudding is usually baked in a square pan and cut into squares. We like ours baked in a muffin pan—the crust is crisper.

YORKSHIRE PUDDING

Sift 1 cup of flour with ½ teaspoon salt. Beat 2 eggs until light. Combine w 1 cup of milk. Stir into the dry mixtu Beat until smooth. Preheat muffin pa with 1 tablespoon of beef drippings in ea cup until very hot. Divide the batte filling the cups only about half full. Ba in a hot oven—450° F.—for fifteen minut then lower the temperature to 350° F. fifteen minutes more. (This means st ping up the oven for the first fifteen m utes of baking.) The roast itself can kept hot for fifteen minutes, either in warming oven or on top of the stove.

Tomatoes to end all tomatoes. Thi a dish that, as they say in the circles wher move, "can't be beat." One warning no don't be shocked at the sugar. It brings the richness and ripeness of the tomato holds the charm inta and makes of the d an unforgettable a unusual treble note the basso profundo the roast itself. (N why do I go musi all of a sudden? don't know, maybe do.)

SCALLOPED TOMATOES

Arrange 6 lar peeled ripe tomat in a baking dis Sprinkle with pe per and 1½ teaspoons of salt and ¾ cup sugar, and fill in around the tomat with 1 cup of bread crumbled from t center of the loaf. Mix with a fork 1 c of bread crumbs and ¼ cup of melted b ter or margarine. Sprinkle over the t Bake along with the roast for about hour.

From the shore of the Pacific. C fornia has about everything, from stars slacks to abalone shells in the moonlig And the fruit! Well, to walk throu the pungent orchards with their burd of fruit on every limb is something one dream of through the dreariest North winter, and see in the sunset on every miliar shore.

So here's to California. And here's a d sert that bespeaks some of her lavish c tributions to beauty and taste and sure light. A sunset-glow upside-down ca Serve it hot, serve it cold, but don't stingy; make the portions ample and sauce a complement to so much goodn And your success is complete.

SUNSET UPSIDE-DOWN CAKE

Melt 3 tablespoons of butter or marg rine in a ten-inch skillet that has a remo ble handle. Of course an iron spider is ev better. Add 1 cup of brown sugar. He slowly until the sugar and butter or m garine blend well and begin to bubl Remove from the heat. Arrange half sli of pineapple around the edge, a whole sl in the center. In between lay apri halves, cut side up. Put maraschino ch ries here and there for that red that is red. Now make the batter, which is orange-cake batter and first-rate. Cre ½ cup of shortening and 1½ teaspoons grated orange rind. Add 1 cup of su gradually and continue creaming u light and fluffy. Add 2 eggs, beaten lig Sift together 1½ cups of cake flour, 2 t spoons of baking powder and ¼ teaspo of salt. Add alternately to the crea mixture with ½ cup of orange juice, be ing after each addition until smoo Pour the batter over the fruit. Bake i moderate oven, 350° F., for fifty minutes one hour, or until it springs back ligh

(Continued on Page 202)

Good Old Bread and Gravy

WITH Rich Brown Gravy

EVERY TIME

Good old bread and gravy a-coverin' up your plate . . . That, says Eddie Guest, is "just one bit of eatin' which I hold supremely great."*

So says "the poet of the people." And so says the whole nation, for March is National Bread and Gravy Month!

To do justice to those big thick slices of enriched bread, smother them with gravy (and what gravy!) made with Wilson's B-V. Ummm—gravy that's smooth! rich! brown! good!—you get it every time with my foolproof recipe, using B-V. No meat drippings are needed, but if you use them, trust B-V to add a bountiful amount of extra meat flavor.

To be sure of getting genuine B-V—America's favorite meat flavor—look for it in the orange and blue carton, or ask for it by name at your favorite dealer's. Get some today and have good old bread and B-V gravy tonight!

George Rector
Food Consultant to Wilson & Co.

B-V GRAVY RECIPE

2 tbsp. fat or drippings — 1 cup liquid (water, milk or vegetable water)
2 tbsp. flour — 1 tsp. Wilson's B-V

Melt fat, add flour and blend well. Add liquid and stir until smooth. When hot, add B-V which has been dissolved in a small amount of the hot mixture. Cook until thickened sufficiently. Serves 3 or 4.

---

B-V is a delicious blend of concentrated meat extract and selected vegetable flavors. Use it whenever rich meat flavor is desired—in soups, stews, hot drinks, casseroles, meat loaves, etc.

See "Bread and Gravy" from SELECTED POEMS, by Edgar A. Guest (Reilly & Lee Co.). Quoted by permission of the copyright holders.*

MARCH IS NATIONAL BREAD & GRAVY MONTH

WILSON'S "QUICKIE" SHELF

With a handy shelf like this in your pantry, you'll save many steps—many hours—in the preparation of delicious meals. Start your own "quickie" shelf with these quality meat products—Wilson's MOR, Corned Beef Hash, Chili, Tamales, Deviled Ham and America's favorite meat flavor, Wilson's B-V. All seasoned the Wilson way.

WILSON & CO. INC.

The Wilson label protects your table

LIPS CAN REVEAL
Early and Advanced Signs of # "TISSUE STARVATION"

MORBID CHANGES shown in mouth tissues above due to advanced "Tissue Starvation." This is a severe case, resulting from vitamin shortages over a period of years.

LIP LESIONS like these in the unretouched photograph above are relatively common where there is a chronic—even if comparatively mild—vitamin deficiency.

"TISSUE STARVATION" is producible by a lack of vitamins in the living cells of your body— Its signs often appear first in Eyes, Skin and Mouth

MILLIONS have missed the real point about vitamins. Vitamins are needed factors in the foods we eat, it's true. But more than that they're part and parcel of every body tissue. If you're short of vitamins, your shortage may show in those tissues themselves.

You can have a "Tissue Starvation" — producible by a vitamin deficiency — even though you are overweight. Advanced medical opinion confirms that thousands of Americans today DO show some sign of "Tissue Starvation"!

To insure accurate understanding — the "Advanced" photograph above shows a degree of "Tissue Starvation" quite rare in the United States. But the early condition pictured at the right is fairly frequently seen, and so are such signs as swollen gums . . . cloudy eye-whites . . . lesions of the tongue . . . roughened places on the skin of arms and thighs. These signs, of course, may result from such conditions as irritation, infection or other malnutrition, but "Tissue Starvation" due to vitamin deficiency is a frequent and basic cause. To help prevent this form of "Tissue Starvation," you should take multiple vitamins — take ALL the known needed vitamins, not just one or a few. One-A-Day (brand) Multiple Vitamins bring you vitamins A, $B_1$, $B_2$, C and D, plus Niacin, Calcium Pantothenate and $B_6$—all in a single capsule.

THE MILES PLAN
FOR HEALTH PROTECTION

1. PROPER DIET. Vitamin deficiencies may accrue gradually in the body tissues throughout your entire life. So try to eat a balanced diet every day from now on.

2. PROTECTIVE VITAMINS. Take one capsule of Miles One-A-Day Multiple Vitamins every day.

3. CONDITIONING FACTORS. Certain conditions and habits (diarrhea, over-indulgence, etc.) increase vitamin needs. Protect yourself then by taking extra vitamins.

4. SEE YOUR DOCTOR — if you think you have lesions — as above — that indicate vitamin deficiency.

ONE A DAY BRAND
MULTIPLE VITAMIN CAPSULES
Miles Laboratories, Inc., Elkhart, Ind.

(Continued from Page 200)

from a touch in the center. Turn out upside down. Serve warm or cold with or without the following sauce: Beat 2 eggs very light, thick and lemony. Add 1 cup of granulated sugar, part at a time, and beat hard. Then whip 1 cup of cream very stiff and fold in. Chill. Flavor to taste with vanilla or orange, or any choice you have.

The map is here. What is a blueprint but a map! Map for a meal. And now you have the compass and the path. The roast beef and the Yorkshire, the soup and the dessert. No matter if March winds blow and the last snowstorm sweeps by. There is good eating here. Let us enjoy it with fine appreciation. May your roast be the best ever—and I think it will be.

"DATE WITH DADDY"

(Continued from Page 177)

If your conscience is absolutely clear on all these scores, your lack of time would seem to indicate that you are a poor organizer, who lets unimportant detail get in the way of jobs that count. Check your daily operations with a fresh eye, remembering that shared recreation with your husband ought to come ahead of fancy ironing, fancy cooking—or fancy anything!

"It costs too much to go anywhere."

Nonsense. In a country where there are more radios, automobiles and electrical gadgets than anywhere in the world, the cry of poverty so abject as to make mild outings unaffordable is rarely true. A trip to the local refreshment place for a soda and juke-box dancing, or to second-run movies, does not require a heavy investment. Besides, there are church and club festivities which often cost nothing; or what's the matter with a good old-fashioned picnic?

There have been many jokes about the proud, tightfisted farmer who bought more up-to-date equipment for his cows than he did for his wife. In reverse, there have also been wives who placed too much stress on showy worldly goods. No home is well furnished, however handsome the parlor carpet, if it contains a wife who would rather impress the neighbors with a look of prosperity than have a companionable time with her husband. Emotional misers acquire pinched personalities just as surely as those who hoard gold.

"I am too tired."

On the surface, this seems a legitimate excuse for a woman who does her own work, raises a family and copes with a hundred and one unexpected demands on her time and energy every day. Actually, tired women are the ones who particularly need the stimulation of an evening of stepping out. If their weariness has been aggravated by children's unceasing voices and activity, an adult twosome ought to be a welcome relief. A husbandly date, however, should be approached with something more than a spirit of relief, and should not be accompanied with a steady sighing and reviewing of the day's problems. Likely the gentleman you're married to has a few workaday worries of his own. By taking his mind off them, and being as much fun and as nice to look at as possible, you produce a kind of boomerang tonic that refreshes you as much as the one at whom it is aimed.

It is now an accepted fact that the cure for tiredness isn't necessarily closing your eyes, but may be, instead, opening your mind. Substitute a new activity—something you like to do—for whatever it is that has grown monotonous, and you're a new woman! And now do you still claim you are too tired to go out with your husband? Watch out, lady; in that case you're not tired, you're bored. That's bad, because the quickest way to become tiresome to others is to lose interest yourself. Maybe your husband is feeling just the least little bit tired too!

"I can't leave the children."

You mean you can't, or you don't want to? The high-school-girl "sitter" who does for SCRAPES SCRATCHES SKINJURIES

The thing to use is UNGUENTINE

It's first-rate first-aid for any injury to the skin:

- It relieves pain.
- It is antiseptic and fights infection.
- It promotes natural healing.

In tubes and jars at all drug stores.

A Norwich Product Norwich

NEEDLEWORK

DESIGNS—Usable Several Times. No. 124—A set of 8 colonial girl motifs for tea towels and pan holder. Over 100 other designs for tea towels, luncheon sets, bedroom ensembles, pillow slips, baby's things—in the improved hot iron transfers, usable 2, 3, or more times. Ask for AUNT MARTHA'S Hot Iron Transfers at dept. & variety stores or send 10c to 3956F Central, Kansas City 2, Mo.

AUNT MARTHA'S Hot Iron TRANSFERS

QUICK RELIEF FOR stuffed up
MISERIES . . . DUE TO head colds

Keep a bottle of Mistol Drops with Ephedrine on hand, always! A few drops in each nostril help relieve that drippy, "hard to breathe" feeling due to head colds!

Caution: Use only as directed

Copr. 1945, Bristanco Incorporated

At your favorite store
WHITE SWAN
REG U S PAT OFF
Nurses' Uniforms

KNOWN AND TRUSTED THROUGHOUT THE WORLD

BROKEN . . .
IRON HANDLES easily repaired with
PLASTIC WOOD
. . . Wood, plastic metals, and other materials are quickly repaired with Plastic Wood.

At all paint, hardware and 10c stores.

Tube or Can

REPAIRS IN A JIFFY
PLASTIC WOOD
A CELLULOSE FIBRE FILLER

MATERNITY
STYLE BOOK
FREE

LANE BRYANT
Maternity clothes enable you to dress stylishly during all stages of your maternity period—and after baby comes as well. Designed to conceal your condition and to provide ample room for expansion. Latest styles in Dresses and Corsets. Also apparel for baby. Send the coupon today for your FREE Book.

Lane Bryant
DEPT. 5-C · 752 E. MARKET ST.
INDIANAPOLIS 1, IND.

Mail FREE Maternity Style Book in plain wrapper. (5-C)
Name .....
Address .....
Town ..... State .....

her lessons in your home of an evening and earns pin money keeping an ear turned in the direction of your sleeping children, while you have a little diversion, has become a national boon. Or you can trade services with a neighbor and mind her brood one night if she will do the same for you, in turn. This is all presuming you have no handy relatives or a child who is old enough to take over.

You are probably not going far enough away to be unavailable in case of emergency, and the telephone can hunt you down if real need arises, which it seldom does.

If you are one of those overanxious mothers who feel that nothing is safe enough for their children except their actual presence in their near vicinity at all times, you are asking for trouble. You are weakening your children. You are teaching them that you expect to subordinate your life to theirs, which is hardly a healthy viewpoint or one that will win their respect. You are, moreover, in danger of alienating your husband, who may quite reasonably resent the fact that the children have usurped his place in your affections.

"I have no pretty clothes — I am ashamed of the way I look."

That sounds like the old overworked inferiority complex, doesn't it? You know, you don't have to treat yourself that way. A dress in a becoming color costs no more than any other kind. The editorial and advertising pages of magazines are full of free grooming advice. The counters in the chain stores are crowded with small sizes of excellent cosmetics. Trim clothes and clean good looks are almost as readily available in America as pure drinking water.

---

No needle is sharp at both ends.

---

The truth is, putting the blame on your looks is unfair. If you have consistently neglected your appearance, it is more than likely that you have a sore spot somewhere inside your mind or heart, and that your outward carelessness is a protest against something you don't like in your world. Think it over. And in the meantime, don't be mean to yourself. Give yourself a chance. A fresh-looking skin and a fair figure require very little more than soap, water and self-denial.

And if you really set your mind to it, you can fix up a dress. You know how we women are! What is more, the effort and imagination you expend in this labor of self-improvement may be the best possible medicine for your inner hurt.

"My husband isn't interested."

Why isn't he? You started out with a powerful mutual attraction. What has happened to it? Go back in your mind carefully over your relationship. When did it start to change? And—be very honest now—whose fault was it? These marital disappointments are rarely, if ever, all one-sided. How did you let your husband down? If there is a serious rift, you might consider talking to a family counselor. This sort of friendly, trained service is spreading over the country now. It has the advantage of being impersonal, and in no way resembles the heated advice usually given so freely by close friends and relatives which, in spite of best intentions, is unavoidably biased.

In most cases, however, there has been a gradual drifting into dull ways rather than downright dissension. It takes effort to pull out, and the work will devolve mostly on the wife, since hers is the more emotionally imaginative sex. Many a wife who is bemoaning the increasing stodginess and grumpiness of the man she married, and who finds outlet in secret dreams about romantic screen heroes, needs nothing so much as a new love affair. Why not? A love affair which she, best in all the world, could inaugurate, and foster, and bring to delightful perfection through her unique experience ■ love affair with her own husband.

THE MAJESTY OF ORGAN MUSIC, echoing in Gothic nave and choir . . . gentle tribute to one dearly loved. Departed.

It is in this hour that the heart seeks something fine to bestow. Perhaps that is why, through the years, the choice of so many has been the Clark Metal Grave Vault. The finest tribute . . . the most trusted protection.
Stately. Beautiful. Armored against the elements.
All metal. Nonporous. Noncracking.
Designed to use the pressure of trapped air in the dome to hold out water in the ground.
An enduring custodian.
A sanctuary worthy of those you would honor with the finest.

The finest tribute . . . the most trusted protection

CLARK GRAVE VAULTS

When an inverted tumbler is submerged in water, the pressure of trapped air in the glass prevents water from rising inside. Placed over the casket, the Clark Grave Vault is designed to exclude water by this same scientific principle. Copyrighted 1946. The Clark Grave Vault Co., Columbus, O.

CONVERSATION PIECE

By Ruth Mills Teague

OUR forebears must have appreciated the virtues of soup far more than most of us do today: else why do all antique dinner sets include those immense tureens big enough to hold a complete dinner for eight? I have three such tureens and have discovered that it's delightful to use them in the way their capacity indicates—for meals that are practically soup, period.

There are few things more delicious than a soup that shrewdly blends the makings of a whole dinner, and nothing that lends itself more easily to the smart informality one wants in a Saturday or Sunday supper, or in a lunch before going on to a game or whatever.

Such a party is easy to prepare in advance, easy to serve and sure of success. What more could one ask? So let's work out the menu.

With cocktails we'll want something rather special—something that will combine the qualities of salad and hors d'oeuvres. The answer is a platter of shrimp, little tufts of raw cauliflower and strips of crisp red and green pepper, and in the center a bowl of highly seasoned mayonnaise to dip them in. The shrimp will be speared with colored picks and everyone will be supplied with small plates so that communal dunking—an awkward and often messy performance—will be eliminated.

For the cocktail you might try a combination of sauerkraut juice and tomato juice pepped up with Worcestershire sauce.

(Continued on Page 206)

Supper of bread and soup—simple? But sensational, if you give it that just-right touch. Homemade bread, served hot from the oven, is easy and exactly what you need to go with borsch and sour cream.

PHOTOS BY STUART

For hors d'oeuvres, raw cauliflowerets, the ever-popular shrimp and sliced raw peppers, both red and green. With delicious mayonnaise to dip into—well, you'd better prepare plenty of all three!

Dessert must be pretty to look at, served at the table. Use chopped strawberries, fresh or frozen, as a bright red base for individual baked custards. Or substitute red raspberries or Bing cherries.

Few things are more delicious than a soup that shrewdly blends the makings of a whole dinner, and nothing lends itself more easily to smart informality. This time it's borsch, hearty and subtle too.

It's a Big Evening... Have a Coca-Cola

...time out for the friendly pause

"Snacks at our house" is an invitation that always rings the bell. No matter what the hour, when the young folks are out for a good time they can look forward to a real treat—when there's a bit of home cooking in the cupboard and frosty Coca-Cola in the icebox. Have a Coke says Sam to Sue, meaning, This certainly is a date to remember. The friendly pause, with ice-cold Coca-Cola, is the perfect way to climax a happy occasion—to make any occasion happier.

Serve Coca-Cola at home

"Coca-Cola" and its abbreviation "Coke" are the registered trade-marks which distinguish the prod-uct of The Coca-Cola Company.

COPYRIGHT 1946 THE COCA-COLA COMPANY

VEGETABLE VARIATIONS

Vegetables are full of delightful surprises! To prove it, just try this "second-bite" lemon taste test the next time you serve these vegetables:

| | |
|---|---|
| Carrots | Broccoli |
| Beets | Asparagus |
| String Beans | Spinach |

Try the first bite without lemon. Hmmm, pretty good—but a little flat. Now squeeze a few drops of fresh lemon juice on the second bite. Oh, what a difference those few drops make! Lemon really has a knack for bringing back that garden-fresh flavor.

HOW TO GLAMORIZE A SQUASH

Yes, we mean squash (Hubbard or any winter variety), and don't go away, please. Here's the recipe, and you can tell just by reading it that this squash means second helpings—even from husbands!

GLAZED SQUASH

4 cups squash cubes or pieces
1 teaspoon salt
1 tablespoon brown sugar
1 tablespoon honey
3 tablespoons lemon juice
1 teaspoon grated lemon peel
Butter or margarine

Remove seeds and rind. Cut into one-inch cubes. Place in shallow, buttered casserole. Combine remaining ingredients and pour over squash. Dot with butter. Cover. Bake in hot oven (400°F.) about 30 minutes or until squash is tender. Remove cover and continue baking until squash is glazed (about 10 minutes longer). Serves 6.

FIXING FISH?

When you serve fish, of course you'll serve it with lemon, but have you tried preparing it with lemon? Takes away the odor entirely.

Whether you bake, broil or fry fish, first rub well with fresh lemon juice, inside and out. Cook as usual. No odor, we promise, and fresher flavor.

Bonus reasons for using fresh lemon juice: It's one of the richest sources of vitamins C, "P" and $B_1$. It aids digestion, alkalinizes. Adds health whenever used.

SUGAR SAVER
APPLESAUCE SUPREME

Here's an unusual way to make your sugar ration go further. Next time you serve canned peaches, or apricots, or pears, save some of the juice for making applesauce. Substitute it for the usual water and sugar, add a sprinkling of grated lemon peel and discover how truly delicious applesauce can be.

PARTY DESSERT—ANY TIME

The dessert that makes any meal a party—that's lemon pie, of course. So popular that 10 lemon pie recipes—all wonderful—are listed in the famous Sunkist Lemon Recipe Book (see below for your free copy).

Here's a lemon surprise that makes any pie better: Use lemon juice in making the pie crust! (Quoted from Page 16, Sunkist Lemon Recipe Book.)

SUNKIST PASTRY

3 cups sifted flour

1 teaspoon salt

Sift together

Cut in: 1 cup shortening

Add: 1 slightly beaten egg, combined with 3 tablespoons Sunkist lemon juice

Add gradually: Ice water—just enough to bind dough together

Roll pastry out thin and line pie plates. Bake in hot oven (475°F.) for 15 minutes. (Makes three 8-inch single pie shells. Keep unbaked dough in refrigerator until needed.)

TEA MAGIC

You can see lemon work its magic with tea. Add a little lemon and watch the tea turn from brown to clear amber. And the taste? More magic. For that change in color means any bitterness is gone and the true tea flavor is released.

Of course, you can think of a dozen more ways lemons help, such as to sour fresh milk in a jiffy, keep cut-up fruits and vegetables from discoloring, remove stains, keep hands soft and white. The point is—lemons do so much so easily, to make foods better and housekeeping easier, you want to be sure to keep a supply on hand—and use them.

Get Sunkist Lemons in trademarked tissue wrappers, the finest from 14,500 cooperating California and Arizona citrus growers.

P.S. For that famous Sunkist Lemon Recipe Book, write Sunkist, Sec. 203, Los Angeles 55, California.

Sunkist *California Lemons

(Continued from Page 204)

The soup will be borsch, but not the usual delicate borsch that is served at the beginning of a meal. This is soup, vegetables and meat all in one, hearty enough to satisfy the most ravenous appetite and subtle enough to excite the most meticulous epicure. I was introduced to it by a Russian friend who had known it as the favorite family meal in her childhood home. Of course there must be plenty of sour cream for each bowl—borsch without sour cream isn't borsch at all.

With the soup we'll have homemade bread—the easy kind, and I promise you it is easy. It's a slap-dash method, but you'd never dream it when the hot crusty slices come to the table. Serve your favorite marmalade or preserves with the bread.

The dessert will be a bowl of chopped frozen or fresh strawberries with individual baked custards. And with it a heavenly sauce to pour over each serving. This combination is perfect in taste and texture, and it's a real dessert that is neither too rich nor too sweet. (If strawberries are unobtainable, red raspberries or bing cherries can be substituted.)

And so to recipes. We'll prepare for six—increase quantities if party is to be larger.

HORS D'OEUVRES

Shrimp. Use large fresh, frozen or canned shrimp. If frozen or canned, clean and store in refrigerator until very cold.

To prepare fresh shrimp, wash thoroughly in cold water, let stand in cold water twenty minutes, drain and plunge into boiling water to which 1 bay leaf, 1 onion and 1 teaspoon lemon juice have been added. Boil ten minutes, cool in broth, peel, clean and store in refrigerator. It's rather a nuisance to prepare fresh shrimp, but it's worth the effort.

Cauliflower. The day before, separate a fine head of cauliflower into small tufts, wash thoroughly, cover with ice water and store in refrigerator.

Peppers. Select fine large red and green peppers. If they are extra large, one of each color will be enough. Cut them the long way into strips about three quarters of an inch wide, remove seeds and white membranes, cover with ice water and store for an hour or so in the refrigerator.

MAYONNAISE

Measure 2⅔ cups salad oil, and be sure that it and the mixing bowl are cold. Into the bowl put 2 large egg yolks, ¼ teaspoon Nepaul or red pepper, ¼ teaspoon dry mustard, 1 teaspoon salt, 1 scant teaspoon sugar, 1 teaspoon paprika, 2 tablespoons wine vinegar and 2 tablespoons lemon juice. Beat for half a minute with rotary or electric beater and begin adding the oil, a little at a time at first and later in a small but steady stream, beating constantly and fast. In four to five minutes you will have a bowl of stiff golden mayonnaise. Many people shy away from making mayonnaise because (1) they say it curdles, (2) they say it takes too long. But if you follow this recipe I can assure you success and a minimum of effort. Remember: bowl and oil cold; all other ingredients mixed before any oil is added. This recipe makes about a pint and a half. To 1 pint mayonnaise add 2 cloves garlic, cut in half, 1 teaspoon Worcestershire sauce and a little more pepper. Stir and store in refrigerator at least overnight.

To serve the hors d'oeuvres, remove garlic and fill a small bowl with mayonnaise. Place the bowl in the center of a platter and make a beautiful arrangement of shrimp, cauliflower and peppers around it. Spear each shrimp with a colored pick and be sure everything is icy cold.

BORSCH

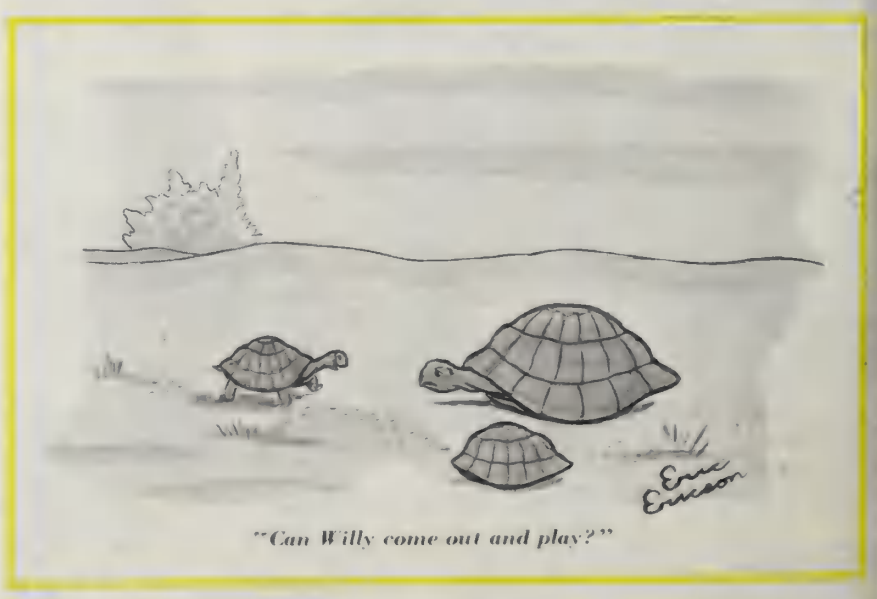
The day before, make a rich broth by boiling together in 5 quarts water about 4 pounds boiling beef or soup meat and a lot of bones, the more the better. Use beef, veal, pork or lamb bones, or all four. Add 4 teaspoons salt, 1 onion, 1 carrot, 2 bay leaves, ½ teaspoon whole pepper and 3 cloves garlic. Cover and cook for at least five hours, adding water if liquid falls below one half, strain and set in cold place. When very cold the grease will congeal on top of broth and should be removed.

When you are ready to make the borsch, measure about 9 cups broth into a large pot and set it over a low flame. Cut 1 pound lean pork into thin slices approximately the size and twice the thickness of a silver dollar. The shapes and thickness are bound to vary, but the silver dollar is a lead. Cut ¾ pound Polish sausage or garlic-seasoned frankfurters into very thin rounds.

Into a skillet put 2 tablespoons butter, 1½ cups grated or finely chopped raw red cabbage, and 1 finely chopped large onion. Sauté for five minutes, stirring frequently. Empty this into broth and let it cook while you grate 1 large or 2 small cans whole red beets, reserving juice. Many borsch recipes insist on elaborate goings on with grated raw beets, but after much experimentation I've decided the only thing gained is a lot of work.

Put the grated beets and their juice into the pot, add 2 medium crystals sour salt and let the soup boil ten minutes. Now taste for seasoning and add more pepper and salt as needed. (Instead of sour salt you can use 1 tablespoon lemon juice and ordinary salt.)



Lower the heat under soup and prepare the meat in this way: dredge the pork very lightly with flour and sauté in skillet with 2 tablespoons fat for five minutes. Add sausage slices. Pour in 1 cup water, and when it bubbles up, empty skillet into the soup pot. After this the soup should cook for twenty minutes, and fini.

This borsch can be made ahead of time, but be careful not to overcook it in reheating. If the soup is too thick, add more broth or water. Serve very hot from a tureen into large hot soup plates, and let each guest help himself to sour cream. I like a lot and so do many people, but others want only a spoonful.

HOMEMADE BREAD

Scald, but do not boil, 2⅔ cups milk and ¼ pound butter. Cool to lukewarm and add 2 well-beaten eggs and 2 cakes yeast that have been dissolved in ½ cup lukewarm water.

Sift together 8 cups flour, 1½ teaspoons salt and 1½ tablespoons sugar. Add liquids to flour and beat. You'll have to be pretty rugged about this, but it's the only real

"Can Willy come out and play?"

Their Slow Day-long Baking Is Why You Like 'Em Best

Always ask for B & M Brick-Oven Baked Beans. They're actually baked (not steamed) slowly . . . all day long . . . to give you that famous, extra-delicious, real New England flavor. Whenever your Grocer is out, remember it's this long, s-l-o-w baking that prevents our hurrying these Down East treats to you. Burnham & Morrill Company, Portland 2, Maine.

THE ANSWER TO YOUR GRAVY PROBLEMS
GRAVY MASTER
Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping
EVERY BOTTLE SHOWS HOW

GET THIS EASY MONEY NOW
Sell Everyday Cards
Make quick profits showing charming cards for Birthdays, Anniversaries, and other occasions. Easy to take orders for these beautiful Assortments of 15 cards, retail $1.00. YOU GET YOUR PROFIT RIGHT AWAY. Stunning designs, fancy papers, rayons, ribbons and beadings . . original, clever wordings. Extra cash for you every week this easy way. Send 50c for sample assortment or write for details!
CARDS 15 for $1
FRIENDSHIP STUDIOS
127 ADAMS STREET, ELMIRA, N. Y.

STICKS PERMANENTLY IN 8 SECONDS
Sanford's LIBRARY PASTE
The only genuine Library Paste. Never stains nor discolors.
10¢ A JAR

work involved. Put the bowl on a chair so that you can bend over and give it all you've got. A wooden spoon is the best beating instrument. After five minutes of this, cover the bowl with cheesecloth and set it in a warm place to rise. My spot is the top of the oil-burning furnace, with a couple of mixing boards under the bowl.

When the dough has doubled in bulk—one and three quarters to two hours—transfer it to well-greased bread pans. Don't be gentle about this. Grease your hands, gouge out a hunk of dough, juggle it into an elongated shape and smack it into a pan. The dough will be sticky and will look like nothing remotely resembling a loaf of bread. Set the pans to rise, and when the dough has again doubled in bulk—about one hour—bake it in a preheated oven at 375° F. for from fifty minutes to an hour. When the bread is done, it will leave the sides of the pans. Turn it out upside down and cover it with a towel. Try to plan your schedule so that the bread is done a little before mealtime, to be served hot from the oven. If you can't manage that, reheat a few minutes before serving. Cut the bread into thick slices, put the slices back in loaf shape and serve in a napkin-lined basket.

CUSTARD SABAYON

Beat together 4 large eggs, 6 tablespoons sugar, ¼ teaspoon salt and 1 teaspoon vanilla. Add gradually, beating all the while, 3 cups lukewarm milk. Pour into greased individual molds, place molds in a pan of cold water and bake from one and one half to one and three quarters hours in a slow oven—about 325° F. Test by inserting a silver knife in the custards. If the knife comes out clean, they are done. This is a little different from the usual basic recipe for baked custards and takes longer, but it's very sure.

If you are using fresh strawberries, cut them into small pieces, sprinkle with sugar and let them stand in the refrigerator an hour before needed. If the berries are frozen, they should be barely thawed when used.

SAUCE SABAYON

Stir 1 tablespoon flour into 1 tablespoon melted butter, add 3 eggs, ⅛ teaspoon salt, juice and grated rind of 1 lemon, 1 cup orange juice and 1 cup sugar. Beat until light and cook in a double boiler until thick. Whip 1 cup heavy cream. When the sauce is cold, fold in the whipped cream. (If you like sherry wine as a seasoning, substitute a good domestic sherry for the orange juice.)

To serve, empty the custards upside down into a serving dish, spacing them evenly, and add the strawberries carefully so that they do not splash over the custards. Serve the sauce in a separate bowl.

Service. Don't be misled by the informality of this party. Plan every detail carefully, for it's smooth simplicity, not a higgledy-piggledy effect, that you must achieve.

The soup should be served at the table and, if you have no tureen, one of those enormous earthenware pots that look like overgrown bean pots will do nicely. Dredge up generous portions and have plenty more for refills. You may find yourself serving some plates four times, for this is a soup to be long remembered.

The sour cream and bread can be passed around the table, and there's little need for help until the table-clearing moment arrives.

If you're without a helper—and in these days that wouldn't be phenomenal, to say the least—have a serving table, or better still, a serving cart, beside you. Empty dishes can be passed to you for stacking, conversation can go merrily on, and confusion be avoided. The idea is to bob up as little as possible yourself and to keep your guests from bobbing at all.

The Custard Sabayon should be served at the table, as should practically any dessert from pie on up and down the scale. A beautiful dessert is a lovely sight and should be enjoyed visually as well as gustatorially. After serving, pass the sauce and let the guests help themselves.

There you are—a simple little supper of bread and soup. Simple? Well, maybe "sensational" is a better word.

"My Proudest Kitchen Possessions"

• Now that Revere Ware is on sale again, women understand why lucky pre-war owners of these kitchen jewels guarded them so jealously. Cooking the Revere "waterless" way is so simple, so easy. It preserves the natural food values. It saves fuel because you use the lowest possible heat. It saves money by cutting down food spoilage and shrinkage. It greatly lessens kitchen heat and odors. These beautiful, easy-to-clean cooking utensils are on sale at your favorite department or hardware store. Whatever your budget, you'll find Revere copper-clad stainless steel ware economical because it's a lifetime purchase.

Revere COPPER-CLAD STAINLESS STEEL Ware

REVERE COPPER AND BRASS INCORPORATED
Rome Manufacturing Company Division,
Rome, New York

P.S. Look for the trademark on the copper bottom

Finest way to turn "Potluck" into party fare

Finest

RECIPE FOR DREAM PUFFS

1 package vanilla pudding powder
1 can Stokely's Finest Fruit Cocktail
1½ cups milk

Put pudding powder in saucepan; stir in milk. Stir and boil 30 seconds. Remove and chill. Use half as filling for 8 small cream puffs. Fold fruit cocktail including juice into remaining pudding. Serve over cream puffs. And to set guests off into raptures, each bright bit of fruit must be chockful of real fresh fruit goodness. You'll savor tree-ripened peaches . . . honey-sweet cherries . . . delicate pears . . . tart grapes . . . and golden pineapple in Stokely's Finest Fruit Cocktail. That's because the skilled workers in Stokely's spotless canneries are trained to let nothing but the finest appear under the label, "Stokely's Finest."

Finest

RECIPE FOR PEAS PIQUANTE

1 can corned beef hash (1 lb.)
1 can Stokely's Finest Peas
⅓ cup Stokely's Finest Chili Sauce
1 tablesp. butter or fortified margarine

Press hash into well-greased 6-inch ring mold. Bake in moderate oven (375° F.) 20 min. Drain peas; save liquid to use in soups or sauces. Heat together peas, chili sauce, butter. Turn out hash ring; fill with peas. Serves 4. And here's the secret of giving this satisfying dish a party flair that will delight unexpected guests. Use only the tenderest, greenest, most high-hat peas of all! Grown from seed with a mile-long pedigree . . . in the country's most cultivated, richest fields . . . Stokely's Finest are truly the aristocrats of the pea world. That guarantees you nothing but the finest in each delicious forkful of Stokely's Finest.

Always Delicious

Products of Stokely-Van Camp, Inc., Indianapolis
and Stokely-Van Camp of Canada, Ltd.

There's nothing like a soup pot to keep the home fires burning—and with happy family results. A good French soup can be a meal in itself.

If You Like Soup

By Louis Diat

Executive Chef of the Ritz Carlton Hotel, New York

THE soup pot in our home certainly had little chance to get cold. Something was always gently bubbling in it, because soup was eaten every day and at any meal, breakfast included. When I was a youngster trudging off to school in cold weather I was fortified with a generous bowl of hot potato soup or a panade just as American youngsters are given cereal.

The idea, however, that everything is dumped into a soup kettle which boils on endlessly like a witches' brew is all wrong, at least in the homes I knew. Only flavors that would go well together were combined, and soup making received all the care and thought of any other cooking. Then when the soup casserole was empty it was washed out like any other utensil and was ready for the fresh ingredients that would fill it the next time.

It always seems to me that the thrift of the French does reach a peak in the marmite, that tall earthenware casserole used for soup making. Such small amounts of this and that, such inexpensive cuts of meat, fowl and vegetables, and everything flavorful that has no other use, like celery tops, find their way into the marmite. Put on the back of the stove, unhurried cooking released all the goodness of its contents into the soup. Such good, nourishing soup!

VERY few housewives start the marmite with water. Part or all of the liquid which forms the base of a soup—or, for that matter, a sauce—is stock. It adds that indescribable "something" to the flavor. Water can be substituted for the stock called for in recipes, and is used when stock is not available, but the flavor suffers. My mother always had stock on hand in a jar, and it cost practically nothing because it was made from scraps of leftover meat that she could not use for anything else, from trimmings of meat and from the extra bones she asked for—and received—from the butcher with each meat order. These, with carrot and onion and a fagot, were slowly simmered in water until all their flavors were extracted, after which the liquid was strained. Gentle cooking and careful skimming produced clear, tasty stock.

WE kept the stock made from chicken and veal separate from that made from beef. The former was used as part of the liquid in cream soups and in white sauces, the latter went into soups such as pot-au-feu, oxtail and onion, and in more highly flavored sauces.

Soup in France, of course, is more often the whole meal than it is just one course—that is, in everyday family meals. Not always the same kinds of soup, however, are eaten in all parts of the country, because different sections have their soup preferences. I remember how partial we Bourbonnais were to a good potage like St. Germain or leek-and-potato, but I know other sections where the popular ones were clear soups with a bouillon base to which vegetables and vermicelli were added. But everywhere that I have been the two most universally popular were the pot-au-feu and onion soup.

To go with our soup we had bread—the crusty French kind—fixed in various ways. For simple hearty soups, particularly the kinds that were not strained and were generously strewn with vegetables, we liked croute de pain—bread crusts—which were nothing more or less than the crust of the loaf cut off in small thin slices and lightly toasted. (The center of the loaf was used for bread crumbs or croutons.) Another favorite for stock soups, always for petite marmite, were one-quarter-inch slices of small crusty rolls. Cream

Excerpts from the book, Home Cookbook, French Cooking for Americans, soon to be published by J. B. Lippincott Co.

Blue Bonnet Margarine gives "ALL 3" Flavor! Nutrition! Econom-e-e!

Flavor-delicious flavor! You'll love BLUE BONNET's fresh, delicate, country-sweet taste. And even when half-melted on piping-hot foods, BLUE BONNET still keeps its sweet, fine flavor.

Nutrition-proved nutrition! BLUE BONNET is a real food for active, growing youngsters-everybody! 15,000 units of Vitamin A in every delicious pound. Rich in Food-Energy, too!

BLUE BONNET comes white—color for table

Listen to FRED ALLEN On the air for BLUE BONNET! NBC Network Sundays, following EDGAR BERGEN—CHARLIE McCARTHY

Economy-yes, you save real money with BLUE BONNET. Why, it costs so little you can spread it on twice as thick!

Jamborees (Sugarless)

½ cup shortening
½ cup corn syrup or honey
1½ cups sifted flour
2 teaspoons baking powder
½ teaspoon salt
¼ teaspoon Burnett's Nutmeg Flavor
¼ teaspoon Burnett's Clove Flavor
½ teaspoon Burnett's Almond Flavor
1 egg
¾ cup jam

Cream shortening; add corn syrup or honey and Burnett Flavors, creaming until light and fluffy. Sift together flour, baking powder and salt. Add to shortening mixture and mix until blended and crumbly. Beat egg; add to dough, mixing thoroughly. Spread one-half the dough in bottom of greased pan (7x12 inches). Spread with jam; cover jam with remaining dough. Bake in hot oven (400° F.) about ½ hour. Cool; cut in 2-inch squares. Makes about 2 dozen squares.

Some Cookie!

For date-bait or family fare, these cookies are love at first bite! The secret's in the Flavor, success of any dish. Try these taste tricks, too:

Add Mint to chocolate syrup for a super sundae sauce. Put Pineapple in plain custard and you've a tropical treat.

Give flair to old-time gingerbread with a dash of piquant Orange.

Easy does it—with Burnett's 29 Food Flavors . . . in handy little bottles all ready to use. Smart gals know Flavor's magic in food . . . so get Burnett's fine Food Flavors today!

BURNETT'S Food FLAVORS

Send for "ACCENT ON FLAVOR" — booklet of basic recipes and exciting variations with Flavor . . . . Dept. L-3, Joseph Burnett Company, 437 D St., Boston 10, Massachusetts soups usually had croutons served in them, and these were small dice cut from the center part of the loaf and either fried in butter or toasted in the oven. And finally there were the thick slices of bread sprinkled with cheese that were floated in the tureen (or our individual bowls) of onion soup and browned in the oven, from where they came sizzling hot to the table.

BEAN (White or Black) SOUP

There are dozens of different varieties of beans in France, and all are used in making soup. But of all the good bean soups I ate at home, I remember particularly the one we had each fall when the last beans of the garden were just starting to get a little dry on the vines. These were shelled and cooked for that delicious dish, Haricots à la Bourbonnaise, at which time my mother always saw to it that there would be enough left in the water to make into soup for our supper.

2 Cups Dried Beans
2 Quarts Water
1⅓ Tablespoons Salt
2 Tablespoons Butter or Margarine
1 Carrot, Diced
2 Leeks, Minced
1 Onion, Chopped
¼ Pound Salt Pork or a Ham Bone
1 Faggot (1 Leek, 2 Sprigs Parsley, 2 Stalks Celery Tied Together)
A Little Pepper
Milk for Thinning

Clean and wash beans and soak one to two hours in cold water to cover. Drain, cover with the 2 quarts water, add salt, bring to a boil, skim well.

Melt butter or margarine in a saucepan, add carrot, leeks and onion and cook until golden brown. Add to beans. Add salt pork and faggot.

Cook slowly until beans are well done, about one to two hours, the time needed to make them soft depending upon the beans. Discard faggot. Remove pork and reserve.

Drain beans, reserve the liquid and rub the beans through a sieve. Return beans to the pan and add enough of the cooking liquid, plus milk, to make the soup the desired thickness. Correct the seasoning, add a little pepper and bring to a boil. If soup is still too thick, thin it with a little more milk. Slice or dice the pork and serve with the soup or save to serve with other foods. Croutons may be sprinkled on top if desired. Serves 6.

CABBAGE SOUP

Cabbage soup is a real country dish and a favorite winter meal because it consists of all the vegetables that are stored for the winter and used when fresh vegetables are not available.

As you can see, this is a whole meal, the soup to be served first, followed by the meat and vegetables.

CABBAGE SOUP, COUNTRY STYLE

(Soupe au choux)

⅔ Pound Salt Pork
4 Quarts Water
1 Ham Bone or 1 Pound Ham
2 Teaspoons Salt
1 Garlic Sausage (if Desired)
3 Carrots, Diced
2 Turnips, Yellow or White, Diced
3 Onions, Chipped
4–5 Leeks, Chopped
1 Quart Chopped Cabbage, Parboiled Ten Minutes
5–6 Medium Potatoes, Diced Pepper

Put pork in a deep kettle, cover with water and boil ten minutes. Drain and plunge into cold water. Drain. Put pork and ham in kettle with water, boil a few minutes, add salt and cook one and a half to two hours. Add sausage and all vegetables except potatoes. Cook three quarters to one hour, add potatoes and cook until pork is well done and vegetables are tender. Correct seasoning and add a little pepper. Skim off fat, remove pork and sausage, cut into dice and return to soup. Serve with crusts of bread in it. Serves 6-8.

CREAM OF TOMATO SOUP

(Crème de Tomate)

3 Tablespoons Butter or Margarine
1 Onion, Chopped
1 Carrot, Chopped
3 Tablespoons Flour
1 Quart Chicken Stock or Water
1 Small Clove Garlic
2 Leeks, if Obtainable
4 White Peppercorns
1 Teaspoon Salt
1 Tablespoon Sugar
6 Fresh Tomatoes, *or
1 Cup Canned Tomatoes
Chicken Bones, if Available
1 Cup Top Milk or Cream

Melt butter or margarine in deep saucepan, add onion and carrot, and cook slowly until golden brown. Add flour and mix. Add stock (or water), garlic, leeks, white peppercorns, salt, sugar, tomatoes and chicken bones (if used). Let cook over a low heat from one to one and a half hours, skimming as needed. Rub through a fine strainer, combine with the top milk and correct the seasoning. If the soup is too thick, add a little more milk or stock. Serve with cubes of bread fried in butter or with cooked rice. Serves 4-6.

CROUTES AU POT

Croutes au pot*, one of our very common French soups, is merely the stock from the pot-au-feu (page 214) served with the carrots, turnips and leeks—cut into pieces an inch long—that were cooked in it. When the stock was skimmed to remove the fat, a little was always left in for croute au pot, just enough to make tiny glistening beads all over the surface of the soup. And served separately with it were always pieces of the crust of French bread spread with marrow taken from the pieces of bones that were cooked in the pot-au-feu.

(Continued on Page 212)

NEW WAY TO SERVE SAUERKRAUT

ADD 5 TO 10 DROPS—to each serving of sauerkraut and many other cooked vegetables, meats, gravies, fish, salads, soups, tomato juice, for a new, zestful flavor.

A 10c BOTTLE FLAVORS 108 MEALS

You'll find Frank's Red Hot Sauce on most grocer's shelves and meat counters for only 10c. Get a bottle today!

FREE!—18 tempting, easy-to-prepare recipes in booklet, "Foods as Men Like Them." Write for your FREE copy today

THE FRANK TEA & SPICE CO., DEPT. J, CINCINNATI 2, OHIO

Frank's RED HOT Sauce

HANDY HELPER'S JINGLE QUIZ No. 1

What mends a dollar when it's torn,
Or reinforces papers worn?
What holds the pieces where they're matched
Without obscuring what is patched?

Dennison TRANSPARENT MENDING TAPE
At Stationery Departments Everywhere

THOMASTON Sheets
SINCE 1899 THEY HAVE MET THE TEST OF TIME

Burpee Big Zinnias

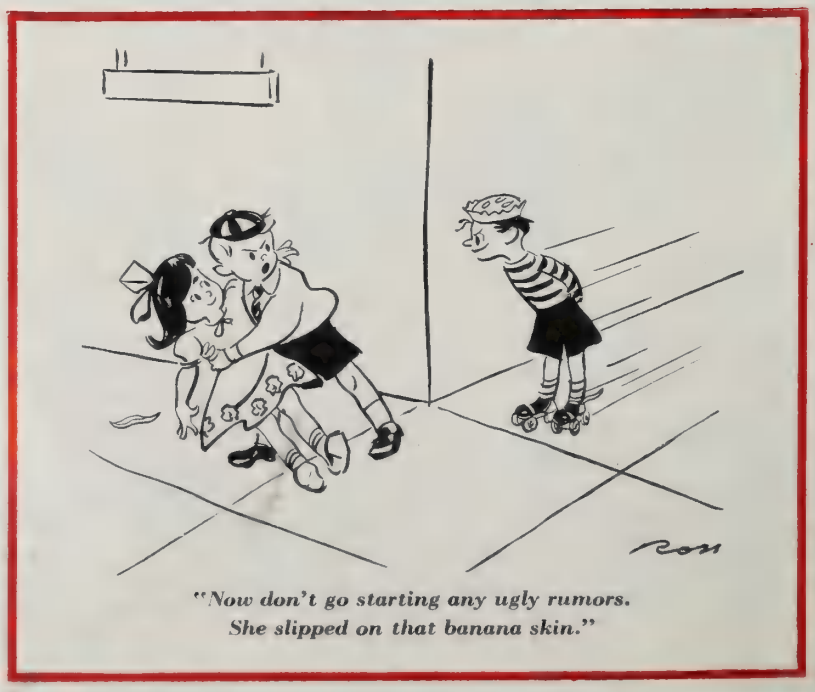
75¢ PACKET for 10¢

Flowers up to 6½ inches across! Richer colors—apricot, rose, salmon, yellow, orange, scarlet. Some have curled petals like chrysanthemums. Sturdy 3-ft. plants, easy to grow. SPECIAL, for all to enjoy Burpee's Big Zinnias—75c Super Pkt. Seeds for 10c—Send Dime Today!

BURPEE'S SEED CATALOG FREE

W. ATLEE BURPEE CO.
472 Burpee Bldg. Philadelphia 32, Pa. OR 472 Burpee Bldg. Clinton, Iowa

MATERNITY DRESSES! Write FOR Catalog



Spring Styles

Smart, youthful styles for Morning, Street, or Afternoon. Also Maternity Corsets & Lingerie.
CRAWFORD'S—Dept. A-1233 Main Ave., Kansas City, Mo.

Make EXTRA PAY Every Day

Sell Big Value Greeting Cards
Your Spare Time brings CASH Earnings. Show rich, novel Everyday Cards to friends, take orders. Assortment of 14 smart Birthday, Anniversary, Get-Well Cards retails $1. 12 other boxes 60c up. Big profits. Act now.
PHILLIPS CARD COMPANY
456 Hunt Street - - Newton, Mass.

WRITE NOW for SAMPLES ON APPROVAL

"Now don't go starting any ugly rumors. She slipped on that banana skin."

the EKCO pressure cooker comes out of the kitchen and stays to dinner!

A STAR IN THE KITCHEN . . .

SHINES AT THE TABLE

Watch the smiles go 'round your table when you cook and then serve in the Ekco Pressure Cooker. Food you cook in minutes brims with color and flavor (vitamins, too!) and the family enjoys it at its luscious best . . . served bubbling hot right in the Ekco Cooker.

The Ekco Pressure Cooker combines the magic of quick, easy, pressure cooking with the advantage of range-to-table service. See its amazingly efficient cooking features . . . just a twirl of the Fingertip Knob seals it, just a flick of the Pressure Control keeps pressure from exceeding the proper level. Then take another look at its distinctive serving style . . . the special serving cover. You'll be doubly glad you waited for an EKCO. At better stores.

PATENTS PENDING
T. M. REG. U. S. PAT. OFF.

EKCO

WITH THE FINGERTIP SEAL pressure cooker

EKCO

EKCO PRODUCTS COMPANY
CHICAGO

Knox Gelatine turns the trick!

Fancy treats or plain dishes—both are easy with Knox. This luscious Lemon Chiffon Pie has the marvelous tang of fresh lemons...takes less sugar than ordinary lemon pie! (Make it the day before, whenever convenient!) The delicious salad mold is so easy, you can fix it in almost no time! Let Knox Gelatine help you regularly to make meals more varied...and meal-getting easier. For more helpful Knox recipes, see P. S. below.

KNOX GELATINE

LEMON CHIFFON PIE

(Filling for one 9-inch pie; uses ¼ pkg.)

1 envelope Knox Gelatine
¼ cup cold water
3 eggs
1 cup light corn syrup (or ⅝ cup sugar)
½ cup lemon juice
½ teaspoon salt
1 teaspoon grated lemon rind
1 crumb crust or baked pie shell

Soften gelatine in cold water. Beat egg yolks; add ¼ cup of the corn syrup (or ½ cup of the sugar), lemon juice and salt. Cook in double boiler until of custard consistency, stirring constantly. Add softened gelatine, and stir until dissolved. Add grated lemon rind. Cool, and when mixture begins to thicken, fold in stiffly beaten egg whites to which remaining corn syrup or sugar has been added. Turn into baked pie shell or crumb crust and chill. Serve topped with sweetened whipped cream and chopped nuts, if desired.

SAVORY VEGETABLE SALAD

(Serves 6; uses ¼ pkg.)

1 envelope Knox Gelatine
¼ cup cold water
1 cup hot water
¼ cup mild vinegar
1 tablespoon lemon juice
½ teaspoon salt
1 or 2 tablespoons sugar
Dash of pepper
1½ cups diced vegetables

Soften gelatine in cold water; dissolve in hot water. Add vinegar, lemon juice, salt, sugar, pepper. Cool. When it begins to thicken, fold in vegetables. (Any combination, cooked or raw. Leftovers, too!) Turn into one large mold, or individual molds that have been rinsed in cold water; chill until firm. Treats made with pure, unflavored Knox Gelatine and fresh vegetables or fruits are quick and easy...have all the wonderful fresh flavor and good vitamins! What's more, Knox is a supplementary protein—adds nutrition to every dish!

P.S. FREE—write to Mrs. Charles B. Knox, Box 23, Johnstown, N. Y., for her beautifully illustrated recipe book.

(Continued from Page 210)

LEEK-AND-POTATO SOUP

One of my earliest food memories is of my mother's good leek-and-potato soup made with leeks I pulled myself from our garden—plump, tender leeks. How much larger they were than any I can buy here! When I first came to this country I actually couldn't find any—and what Frenchman can make soups without leeks? I finally persuaded one of my vegetable suppliers to find someone who would grow leeks for me.

There are two variations of leek-and-potato soup: Potage Parmentier, which is strained and sometimes finished with eggs; and Potage Bonne Femme, a less elegant version which is not strained and to which eggs are never added.

My mother never fried croutons for the simple bonne femme version, but cut the crispy crusts from the French bread and floated them on top.

LEEK-AND-POTATO SOUP

(Potage Parmentier)

4 Leeks (White Part), Minced
1 Onion, Finely Minced
2 Tablespoons Butter or Margarine
4 Potatoes, Pared and Chopped
3 Cups Water
2 Teaspoons Salt
3 Cups Hot Milk

Put leeks and onion in a saucepan with 1 tablespoon of the butter or margarine. If leeks are not available, substitute 2 onions, finely chopped. Cover and cook slowly a few minutes until they are soft, but do not allow them to become brown. Add potatoes, water and salt. Bring to a boil and cook slowly thirty to thirty-five minutes, or until potatoes are very soft. Strain through a fine sieve. Return the strained purée to the pan, bring to a boil and add milk and the remaining tablespoon of butter or margarine. Correct the seasoning. Serve with croutons if desired. For a richer soup, mix two egg yolks with ½ cup cream and combine with the hot soup. Bring to the boiling point, but do not allow to boil after adding the egg yolks. Serves 6–8.

> Success never gives us a good opinion of ourselves: it only confirms it.
>
> —PETIT-SENN: Conceits and Caprices.

LEEK-AND-POTATO SOUP

(Soupe Bonne Femme)

4 Leeks (White Part), Minced
1 Small Onion, Finely Minced
2 Tablespoons Butter or Margarine
1 Quart Water
2 Teaspoons Salt
4 Potatoes, Peeled and Minced
2 Cups Hot Milk
Pepper
Bread Crusts

Put leeks and onion in a saucepan with 1 tablespoon of butter or margarine. Cover and cook slowly a few minutes until they are soft, but do not allow to become brown. Add water, salt and potatoes. Cook slowly forty minutes. When ready to serve, add milk and remaining tablespoon of butter or margarine. Correct the seasoning, adding pepper. Serve from a soup tureen with crusts of bread floating on top. Serves 4–6.

LENTIL SOUP

Follow recipe for bean soup (page 210), substituting lentils for beans. Lentils need extra care in cleaning them because there are always many little stones mixed in with them. They do not, as a rule, take so long to cook as beans, usually will be done in an hour.

ONION SOUP

The French love to sit down to a meal of onion soup—never seem to tire of it. At home the earthenware casserole in which it was cooked was brought to the table and the soup dished from it into our pottery soup bowls. A custom worth adopting if you like, as we did, to come back for more of the

Don't be a RUBBIT!

Don't rub and scrub and slave over gummy, greasy pots and pans! Get rid of that lazy, spineless dishrag—and let Brillo do your dirty work!

BRILLO shines 'em easy!

Brillo is fast . . . easy . . . neat! A square metal-fiber Brillo pad cleans scorchy pans smooth and bright as a silver spoon! Get your Brillo today. Either Brillo Soap Pads—red box. Or Brillo Cleanser, separate pads and soap—green box.

Keeps aluminum brilliant

PLEE-ZING GROCERIES

BUY

FINE FOOD AND HOUSEHOLD PRODUCTS --all under one famous name

At your neighborhood grocer

WAGNER

KOMB-KLEANED SWEEPER

Better, Easier "PICK-UP"

ASK YOUR DEALER

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

E. R. WAGNER MFG. CO., Dept. J, Milwaukee 9, Wis.

First ceremony of the Ojibwa maple sugar festival was the mixing of new maple sugar with some from the season before.

Maple sugar flavor that's true and uniform

The Indians first discovered maple sugar. They realized the value of having a uniformly delicious flavor. But they didn't know the right way to get it!

Long experience has taught us to select maple sugar with a good, full flavor; then blend it with cane and other sugars. This enhances the maple flavor—makes it richer. You get that same delicious real maple sugar flavor in every bottle of Vermont Maid Syrup. At your grocer's.

Penick & Ford, Ltd., Inc., Burlington, Vermont.

Vermont Maid Syrup

Vaculator

TRADE MARK REG.

makes good meals better!

equipped with DUTCH CLOTHLESS FILTER

VACULATOR · CHICAGO, ILL.

THERE'S NO OIL "Just like 3-IN-ONE"

INSIST ON 3-IN-ONE

For over 50 years the accepted household oil in America . . . Sold everywhere.

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

3-IN-ONE Oil

KVP Dusting PAPER

rich bouillon with its succulent slices of onions. Sometimes my mother would make onion-soup gratiné, and then she put the soup in the individual bowls, placing them in the oven to brown the cheese-topped crusts before the bowls were brought to the table.

ONION SOUP

(Soupe l'Oignon)

2 Cups Minced Onions
2 Tablespoons Butter or Margarine
1 Tablespoon Flour
5 Pints Stock
1 Teaspoon Salt
Little Pepper
Bread Crusts

Put onions in saucepan with the butter or margarine and cook slowly until golden. Add flour, mix and cook a few minutes. Add stock, salt and pepper and boil gently for ten minutes. Serve from a soup tureen with bread crusts floating on top. If desired, sprinkle with grated cheese. If preferred, this soup may be strained. It may also be made with half stock and half milk, in which case heat milk and add it to the soup just before serving. Serves 6–8.

(This soup needs a good rich beef stock. If not available, substitute canned bouillon or consommé or make stock with one of the beef extracts or meat pastes and water.)

ONION SOUP GRATINÉ

(Soupe à l'Oignon Gratiné)

Follow recipe for soupe à l'oignon. When soup is ready to serve, turn it into an ovenproof casserole, put crusts of bread on top and sprinkle them with grated Parmesan or Swiss cheese. Put in a hot oven until the cheese has melted and browned.

OXTAIL SOUP

(Potage de Queue de Boeuf)

1 Oxtail (About 2 Pounds), Cut Into One-Inch Sections
2 Tablespoons Beef Fat
1 Medium Onion, Sliced
1 Carrot, Sliced
2 Tablespoons Flour
2 Quarts Water or Stock
2 Teaspoons Salt
4–5 Peppercorns
1 Faggot (Made of 1 Leek, 2 Sprigs of Parsley, 2 Stalks Celery Tied Together)
½ Cup Diced Carrots
½ Cup Diced Turnips
Marjoram, Rosemary, Sage, Basil, Thyme and ½ Bay Leaf

Parboil oxtail for two or three minutes, drain off water and wipe the sections dry. Put fat in saucepan and, when melted, add oxtail. Brown partially. Add sliced onion and carrot and cook until all are golden brown. Add flour, mix well, add stock (or water), salt, peppercorns and faggot. Bring to a boil, skim well and simmer for about four hours, skimming as needed. Add 3–4 cups additional water, as broth condenses considerably. Tie diced carrots and turnips in cheesecloth and cook during last hour, or cook them in a separate pan. Strain the soup through cheesecloth on which the herbs have been placed, pouring carefully to prevent any sediment in the bottom of the pan from clouding it. The pieces of oxtail should be removed with a spoon to the tureen. Correct the seasoning of the strained soup, add the carrots and turnips, and pour over the oxtail. (Oxtail meat may be removed from the bones if desired.) Serves 6–8.

PANADES

A panade is a potage thickened with bread and finished with egg—the egg gives richness and seems to make the texture just right. It is a very tasty soup, but one which I have never seen served in any but French homes. Panades were considered especially good breakfast soups. My mother's recipes all call for half a pound of bread because she bought her bread by the pound. One half pound equals about eight slices of the average American baker's sliced bread.

PANADE WITH LEEKS

Follow recipe for Panade with Sorrel (below), substituting 2 cups of white part of leeks, finely minced, for the sorrel. Cook the leeks slowly in the butter until they are soft but not brown, then proceed as for the Panade with Sorrel recipe. Serves 6.

Add a Spicy New Interest to Plain Lenten Dishes!

TAKE a tip from famous New Orleans cooks! They know how to give everyday dishes a magic twist that lifts them right out of the ordinary. The tricks are easy, and you can get the same clear, delicate-flavored Wesson Oil so many of them swear by. Try these two magic-making recipes, using Wesson Oil for both. See for yourself why Wesson Oil is America's favorite salad oil!

PICAYUNE PATTIES—FISH WITH A FLAIR!

1½ cups cooked fish
1 large onion
1 sprig thyme
3 sprigs parsley
Dash of cayenne
1½ cups bread crumbs
2 eggs, beaten
Wesson Oil

Into chopping bowl, put fish, onion, thyme, parsley, cayenne; mince fine. Moisten with half of the beaten egg and 1 tablespoon Wesson Oil. Mix in ⅔ cup bread crumbs. Shape into 6 or 7 patties. Dip in remaining egg; coat with crumbs. Fry in deep hot Wesson Oil (375°–385° F.). Drain on absorbent paper. (Frying in Wesson Oil is a pleasure! No smoke! No odor! Economical, too! Strain your Wesson Oil after frying, and you can fry in it again and again. Wesson-fried foods are digestible, and have a fresh, delicate flavor!)

CLIP THESE RECIPES AND ASK YOUR GROCER FOR WESSON OIL TODAY!

SPRING SALAD—FOR WINTER-WEARY APPETITES!

Toss crisp, well-dried greens in your salad bowl. Any kind or combination will do—it's the fresh, gay-as-confetti dressing that makes this salad! (Add beets, onion, and hard-cooked egg, if you like.)

CHIFFONADE DRESSING

1 teaspoon salt
½ teaspoon sugar
¼ teaspoon pepper
½ teaspoon dry mustard
½ teaspoon paprika
¼ cup vinegar
¾ cup Wesson Oil
1 hard-cooked egg
1 small cooked beet
1 small onion

Mix and shake in a jar all but the last three ingredients. Then stir in the egg, beet, and onion, all finely chopped. Note how clearly and distinctly all the seasonings stand out . . . how subtle and delicate the background flavor is! Dressings never have a heavy, oily taste when you make them with light, delicious Wesson Oil!

Wesson Oil

FOR SALADS & COOKING

NEW ORLEANS

WITH THIS Original GEBHARDT SEASONING

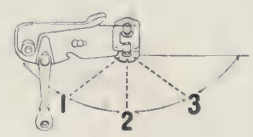
Only in Gebhardt's Chili Powder is found the perfect flavor of imported Mexican Ancho Chili Peppers processed by the exclusive Gebhardt method and blended with fragrant spices to produce the basic seasoning for real Mexican cookery.

With this original Gebhardt seasoning you can make real Chili con Carne and duplicate the incomparable flavor of many other Mexican dishes. Use it to add flavor-originality to your every-day recipes, too. Add its piquancy to your stews and sauces.



MADE BY GEBHARDT IN SUNNY SAN ANTONIO SINCE 1896

MEXICAN RECIPE FOLDER PACKED WITH EVERY BOTTLE

Gebhardt's EAGLE CHILI POWDER

A MODERN CONVENIENCE for EVERY kitchen

May be used in any of three locked positions, then swings flat out of your way. An EXCLUSIVE SWING-A-WAY feature!

SWING-A-WAY

...THE KING OF CAN OPENERS FOR THE QUEEN OF THE KITCHEN

Patented double syncro-gears assure positive, SAFE cutting action ... and 1-o-onger life. Cans of all sizes and shapes are held securely and smoothly opened with a twist of the wrist. Lid lifts for easy removal. Has built-in handy BOTTLE OPENER.

At better stores everywhere: or send check or money order for $2.15 ($2.40 West of Denver) to SWING-A-WAY Steel Products, Merchandise Mart, Chicago 54, Illinois

SWING-A-WAY CAN OPENER

PANADE WITH SORREL

2 Cups Sorrel, Well Cleaned and Shredded
2 Tablespoons Butter or Margarine
1 Quart Warm Water
1 Teaspoon Salt
½ Pound (8 Slices) Stale White Bread Cut Into Pieces
2 Cups Milk (Part Cream if Available)
1 Large or 2 Small Eggs, Lightly Beaten

Put sorrel in saucepan with 1 tablespoon of the butter or margarine. Cover and cook slowly until sorrel is cooked down to about ½ cup. Add water, salt and bread. Mix well so that bread will become thoroughly soaked, then bring mixture to a boil, stirring all the time. Let cook slowly for half an hour longer, stirring from time to time. At this point beat briskly with a whip to make the mixture smooth. Add the milk to the eggs and combine with the hot mixture and add the butter or margarine. Bring back to the boiling point, but do not allow to boil. Correct the seasoning and serve immediately. Serves 5–6.

PEA SOUP

Pea soup was seldom called "Potage de Pois," but usually "Potage St. Germain." The reason is that exceptionally good green peas grow abundantly in St. Germain, a place not very far from Paris, and the French like to honor a town that has some special virtue by naming a dish for it.

You will find the flavor and color of this soup made of dried peas greatly improved if a cup of fresh green peas (or the pods of very young tender peas) which have been cooked until soft and then rubbed through a sieve is added to the soup after it has been strained. Incidentally, we would have this soup the day before or after we had leek-and-potato soup, because it uses up the green part of the leeks that are left.

PEA SOUP
(Potage St. Germain)

2 Cups Split Peas
5 Cups Water
1 Teaspoon Salt
1 Medium Carrot, Chopped (½ Cup)
2 Leeks (Green Part), Chopped
1 Cup Spinach Leaves, or Green Lettuce Leaves
2 Tablespoons Butter or Margarine
½ Cup Fat Salt Pork, Finely Chopped
1 Medium Onion, Chopped
1 Bay Leaf
A Little Thyme
Bread Croutons

Soak peas in water to cover about one hour. Drain, put in a saucepan with 4 cups water, and salt. Bring to a boil, skim, cover and cook slowly while preparing the following: Melt 1 tablespoon butter or margarine in a saucepan, add salt pork and onion and cook until it melts and starts to brown. Add carrot, leeks, spinach or lettuce leaves, bay leaf and thyme, and cook for a few minutes. Add to the split peas. Cover and continue cooking all together for about one hour or until peas are soft. Rub through a sieve, add remaining cup of water (or a cup of bouillon or stock) if the soup is very thick. Bring to boil, correct the seasoning, adding a little sugar if desired. Add remaining tablespoon of butter or margarine. Serve with croutons. Serves 6.

POT-AU-FEU

No book on French cooking could be written that disregarded the pot-au-feu, the one dish that for centuries has regularly appeared, usually on Sundays, in every French home. Its savory fragrance and robust flavor are loved alike by the poor and the rich. And the tall clay casserole called a "marmite" in which the pot-au-feu is cooked is as essential in a French kitchen as a stove.

As a rule, enough meat and vegetables are put in the pot-au-feu to last two meals, and there is usually stock left for the base of soups or sauces to follow on other days. Rump of beef, fresh plate and chuck—from ½ to ¾ pound of meat with bone for each quart of water—are the best cuts of meat for pot-au-feu. Then in addition every good housewife saves the carcasses of chickens she may have served and adds them to the pot. Or if chicken salad, vol-au-vent or Happy Days are here again!

HASKO TRAYS ARE HERE AGAIN

Now . . . you can get most of the Hasko Trays and Accessories you watched and waited for.

Standard Hasko designs in all popular sizes and beautifully gift packaged are coming back strong . . . New models . . . New designs are in the making.

So . . . when you visit your jewelry, gift or department store be sure to ask "What's new by Hasko?" There will be some delightful surprises in store for you soon.

HASKO

hasko TRAYS and ACCESSORIES

HASKELITE MANUFACTURING CORP.
DEPT. 143, 135 S. LA SALLE ST., CHICAGO 3, ILL.

Haskelite Corporation also makes PLYMETL • PLYWOOD • PHEMALOID 3 Famous Products for Industry

Coming Your Way!

HE QUALITY RICE IN THE UE AND YELLOW PACKAGE

y're coming back, those plump, rkling clean, whole grains that have de WondeRice famous for quality through-the country. In small lots at first, ause WondeRice quality standards t quantity—but in greater amounts r, as soon as conditions make eased packaging possible.
e is a desirable all-purpose food for ryone—low in cost, high in rgy value—and WondeRice is rice its peak of perfection. Look for ndeRice in the blue and yellow kage.

WALTON RICE MILL, INC.
STUTTGART, ARK.

WALTON'S
WondeRice

other cooked chicken dish is planned for another day, the fowl is cooked in the pot-au-feu because the chicken flavor makes the stock extra delicious.

In serving pot-au-feu, some like slices of the meat, the vegetables and the soup put all together in the soup bowl. Others prefer to eat the soup separately and follow it with the sliced meat and vegetables. But always very, very thin slices of small, dry, crusty rolls are eaten in the soup.

POT-AU-FEU

3–3 ½ Pounds Meat and Bone (Rump or Fresh Plate of Beef)
4 ½ Quarts Water
2 Tablespoons Salt
2–3 Carrots
1 Turnip
1 Small Parsnip
5–6 Leeks
2 Stalks Celery
1 Onion
A Little Thyme
½ Bay Leaf
1 Clove

Cover meat and bones with water, bring to a boil and parboil five minutes. Remove meat and bones, discard water and clean pot. Put back the meat, bones, the 4½ quarts water and salt and bring very slowly to a boil, skimming all the time, until the scum stops rising to the top. Boil very gently for one and a half hours, add vegetables (which have been cleaned and cut into pieces of any desired size), and cook for two and a half hours longer. Skim off the fat and correct the seasoning. Remove as much bouillon as desired for serving, remove meat, slicing enough for serving, and the vegetables. Strain remaining bouillon through cheesecloth

Courtesy is the eye which overlooks your friend's broken gateway—but sees the rose which blossoms in his garden.

—LYMAN ABBOTT: The Author's Illustrated Quotation Kalendar (A. C. Woodford) or fine sieve, let cool and keep in refrigerator for use in soups or sauces. To make the bouillon a good brown color, brown an onion, sprinkled with a very little sugar, in butter in a frying pan and add to the soup. Instead of parboiling the meat and bones, they may be started in the cooking water, reserving 2 cups of the water to be added after the soup has begun to boil. This brings the scum more quickly to the top. Done this way, the soup stock will not be quite so clear. Serves 6.

SHEPHERD'S SOUP

(Soupe Bergère)

1 Tablespoon Butter or Margarine
½ Cup Fat Salt Pork in Small Dice
1 Small Turnip, Pared and Minced
2 Leeks (White Part), Minced
1 Onion, Minced
1 Carrot, Minced
5 Cups Stock (or Water)
3 Potatoes, Pared and Minced
12–18 Slices of Bread (Toasted)

Melt butter or margarine in a saucepan, add salt pork and cook until it is melted and starts to brown. Add turnip, leeks, onion and carrot and cook very slowly about a half hour. Add stock (or water) and potatoes, bring to a boil and cook slowly about thirty-five minutes or until potatoes are soft. Correct the seasoning and serve in a tureen with toasted bread floating on top. Serves 6.

SORREL SOUP

(Soupe à l'Oseille)

1 Cup Well-Cleaned and Shredded Sorrel
2 Tablespoons Butter or Margarine
1 Tablespoon Flour
1 Quart Water
½ Teaspoon Salt
2 Cups Milk (Part Cream, if Available)
1 Large or 2 Small Eggs, Slightly Beaten
Bread Crusts (page 209)

Put sorrel in saucepan with 1 tablespoon butter or margarine. Cover and cook slowly

(Continued on Page 217)

MOLASSES BROWNIES

take no sugar . . . no shortening!

ANOTHER MAGIC RECIPE! ANOTHER EAGLE BRAND SUCCESS!

Magic Recipe for Molasses Brownies

1⅓ cups (15-oz. can) Eagle Brand Sweetened Condensed Milk
Dash of salt
¼ cup molasses
2 cups graham cracker crumbs
1 cup chopped nut meats
½ teaspoon vanilla

Mix Eagle Brand Sweetened Condensed Milk, salt, molasses, graham cracker crumbs, nut meats, and vanilla. Blend thoroughly. Spread mixture in 8 x 12-inch pan greased and lined with waxed paper. Garnish as desired. Bake in moderate oven (350° F.) 15 minutes or until set. Turn from pan and remove paper at once. Cool, cut into squares. Makes about 24 brownies.

NEW! LUSCIOUS!

SO EASY TO MAKE!

Every Magic Recipe is planned and tested to give you perfect results . . . with a minimum of fuss and trouble! Every recipe is built around Eagle Brand, the original Sweetened Condensed Milk, made to meet Borden's high-quality standards. It's a creamy-rich blend of the purest whole milk, and sugar.

For recipes for dozens of delicious candies, cookies, puddings, ice-creams, send post card for FREE Book of Eagle Brand Magic Recipes to Borden's, 350 Madison Ave., Dept. LH-36, New York 17, N.Y.

© Borden Co.

Sir Christopher MOOD OF GRANDEUR, A PICTURIZATIO

Only WALLACE STERLING has all Aspects of Beauty

Only Wallace Sterling Silver has both beauty of Mood and Sculptured Form. More than a design, each pattern has the inspiration of a major period in art. The grandeur that is St. Paul's Cathedral in London is of the combined genius of Sir Christopher Wren, master architect, and Grinling Gibbons, unsurpassed carver. Their artistry is translated into the Sir Christopher pattern.

WALLACE EXCLUSIVE DIMENSIONALS: SIR CHRISTOPHER, GRAND COLONIAL, GRANDE BAROQUE, ROSE POINT AND STRADIVARI PATTERNS

WALLACE SILVERSMITHS, WALLINGFORD, CONN. • R. WALLACE ■ SONS OF CANADA, LTD., TORONTO, ONT.

(Continued from Page 215)

sorrel is cooked down to ½ cup. lour, mix all together, then add water alt and cook slowly fifteen minutes. ogether milk and eggs and combine the soup. Add remaining butter or arine and bring back to the boiling , stirring constantly, but do not al- o boil. Correct the seasoning. Serve soup tureen with the crusts of floating on top. Serves 4–5.

grew a special kind of white turnip "les raves" which were never hard or woody—were, in fact, always more tender than potatoes. They had a delicate and unusually sweet flavor. No wonder they were well liked. If, however, your turnips do not break away to a pulp when you make this soup, strain it before adding milk.

TURNIP-AND-POTATO SOUP

(Soupe de Rave)

3 Young White Turnips, Pared and Minced
3 Medium Potatoes, Pared and Minced
1 Teaspoon Salt
5 Cups Water
2 Tablespoons Butter or Margarine
1½ Cups Milk

Put turnips, potatoes, salt, water and 1 tablespoon of butter or margarine in saucepan. Bring to the boil and cook over a brisk fire half an hour or until the potatoes are soft. Remove from fire, and if the vegetables have not broken into a pulp, mash them or run the mixture through a sieve. Add milk, bring back to the boil, correct the seasoning and add remaining tablespoon of butter or margarine. Serves 4–5.

GUEST HUSBAND

(Continued from Page 31)

eatly filed," he agreed. "But come now, do something today." His tone had ed that what she was then doing was y trivial, a kind of caprice in her. "Let's a picnic or something."

t's not very warm for a picnic," she ed.

We'll find the sun somewhere across the ,

But Rex, I've got a hair appointment," old him.

Cancel it."

But look at me!" She touched her hair. can't see a hair out of place."

t's very dirty, and appointments are so to get. I'd have to wait another full . You don't know how hard it is these to get the simplest chores done. Be- . I've ——" That blank and clinical ession had come like a cloud across his She paused. "All right dear," she d. "Let's do something. Whatever you to do."

kept her standing there waiting while ondered. Then, at last, he said, "Let's t it. Actually, I should go down to the . Now that I'm back I can't continue row everything onto Carleton. He's o young any more."

And I have to keep pretty for you," she ned gaily. But her remark fell flat. He gone on down the hall. He had not d it.

l their recent conversations had a way oming to dead ends. She had thought this first awkwardness would pass. But ad been home over two months and it ed to become more and more exagger- , until now their reticence with each r was, in itself, becoming habitual, the ern of their relations. To trace the way to their former basis of free camara- e seemed futile now, as futile as the at- ot to recapture a mood once it has ed. Perhaps, she told herself, it was ly that they had matured. Perhaps a er state than the lost state, a deeper re- nship, would develop in place of the one.

EY were entering a sunny area now, ing Palo Alto.

Ah, here is the sun!" she exclaimed, n stopped short, vexed to find herself n speaking of the weather.

ick and Tim, immensely dignified, es- ed them into the dining room. The boys e very stuffy and proper all through h. But once away, out of range of the ol buildings, they pranced like young pies around Evelyn and Rex. They punc- ed their every phrase with "sir" and a'am" in the dormitories, but it was d" and "mom" in the car when they ve to the village for ice-cream sodas. y looked adorably ridiculous, Evelyn ught, sprawling over the car in the atti- es of children with their legs encased in strictly pressed long gray trousers.

Come on, mom," Tim pleaded. "You e a soda too."

Give in to yourself for once, mom," k urged.

Evelyn wrinkled up her nose in distaste. ut I've just finished lunch."

Mother'd like it plenty," Dick confided is father, his mouth full of straw and ice am. "She's just afraid to get fat."

"Let's take the sky-line road back," Rex suggested, after they had deposited the boys back at the academy.

"Fine. But do you mind if I drive?"

"Don't you like the way I drive?"

"Yes, but I get such a feeling of inertia sitting doing nothing."

As they neared the city and the traffic thickened, Evelyn said:

"You can take it now, dear."

They shifted seats. He said suddenly, before starting the car, "I'll tell you what. Let's stop and have dinner at the beach. We'll go to Robert's. We haven't been there for years. How about it?"

"But Stella's prepared everything. All I've got to do is put it together. The refrigerator is full of food."

"Throw it out—let's dine out," he said impulsively.

"But dear, you forget. Things don't keep. You can't just dismiss food so lightly."

Gravity is no more evidence of wisdom than a paper collar is of a shirt.
—JOSH BILLINGS.

"Very well," he said curtly, starting the car. "We'll stick to your schedule." He turned the car away from the ocean and into the city streets.

"You're angry with me, Rex?"

"No, I'm not. It's just that with you everything is rationed. Time included."

"You are displeased," she murmured.

"You have a lot to learn, Evelyn," he said, his voice low. It was his M.D. voice that he used when the patient was very ill indeed. "Someday you'll realize that the important things are free."

"Important things?"

"Time," he said. "And love. They can't be earned. They're gifts. You think you have to earn everything, Evelyn."

"All this over a little dinner at Robert's." A quick anger rose in her. Controlling her voice, she said coolly, "I'll give you a much better dinner at home."

She made a very complicated risotto with chicken livers and mushrooms and olives and grated cheese. Though Stella had prepared everything, she worked hard and expertly for an hour with an apron over her country clothes.

She watched him eat, pleased with his greedy appetite. "Now wasn't that better than eating out?" she asked, as they sat over their coffee.

He offered to help with the dishes.

"No, no. I'll just rinse them and leave them for Stella."

But she didn't rinse them. She did them all properly.

It was nine o'clock when she had finished. She was tired. It had been, except for the short oasis of pleasure with the boys, a long, nondescript day. She was glad it was nearly over.

Sunday night was the night for much business in her room. It was her habit to do her eyebrows, freshen the polish on nails, give her face an especial scrubbing, and work on the menus for the coming week.

Rex was in the study, sunk in an armchair, a radio concert on low and the Sunday papers scattered on the floor about his chair. "Koussevitzky—records," he explained, indicating the music.

She stood for a moment in the doorway, listening. Then she said, "I'll go upstairs to bed and do some work on myself." But instead she entered the room, her eyes gathering in the scene. She stooped, picking up the papers, section by section, folding them carefully. "Have you finished with these?" He looked immensely placid and comfortable sitting there watching her, a cigarette in his fingers. She fancied that his eyes were fixed on her stooped figure with scorn. She straightened up. "I really believe, Rex, you drop these papers on the floor deliberately. Because you know it irritates me."

For a moment he did not reply, his eyes measuring her. Then he quoted: "'Martha, Martha, thou art careful and troubled about many things: But one thing is needful.'" She scowled down at him. "The Bible," he explained. "Luke."

"I didn't know you were so familiar with the Bible."

"I'm not. I looked it up just the other day."

Exasperated, she retorted, "You've been speaking in riddles all day."

"I'm surprised you don't know the story about Mary and Martha. Two types of women—the Marys and the Marthas. And you, Evelyn, are a Martha—terribly," he told her.

She jabbed at him. "And your Lady Brigid is a Mary, I suppose?"

He considered a moment. "Yes, I rather think so. Yes."

She sank onto the chintz-covered ottoman where he had piled his feet. "I don't in the least know what we are talking about."

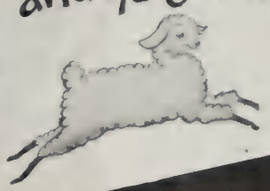
"You're tired," he said kindly. "You needn't have worked so hard over dinner. A can of soup and a smile would have been ample for me."

She melted a little. "I've been feeling disagreeable all day. Maybe it's my liver. Or something." It was a distinct relief to attribute dismays and impatience to physical causes. In that way you got back to the sanity of cause and effect. And then you were superior to your mood. You could even afford to talk about it. "I've been feeling rapid all day," she confessed.

It was on Friday morning at breakfast that he said, looking up from the paper, "First concert of the season this afternoon. They're playing Sibelius Number One." His voice ended on a note of interrogation.

She shook her head. "I can't today. I've so many pesky things to do." Then she faltered. "I'd like it. I love Sibelius, but ——" Again she was explaining. Again she was justifying herself.

During the day she kept rigidly to her schedule. Guiltily, she performed all the duties on her calendar. She did have things to do, she told herself. They had always subscribed to the symphony, and in the past she had gone with Agatha when he had not been able to get away from the office on Friday afternoons.



Now he seemed so free to leave the office, as if he hadn't really established any order in his work since he had come home. He was on call for the military. But there was something of the dilettante in the way he worked, compared with his old energy. This uncertainty in him, this overtone of the haphazard

When Rayon Curtain Washdays . . .

Come in like a and go out like a

THE FINISH IS Wat-a-set

A BASKETFUL of rayon curtains ushers washday in "like a lion" but if the rayons are Wat-a-set, you can depend on a lamb-like exit!

Wat-a-set, the improved LASTING finish for rayon curtains gives longer curtain life because it STAYS ON through numerous tubbings, protects the delicate marquisette weave and repels those pesky silverfish bugs that eat rayon like moths eat wool.

Wat-a-set Rayons KEEP that spanking-clean, crisply-new look. Ask your retailer for Wat-a-set Rayon Curtains. Wat-a-set is used on numerous popular brands.

If you live in one of America's 50 largest cities you can locate your Wat-a-set retailer in the "Where to buy it" section of your local telephone directory.

MT. HOPE FINISHING CO.
North Dighton, Massachusetts
Trade Mark Wat-a-set Registered
A Lasting Finish For Rayon and Cotton Curtains

in their life, told on her. There was an untidiness in it. She was certain, too, Rex would be happier with a full-time schedule. She had hinted at this more than once. But his answers had been vague and unenlightening.

That Friday evening the telephone rang twice. Once during dinner, for him. The daughter of an old patient was ill. Rex suggested Carleton at once. But the voice on the telephone was insistent. So he left her to finish dinner alone. The second call came while she was having her coffee. It was Agatha.

Owl-eyed Agatha. All the way across the darkened auditorium she had seen him sitting alone on the aisle in the third row. "He's acquired a lovely patina, if you know what I mean, Evelyn."

"Oh, Agatha!" she laughed.

"No, I mean it. He sat there with a regular electromagnetic field of romance about him as he listened to the Sibelius."

"Oh, Agatha, you're just the usual woman reacting to her doctor!" She laughed again in the high octaves so as to cover up her surprise.

So he had gone to the concert after all. And alone. He had sat through dinner and had not mentioned it to her. He had sat all afternoon absorbing music, thrilled to it, and had not spoken of it to her. Something about that knowledge shook her, shook her deeply. Had someone told her that he had been seen sitting in a café with a woman, she would not have been so stirred. Slowly, moment by moment, as she sat waiting for him to come home, it was borne in upon her with greater and greater clarity that this man, her husband, possessed a life of his own, that there were rooms of his being as yet unexplored by her. She saw suddenly all the perilous fluidity of human relations. She became aware of her husband as a separate human being—in the same sense that she had been aware of him when they had first fallen in love, as someone distinctly apart from her, excitingly strange.

She went up to the bedroom and beg watch the clock for his return. She p up the picture of Tim; Rex had stuc snapshot of himself and Lady Brigid i frame. She examined that smiling face the straight limp hair, that composed in the sloppy sweater, arms hanging str at her sides like a soldier's. She felt a t of jealousy, just that faint suspicion adds the savor to possession. She seem come alive—feel young again.

It was eleven o'clock when he retu She was seated at her dressing table, m ready for bed. She smiled at him i mirror. "So you went to the concert all."

"Didn't I tell you?" he asked carel

"No, but Agatha did."

"You should have come."

She was brushing her hair. "I get the est feelings lately—in crowds. Somet like claustrophobia. I had to stand nea exit through the entire last act of Bo last year. It's awful."

He stood behind her at the dressing t watching her in the glass. "You ha been sleeping well lately. I've noticed. give you something." He disappeared d stairs and returned almost immedia "Take these tonight." He handed her pink pills.

She turned and faced him. "How did know I hadn't been sleeping? You r have been lying awake yourself."

He didn't answer that. He said, " haven't shared a room for so long, Eve perhaps my being here disturbs you. A like to read so late. I've a mountain of n cal journals to catch up on. I was wonde if you would ask Stella to make up the g room for me. I'm sure we'll both rest bet

"Why—why ——" She moved some tles into position on the top of the tabl she sparred for time to find her voice, to her poise. "Why, certainly, dear. Why d we do it tonight? We'll make up your now. Come on and help me," she said ga dropping the brush.

Of course it's a Cory!

coffee filtered only thru coffee
TASTES SO MUCH BETTER!

You'll be amazed how much fuller bodied, richer, your favorite brand of coffee will taste when it's brewed this modern way that extracts ALL the flavor.

Only The Cory with its hand-decorated glass beauty comes complete with all these outstanding accessories: hinged decanter cover, safety stand for the upper glass, accurate coffee measure, and the famous Cory GLASS filter rod. Sold at better stores everywhere. $3.75 to $5.25, Cory stove extra. Slightly higher in Canada. Cory Glass Coffee Brewer Co., Chicago 1, Illinois.

CORY
the only All-Glass coffee brewer

Look for the Cory glass filter rod when you buy!

It's a patented Cory feature. Insures delicious coffee every time. Does away with messy filter cloths. Eliminates metal, too. And so much more convenient. Just rinse off and it's clean. Fits all standard glass coffee makers, and you can buy it separately. 50c at your favorite store.

Copyright 1945 by Cory Glass Coffee Brewer Co., Chicago

Turnover Toaster

PERFECT TOAST EVERY TIME

Toasts two slices of bread at a time an even all-over golden brown. Flip handle and presto—doors open, toast automatically reverses! Finished in gleaming chrome with genuine ribbon nichrome element. Cool plastic handles. Famous K-M quality and dependability assure long life and trouble-free performance. If your dealer can't supply, ask him to reserve one for you—now!

KNAPP-MONARCH COMPANY • ST. LOUIS, MO.

He followed her out into the corridor. She laughed nervously as if it were some caprice they were indulging in. She chattered on, obviously unable to stop. She made various trips back to their room: to bring his dressing gown, his slippers, his bedside books, his cigarette box, his ash tray. They said good night.

She returned to his room once more. "I brought these," she said, handing him the portraits of Dick and Tim—the snapshot of himself and Lady Brigid intact in a corner of Tim's. "It'll make it more homey. Good night again."

Back in her own room, she walked obediently to her dressing table and resumed her usual nightly schedule. She pinned a net carefully over her hair. Then she began cleansing her face with cream. She did all the countless little things women do before retiring; she did them rapidly, too rapidly, as if she were in haste. Her heart was beating too rapidly too. She was unaccountably exhausted, as if the making of the bed had been a heavy exercise.

She felt drawn to the window. But at the window, she felt drawn to the bed. She walked to and fro aimlessly, as if there were nowhere in the room that she might rest. Finally she sat in the slipper chair—rigid. All the objects in the room—the two waiting beds, the mirrors, the desk, the bric-a-brac on the desk—each separate object seemed to be waiting, like sentinels, watching her, like a scene on a stage waiting for the play to begin. The entire house with all its objects passed before her mind as on a screen, all these things that were gathered under this roof. She was suddenly appalled that all this crowd of objects, vansful, the whole organization of her home—of any home—was assembled about nothing more solid than an emotion between a man and his wife.

All men are not born with genius, but every man can acquire purpose, and purpose is the backbone and marrow of genius—nay, I can scarcely distinguish one from the other.
—BULWER.

The building of the house, the keeping of it, paying bills for it, all this sober business, she saw then, was only the result of two people wanting to live together. The knowledge that the whole of her life was founded on the slim skein of affection between herself and her husband was frightening—and marvelous. She saw clearly that the buttress of every roof of every home in the city was the intangible, imponderable—love. Without that the house toppled.

Like a thief, she stole downstairs and into his study and fumbled for the lamp. The Bible was in its accustomed place on the lowest shelf next to the reference books. She put it inside her dressing gown and hurried back upstairs to her room.

She found the chapter. "But Martha was cumbered about much serving," she read. "Martha, Martha, thou art careful and troubled about many things: But one thing is needful: and Mary hath chosen that good part, which shall not be taken away from her."

Evelyn swallowed the two pink pills and waited for sleep, a sleep which, when it finally came, was repetitious with images of the rather plain Englishwoman whose features, while you watched, changed over and over and over again into a bewitching beauty, whose lank hair had a Botticelli charm, whose shoes were, at the same time, both walking boots and ballet slippers. And she, Evelyn herself, was busy packing suitcases, about to catch trains that would not wait for her when she discovered that among the piles of suitcases, and at the very last moment, she had forgotten the one important garment, whatever it was.

Dick and Tim came on Saturday. This was their monthly week end at home. Evelyn chauffeured them Saturday afternoon to a swimming meet. Saturday night they went

Give a man a bottle of Derby Steak Sauce for the table—but keep one of your own in the kitchen to cook zest and savor into dozens of tasty recipes! Here's rich, concentrated flavor that goes a long way—makes men's appetites sit up and take notice. Derby Steak Sauce is exciting, no matter how you use it. Send for Free Recipe Book and see why.

GLASER Derby Steak Sauce

■ Steak Sauce... Barbecue Sauce... Worcestershire Sauce... Hot Sauce

GLASER, CRANDELL CO., Chicago 8, Dept. B3

FIRST AID FOR CLEVER COOKS

MAESTROS OF THE SALAD BOWL

Shrimp Orleanais

2 egg yolks, 1/2 tsp. salt, 1/4 tsp. pepper, 1/2 tsp. sugar, 3 tsp. lemon juice, 2 cups olive oil. Add the oil to the mixture slowly, then beat well. Pour dressing over 1 lb. boiled shrimp. Serve on green peppers.

RAYMOND OF "CAFE LAFITTE"

Shades of the old fierce pirate, LaFitte! His blacksmith shop now houses one of New Orleans' greatest restaurants. And Raymond says LaFitte's treasure trove never equalled this superb shrimp sauce.

Try this truly masterful dressing. Make it with a genuine olive oil. Make it with pure Pompeian Olive Oil. Its clear golden color and delicate haunting flavor make the humblest salad ■ triumph. Use Pompeian—the finest of olive oils! Pompeian Olive Oil Corp., Baltimore 24, Maryland.

POMPEIAN
Great Name in Olive Oil

Just 1/4 cup sugar makes this divine cake and frosting!

What ■ stunning cake! And just think—a quarter cup of sugar makes the whole thing! A wonderful treat when sugar's scarce—and so delicious, you'll be making it even when there's plenty of sugar again.

GRANDMA'S MOLASSES DAISY CAKE

| | |
|---|---|
| 2/3 cup shortening | 3/4 tsp. salt |
| 1/4 cup sugar | 1 1/4 tsps. baking powder |
| 3/4 cup Grandma's Molasses | 1/2 tsp. baking soda |
| 2 cups sifted all-purpose flour | 2 eggs, beaten |
| | 1/2 cup milk |

Cream shortening and sugar, slowly add molasses, beating constantly. Sift together dry ingredients and add 1/2 cup to molasses mixture. Add eggs, beat well. Add remaining dry ingredients alternately with milk. Pour into well-greased 8-inch cake pan. Bake in moderate oven (325° F.), about 60 min. One word of caution! Be sure you use Grandma's Old Fashioned Molasses . . . for the sweetness this cake needs to make it a success. Not only is Grandma's sweeter than ordinary molasses, but it has a finer, more delicate flavor—(one cup equals ■ cup of sugar in sweetness). It's the only nationally sold brand that does not contain sulphur dioxide!

SUGARLESS FROSTING—Beat egg white and one 8-oz. glass (1 cup) currant or your favorite jelly until mixture stands in peaks. Add one tsp. vanilla extract. Spread on cool cake, decorate with almonds and chocolate bits as shown.

NEW COOK BOOK—FREE! American Molasses Company, Dept. LHJ-3, 120 Wall Street, New York 5, N. Y.

Please send me FREE Grandma's new book of 101 delicious Molasses recipes. (Please print plainly).

Name.....

Address.....

City.....Zone.....State.....

SELF-POLISHING
Crystal-Clear Charm
FOR YOUR FLOORS

Gives the Same Long-Lasting Beauty So Famous for Cars

Your floors take on a luxuriant richness with easy-to-use Self-Polishing SIMONIZ. It's crystal-clear so the true beauty of your floors "shows through" with an exciting brilliance. But more important—Self-Polishing SIMONIZ saves you work because it lasts. Dirt and spilled things wipe up with a damp cloth and your floors are as bright as ever.

Shines as it dries . . . just spread Self-Polishing SIMONIZ evenly over your floors with a cloth or applicator. You can do it in no time at all. Then notice how it Self-Polishes to a brilliant luster . . . without rubbing or buffing. Enjoy lovelier floors that require less care. Get Self-Polishing SIMONIZ today at your grocery, hardware, drug, paint, 5 cents to $1, auto accessory or department store.

The Simoniz Company, Chicago 16 Ill.
Recognized for over thirty years as authorities on preservation of fine finishes.

Self-Polishing
SIMONIZ
FOR FLOORS

REPLACEMENT OR REFUND OF MONEY
Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping
IF DEFECTIVE OR NOT AS ADVERTISED THEREIN

FOR LINOLEUM, ASPHALT OR RUBBER TILE, OR FINISHED WOOD FLOORS

to the neighborhood movie. She sat through the double feature, uncomplaining. She made hot chocolate before they went to bed. She drank a cup of it herself.

Monday she lunched with Agatha, who invited her for the Friday concert. It was to be a program of Mozart. Despite the fact that she had always been bored by Mozart, she accepted readily. Immediately upon returning home, however, ashamed of her confusion, she telephoned Agatha.

"Invite me for another Friday, Agatha. I'm very anti-Mozart."

Agatha was horrified and wanted to argue. But Evelyn was firm.

A permanent was on her calendar for Tuesday. Like a good soldier, she kept the appointment. She went at eleven. Since she had started with shattered nerves, she was surprised at her stamina. She remained quite calm until three o'clock, just when all was finished except the combing out, then she could endure it no longer. She overtipped the astonished and offended operator and hastened home, her hair in tight little wormy curls all over her head. After she had combed it out she lay down, trying to force the feeling of rapidity to pass, trying by enforced repose to change her pace.

It was just after Stella had removed the dessert that he told her. "I have some news, Evelyn."

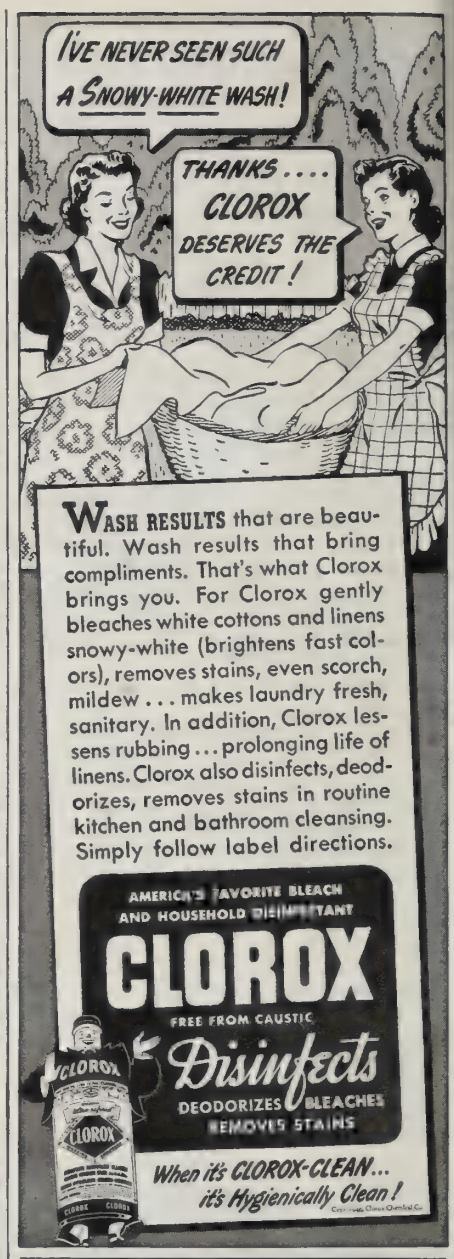
"News?" She toyed with her coffee cup. Her heart began its capricious behavior again. Why should she be alarmed at news? News could be good as well as bad. Still, there was something in his voice that told her.

He looked very solemn. "I've had rather an exciting offer. To go to China." He paused, watching her face. "There's a group of medical men going out. China would be particularly rewarding. There's so much to be done. It's rather an honor to be asked by these men," he ended modestly. "They're a first-rate bunch."

"That's wonderful," she gasped.

All that he was saying was a blur; it came to her like the hum of voices when one is falling asleep. He was enumerating gigantic tasks to be done. Biophysics, psychosomatic medicine, biochemistry—his language was half sense and half scientific terminology. She struggled for composure as he talked on, his eyes alight. For a moment she almost hated him. For a moment she hated all men and their work that liberated them from their neighborhoods, from themselves, their blessed work that made them like gods, suprapersonal.

At last he came back to himself. "Of course, there's the boys—and," he added, avoiding her eyes, "there's you." He lifted the demitasse that had long since been empty and feigned to swallow. "But the boys are at school now. They won't miss me greatly." Then he raised his voice with mock cheer. "Besides, I shan't be gone forever."



"Of course, it's rather a blow for me," she began. But she would not complain. She would not carp. She, too, would be impersonal, objective. "I can understand, though," she went on, "that all this looks little to you now, after the war. I can imagine it would." Her voice was feeble, stingy. Within her mind, like a fugue, went the refrain: He'll go this time, and after that he'll go again, and there'll be another again, and again.

By midnight she had made up her mind. She removed the hair net from her hair, removed the cold cream and the tailored-wool dressing gown. She went to the wardrobe and from a protective bag took out the pink silk robe. She hesitated. It was too obvious. But she put it on anyway, though the hall was cold and the furnace off.

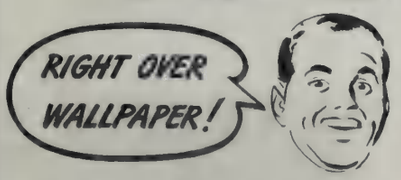
His bed light was still on and the radio was playing softly. The day's newspapers were cast upon the floor beside his bed and a cigarette he had neglected to rub out was burning in an overloaded ash tray. He was awake, his face half hidden among the pillows.

"Rex," she began, "I don't feel well."

He came alive instantly, sitting up in the bed. Guiltily, he reached down to pick up

WHIZOOKA WINNIE SAYS:

WHIZOOKA ROACH GUN—a wartime development, with D.D.T. added—makes short work of killing roaches, ants, bedbugs, silverfish. Comes fully loaded, ready for safe, sure, instant action. Only $1.00 at your store. R. M. Hollingshead Corp., Camden, N. J.



BE A HOTEL HOSTESS

Enjoy Your Work! Fascinating positions in hotels as Hostess, Executive Housekeeper, Manager, Social or Food Director. Grade school education plus Lewis Training qualifies you. Lewis National Placement Service Free of extra charge. One student writes: "Business Manager and Hostess in Fraternity House. Have attractive suite, in addition to salary, thanks to Lewis Training." Write for Free Book.
LEWIS HOTEL TRAINING SCHOOL Sta HC 501, Washington 7, D. C. 30th SUCCESSFUL YEAR

$2.98* PAINTS A ROOM!

Trust Kem-Tone Miracle Wall Finish to keep giving you the biggest bargain in beauty for your home. This finer scientific blend of pigments, resins and oils is easy to use, dries in one hour and covers most any surface—even wallpaper—with one coat!

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping — REPLACEMENT OR A REFUND OF MONEY if DEFECTIVE OR NOT AS ADVERTISED THEREIN

THERE'S A KEM-TONE DEALER NEAR YOU!

$1 RIDS YOUR LAWN OF UGLY WEEDS!

Weed-No-More kills dandelion, plantain, other weeds. Won't harm lawn grasses or soil. Just spray on! 8-oz. pkg. treats 1600 sq. ft. At Paint, Hardware, Garden Supplies, Department and Drug Stores.

WEED-NO-MORE
MAGIC WEED KILLER
Made by the makers of Kem-Tone

the scattered papers on the floor. She shoved them aside with the tip of her pink mule.

He pointed to his coat hanging on a chair. "The thermometer," he said. "In the breast pocket."

She handed it to him and sat on the bed beside him.

"Pain?" he asked, placing the thermometer in her mouth and reaching automatically for her wrist.

She shook her head.

"Just general discomfort?"

She nodded while his eyes fastened on her with that impersonal, professional stare. She turned her face half away from him, her eyes falling on the snapshot of Lady Brigid stuck awry in the frame of Tim's picture. He released her wrist for a moment to turn sideways in the bed and switch off the radio. Then he took her hand again. The silence was imposing. She began to feel absurdly important. The silence became intolerable at last.

With a quick movement she removed the thermometer from her mouth.

She said, "I'm a fraud. I feel all right. I'm not ill."

He slumped back among the pillows, a puzzled, amused smile beginning on his face. She felt like a caller who is expected to make conversation. She tilted her head toward Lady Brigid's picture and asked, quietly, conversationally:

"Did you make love to her?"

He considered a moment. "I kissed her. Once. It was summer. And there were nightingales. You know the English nightingales."

A man who knows that he is a fool is not a great fool.

—CHANG TZU: Wisdom of the Chinese, edited by Brian Brown. (Coward-McCann, Inc.)

For a moment she savored that pang of jealousy. "I never kissed anyone while you were away. Not even once." She paused, then added humbly, "Of course, I had no offers."

"Maybe that was because you didn't go around wearing your kissable self," he told her.

"Maybe." She drew a deep sigh that ended in a shiver. "I just keep that self hanging in the closet, filed away, don't I?" she asked.

"Yes—rather too much," he agreed.

Her chin was trembling. She kept her face averted so that those trained eyes should not notice. "Rex," she said, "I don't want to be a Martha any more." Win or lose, it would be bliss if she could cry. Instead she was merely cold with a quivering chin. "I've tried so hard to be a good and proper wife. I guess I tried too hard. I got lost among the details." He was toying with the ends of her pink silk belt. "You were right when you said I thought I had to earn everything. I always felt that I had to keep on earning you." His sandy head was bowed somewhere near her chin. "But what I want to know is: do you think the Martha in me is too chronic to cure?" She hastened on. "I want to go to China with you. Oh, I've thought about the children." She swallowed hard. "But wouldn't it be better for the boys to have a married mother in China than a neurotic old-maid mother at home?" she finished.

"It won't be tidy in China. It won't be neat at all. In fact, it'll be very dirty." His voice was almost a whisper.

"But that isn't the question." She scuffed the newspapers on the floor with the tip of her dangling mule. "The question is would it be possible—no, no, no"—she interrupted herself impatiently—"the question is: Do you want me?"

"Your hands are freezing."

"My feet are cold too," she complained childishly. "Bad circulation, maybe."

"You let me be the doctor," he ordered. He moved in the bed. "Crawl in, darling."

He had said darling. She said, "Darling, darling."

Every room needs . . . a "Living Picture" to double its beauty and size

Living Pictures

Genuine NURRE Mirrors

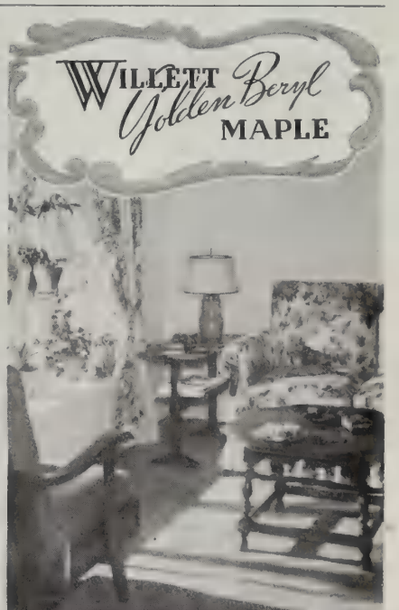
See the many exquisite Genuine Nurre Mirrors at your dealers. They're all made of scientifically silvered plate glass for true, undistorted vision, and will add depth, light, color and animation to any room.

FREE BOOK!

"How Famous Decorators Would Use Mirrors in Your Home." Illustrates how an ever-changing Living Picture will work shining wonders in your home.

The Nurre Companies, Inc.
Dept. LHJ, Bloomington, Ind.
Please send me FREE mirror book.
Name .....
Address .....
City ..... State .....

BERLOU stops MOTH-damage for 5 YEARS or Berlou pays for the damage



Pennies-a-year protect your clothing, furs, blankets, rugs, furniture, when you spray with BERLOU Guaranteed Mothproof. (BERLOU-protection for a man's suit costs only 8 cents per year.) BERLOU is guaranteed in writing for 5 years. Leading department, drug, and hardware stores sell BERLOU. Write for booklet, Dep't LHJ-3. BERLOU service available at leading laundries and dry-cleaners.

BERLOU MANUFACTURING COMPANY, Marion, Ohio. In Canada: THE BERLOU COMPANY LTD., London, Canada.

BERLOU Guaranteed MOTHPROOF

WILLETT Golden Beryl MAPLE

Livable Loveliness

is expressed in every piece of Golden Beryl Maple you choose for your new living room.

See it at your favorite store!

CONSIDER H. WILLETT, INC.
Louisville 11, Kentucky

Also makers of authentic reproductions in Wildwood Cherry

Here the contemporary manner in the outward appearance of the house expresses the freely planned interior; generous windows protected by wide overhangs, and complete absence of formalized symmetry.

EDWARD D. STONE ASSOCIATES, ARCHITECTS; HOUSE MODELS BY RAYMOND BARGER STUDIOS; SETTINGS AND PHOTOGRAPHS BY PR

TAKE YOUR CHOICE

Traditional and Modern—and how one basic scheme for living can make them sisters under the skin.

★ BY RICHARD PRATT

Architectural Editor of the Journal

CAMERON CLARK, ARCHIT

While surveys and opinion polls indicate a growing public acceptance of modern design, they also show that prospective home buyers who prefer the old familiar styles to the newer functional forms are still in the majority. But far more important than mere outward architectural styles as such is the degree of livability within the houses, which is largely a matter of planning. Here, for instance, the finely balanced beauty of Georgian Colonial proves it can provide to perfection the special requirements of a typical large modern American family which also finds pleasure in friendly period charm and flavor.

The floor plans of the modern version contain the same essential elements as the traditional design, provide the same basic living scheme. One lack of similarity: the layout simply is freer.

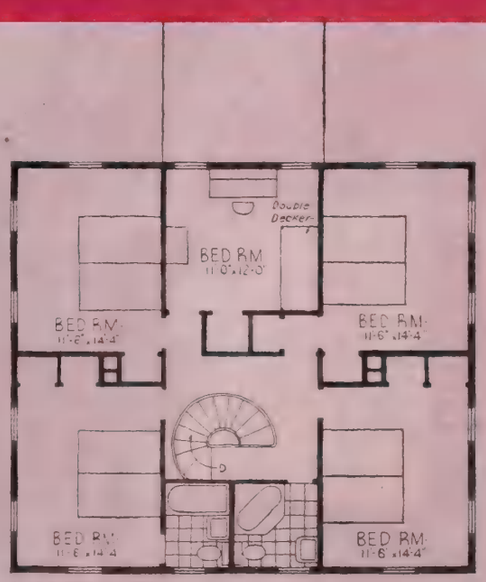
THIS is the story of a special design for living, and how it makes itself at home in two entirely different types of houses. It is worked out here in both cases with a good-sized family in mind—four to six children, even more—and a mother who wants an easily managed home without servants. There must be a big informal room that can take things as they come: dining, games, dancing and just plain getting together. But there must also be a quiet, small and nicely ordered sitting room, where the parents can be alone when they like, or entertain a few friends undisturbed. There must be commodious work space, laid out with convenience foremost in mind, and upstairs four or five bedrooms and two baths. It can't, of course, be a minimum house, but it must nevertheless be one that can be paid for and kept up on a moderate income.



Here then is a pattern for really pleasurable living which will appeal to innumerable families who have never had a house that, all within four walls, made work easy, entertaining simple and privacy possible. And while the figures show that more families would prefer to enjoy this living scheme in a house styled along traditional lines, many others are beginning now to want it modern. The beauty of the scheme is that it works both ways, as the two sets of floor plans on these two pages prove. As far as total space is concerned, the two houses are practically identical; the traditional house having a larger second floor, the contemporary house a larger first floor.

The former features, inside and out, all that architectural graciousness which goes with the best period design and planning: the molded cornice and delicate details of doorways and windows; the shutters which function in this case for shade and protection, besides dressing the outside walls of white-painted flush siding; the circular staircase, the wide bow windows, and the general air of dignity and balance toward which many people will always feel partial. Whereas the modern version derives its outward beauty from its sweeping horizontal lines, the wide overhangs that cast their shadows on the chalk-tinted brick below and the vertical log-siding panels above. While indoors the over-all light from continuous ceiling-height windows fills rooms whose layout is in striking contrast to the balanced arrangement of the traditional plan.

The choice between the two houses is a matter of taste and attitude, but it is interesting to observe in the pictures on the opposite page that the two designs, which have so much in common as far as living is concerned, are also good companions, side by side, in the same community.

Note how the rooms that fill a large family's need for spacious informality, for seclusion, too, and for plenty of sleeping quarters, are planned here in the best symmetrical traditional fashion.

Clara Dudley says:

"You can bring quiet luxury to your home for as little as 50¢ a foot!"

You can start by giving your home the restful quiet of soft, luxurious-feeling rugs, in colors more delightful than any you have ever imagined. The sheer enjoyment of knowing that they await you on every floor, from entrance hall to bedroom, is inspiring and satisfying. But the real thrill comes when you awaken to the fact that you can actually afford to have the beauty and distinction of Alexander Smith Rugs on every floor of your home!

Your entrance hall will give your family and friends a warm welcome. They'll almost purr at the soft hush of carpeted stairs. And never again will anyone in your home step out on a cold, bare bedroom floor. As to price, you'll congratulate yourself at having gotten so much for so little.

For Clara Dudley's free booklet "It's Fun to Do Over with Color" write Alexander Smith & Son's Carpet Company, Dept. A-1, 285 Fifth Avenue, New York 16, N. Y.

CARPET MAKES IT HOME

Mrs. B. H. Willingham
NASHVILLE, TENN.

"Clara Dudley certainly is right when she says that soft warm rugs in every room increase everyone's enjoyment of home.

"One thing I've been looking forward to is the luxurious elegance of some of the new designs in Alexander Smith Rugs. I am sure that none of us could make a more satisfying investment in home beauty."

THE STAR THAT FELL IN OHIO

(Continued from Page 21)

he and two other guys went to where they had met Ida Lupino. Johnny wrote us that they got "a big bang" out of it. Now since he had met Ida, I would have used her, only I was afraid she might have a husband or something, so I decided to use Gloria. And I was suddenly smiling happily to myself, thinking what a clever girl, I. That Twink Leonard! I loved me.

I hung around the house the next morning just waiting for Barbara to turn up, and sure enough around noon I saw her roadster wheeling around the corner. I jumped up from the porch swing, and by the time Barbara had pulled up to the curb I was batting a tennis ball against the wall.

"Twink!" she caroled, and her voice dripped honey like a Sunday-morning waffle.

I glanced carelessly over my shoulder. "Hi." I sauntered down the steps.

"Twink," she cooed again, "why don't you come over to the house this afternoon? I have several people coming from Cleveland, including a very cute ensign!"

I quivered inwardly, but I did not weaken. "Can't," I chewed. "I have a date to go dripping with a goon." Her blue eyes were fastened on mine like an X-ray glare, but I just gave her my dead-pan look, which mother says is a cross between a moron and a Kentucky mountaineer who is figgering to blow your brains out.

"Oh, that's too bad!" From her tone you'd have thought we'd been going steady for years. I was just thinking of saying "How's about offering me the speedboat?" when she apparently decided that I couldn't be had, and changed tactics. "You probably have been thinking awful thoughts of me, haven't you, Twink?" she purred.

"Huh?"

"You know that I couldn't help what happened last night, don't you?" The heck she couldn't. She was asking for it—and liking it.

"Huh?"

"Last night!" she said, raising her voice. "Last night out by the lighthouse!"

I gaped at her, then registered intelligence. "Oh, that," I said.

"You know that it doesn't have anything to do with my feelings for Johnny, don't you?"

"Sure," I said, and carefully chewed three times. "That's what Johnny says about his feelings for Gloria." I shrugged.

"Gloria? Gloria who?"

"Gloria Allen."

"Gloria Allen?" She stared at me incredulously. "You don't mean the famous Gloria Allen?"

"Sure," I replied. "They met in New York at a party on his last leave, and ——" I stopped. "Didn't he tell you about it?"

"No. He did not tell me about it!" She was all ablaze now. "Just what else did they do besides meet at a party?"

"Oh, they went to the Stork Club and El Morocco to dance, and they went swimming a lot. Johnny likes to swim, you know," I added with special glee because Barbara just sits around looking beautiful in a bathing suit.

"Oh! How nice!" She was simply fuming. "He didn't even mention her!"

I chewed my cud. "Are you going to tell him about Ransom?"

Honestly, I expected to see smoke pouring out of her at any moment like an incense burner.

"Of course if you did he might get mad and stop writing. You know Johnny," I said chummily. And then I added brightly, "Maybe that's why he didn't mention Gloria to you."

When she roared away a few minutes later I could have jumped for joy, because I knew Barbara. She wasn't going to let any Hollywood star get Johnny away from her. So I didn't worry about Ransom any more. But I did worry about that ensign that got from me. "Date with a goon." Hah. The goon in these parts worth leering at was kick Saunders, and that dope didn't brains enough to ask me for a date. He always hovered around in the backgr looking mournfully at me, but not doing thing about it. And he did the nicest dives from the lighthouse. And he had be ful long brown legs. And lots of blond Like an Airedale. I guessed I didn't have sex appeal.

It wasn't till later that I read in a n magazine that Gloria Allen was from ston. Now whoever heard of a movie sta ing from Lanston, Ohio? But she was way, and her father was a football c there. But that didn't alarm me, becau thought no Hollywood star would be ca dead in Lanston, Ohio. Hah. Little c know!

When Johnny came marching home a he didn't march—he just bounded in bright October day, and he looked sir dazzling in that gorgeous uniform with captain's bars, and all the wings and me and his cap rakishly tilted. I kept gibbe and bouncing around, and Dopey—t our dachshund—kept racing madly ar the room, yelping and barking, until mo who was laughing and crying, said that wished I'd stop barking so she could hear self think, while daddy stood there beam with such pride that you'd have thought just delivered sextuplets. And Johnny, ning that devilish way of his, and loo more handsome than Ray Milland, Gre Peck and Jimmy Ste rolled into one. Oh, it the most wonderful t that had ever happene the Leonards, hav Johnny come back h

That first night at ner Johnny kept sayin was going to sleep till r for six months, and golf and sail all the re the time. "And what about Barbar teased mother.

"That takes care of the evenings," Joh grinned.

"Is that the program for the rest of life?" asked daddy. "Or are you and Barb going to get married and settle down?"

"Now, Charles," protested mother, " just got back! He doesn't want to thin that yet."

"H'm-m," said daddy. "But maybe bara's been thinking of it. If she has" raised one eyebrow at Johnny—"you'd ter start thinking too. You can't live on pills I put out, you know."

"Charles!" said mother reproachfully

I was squirming a little bit. It didn't s to me that running around with Ran Watkins all the time was exactly thinkin getting married to Johnny, and I had a rible feeling that she was with him right t for when Johnny had called her home told him that she was in Cleveland for day, and here he was waiting to surprise I glanced at Johnny uneasily. He looke happy, and so sure of himself. He was brownest thing I ever saw, and he looked as though he'd been playing a of tennis instead of fighting a war. wasn't changed a bit. Or at least I thou he wasn't.

Johnny saw Barbara that night, an seemed to me that he started changing o night. I heard mother ask him next mor how Barbara was and the way he answe "Fine" had a sort of cellulose coverin protective you know, but you could through it. I saw mother glance at quickly, then ask lightly if Barbara changed any.

Johnny didn't answer right away. "Ev thing looks a little different to me right no he finally said. "Even the sailboat. It se to have shrunk."

(Continued on Page 226)

Remember to tell him how becoming his strand of gray hair is. Men dread the ravages of time quite as much as women.

—PAGE COOPER: All the Year 'Round. (Stackpole Sons).

On kitchen equipment or inner spring mattresses, furniture or carpenter's tools—on anything made with steel...

this label means the steel is good

MANUFACTURED FROM U·S·S STEEL UNITED STATES STEEL

The U·S·S Label helps you get your money's worth. When you see it on any article made with steel, you can be sure the steel in that product is quality steel—backed by all the engineering skill and manufacturing knowledge of the world's foremost steel maker.

Manufacturers of quality products who desire to identify their goods with the U·S·S Label may obtain full information on request. Address: United States Steel, P. O. Box 236, Pittsburgh, Pa.

EVERY SUNDAY EVENING... United States Steel presents The Theatre Guild on the Air. American Broadcasting Company, coast-to-coast network. Consult your newspaper for time and station.

UNITED STATES STEEL Subsidiary companies: AMERICAN BRIDGE COMPANY • AMERICAN STEEL & WIRE COMPANY CARNEGIE-ILLINOIS STEEL CORPORATION • COLUMBIA STEEL COMPANY • CYCLONE FENCE DIVISION • FEDERAL SHIPBUILDING & DRY DOCK COMPANY NATIONAL TUBE COMPANY • OIL WELL SUPPLY COMPANY • TENNESSEE COAL, IRON & RAILROAD COMPANY • UNITED STATES STEEL EXPORT COMPANY UNITED STATES STEEL PRODUCTS COMPANY • UNITED STATES STEEL SUPPLY COMPANY • UNIVERSAL ATLAS CEMENT COMPANY • VIRGINIA BRIDGE COMPANY

LIKE TO Embroider?

BUCILLA has inspirations galore!

Want to embroider a luncheon set, hostess ensemble or this cunning "Effie The Elephant" Nursery Ensemble? No matter what...depend on Bucilla for ideas galore. And depend on famous Bucilla quality for embroidery floss and everything in Art Needlework. At all good stores.

Bucilla GUARANTEED QUALITY

Other Famous Bucilla Products
Embroidery Flosses Decorative Linens
Knitting Yarns Crochet Cottons

Why not select a pattern for your stationery, just as for your silver and china? Choose Montag's Coronet, to project your personality before you write a line! Finest quality, extra 100% rag, with unique weave design. Open-stock, so you can buy matching envelopes and letter paper as you need them. Flemish blue, flesh pink, jungle orchid, pure white. Make Montag's Coronet your stationery pattern! MONTAG BROTHERS, INC., Atlanta 3, Ga., 230 Fifth Avenue, New York. Also makers of Montag's Sheerlite and London Crushed Bond.

The Pattern for your writing . . . Montag's

Coronet

WRITE FROM THE HEART

(Continued from Page 224)

"You've been away a long time, Johnny," mother replied gently. "And you've seen too many things."

"I guess that's it," Johnny replied easily.

I kept seeing Barbara with Ransom when Johnny was playing golf or sailing, and I wondered if he knew about it. Then one night Johnny came home in a black mood from Barbara's, and I heard him say something to mother about too many people being around all the time, and he was fed up with parties.

The next night we were sitting in the living room when mother said, "Johnny worries me. All of a sudden he's like a pricked balloon."

Daddy just chuckled, and remarked that when he took off that warrior's plumage he lost some of his cockiness, that was all.

Mother looked dubious. "Something's wrong. He acts peculiar."

"That's only natural," replied daddy. "He's been under terrific tension for a long time, and along with all the danger, there was a certain exhilaration. Now that it's all over there's bound to be a letdown. He's in for a sort of prolonged hang-over, that's all."

"I should think that being with Barbara would ——" Mother faltered. "Well, if they're in love ——"

"Perhaps," said daddy gently, "that has to go through a period of adjustment too. Give them a little time."

Mother put down her knitting. "You know they didn't become engaged until that leave of Johnny's last year, and it might have been due to the excitement of his coming home. And now that he's taken off his uniform, maybe he looks different to Barbara. She's always had everything, and I think that spoils a girl. Maybe Johnny as a glamorous hero was like a new toy. But now he's just one of the boys in town again."

"You're forgetting that Johnny has had a great deal of experience in the past few years. He's not a boy any more." Daddy's lips closed tightly. "You've got to let him work things out for himself, mother."

Just then the front door slammed, and Johnny sauntered into the living room. His eyes were very bright and he had a cynical little smile on his face. He was, to put it politely, lit.

"It's rather drunk out tonight," he announced cheerily.

Mother stared at him in shocked surprise. "Why, Johnny, I thought you and Barbara were at a party in Elyria!"

"That we were." He smiled amiably. "That we were. But I find the social activities of small smug towns rather boring. Miss Barbara Jennings doesn't. Miss Barbara Jennings and I had a slight disagreement about it. So Johnny hit the road to Cleveland, and he got a little drunk. He had a lovely time. Sorry, mother," he finished with a gallant bow.

"There's nothing to be sorry about," put in daddy, all genial like an Elks' Club. "Every man should get drunk now and then. I'd get drunk every night if I weren't a doctor."

"Charles!"

JOHNNY looked at daddy broodingly. "Swell guy," he muttered. "Stick up for the pride and joy of the family any time, won't you?"

"How about a nightcap?" asked daddy.

"Nope. Going to bed now." He turned and looked at me "You're a nice kid," he said solemnly; "not very bright, but nice." He stood there weaving slightly. "Too bad you have to grow up and become a woman!"

Mother sat up straight. "I'm a woman!" she said indignantly.

"You're no woman," replied Johnny. "You're my mother, and you're okay." He stopped at the door and turned. "It's funny. I didn't pass a single Zero on the way to Cleveland. Very dull. Very dull." He walked stiffly out and up the stairs.

We sat there like three stooges who had forgotten their lines.

"He'll get killed!" mother cried brokenly. "Drinking and racing off to Cleveland like that! You know how he drives!"

Daddy spoke rather sharply. "Mother, he's back from Cleveland, and back from the war, without any assistance from us. Let's try to act like parents instead of fussing hens!"

Mother meekly picked up her knitting again and daddy picked up his newspaper, but I don't think he was doing much reading, as it was upside down, so I decided to put on the radio too loud just to make them mad at me so they'd feel better about Johnny, which I did, and which they did, so that took care of things for the time being.

BUT when I got in bed I started thinking. Barbara lives in a vine-covered mansion with terraced lawns and stuff, and her family has all the money in town, as they own a big factory where most of the population of Cerulean work. She has really grown up here like a princess because she always had things that no one else had, including a groovy blue roadster when she was my age which made everyone simply drool with envy, and a speedboat in which she always managed to have some good-looking boy beside her. Barbara is very pretty, too, with dark hair and blue eyes and white skin—you know, Snow White-Hedy Lamarr stuff. And even though she always seemed rather snooty, that fitted into the picture because she had so much to be snooty about.

I think that she was always glamorous to Johnny, too, because he always danced with her at the yacht club, and went to parties up there, but he never hung around her much. Johnny's very independent, so he wouldn't worship at anyone's feet even if he had a great yen for her. Then he was away most of the time at Dartmouth, or being a lifeguard in the summer up at Put in Bay. Johnny's very athletic, and he was high-jump ski

(Continued on Page 228)

"Gee, reverend, I sure enjoyed the lacing you gave the grownups!"

OLSON RUGS

Beautiful NEW RUGS from OLD!

FREE This Valuable
BIG RUG CATALOGUE
In Full Colors—26 Model Rooms
—see all the other lovely colors and designs —decorating helps. Mail coupon below or 1c postcard.

Every Rug REVERSIBLE for Extra Wear and Luxury

FACTORY TO YOU

Learn How Your OLD RUGS, CLOTHING Can Save up to ½!

SIZES for All Needs

Lovely Coral Rose Tweed Blend

New Delft Blue

Catalogue shows Early American, Oriental and 18th Century designs, modern tone-on-tone Leaf and Texture effects — rich, new Solid shades—ovals—practical Two-Tone and Tweedy blends in the subtle new "twist texture weave" that disguises footmarks.

It's All So Easy! Write today for the Free Olson Catalogue that tells how—

Your Materials are picked up at Our Expense at your door by Express or Freight and shipped direct to the Olson Factory—

How, by the Famous Olson Process, we shred, sterilize, sort, merge and reclaim the good usable wool and other valuable materials in old carpets, rugs, clothing, blankets of all kinds; then steam, picker, card, comb, bleach, spin, redye and—

Weave New Broadloom Rugs —luxurious, colorful, deep-textured Olson Rugs that are Seamless and Reversible for longer wear and greater luxury in Sizes for All Needs up to 16 feet wide, seamless, by any length.

Look Ahead. Save old material of all kinds and colors, no matter how badly worn. They are even more valuable to you today than ever before.

Over 2 Million Customers. Read praise from editors, radio experts, women everywhere.

Our 72nd Year. We guarantee to please, or pay for your materials. Only from the Olson Factory can you get genuine Olson Rugs. Write today for big, free Olson Rug Book that tells how to have lovelier broadloom rugs this easy way. It's fascinating! Try it!

We do not have agents or sell thru stores.

OLSON RUG CO. Chicago, New York San Francisco

Largest Makers of Rugs Dealing Direct with the Home.

TEAR OUT—MAIL TODAY!

or Send 1c Postcard for FREE BOOK to OLSON RUG CO., Dept. R-16

"Olson Park," Chicago, Ill.

Gentlemen: Mail your big, money-saving Book of Rugs and model rooms in colors FREE to:

Name _____

Address _____ State _____

Town _____

COPYRIGHT, 1941, OLSON RUG CO.

(Continued from Page 226)

champion at Dartmouth, and around here he won every swimming and diving prize there was to win.

Well. After that night when Johnny came marching in with a load on, things went on for a few days with nothing sensational happening, only it was obvious that Johnny had something on his mind. He wasn't like Johnny, always so gay and high-spirited. He was gay, but in a sort of forced chin-up-old-thing way. It made me uneasy. Maybe Johnny was more war-torn than he seemed to be, and if he got too drunk some night—well, I wouldn't want him to shoot Ransom Watkins or anything like that. Maybe somebody should shoot him, but I'd rather somebody else did it. I decided I'd better do a little spying.

But something happened which made it necessary for me to call all my powers of concentration into action. I was down at the post office, and I swung around and ran right into someone.

"Ooof!" I said. Then I saw that it was Barbara. "Oh," I apologized nervously, "I'm sorry, Barbara!"

She drew back and gave me a frosty smile. "Hello, Twink. Where's Johnny?" There was a dangerous gleam in her eye which warned me.

"I don't know. Isn't he with you?"

Barbara's blue eyes turned as green and cold as a mint julep. "No, he isn't with me," she replied icily. "He's probably in Lanston."

"Lan-s-ston?" I said feebly.

"Oh, don't go all big-eyed, Twink. You know what I'm talking about, and so did Johnny when he refused the invitation to my dinner party tomorrow night."

"W-why did he refuse the invitation to your dinner party?"

She smiled poisonously. "Well, of course it wouldn't have anything to do with the fact that Gloria Allen is in Lanston, would it?"

"Gloria Allen?"

"Oh, really, Twink!" snapped Barbara. "You're impossible. Of course you don't know that she's visiting her family, in Lanston, and is coming over here tomorrow night to do some exhibition swimming at the benefit?"

I just stood there blinking. "No, I d-didn't kn-know. Honestly, I didn't, B-barbara."

She laughed nastily. "And it wasn't you, Barbara, who told me all about Johnny and Gloria last summer, was it? Or was that two other people?" She gave me a withering down-the-nose glare. "What an actress you are! You should do Hamlet!" And she whiffed off while I stood there sagging like a paper bag filled with water.

Oh, golly, I thought. Oh, great galloping gophers! Hollywood stars don't go around dropping in on people like the stork—do they? But it seems that they did. They were even inconsiderate enough to have parents in Lanston, Ohio, and to come barging into my life, ten miles away. And Johnny's. I didn't know what to do.

I crept home and tried to sound casual as I asked mother why on earth Gloria Allen was going to appear at the benefit. Mother was darning socks, and she didn't even look up.

"She used to teach swimming at the orphanage," mother replied, "so naturally she'd do that to help them." She bit off a thread. "A very nice gesture," she added.

"Yeh," I said unenthusiastically. It was nice, all right. It was just ducky.

"You're going with us, aren't you?"

"I guess so," I replied in a drab tone. I wandered off to the porch.

The benefit is quite a shindig, with carnival booths, and all kinds of chance thingamabobs, and prizes. The children give a play and a swimming exhibition, and there's a big formal dance in the gym where all Cerulean turns out with an orchid in its hair. The orphanage is endowed, but once a year they have this big benefit to raise money, and it's Something. It looked as though it was going to be even more than that this time, so far as I was concerned. And Johnny too.

At dinner before the benefit I couldn't finish my chocolate pudding, and Johnny was

WARTIME LESSON

Hoover peacetime service continued on a 48-hour basis during the war. That built new respect and friendship for the Hoover Cleaner. Before buying any appliance, ask yourself if it has an honest service behind it.

New features, new beauty faster and easier cleaning

THE New Hoover 27

THE HOOVER

REG. U. S. PAT. OFF.

IT BEATS · AS IT SWEEPS · AS IT CLEANS

THE HOOVER COMPANY, NORTH CANTON, OHIO
HAMILTON, ONTARIO, CANADA

In addition to winning the Army Navy "E" five times, Hoover has received a special Navy "E" flag with three stars, awarded exclusively to those who share in the successful development and production of the VT fuze, famous secret weapon of the war.

FASTIDIOUS HOMES

BANISH TOILET ODORS with VANISH

- Cleans quickly
- Removes a major source of toilet odors
- Leaves fresh minty aroma

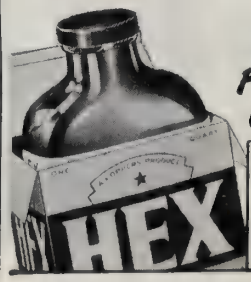
Used as directed

- Bleaches porcelain
- Harmless to septic tanks

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

ON SALE AT YOUR GROCERS

JUDSON DUNAWAY CORPORATION, Dover, N. H.
[formerly Expello Corporation]



*PROVEN PROTECTION against moths with new, lasting HEX!

THOROUGH! Hex liquid mothproofing penetrates right into every wool fiber. Scientific tests prove that moths absolutely will not harm fabrics treated with Hex!*

QUICK! Just one quick and easy spraying of Hex on woolens gives them lasting, proven moth-protection. No unpleasant odor! No wrapping or storing away necessary!

A KOPPERS PRODUCT

HEX PUTS THE HEX ON MOTHS!

BUY HEX AT VARIETY, HARDWARE, DRUG OR DEPARTMENT STORES in a black mood, and I kept hoping he'd go to Cleveland or somewhere.

"Johnny," said mother brightly, "are you going to the benefit with us?"

"Good grief, no," replied Johnny. "What a grim idea!"

"I thought you might go with Twink," said mother, smiling fondly. "She hates being seen in public without a man." She chuckled and daddy chortled. My own parents too!

I must have looked pathetic or something because Johnny looked at me a moment, and said, "Okay. I'll drag along. I'll put on my tails and give the natives a treat."

I might as well put on a pair of horns, I thought miserably. Oh, this was awful.

Even putting on an evening dress didn't lift my spirits. Even Johnny's whistle at the sight of me didn't bring me to life.

"Hey!" he exclaimed. "It's a woman. Pretty too!" he grinned.

"Too bad she isn't bright, isn't it?" murmured mother.

"Oh, blub," I said, my voice in my shoes.

Of course we ran right into Barbara on the midway. She was luscious in black velvet cut down to here, and long earrings. She had her Upper Set crowd with her, and when she saw Johnny she immediately laughed gaily up at Ransom. Then she pretended to just discover Johnny, and she registered surprise.

"Hello, Johnny!" she called gaily.

"Good evening," Johnny replied coolly.

There was a bit of polite chitchat, with the others watching Johnny and Barbara curiously.

As we pushed off, Johnny said, "See you all later."

Barbara gave him a Look. "Certainly. At the swimming pool, no doubt." She smiled nastily and turned to Ransom.

Johnny glowered at her back. "That had the earmarks of a crack," he said, "but I don't get it." He shrugged indifferently. "Oh, women," he muttered. "Women!"

By this time I was simply frozen with fear. When Barbara discovered that Johnny didn't even know Gloria, she'd just throw Johnny over completely for Ransom. I had to do something.

I was in such a state that I hardly saw anything. I vaguely felt all the excitement at the swimming pool. I heard the music playing and I saw the colored lights through a dense fog in my mind. I heard the fanfare for Gloria, and the terrific applause, and I have a vague memory of her stepping out onto the springboard looking like a goddess in a white bathing suit, with her golden hair in a braided coronet which looked like a crown. She was tall and built like a million dollars and her skin was the warmest, sort of deep gold. She was, in short, the best-looking thing I ever saw in my life. And when she soared into space in a breath-taking swan dive, the audience gave one big gasp, then burst into tumultuous applause. She wowed them, she knocked them right out of their seats.

A man should choose a friend better than himself; if only like himself, he had better have none. There are plenty of acquaintances in the world, but very few real friends. —CHINESE PROVERB

And she knocked Johnny cold too. "Um-m-m-m!" he said, and then he softly murmured, "Hubba, hubba, hubba!" And there was my brother turning into a wolf before my eyes. My very own brother.

I suppose that gleam in his eye made me decide to do something desperate—and I did it. After the exhibition I told Johnny I'd meet him upstairs, and I hotfooted it for the shower where I knew Gloria would be. I could hear the water splashing, so I waited outside, and finally when she came out I popped out of the shadows, making her jump back in fright. She was wrapped in a white robe as soft and fluffy as a snowdrift.

"H-hello," I peeped like a baby chicken. My voice had little knitted bootees on it.

(Continued on Page 231)

They say I'm a vamp

• None of this one-man dog stuff for me . . . I'm everybody's darling!

My secret is personality PLUS sparkling eyes and shining coat, and plenty of energy. The folks make sure that I keep in the pink by giving me Sergeant's Vitamin Capsules (Vitapets) every day . . . they're made especially for dogs with vitamins A, $B_{12}$, D, G and Niacin. They help guard a dog against diet deficiency diseases.

You'll find Vitapets with other Sergeant's products, at your nearest drug or pet store.

Do you have a copy of the new Sergeant's Dog Book? It's full of good ideas on dog training and care—and it's FREE. Get it at any drug or pet store, or write Sergeant's, Richmond 20, Va.

Sergeant's
VITAMIN CAPSULES

I get vim from vitamins Brenda

"There must be a better way to kill Bedbugs!"

Madam, there is! It's easy, it's efficient, it's sure . . . and fast! It's Peterman Discovery, otherwise known as sudden death to bedbugs! Comes two ways—with or without DDT. Non-staining—just use as directed. Brush along baseboards, on beds. One use will prove why Peterman is America's favorite bedbug killer.

PETERMAN
DISCOVERY

LIN-X Self-Polishing WAX
IS ANTI-SLIP EVEN WHEN WET

HERE'S the wax you've been waiting for, ladies . . . LIN-X Self-Polishing WAX—it's anti-slip, even when water is spilled on it—proved by Underwriters' Laboratories!

And all you do is just wipe it on! It dries in 20 minutes to a hard, lustrous, real-wax finish that's a joy to behold. It protects and it beautifies. Your home is brighter—your work is lighter with Lin-x Self-Polishing Wax.

Get some today at your dealer's.

Only 59¢ PT. 98¢ QT.

LIN-X CREAM POLISH

Polishes Bone-Dry!

So easy to use. Cleans as it polishes. Lin-x Cream Polish restores beauty to fine furniture without tiresome rubbing. It's non-oily—resists finger marks—polishes to a hard, waxy, gleaming surface. The modern easy way to protect and beautify your furniture.

Only 69¢ a pint

LIN-X CLEAR-GLOSS

Resists Boiling Water!

For linoleum and all wood surfaces. Resists boiling water, sizzling grease, fruit juices, perfume, even alcohol. Gives a sparkling luster that wears and wears. Flows on smooth. Easy to use. Easy to clean. "Just brush it on!"

Only 95¢ a pint $1.70 a quart

GET THESE GREAT Lin-x
HOME BRIGHTENERS TODAY!
Made by the Makers of Kem-Tone

Gibson BRINGS YOU THE Freez'r Locker

FREEZ'R SHELF REFRIGERATORS • KOOKALL ELECTRIC RANGES

GIBSON Kookall ELECTRIC RANGE

The "dream" stove! Automatic—set it—forget it. Cooks with stored-up heat, saves on current costs. Waist-high broiler—banquet-size oven. Plus UPS-A-DAISY, today's secret—tomorrow's sensation!

NEW HOME FREEZER

Upright design—downright convenience . . . No more diving for stored foods . . . Wall-to-wall, glass-door shelves keep everything in clear view—easy reach . . . Direct contact freezes faster—keeps foods longer—better—at less cost.

Spaciousness has long been a Gibson feature! This is more apparent than ever in the Freez'r Locker—that big, roomy compartment for frozen foods—which stretches clear across the new Gibson refrigerator . . . from wall to wall, without any obstructions!

In this convenient Freez'r Locker, built right into the Gibson, you can store large quantities of frozen foods—and retain their delicious, farm-fresh flavor and goodness!

For health-protecting refrigeration at its best—watch for, wait for the new Gibson . . . and the Freez'r Locker!

SEE YOUR GIBSON DEALER

GIBSON REFRIGERATOR COMPANY
GREENVILLE, MICHIGAN

Export Department, 201 N. Wells St., Chicago, Ill. • Canadian Distributor, Rogers Majestic, Ltd., Toronto

(Continued from Page 229)

Her eyebrows rose to an amused peak, and she smiled. Oh, beautiful. Her eyes sparkled like sunshine on Lake Erie. "Why, hello," she said. "Do you always make such sudden appearances?" She was laughing a little bit and that was nice too.

"I'm sorry," I stammered. "I didn't mean to frighten you, but I had to see you." Then I couldn't go on. I just stood there like a country bumpkin staring at a queen.

She smiled again. "What is it?" she asked. She glanced at my hands, and I realized she thought I was an autograph hound.

"Oh, no," I quickly said. "I'm not a bobby soxer—well, I am, I guess," I floundered, "but it isn't that. It's my brother."

"Your brother?" She looked faintly alarmed.

"Yes. He was a flier in China, and he has lots of medals, but his girl kept forgetting him, and I had to remind her, and—and ——" Then I blurted it out. "I told her you were his other girl!"

"What?"

I was practically wringing my hands. "Oh, I know it was awful of me, Miss Allen. Please forgive me!" I pleaded. "But I never dreamed you'd come here. But you did, and they're both here, too, and she'll never be jealous now, and—oh, I could die!"

She was staring at me as though I were a lunatic—which I am, of course. "Oh, dear!" she said. "Oh, dear!" Then she reached out and firmly took my hand. "You come with me," she said, "and tell me all about it while I'm brushing my hair. Come on now," and she led me into the dressing room.

They say that all divers have a perfect sense of timing, and that must be why Gloria chose the exact moment to make her appearance when we were standing only about ten feet from Barbara and her mob. Everybody was staring at Gloria; and no wonder, as she was like a Greek goddess in flowing white that was all draped and pleated with a wide gold belt, and her hair was piled on top of her head, and she was magnificent. She walked right up to Johnny, put her arms around his neck and kissed him. I closed my eyes and prayed wildly that he wouldn't drop dead. "Hello, Johnny," I heard her murmur in a most caressing manner. I opened my eyes again. Gloria had slipped her arm through Johnny's, and darned if he wasn't looking down at her with a slow smile on his lips and a look in his eyes that made me blink. I guess a man who has downed a string of Zeros can meet any situation. They started for the dance floor, and Gloria gave me a sidewise glance. "How'm I doing?" she asked, and winked.

I HEARD Johnny saying, "I don't know what this is all about, but I like it fine!" Then I saw Barbara staring after them with murder in her eye, and I quickly dove for the punch bowl. Golly!

After Gloria and Johnny had danced together so much that everyone was whispering excitedly about it, and Barbara was beginning to look as though rigor mortis were setting in, I decided that the moment had come for the happy ending. I edged over to the corner where they were standing, completely absorbed in each other.

"You were wonderful, Miss Allen!" I breathed. "Just wonderful!" They didn't even hear me! "Hey!" I said.

They both turned to look at me, but the expressions on their faces startled me.

"Hey," I said plaintively, "don't you think you're sort of overdoing this?"

They looked at each other and smiled.

"Johnny!" I said. "Don't you think you ought to dance with Barbara now?"

"Uh-uh," he replied over his shoulder. "I'm busy."

This was carrying things too far! Johnny was falling like a ton of bricks, and he'd only get his heart broken twice instead of once.

"Miss Allen," I said desperately, "please don't make him fall for you. He's just rebounding all over the place!"

Johnny swung around. "Rebound my foot! I've known ever since I got home that Barbara's not the girl for me. She's a spoiled, superficial little girl with too much money, and she's not in love with anyone but herself. So don't worry about her or me."

"B-but—you can't fall in love with Miss Allen! She's a movie star!"

She turned a radiant smile upon me. "Don't you think that movie stars fall in love too?" she asked gently.

"But you don't even know each other!"

SHE smiled again. "That's what you think. He taught me how to dive at Put-in Bay several years ago. He didn't remember me, but I remembered him. I had an awful crush on him." She looked up at him. "And it all comes back to me now."

"Twink"—Johnny gave me a deep look—"isn't someone calling you?"

Well, I guess I know when I'm not wanted. I turned and walked away, thinking I'd certainly gone to a lot of trouble for nothing. I went outside to cool off, and as I came around the corner of the building I ran smack into Barbara and Ransom, and I stopped dead in my tracks as I heard Ransom telling Barbara in no uncertain terms that she could make up her mind now or never, that he didn't mind being led on a string with Johnny in China, but now —— He looked up and saw me standing there.

"Good Godfrey!" he exploded. "There she is again!" He took Barbara by the elbows. "Wait right here," he said in a commanding tone. "I'll be right back." I heard Barbara say, "Yes, Ransom," very meekly as he took me by the arm and led me back around the corner of the building. "Listen," he said, "will you please stop this popping out of walls, and cracks in rocks? Are you following me?"

"No," I replied. "Certainly not!"

"Well, if you are," he replied coldly, "it might be better if you wait till you get a bit older. Then I'll consider you." He looked me up and down. "You're pretty. You've got possibilities. I'll think it over."

My mouth fell open and I spluttered helplessly. "Why, you w-wolf!" I yelped, and I stood there just shaking with anger as he smiled and turned on his heel. I turned on mine, too, and ran right into Sidekick. He looked very mad, and his blond hair had fallen over one eyebrow.

"What's he doing to you?" he demanded.

I looked up at him in surprise, then I started giggling. "Come out from behind that bush. I'd know you anywhere."

He looked down at me very sternly. "Were you leading him on?" he asked suspiciously.

"Can I help it," I asked innocently, "if men can't leave me alone?"

He just looked at me in a way that made me wriggle inside. "Do you want to dance?"

"Is that a threat—or an invitation?" I asked sweetly.

"Don't lead me on," he said roughly, "don't lead me on!" And he dragged me toward the door just like a cave man in a leopard skin. Just like a man.

So you see, that's how it happened that Johnny went to Hollywood, and got in the picture with Gloria about Sun Valley where he teaches her to ski, and she teaches him to swim, and daddy says that he's just cocky enough to hold his own in Hollywood, even if he is Mr. Gloria Allen now. And Ransom is Mr. Barbara Jennings, and on her the trousers don't look good either, but he still leers and sneers at me when we meet, which is just dandy because it keeps Sidekick following me around to protect me from older wolves, and mother says will I ever learn to mind my own business, and I don't think that I ever will now because look what's happened because I didn't! Would you?

Would you rise in the world? You must work while others amuse themselves. Are you desirous of a reputation for courage? You must risk your life. Would you be strong morally and physically? You must resist temptation. All this is paying in advance. Observe the other side of the picture: the bad things are paid for afterwards.

—SAVONAROLA.

Pabst-ett's cheddar cheese flavor will please 'em all!

Mealtime worries fade into thin air when you have delicious Pabst-ett on hand. It's a cheese food of 100 uses—spreads, melts, slices, toasts to perfection. Enjoy Pabst-ett's tempting, golden cheddar cheese flavor in sandwiches, rich tasty sauces and cooked dishes. Highly nourishing . . . easily digested. Get Pabst-ett today—it'll be your pantry pal. Phenix Pabst-ett Company, Chicago.

OTHER PHENIX PRODUCTS
Phenix Bouillon Cubes
Phenix Processed Cheeses
Phenix Cream Spreads (7 varieties)

PABST-ETT—the delicious cheddar cheese food!

FOR HER BIRTHDAY
Give a Canary
"The Singing Pet"

■ So perky, lively and cheerful, a canary will find a warm place in the heart of any boy or girl. These little songsters are perfect gifts . . . living gifts that keep on giving joy and companionship to brighten the home. So for her birthday, present her with a canary, "The Only Pet That Sings!"

LARGEST SELLING BIRD SEED IN U. S.

KILLS ROACHES
WATERBUGS • SILVERFISH • CRICKETS

Insects eat the bait in the protective tube and die. Sanitary—can't be blown or tracked on food, etc. Clean—can be used on shelves, in drawers, anywhere. Long lasting service. Sold by most stores. If yours has none send $1 for 3 pkgs. postpaid. Money back guarantee. Over 20,000,000 sold. DeSoto Chemical Co., 3 Rose St., Arcadia, Fla.

EXTRA MONEY EASILY EARNED

SHOW FRIENDS EXCLUSIVE GREETING CARD ASSORTMENTS

Up to 100% profit for you. Request new 1946 exclusive 14 card All Occasion $1.00 assortment on approval. Many other year 'round money makers—Birthdays, Gift Wrappings, Social Notes. Write today for box on approval and new selling plan.

FREE SAMPLE PERSONALIZED STATIONERY

THOMAS TERRY STUDIOS, 89 Union Ave., Westfield, Mass.

A•1 SAUCE

ONE Sauce for ALL!

Not just for meat. Not just for fish. Not just for fowl, beans, salads and egg dishes. It's A•1 for all!

Ask for it when dining out. Keep it on the table at home.

G. F. Heublein & Bro., Inc., Hartford 1, Conn.

The DASH that makes the DISH

JOLLY TIME The NATION'S FAVORITE POP CORN

Tasty—Tender—Hulless. Sure to Pop. Get it at your Grocer's.

Easter and calla lilies, daffodils, tulips and amaryllis can preview the fragrance and color of spring by a couple of months.

A Way to Hasten Spring

WHEN the last weeks of winter are wearing out their stay and the first weeks of spring creep in a little dismally, the question is what to do with the days which linger in that long hallway between seasons, and the answer is in the photograph above. If you have the time, the place and the knack, any plant in the picture could be raised right at home: callas and amaryllis quite easily; the others, less simple to bring along under ordinary household conditions. But from now on till spring you should be able to get them at almost any greenhouse or flower shop, if someone doesn't get there first and send them to you. There is even a knack in buying them, to make them last longer, and that is to pick them out in bud, instead of in full bloom. This way you have the satisfaction of watching them open under your own personal care, on which also depends the length of time they stay in flower. It goes for practically every kind of potted flowering plant that it will bloom better and last longer if it is kept in a sunlit window where strong sunlight can be shaded. Too much brightness shortens its blooming time, and in the case of tulips makes them open wider than is becoming to a flower whose petals should form a cuplike shape. Next to controlling the light it is important to control the atmosphere and temperature. These plants, like people, do better in rooms where there is moisture in the air, and comfortable warmth below seventy. Under those conditions they dry out slowly and should be watered discreetly, just enough to keep the pot soil slightly damp. In other words, with a little foresight and care, the flowers that bloom in the house before spring will last for weeks instead of days. And after they have finished, you can get still other seasons of bloom out of them if you want to take the trouble. Tulips, daffodils and Easter lilies can be taken from their pots in May and planted outside where they'll bloom the following spring, while the callas and amaryllis, when they've ripened, and after they've been given a dry rest on their sides, will be ready to start all over again.

★ BY RICHARD PRATT ★

NEW BEAUTY FOR YOUR HOME...

A little extra GLASS means a lot of extra charm!

FORGOTTEN CIGARETTE? Relax! It can't mar your furniture when fashionable Plate Glass furniture tops* are on the job. These tops are burn-proof, stain-proof, damp-proof.

TO FACE THE WORLD looking your best, rely on a Plate Glass door mirror.* Every home needs several. Be sure they're big enough ...at least 5½ feet high for the average door.

YOU CAN'T BEAT a framed mirror* when it comes to supplying the little extra touch of character and beauty a prized piece of furniture often needs to set it off just right.

IT'S EASY TO BE YOUR OWN HOME DECORATOR if you know the modern magic of mirrors. A Plate Glass mirror* over your living room mantel, for instance, comes under the heading of "always beautiful and in good taste." It adds charm and warmth by its colorful reflections. Creates the illusion of greater spaciousness.

FOR YOUR NEW HOME
Consider these built-in beauties!

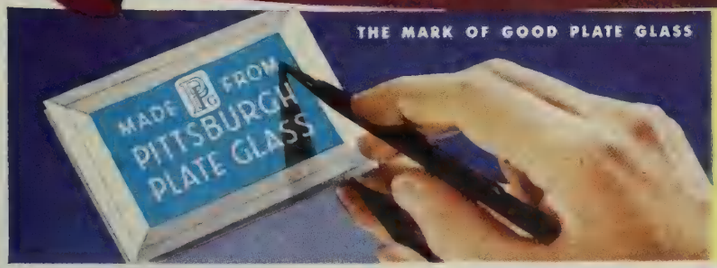
A KITCHEN walled with colorful, easy-to-keep-spotless Carrara Glass. Stays smart and lovely year after year. 10 appealing shades to choose from in selecting your color scheme!

PLENTY OF LIGHT where you need it and "keep out" to prying eyes . . . that's what you get with PC Glass Blocks over your kitchen work surfaces. Good looking, new, practical.



LOVELY SETTING for a sofa: handsome, ceiling-high, built-in mirrors of Pittsburgh Plate Glass. In blue, green, flesh or regular color. With silver, gold or gunmetal backing.

You can get these items at your favorite department or furniture store.

PITTSBURGH PLATE GLASS COMPANY

Free Booklet

Scores of practical suggestions for beautifying your present home . . . for building greater beauty and usefulness into your new home . . . with mirrors and Plate Glass. Send the coupon for your free copy. Crammed with ideas. Dozens of full-color illustrations.

Pittsburgh Plate Glass Company
2033-6 Grant Building, Pittsburgh 19, Pa.

Please send me, without obligation, your new, free booklet entitled "Making Your Home More Attractive with Pittsburgh Glass."

Name_____

Address_____

City_____ State_____

"PITTSBURGH" stands for Quality Glass and Paint

Use Powder-ene each week or so where shoes track in dirt you can clean small areas without cleaning entire rug

THE THREE LITTLE WOMEN
OUR TRADE-MARK SINCE 1941

● Every week or so, Powder-ene the parts of your rugs which are soiled quickest —at the front door, in front and rear halls, at the fireplace, at the kitchen entrance to dining room, around dining table. Keep your floor coverings looking bright and new this easy, no-suds way.

Just sprinkle Powder-ene Rug Cleaner on the surface. Brush it into the pile. Let it stand an hour or longer. Then use your vacuum cleaner. Do this in addition to usual rug care and you'll be proud of the clean beauty of your rugs.

● Use Powder-ene on any rug or carpet. This waterless cleaner cannot harm them. It does not cause shrinking, mildew, matting, fading, nor removal of twist. It never leaves rings. Get Powder-ene in bright blue, shaker-top cans at department, furniture, hardware and other stores—right away!

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

Patents 2,344,268 and 2,344,247

VON SCHRADER MANUFACTURING COMPANY • RACINE • WISCONSIN • U•S•A•

Esmé gives the china her personal attention—this routine is a gentle hint that any saucer is the better for cream.

Diary of Domesticity

By Gladys Taber

THE wind has been roaring today, and patches of dark earth show between the snow levels. When I went out to the kennel, I could feel what flying must be like. One could lean against the wind and ride up and out across the hills.

Where would I go on the March wind? I thought. Over the silver hills of the moon to an enchanted land, lovely and lost, a world of faerie.

I could see it, at the wind's end, a pale silvery valley with a white jade river flowing gently through it. The trees are tall and their leaves are the color of moonstone. The air smells like the first apple blossoms in spring, and the pale silvery grass is deep with starry blue flowers. Here lives my unicorn with his ivory hoofs and silver horn. The pale light glows in his dark eyes. When he paws the flowery turf, there is a sound like silver from the striking hoofs. He eats only the blue flowers. The people in the enchanted valley walk softly and speak in pleasant voices. They have never heard of war and they do not know how to hate. They are always kind to one another, they are full of loving-kindness, and this is a more wonderful thing than even my unicorn.

Yes, I thought, opening the kennel gate, someday I shall go to the lost lovely valley and walk by the river of white jade in the country of loving-kindness.

And the March wind tore the kennel gate from my hands and out came ten cockers. They brought me back to New England with a bounce!

They come out always expressing their separate individualities. Hildegarde and Melody hit me like small violent bombs and explode happily in my arms. Wild licking and wagging and squirming and whoofing, as if they never could bear being so ecstatic. Too small a cocker is to carry so much love. Silver and Snow give a couple of affectionate leaps in passing and then whirl away like blowing gold and dark leaves. Snow, the silly, runs around and around the lawn in frantic circles, faster and faster and faster, like a pin wheel.

Silver flashes to the front gate to see if there isn't somebody coming that she can bark at and tell off in no uncertain terms. Silver is still antisocial. And maybe she can find Shep, the German police dog belonging to George across the road. Then she can jump up and down and carry on like a soapbox orator. What she thinks of police dogs! Shep is very polite and always rambles over to cock a thoughtful listening ear on the other side of the picket fence. Sometimes he smiles.

Clover greets me and tears back to the swamp side of the house where the big rabbit lives. Who knows—he might just happen to be inside and ready for fun.

But Sister is the sweet one. She always runs back to me three times and jumps against me and says thank you. No matter how tempting the prospect is outside, Sister comes back just to be sure I know she is grateful for me. Now that Sister is getting older, I often seem to get a curious lump in my throat when she does this. Her eager lifted face looks up at me so earnestly, so bright with love.

Saxon's idea is to see if he can beat the draw and reach the door to the house before I do and come on in to look over the cuisine for the day. He is so big and golden and masculine and his expression is so ingenuous that everyone laughs when looking at him. He is one cocker that enjoys being laughed at. He feels pleased and bangs his tail frantically against the stove, plumps his large rear right by my feet and says, "Let me try a little of that roast, please, just to see if it's done."

Honey is aloof. She sits on the terrace, looking thoughtfully down the road, and the March wind ruffles her hair. She has the heaviest gold coat and her petticoats are very thick. Her ears blow a little in the wind, but are too heavy to stand out. Melody and Hildegarde run by with their ears standing straight out in the air. They look like airplanes as they skim along.

Esmé does not care for wind, or damp earth either. She stays in the sunniest window, looking out and keeping her fur dry. Summer nights are for Esmé and Tigger, when it is hot and still and they can go wild in the moonlight.

NO IFS ANDS OR BUTS

A clean toilet bowl has no odor. When you use SANI-FLUSH you know the bowl is clean. Stains and invisible film that foster germ growth are removed by the chemical disinfecting action of this wonderful cleaner.

SANI-FLUSH saves disagreeable, messy scrubbing. Just sprinkle it in the toilet bowl—that's all. It's safe in septic tanks, effective in hard and soft water. Two handy sizes sold everywhere.

Sani-Flush

QUICK EASY SANITARY

SAFE FOR SEPTIC TANKS

Sani-Flush won't harm your septic tank. This has been proved by a nationally-prominent research laboratory. Your copy of its scientific report is free. Write for it. Address The Hygienic Products Co., Dept. 101, Canton 2, Ohio.

Esmé catches a mouse now and then. It is always a very small, very special mouse. She seems to feel a little doubtful about the propriety of a Royal Siamese engaging in mousing. She reminds me of Marie Antoinette milking a cow in her imitation rustic village on the grounds at Versailles. But when she brings her mouse in, she comes in with long beautiful leaps in the air. She rises completely above the law of gravity, and the mouse rises with her!

A cat has so much imagination. A cat invents a whole drama around a mouse; a cat is, by and large, sophisticated and complex, and capable of creating three-act plays around any single piece of action. Also, at least our cats have a drive that the cockers lack. You can talk a cocker out of something, but not a cat. Esmé and Tigger both feel confident they are always right, and the best thing for their humans to do is fall in line with them and not waste energy trying to reason.

Many people think cats are completely independent, and lack affection. This is not true. You have to understand a cat, that is all. When I go away from Stillmeadow, Honey follows mournfully to the last inch and tells me how she probably won't live until I get back. Esmé just appears on the fence, looking at me coldly and scornfully with her sapphire eyes. Nothing to her, she indicates. But if I don't get back when I should, she runs away. And the instant I set foot on the place again, there she is, walking disdainfully behind me and cursing fluently in Siamese. Honey will be roller-skating all around me, and Esmé stalking along, and whoever thinks that Esmé didn't miss me just as much as Honey has never had a cat.

The difference is simply in the way of showing feeling. A cocker will kiss your hand

The world moves and man moves, and the stars of thought cannot be nailed to the sky. —THE CRAYON frantically and rush to your arms. A cat will move in nonchalantly and rub a chin on you, then seize your hand and bite it firmly and, if really touched, knead you with very briery claws.

In short, a complete household needs both. I think a minimum of two dogs and two cats is about right.

There is a moment in March when I really know spring is coming. I can't wait to get the storm windows off. Our windows have all been numbered again this season. But that means nothing. They are stuck all over with little numbers from past efforts to organize them, and they have writing on them, too, such as "window over outside radiator." . . . "Kitchen window No. LLL." . . . "G's bedroom—6 or 9." But next fall when they go on again, they will all be wrong. We shall be running around and around the house getting them up by trial and error.

It is time to clean the garden up. If spring is early, the first rhubarb will poke through, a dark-emerald lustrous cone ready to unfold in a lovely leaf. Rhubarb is one of the most beautiful plants in the world. The richness of the green and the shape of the leaves and the clear ruby color of the stems are all lovely to look at. And when it flowers in ivory masses, the spikes are like corsages for Titans. Not that Titans probably went in for corsages.

The flowers are good in arrangements in human-size houses too. A friend gave me a beautiful old battery jar for Christmas—greeny-glass and thick and bubbly edges. It will be lovely with rhubarb flowers with their greeny-ivory matching shades.

Spring cleaning of the garden helps clean the mind, too, of winter darkness, because the fresh icy air has new life in it. And the ground is spongy under the thrust of the spring sun. But spring cleaning of the house has very little charm for me. Shall we wax the floor and keep the cockers out, or let the cockers in with dozens of muddy paws? Who would really prefer a spotless sterile room

Laundry Fresh
EXCELLO
Kitchen Towels with a Tradition

Made of the same highly absorbent, lint-free, soft-as-a-cloud fabric that has been a tradition in thrifty American kitchens for generations. At leading Department Stores.

EXCELLO, LTD. Chicago

SAFE • QUICK • EASY-TO-USE
dir-kleen

CLEANS FABRICS LIKE NEW
Fine for Walls, Woodwork, too!

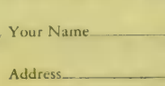
Odorless, non-inflammable DIR-KLEEN dissolves instantly in water; Cleans countless fabrics, woodwork, walls, etc. Regular 50c size makes 10 gallons. Economy $1.00 size makes 25 gallons. At department, hardware, drug, and grocery stores—or order direct DIR-KLEEN CO 2750 N. Wolcott Ave. Chicago 14

SEND 10¢ FOR TRIAL PACKET MAKES ONE GALLON

KVP Heavy WAXED PAPER

IMPERIAL Washable WALLPAPERS

Hat by Sally Victor



...in tune with modern decorating fashion

For a fashion-right home

—the right wall decoration is important. Make yours the choice of fashion leaders everywhere—Imperial Washable Wallpapers. Authentic in design, keyed to today's lovely decorating colors, Imperial papers will give your home that up-to-date look.

Ideas for Home Beauty
Send only 10¢ for "Decorating Ideas from Jean McLain's Notebook." Notes and sketches for every room in the house.

Imperial Paper and Color Corporation
Dept. L-43, Glens Falls, N. Y.

Your Name_____

Address_____

GUARANTEED WASHABLE AND LIGHT-RESISTANT

Imperial papers are *Color-Locked—their beauty last. Be sure you get genuine Imperial, identified in sample books by the famous silver label.

COLOR-LOCKED an exclusive Imperial process by virtue of which all Imperial Washable Wallpapers are guaranteed for years from date of hanging to withstand room exposure without fading and to clean satisfactorily in accordance with the instru with a very immaculate bedspread on the bed to a room inundated with cockers and cats? I generally decide that seven cockers on the bed, lined up nose by nose and looking blissful, is more rewarding than an empty but virginal-white bed.

When the ground has "settled," as we say, and it is dry, the time for spring cleaning is over. The garden must be planted then. So I vacillate. We spring-clean one room and shut it up. Then the door gets left open, and Snow is observed rolling in blond splendor on the cleanest sofa.

We are one family that changes horses in midstream so much that it would make some housewives dizzy. We may get half the windows washed and clean curtains up and decide it would be a fine time to paint the front-room woodwork. Or my sister Jill may begin to "do" the upstairs closets and find something she meant to repair. Whereupon she vanishes to the barn and the happy sound of her hammer fills the rest of the day. I creep up and chuck everything back in the closet.

As for me, the bookshelves are fatal. If I even pass by with a fugitive dustcloth, I happen to see Keats' Letters and I pause just to reread a couple. I begin with "I must think that difficulties nerve the spirit of a man—they make our Prime Objects a refuge as well as a passion." I go on to his "readiness to measure time by what is done and to die in six hours could plans be brought to conclusions—the looking upon the Sun, the Moon, the Stars, the Earth and its contents, as materials to form greater things ——" and some time later I am still there, wiping my brimming eyes with the idle dustcloth as I agonize all over again with Fanny Brawne and Keats' tragic passion. (And no matter what any critic may say, I shall never, never forgive Fanny Brawne.)

It seems to me Keats said almost everything that need be said about man. If we could all "look upon" Sun, Moon, Stars and Earth as materials to form greater things, what a race we should be! If we had, all of us, that largeness of spirit, that passion for truth and beauty, nothing could shake us. But we busy ourselves with little things, small jealousies, fears, anxieties. And life goes on and maybe we miss some opportunity to ease someone's heartache or help someone out of a bad spot.

Maybe we are just too busy "doing a million things" to see how the sky looks at dusk-dark. Pink pearl over the fringes of evening as day dies in beauty while we argue over who is going to do the dishes.

The March wind dies at dusk, too, flinging a last banner against the woods. Triumphant wild wind, presaging the softness of April air, promising new life, new growing green things.

The cockers have run themselves out. They are ready to sit by the open fire and leave mud all over the floor. They are ready for milk and eggs and they will be polite while we turn on the radio and get the evening news.

The evening news may be bad; it usually is. The old tired earth moves on in its orbit while men still hate and struggle and folks go hungry and children are cold and lonely. Often at this hour I feel sad, too, wishing I could set out supper for all the world with candlelight and the open fire and the cockers and cats and simple loving-kindness enough to go round. I think of women whose loved ones are under white crosses in hot steaming places and cold level plains; I think of them, too, every one, the men who gave up life for a dream. The men back with us, confused by a peacetime world.

I think of us, left on the Earth a little longer, to justify the sacrifice, to look on the Sun, the Moon, the Stars as materials to form greater things.

And I never quite despair! I pick up a cocker and feel how warmly the heartbeat goes on, and I know the answer to the old troubled world. I look out the window—storm window off and buried in anonymity until another year, and spring coming with the miracle of rebirth, and the old words come again:

"Be ye kind one to another."

"I, too, used to have trouble in getting my husband to help around the house"

says Mrs. Artemus Thinkle of Venus

Take a tip from this good neighbor—a mere 26,000,000 miles away. Take a trip to Venus yourself—as soon as the new atom drive space ship is completed. Chances are you'll find a planet much like earth—with much the same people having much the same problems. Read further! Find out how Mrs. Thinkle solved hers!

"The screen door was half off its hinges. Our wedding present pictures were still unhung. But would Arty do anything about it? Not on your tintype! Then I read about the Casco Power Tool Kit. . . ."

Good thinking, Mrs. Thinkle! The Casco Power Tool is hand-sized, gets into small places, makes tiny holes or great big ones, has 35 attachments that do everything from polishing the silver to engraving the glassware. But let Mrs. Thinkle tell it in her own words.

"Arty became so fond of his Casco Power Tools he developed several worth-while hobbies. Sculpting is just one of them. He has made me some lovely bracelets out of metal coins. His plastic book ends are the envy of the neighborhood. And our house never creaks, leaks or squeeks. I'm the happiest woman in Venus! Don't you thinkle I should be?"

Shortly, you, too, will be able to get your men folks this magic kit. We guarantee they'll like it. We guarantee you'll love the results. Keep an eye on hardware, electrical and department stores. They'll be the first to have the Casco Electri-Craft Power Tool Kit. Casco Products Corp., Bridgeport 2, Conn.

watch CASCO

for new and unusual contributions to better living

SUNNY SHEERNESS for your windows

Zionet Curtains

Your better stores will have more and more of them.

ZION LACE CURTAIN MILL

Marshall Field & Company, Inc., Manufacturing Division

295 Fifth Avenue, New York 16

Crochet THESE CLEVER PAN-TEE POT HOLDERS They're new!

No. 761—You'll want to make several of these gay little "His and Hers" Pan-tee Pot Holder sets, so quickly and easily crocheted with right-weight crochet cotton. In natural color with bright color for trim. We send you all the crochet cotton needed to make a set of "Pan-tee" Pot Holders and complete, easy-to-follow instructions, for only 25c. Order by number above. 100% satisfaction or money back. Send your order today!

Complete SET CROCHET COTTON POT HOLDERS INSTRUCTIONS 25c POST PAID

FREDERICK HERRSCHNER CO. 28 E. WABASH AVE., DEPT. 761 CHICAGO 3, ILL.

WON'T SNAG OR TEAR

LOOK FOR THE FABRIC LINING

NEW Swaggerettes

MORE DURABLE HOUSE AND GARDEN GLOVE

Curved fingers, form fitting, firm grip finish. Water-proof rubber outside, soft napped cotton inside. Easy on and off. Protects from rose thorns, shrubs — ideal for dishwashing, cleaning, scrubbing, laundry — any house hold task.

At leading hardware, drug and department stores....

Edmont COSHOCTON OHIO

Fabric-Lined RUBBER GLOVES

SAVOGRAN COLDFOAM

SUDS! WASHES PAINT, DISHES, FLOORS etc. SOAPLESS SOAP POWDER

1 LB. CAN 25¢ MAKES 40 GAL

AT PAINT AND HARDWARE STORES WRITE FOR CIRCULAR 14

THE SAVOGRAN COMPANY, BOSTON 10, MASS.

E'S RELIEF
n ironing drudgery
Original All-Metal
ONING TABLE
ET-I-TOP
TRADE MARK REGISTERED

st tiring household task is now sier and more pleasant with
'OP. The ventilated white-l top retains and more fully he heat of the iron so that ron dry faster, with less pulling ging of the iron. The MET-L-ll not catch fire, warp or crack. ed and riveted construction pro-ermanently firm ironing surface.
ous ProtectoRest protects cover ing it off the floor when table use. Over half a million users.

at your favorite department,
ire, hardware, or utility store.

MET-L-TOP Division
UDER, PAESCHKE & FREY CO.
Milwaukee 3, Wisconsin

Manufacturer of
M CITY WARE Since 1880

urly Kate
RUST PROOF
OT CLEANER
de of STAINLESS Metal

REE MUSIC CATALOG over 1300 pieces
l, Classical and Teaching Pieces for piano, violin
e in World Famous McKinley Sheet Music and Book
—the teacher's standard for nearly 50 years. Splengements. Every music lover should have copy. Write closing 3 cent stamp for return postage. Dept. 2523.
KINLEY PUBLISHERS, INC.
425 S. Wabash, Chicago 5

THER RAMSEY'S
100% WOOL
ND KNITTING YARNS
Buy Direct and Save!
ITE FOR Free SAMPLES!
RESS P. O. BOX 2062, PHILA. 3, PA.

HANG IT UP...
PIN IT UP WITH MOORE
USH-PINS • PUSH-LESS HANGERS
stationery, department and hardware stores
RE PUSH-PIN CO., PHILADELPHIA, PA.

NEW DESIGN FOR LIVING

(Continued from Page 180)

room could be arranged attractively and yet include all the things young people require nowadays. The built-in features were especially designed for school-age children, and we eliminated rugs and other features which would complicate the housekeeping.

The actual room is thirty-six feet long, with all outdoors included through the long rows of windows. The floors are dark green jaspé linoleum; the draperies, washable casement cloth; and all upholstery is heavy-textured cotton. In the living end of the room the ceiling is higher, adding to the pleasant clublike atmosphere, and increasing the air space. All the furniture slides easily so it can be moved back for dancing, pulled around the fireplace or rearranged to suit a special occasion.

Let's take a tour around the room and look at all the special features. At the right of the fireplace is a block of twelve lockers, built like deep cupboards. Into the lower ones you put toys, building blocks, catcher's mitts, crayon boxes, dolls, airplanes, puzzles, and so on. Into the top lockers go playing cards, cameras and other family articles which are used only on occasion and which are somewhat of a problem to store in the ordinary household.

Next come the long deep bookshelves with a place for everybody's books and magazines. Then the small piano, recessed to save floor space, and the portable radio.

Those three deep, long couches or window seats to the right of the doorway are well padded and as comfortable as single beds. Not being joined, they rearrange in several ways, and are ideal for lounging or naps.

In front of the couches is a big sturdy table which functions also as a record player. Close the open section over the record wheel, and youngsters can sit on it or use it for puzzles, cutting out or games.

The furniture group around the fire also assembles in different ways to suit the season and the occasion. Thirty persons can be seated comfortably in the room, without bringing in additional chairs.

The next color photograph shows the dining end of the room. The table is in three sections, each of which can function separately or assemble in different ways for table tennis, a gala buffet or just everyday family dining. Above the cabinet is the "pinup" area planned as a changing decoration or family-interest spot, with prints, maps, posters or other features alternating, according to the enthusiasms of the hour. Shown is a group of American artists' prints made available at popular prices, for home enjoyment.

All the concealed lighting is scientifically planned to give adequate light in just the right spots. There is, of course, general illumination for the room as a whole, and cove lighting back of the deep ledge in the living end of the room.

---

Take time to work—it is the price of success.

Take time to think—it is the source of power.

Take time to play—it is the secret of perpetual youth.

Take time to read—it is the fountain of wisdom.

Take time to be friendly—it is the road to happiness.

Take time to dream—it is hitching your wagon to a star.

Take time to love and be loved—it is the privilege of the gods.

Take time to look around—it is too short a day to be selfish.

Take time to laugh—it is the music of the soul.

—LEINSTER LEADER: Irish Digest.

---

SEE with your own eyes...

LAID OVER OZITE (Actual Photo) LAID OVER BARE FLOOR

SEE WHAT CIRCLE TREAD
OZITE
Rug Cushion
DOES FOR YOUR RUG

- Makes it look lovelier
- Makes it feel softer
- Makes it wear longer

If you laid only half your rug over OZITE—you soon would see a difference that makes you rub your eyes. OZITE cushions the pounding of hard feet that otherwise crushes down the rug pile and dulls its color and beauty. It's soft, soft, soft and your rug lasts and lasts and lasts.

Insist on genuine CIRCLE TREAD OZITE. Made of All-Hair reinforced with patented Adhesive Center. Stays springy all your life. Permanently Mothproofed. Odorless because Ozonized. Guaranteed.

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

CLINTON CARPET COMPANY
Merchandise Mart, Chicago 54
Please send me Free Booklet 809, on Care of Rugs
Name.....
Address.....
City.....Zone.....State.....

In this year when VALUES count again:

GET MORE OUT OF TRAVEL!

Best ...vel Time ... Now
In late ...ter and early Spring travel is usually less crowded . . . and this is the time you especially need a pleasant, relaxing trip.

The easy-spending spree is about over. More and more people are asking: "Am I getting full value from each of my hard-earned dollars?" And they're saying this, too . . . "I intend to get more out of life—more recreation, more travel, more fun!"

This is America's post war mood, and it adds up to something Greyhound offers in full measure: pleasant, sightseeing travel over beauty-lined highways at fares that remain near pre-war levels, while other living costs have rocketed.

What does "more for your money" mean in Greyhound travel? It means many more miles per dollar—more schedules each day—inexpensive, scenic trips to almost anywhere in the U. S. or Canada, and down to Mexico.

This is value that will increase—as rapidly as Greyhound can secure fine, new equipment, build more stations and Post Houses, plan and operate carefree Expense Paid Tours to all This Amazing America.

GREYHOUND

Let's Diagnose Your Verbal He...

By Norman Lewis

I. TEST YOUR GRAMMAR

All answers will be found following the last test.

Easy

If you can check a correct choice in four or more of the following sentences, consider your grammatical skill AVERAGE.

1. Would you like to have dinner with my mother and (a—I, b—me)?
2. She looks much older than (a—I, b—me).
3. The doctor suggested that you try to (a—lay, b—lie) down for a short nap after lunch every day.
4. Just between you and (a—I, b—me), I think she's cheating us.
5. (a—Is, b—Are) either of the boys ready?

No. Right:___

Hard

Indicate the word which grammatically completes each sentence. Get four or more right to prove that your ability in grammar is GOOD.

1. I knew it was (a—they, b—them) all the time.
2. The person who is sloppy in (a—their, b—his) thinking usually will not get very far in business.
3. I can't imagine (a—who, b—whom) it was.
4. You may speak to (a—whoever, b—whomever) comes in to see you.
5. Yesterday afternoon we (a—lay, b—laid) in the sun for an hour.

No. Right:___

Very Hard

If you made an acceptable score on the two previous tests and can choose correctly in four or more of the following sentences, your grammar is EXCELLENT.

1. (a—Who, b—Whom) would you prefer to be?
2. It is I who (a—is, b—am) asking the questions.
3. He is one of those politicians who (a—believe, b—believes) in straddling the issues.
4. (a—Due to, b—Because of) his illness, he cannot keep his appointment today.
5. They believed the burglar to be (a—he, b—him).

No. Right:___

II. TEST YOUR SPELLING

Easy

Your spelling is AVERAGE if you can check the correct form of four or more of the following words.

| | | |
|---|---|---|
| 1. | a—holiday | b—holliday |
| 2. | a—despair | b—dispair |
| 3. | a—persue | b—pursue |
| 4. | a—appartment | b—apartment |
| 5. | a—pastime | b—passtime |

No. Right:___

Hard

Your spelling is GOOD if you can check the correct form of all of the following.

| | | |
|---|---|---|
| 1. | a—exhillarate | b—exhilarate |
| 2. | a—category | b—catagory |
| 3. | a—rhythmical | b—rythmical |
| 4. | a—sieze | b—seize |
| 5. | a—indispensible | b—indispensable |

No. Right:___

Very Hard

If you made an acceptable score ... previous tests and can check the c... of all ...he following, your spelling ... EXCELL...NT.

| | | |
|---|---|---|
| 1. | a—tyrannize | b—tyra... |
| 2. | a—insistent | b—insist... |
| 3. | a—supercede | b—super... |
| 4. | a—conoisseur | b—conn... |
| 5. | a—ecstacy | b—ecsta... |

No. R...

III. TEST YOUR PRONUNCIATION

In these pronunciation tests syllab... not necessarily correct, and is intend... show approximate sounds.

Easy

Indicate the preferable pronunciati... of the following words. Make a pe... to judge that your ability is AVERA...

1. Italian: a—Eye-talian
   b—It-alian
2. radiator: a—ray-diator
   b—rad-iator
3. intricate: a—IN-tricate
   b—inTRIC-ate
4. preferable: a—preFER-able
   b—PREF-erable
5. mischievous: a—MIS-chievous
   b—misCHEE-vee...

No. Ri...

Hard

Score four or more correct to show th... pronunciation is GOOD. As before, ... the preferable form.

1. bade: a—bad
   b—bayd
2. clandestine: a—cl...mDES-tin
   b—CLAN-de-styne
3. irony: a—eye-ro-ny
   b—eye-er-ny
4. to combat: a—COM-bat
   b—comBAT
5. ignominy: a—IG-nominy
   b—igNOM-iny

No. Righ...

Very Hard

If you made an acceptable score on t... previous tests and can get four or mo... in this one, your pronunciation is EXCE... Indicate, again, the preferable form.

1. finis: a—fin-is
   b—fye-nis
   c—fee-nee
2. status: a—staytus
   b—stattus
3. grimace: a—GRIM-ace
   b—griMACE
4. flaccid: a—flassid
   b—flak-sid
5. eighth: a—ay-th
   b—ayt-th

No. Righ...

IV. TEST YOUR VOCABUL...

Easy

Check the correct definition of each ita... word. A score of four or more right sh... AVERAGE vocabulary.

1. versatile: a—cowardly
   b—unfaithful
   c—having many differ... titudes
2. ostracize: a—shun
   b—misunderstand
   c—deny

(Continued on Page 240)

Every doctor in private practice was asked:

—family physicians, surgeons, specialists...
doctors in every branch of medicine—

"What cigarette do you smoke?"

According to a recent Nationwide survey:

More Doctors Smoke Camels

than any other cigarette!

R. J. Reynolds Tobacco Company, Winston-Salem, N. C.

THE "T-ZONE" TEST WILL TELL YOU

The "T-Zone"—T for taste and T for throat—is your own laboratory, your proving ground, for any cigarette. For only your taste and your throat can decide which cigarette tastes best to you... and how it affects your throat. On the basis of the experience of many, many millions of smokers, we believe Camels will suit your "T-Zone" to a "T."

Not a guess, not just a trend...but an actual fact based on the statements of doctors themselves to 3 nationally known independent research organizations.

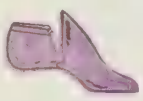
YES, your doctor was asked...along with thousands and thousands of other doctors from Maine to California.

And they've named their choice—the brand that more doctors named as their smoke is Camel! Three nationally known independent research organizations found this to be a fact.



Nothing unusual about it. Doctors smoke for pleasure just like the rest of us. They appreciate, just as you, a mildness that's cool and easy on the throat. They too enjoy the full, rich flavor of expertly blended costlier tobaccos. And they named Camels...more of them named Camels than any other brand. Next time you buy cigarettes, try Camels.

above everything...
fashion must fit

Every fashion-connoisseur knows it! And it's Foot Saver's famous Shortback* Last that makes these shoes fit as though custom-made for your foot alone! Moulded over this unique Last, Foot Savers hold your heel—gently . . . and free your toes—really! Comfortable? Couldn't be more so! Lookable? But, very . . . and in young Spring styles for daytime or dress. Write for name of nearest store.

The Julian & Kokenge Company,
274 South Front Street, Columbus 15, Ohio.

Only Foot Savers are made over Shortback* Lasts, which prevent looseness and gapping at the heel without crowding at the toe.

$9.95 to $14.95
*Reg. U. S. Pat. Off.

SHORTBACK
Foot Saver Shoes

(Continued from Page 238)

3. naïve: a—young
   b—happy
   c—innocent
4. euphonious: a—misleading
   b—pleasant sounding
   c—visible
5. gourmet: a—government official
   b—judge of good food
   c—foreigner

No. Right:____

Hard

Is each pair of words the same or opposite in meaning? Four hits out of five indicates a GOOD vocabulary.

1. acerbity; mildness — Same? Opposite?
2. temerity; rashness — Same? Opposite?
3. perspicuous; confusing — Same? Opposite?
4. truculent; fierce — Same? Opposite?
5. vindictive; forgiving — Same? Opposite?

No. Right:____

Very Hard

Complete four or more of the following words to label your vocabulary EXCELLENT.

1. Untruthfulness M....CITY
2. Grotesque parody or likeness T....STY
3. Flimsy, unsubstantial T....OUS
4. Descriptive of a feeling or reaction that comes to one as a spectator rather than as an active participant V....RIOUS
5. Slightly sour or sourish A....LOUS

No. Right:____

ANSWERS

I—GRAMMAR—
Easy: 1-b, 2-a, 3-b, 4-b, 5-a.
Hard: 1-a, 2-b, 3-a, 4-a, 5-a.
Very hard: 1-a, 2-b, 3-a, 4-b, 5-b.

II—SPELLING—
Easy: 1-a, 2-a, 3-b, 4-b, 5-a.
Hard: 1-b, 2-a, 3-a, 4-b, 5-b.
Very hard: 1-a, 2-a, 3-b, 4-b, 5-b.

III—PRONUNCIATION—
Easy: 1-b, 2-a, 3-a, 4-b, 5-a.
Hard: 1-a, 2-a, 3-a, 4-a, 5-a.
Very hard: 1-b, 2-a, 3-b, 4-b, 5-b.

IV—VOCABULARY—
Easy: 1-c, 2-a, 3-c, 4-b, 5-b.
Hard: 1-opposite, 2-same, 3-opposite, 4-same, 5-opposite.
Very hard: 1-mendacity, 2-travesty, 3-tenuous, 4-vicarious, 5-acidulous.

THE DIAGNOSIS

| | POOR | AVERAGE | GOOD | EXCELLENT |
|---|---|---|---|---|
| Grammar | | | | |
| Spelling | | | | |
| Pronunciation | | | | |
| Vocabulary | | | | |
| General Skill | | | | |

Check the correct box, according to the score you make on each test.

Now total the scores you made on all twelve tests, counting one point for each correct answer. Here's your diagnosis:

| TOTAL SCORE | DIAGNOSIS |
|---|---|
| 0–16 | poor |
| 17–33 | average |
| 34–50 | good |
| 51–60 | excellent |

★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

Ask Any Woman

BY MARCELENE COX

IN DRESSING three daughters, I sometimes find myself longing for those times when you could raise a girl on one school skirt, three shirtwaists, a Sunday dress and a box of talcum powder.

A grandmother asked her granddaughter, just home from college, to stir up a batch of griddlecakes. The cakes were a complete failure. "I should think," said the old lady acridly, "with all that education you'd be able to make pancakes fit to eat."

"Well, grandmother, I followed the recipe exactly," replied the girl.

"That's what I mean," replied her venerable relative. "You ought to know better than that."

Erratic unpredictable punishment places a child in a state of awful apprehension, worse than living on the edge of an active volcano.

Women should be equipped with double receiving sets, one for husbands and one for children.

When the children have kite failures it may be one of life's lessons they ought to learn early: that some people never do get their kites off the ground; that some get them in the air but cannot keep them there; and that a few, only a few, are born to the purple and succeed in getting their kites into the clouds and sailing them for the wonder and amazement of the multitude below.

The one big difference between the old-fashioned and the modern parent is that the old-fashioned one knew he knew best, the modern one studies child psychology and wonders if he knows best.

When one considers what adults in their relationships can do to each other, it is frightening to think what an adult can do to a child.

Parents are dated by "Oh, you're just going through that." Thank goodness, we went through that last year.

★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

Printed in U. S. A.

Ladies' Home

The Magazine Women Believe

JOURNAL

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Calif.

The Gifts of Love ♥ A COMPLETE NOVEL BY ANDRINA IVERSON

ANDRINA IVERSON (The Gifts of Love) writes: "A long time ago the University of Michigan gave me a B. A. without benefit of math, and I spent the next ten years keeping books. Now I'm a housewife, but there isn't a sewing machine in the world I wouldn't trade for any old broken-down typewriter. I envy the green-thumbed magicians whose gardens look like seed catalogues, the little man who cuts my slip covers, and people who play the piano. I have a patient six-foot husband, and a not-so-patient five-year-old daughter. I speak Norwegian and read French, but would be hard put to prove either in the presence of a Norwegian or a sophomore French student!"

ALEC RACKOWE (Seven Hundred a Week) writes: "I was born in England—educated there and in the U.S. My first phase of writing took place in the newspaper world, on the staff of several dailies. Following came publicity work in New York, and radio writing. Finally, fiction caught up with me. I let it, believing that it would offer me a better chance of self-expression. I've been doing stories since 1934, and have pretty good luck in side-stepping rejections. Haven't written any scenarios, but my study of the film medium was the most instructive experience I've ever had."

EDITH BRECHT, author of All Men Like Red, says: "I was born in Lancaster, Pennsylvania, and still live there, deep in the country, when I'm not on the Main Line outside of Philadelphia. My earliest literary success was a sob story about a little child's untimely end, which won a school contest when I was nine. I prepared for a life of the theater; but was swerved by romance, and later from it, filling, during the interim, a notebook of verse and prose which finally turned into stories. I'm musical, imitate people, and collect recipes. My birthday and Wordsworth's coincide, which may or may not account for my passion for Nature."

JOURNAL Contents

APRIL, 1946

NOVEL COMPLETE IN THIS ISSUE PAGE

THE GIFTS OF LOVE . . . . . Andrina Iverson 17

FICTION

TIME ENOUGH . . . . . Margaret Weymouth Jackson 20
BROOK AND RIVER MEET . . . . . Gladys Taber 22
JOHNNY WITH THE SPINDLY LEGS . . . . . Florence Cummings 26
ALL MEN LIKE RED . . . . . Edith Brecht 28
SEVEN HUNDRED A WEEK . . . . . Alec Rackowe 30
A MATTER OF STYLE . . . . . Newlin B. Wildes 40
THE DARK WOOD (Second Part of Five) . . . . . Christine Weston 46

SPECIAL FEATURES

BUCKING HORSES . . . . . Struthers Burt 6
MAN'S GREATEST ENEMY—MAN? . . . . . Dorothy Thompson 6
LEARNING TO LIVE . . . . . Robert Maynard Hutchins 24
PROFILE OF SUCCESS . . . . . Evelyn Sager 32
IF YOU ASK ME . . . . . Eleanor Roosevelt 43
LOW-COST HOUSING THAT PAYS . . . . . 44
WHAT FORCE IS STRONGER THAN THE ATOMIC BOMB? Harry Emerson Fosdick 48
IS YOUR MAN NORMAL? . . . . . Earnest Hooton 49
I'M TIRED OF GRANDMA! . . . . . Evelyn Ardis Whitman 165
WHY NOT LET YOUR CHILD ALONE? . . . . . H. J. Heltman 173
OH, MY ACHING STOMACH . . . . . Robert J. Landry 175
HOW AMERICA LIVES: "THE WORLD IS OURS" . . Hildegarde Dolson 177
WE'RE PLANNING OUR LIFE . . . . . Georgiana Magargal Feeney 184
WHY MOTHER'S AGE IS SHOWING . . . . . Hilda Cole Espy 198
THE SUNSHINE BAKESHOP . . . . . Jan Weyl 203
YOUNG AMERICA GIVES BOOKS . . . . . Elsie Johns 213

GENERAL FEATURES

UNDER-COVER STUFF . . . . . Bernardine Kielty 5
FAMILIES ARE FUN (The Sub-Deb) . . . . . Maureen Daly 8
FIFTY YEARS AGO . . JOURNAL ABOUT TOWN . . . . . 15
ASK ANY WOMAN . . . . . Marcelene Cox 126
DON'T RISK PRECIOUS HEARING . . . . . Dr. Herman N. Bundesen 201
THIS IS A BLASTER . . . . . Munro Leaf 206
DIARY OF DOMESTICITY . . . . . Gladys Taber 235

FASHIONS AND BEAUTY

HIDDEN TREASURES IN YOUR CLOSET . . . . . Wilhela Cushman 34
NO INFLATION IN THESE FASHIONS . . . . . Ruth Mary Packard 36
SPRING GOES TO A SUB-DEB'S HEAD . . . . . Dawn Crowell 38
AMERICA WILL LOVE APRONS MATCHED TO DRESSES . . Nora O'Leary 188
WAKE UP WITH MAKE-UP . . . . . Louise Paine Benjamin 190
PRETTY CHANGES . . . . . 224

GARDEN, INTERIOR DECORATION, ARCHITECTURE

BLOOM ALONG . . . . . Richard Pratt 42
ROOM TO GROW IN . . . . . Henrietta Murdock 186
A HOUSE FOR A MILLIONAIRE WITH NO SERVANTS . . Richard Pratt 227

FOOD AND HOMEMAKING

IT'S HAM, NO FOOLIN' . . . . . Ann Batchelder 50
LINE A DAY . . . . . Ann Batchelder 52
CHOPSTICKS AND COOKBOOKS . . . . . Louella G. Shouer 192
THEIR HOME IS YOUNG AND GAY . . . . . Judy Barry 195
REPORT TO THE HOUSEWIFE . . . . . Judy Barry 238
CONVERSATION PIECE . . . . . Ruth Mills Teague 241

POETRY

PAPER, MISTER? . . . . . Ethel Jacobson 59
BALLADE OF THE HOMING HOUSE PETS . Georgie Starbuck Galbraith 68
LILIES OF THE VALLEY . . . . . Christian Gauss 80
TO YOU . . . . . Eleanor Cole 94
HERE COMES SPRING . . . . . Marjorie Lederer Lee 104
ANSWER . . . . . Elaine V. Emans 114
RETURN . . . . . Jehanne de Mare 131
CRICKETS . . . . . Elizabeth-Ellen Long 144
RETURN IN SPRING . . . . . Dorothy Boicourt 153
ROCK POOL . . . . . Anne Einselen 158
DECORATION DAY . . . . . Hortense Flexner 166
ANNIVERSARY SONNET . . . . . Joanne de Longchamps 169
RETURNED SOLDIER . . . . . Catherine Haydon Jacobs 172
GIFT . . . . . Alma Robison Higbee 185
FIRST RAIN . . . . . Janet Weinberger 208
CHOICE . . . . . Lenore Warren 211
APRIL WISDOM . . . . . Eleanor Alletta Chaffee 217
DEEPEST SILENCE . . . . . Robert P. Tristram Coffin 231

Cover Design by Vertes

LADIES' HOME JOURNAL (The Home Journal) is published on last Friday of month preceding its date.

The names of all characters in all Journal fiction are fictitious. Any resemblance to actual persons, living or dead, is a coincidence.

LADIES' HOME JOURNAL PRICES

U. S. and Possessions, Canada, Newfoundland, Labrador, Costa Rica, Cuba, Nicaragua, Dominican Republic, Guatemala, Haiti, Mexico, Panama, Republic of Honduras, Salvador, Spain and South America except the Guianas, 1 yr., $2; 2 yrs., $3; 3 yrs., $4; 5 yrs., $5. Other Countries, 1 year, $3.

Remit by Money Order or by Draft on a bank in the U. S. payable in U. S. Funds. All prices subject to change without notice. All subscriptions must be paid for in advance.

UNCONDITIONAL GUARANTY—We agree, upon request direct from subscribers to the Philadelphia office, to refund the full amount paid for any copies of Curtis publications not previously mailed.

The title of the Ladies' Home Journal is registered in the U. S. Patent Office and in Foreign Countries. The entire contents are copyright, 1946 (Trade Mark Registered), by The Curtis Publishing Company in United States and Great Britain. London, 6, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, W. C. All rights reserved.

ENTERED AS SECOND-CLASS MATTER MAY 6, 1911, AT THE POST OFFICE AT PHILADELPHIA, PENNA., UNDER ACT OF MARCH 3, 1879.

CHANGE OF ADDRESS

Send change of address (naming publication) or other communications to

THE CURTIS PUBLISHING COMPANY
Independence Square, Philadelphia 5, Pa.

Change must reach us at least five weeks before the date of the issue with which it is to take effect. Send old address with your new, enclosing if possible your address label. Duplicate copies cannot be sent. The Post Office will not forward copies unless you provide extra postage.

METRO-GOLDWYN-MAYER'S

LION'S ROAR

Published in this space every month

The greatest star of the screen!

We're off on our tandem in a whirl of delight!

★ ★ ★ ★

We've just seen M-G-M's high-spirited new musical hit, "Two Sisters From Boston", and—oh, those sisters!

★ ★ ★ ★

Take it from one who knows: all the hectic gaiety of New York at the turn of the century has been colorfully caught by "Two Sisters From Boston".

★ ★ ★ ★

It's a youthful, exuberant romance of those flamboyant days when it was definitely naughty for a young lady to show her limbs—no matter how attractive!

Kathryn Grayson and June Allyson are thoroughly delightful as the two capricious Back-Bay sisters who venture from their quiet, cultured world into the hurly-burly world they're curious about.

★ ★ ★ ★

And we do mean hurly-burly, what with Jimmy Durante shouting delirious ditties in a Bowery beer hall, and the great Metropolitan Opera tenor, Lauritz Melchior, throwing his magnificent voice into the finest songs.

★ ★ ★ ★

Peter Lawford figures in it, too. He meets one sister, falls in love, meets the other sister, falls in love, and—well, we're not going to tell you who gets who, but it's a story as flip and flirtatious as a bustle.

★ ★ ★ ★

And the songs! Tunesmiths Sammy Fain and Ralph Freed have spiced some swell new melodies with a trace of nostalgia that suits our taste to perfection. Songs like "G'wan, Your Mudder's Calling." And everybody sings!

★ ★ ★ ★

Produced by Joe Pasternak (the "Anchors Aweigh" man), expertly directed by Henry Koster, filmed from the original screen play by Myles Connolly, with additional dialogue by James O'Hanlon and Harry Crane—"Two Sisters From Boston" definitely belongs in the M-G-M family of hits!

★ ★ ★ ★

Do you gather we've gone and fallen for "Two Sisters From Boston"? In the immortal words of our friend Schnozzola: "Ha-cha-cha-cha!"

—Leo

No other shampoo leaves your hair so lustrous, yet so easy to manage!

For "He loves me knots," remember this:
He'll adore your topknots, curls or swirls when your hair is Drene-lovely!
Drene your hair and it shines with all its natural beauty.
Today's Drene with Hair Conditioning action leaves your hair silkier, smoother, easier to manage.

"After your Drene shampoo, try a new hairdo for Spring," says Jerry Courtney, famous Cover Girl and Drene Girl.
"There's nothing like a becoming new hairfix to boost your spirits any time!"
You'll love the way Drene with Hair Conditioning action leaves your hair so beautifully behaved.

Jerry shows you these easy-to-fix Drene styles you can try at home or ask your beauty shop to do. First insist on Drene Shampoo with Hair Conditioning action.
No other shampoo leaves your hair so lustrous, yet so easy to manage.

Drene

Shampoo with

▲ YOU DON'T NEED DAISIES to tell you he loves you . . . with your hair swept up in this tilted topknot. "I'm a Drene Girl," says Jerry, "because Drene brings out all the natural sheen of my dark hair." Actually as much as 33 percent more lustre than any soap or soap shampoo. Since Drene is not a soap shampoo, it never leaves any drab film on hair as all soaps do. For this graceful upsweep, comb all hair back to crown and then forward into this shining topknot.

▲ BOUQUETS TO YOU when you turn a center-part page-boy into this full chignon with just a jeweled barrette. "This hairdo is so easy to fix," Jerry explains, "right after your Drene shampoo." Today's Drene with Hair Conditioning action leaves your hair silkier, smoother and so beautifully behaved. You'll find, too, a good permanent helps keep page-boy rolls neatly in place.

◀ EGGS-ACTLY RIGHT FOR EASTER is this shining example of the long page-boy with a side part. "Don't let dandruff spoil the beauty of your hair," warns Jerry. "The very first time you use Drene, you completely remove unsightly dandruff." See how

UNDER-COVER STUFF

By Bernardine Kielty

ACME

Dietrich and Remarque. She'd be a natural for his Arch of Triumph.

WE hope Marlene Dietrich will be picked for Erich Remarque's THE ARCH OF TRIUMPH. "She had a colorless face, almost without expression. The mouth was full but pale, the contours appeared blurred. Only the hair was very beautiful—of a lustrous natural blond. She wore a Basque beret and under her raincoat a blue tailored suit." That's the girl that Ravic, the surgeon, met on the Paris bridge at night, in the opening scene of the book. From this description, it could be Dietrich.

• • •

We've often noticed that the less a family of children sees of its parents, the tighter the bond among the children themselves, the more initiative they have, and no doubt the more fun. Certainly that is the picture Catherine Pomeroy Stewart gives of her family. (She is the author of HER HUSBAND'S HOUSE.) Mr. Pomeroy, the father, had a business which took him to the four corners of the world. Sometimes his family—wife and four children—went with him, quite as often the children were parked at schools or with tutors and governesses. In Shanghai, while Jo, the older of the two Pomeroy girls, was belle of the coast, the two boys and Catherine, so she says, were the brats of the coast. When father was in Siam and mother in America, the children were sorted out into schools in Switzerland. For a few years while the parents were living in Rome and the boys were in America, Catherine was struggling along at a French convent and Jo was preparing to marry an Italian nobleman. There was one calm period on a farm at Hopewell, New Jersey, where the children slept in the hay barn (for fun) and swam in the quarry. But by the time Catherine was seventeen she was back in Rome and the safari was on once more—new scenes, new tongues, new customs to adjust to. When they grew up the three younger Pomeroys turned to writing. Catherine's earlier book, SO THICK THE FOG, was about France, and HER HUSBAND'S HOUSE is set in Italy, inspired without doubt by her sister Jo's Italian ménage. Catherine Stewart's husband was killed at Dunkirk three months after their marriage, and a son was born six months after his father's death.

• • •

The other day we saw Tom Costain walking along 57th Street. The author of THE BLACK ROSE is a big man, tall and erect, and that day was wearing a black hat on his close-cropped white hair, and a tie as blue as his eyes. He is hard at work on a new novel, and when we saw him he was just coming up for air, having been at the typewriter five hours straight. The new book is to be the story of a great department-store merchant who lived—believe it or not—in the day of François Villon. . . . THE BLACK ROSE, we hear, was turned down by one Hollywood producer who objected to stories of Negro uprisings.

• • •

In these days of domestic-help difficulties we all appreciate a little co-operation around the house. None more so than Josephine Pinckney, who, after she had finished

(Continued on Page 87)

CARTOON REPRINTED PERMISSION THE NEW YORKER. COPYRIGHT THE F.-R. PUBLISHING CORPORATION

"Guess what Victoria said today—she said 'please.'"

"That's the day I discovered how to wash my clothes the Whitest ever . .

1 It began when my neighbor hung out a wash so white it fairly sparkled. So I asked her "How do you get it so white? Bleach it?"

2 "Bleach it? Not a bit of it!" said she, "Oxydol washes so clean that even the grimiest things come White Without Bleaching."

3 "What about colors?" I asked. "That's the grand part" said my neighbor. "Oxydol's so safe for wash colors and rayons, too."

4 "So what did I do? I hot-footed it to the store to get a box of Oxydol—for a wash that's White Without Bleaching."

IT'S TRUE! Oxydol is far ahead in preventing "dirty-grayness"

OXYDOL suds are so lively they lift out dirt. And even act to prevent those "dirty grayness" particles that form in wash water—tiny particles that stick in the clothes and then turn yellow or gray when you iron them.

Actual tests prove that Oxydol gets clothes cleaner and whiter than less-active soaps can ever hope to do. All your white things—except for outright stains—come White Without Bleaching. Yes, dazzling white!

Oxydol is safe for wash colors and rayons . . . Get Oxydol—and see your wash come so clean it's White Without Bleaching!

Oxydol washes clothes so Clean they're WHITE WITHOUT BLEACHING

★ Be Patriotic! Avoid Soap Waste!

Ladies' Home
JOURNAL
April

BRUCE GOULD AND BEATRICE BLACKMAR GOULD, Editors

MARY BASS, Executive Editor.
LAURA LOU BROOKMAN Managing Editor.

Associate Editors: HUGH MAC NAIR KAHLER • JOHN SCOTT MABON BERNARDINE KIELTY • ANN BATCHELDER • WILHELA CUSHMAN FRANK ELTONHEAD ▪ ALICE BLINN ▪ LOUISE PAINE BENJAMIN RICHARD PRATT • HENRIETTA MURDOCK ▪ LOUELLA G. SHOUER MARY LEA PAGE • MAUREEN DALY ▪ DAWN CROWELL

Assistant Editors: JOHN WERNER ▪ CHARLOTTE JOHNSON ROBERT ATHERTON ▪ DONALD STUART • RUTH MARY PACKARD RUTH MATTHEWS ▪ NORA O'LEARY ▪ ALICE CONKLING ▪ MILDRED ARNOLD ▪ JUDY BARRY ▪ JUNE TORREY • ELEANOR COLE MARJORIE LEDERER LEE ▪ JUNE CUNNINGHAM ▪ EVELYN SAGER

Editorial Assistants: BETTY NILES GRAY • KATHERINE WEST MILLER ▪ SELMA RUTHERFORD BURGESS ▪ ALICE KASTBERG ▪ ANNE EINSELEN ▪ DOROTHY VOORHEES • LILY GLENDINNING • FRANCES RODMAN ▪ DOROTHY C. SELBY • JAN WEYL

BUCKING HORSES

By Struthers Burt

WHEN I was a young man, occasionally, like most young men who go ranching, I found myself on the "hurricane deck" of a bucking horse. Not by choice. I am not by nature a bronco twister. But by accident. Or because, moved by the gallant fear that afflicts the young, I was afraid of being afraid. And so, after a while, bucking horses came to be a symbol: the symbol of what might be called predated fear, the most foolish fear of all. The fear of the future, the fear of the event before it has occurred. For what, as a rule, happened? Either I was able, and this for the most part, to "talk" the horse out of his nonsense—there are half-a-dozen effective ways of doing so—or else, if I couldn't, and he took me for a ride, a surprising thing happened. I enjoyed myself. I had a wonderful time. Not entirely a comfortable one, perhaps, nor a secure one, but wonderful. That is, if you call elation wonderful.

Sometimes I stuck, and sometimes I didn't, but that didn't make much difference; the point is, I discovered that the worst part of danger is undisciplined anticipation, and that there's little use worrying about the future because it's hardly ever what you think. Not only that, but, whatever it is, nine chances out of ten you'll get out of it a lot of interest and excitement.

I am not, of course, deprecating caution, or foresightedness, or any attempt to plan the future wisely. And, naturally, I'm not thinking of the inevitable fear that overtakes for a moment even the bravest before he goes forward into danger.

Of all countries, America has suffered less from the fear I am talking about than any other: Fear with a capital F—fear of the future, general miasmic fear. Confident, buoyant, marvelously excited, sometimes foolish, but for the most part wise, we have gone forward in the clearest air and under the highest skies that the world knows, and we wouldn't even have begun if we had not been that way in the beginning. What are we afraid of? Some other man's religion? Some other man's color? Some foreign ideology? Poverty? Don't be silly. A hundred things can frighten a man if he just lies down on his back and invites them to light. Rabbits die of fright, not men. And what we really are is a hundred and thirty-five millions so engrossed in a gigantic task, just begun, that we can brush flies from our forehead with the unconcern of a mighty blacksmith.

We forget that there is a Fifth Horseman of the Apocalypse, and his name is Fear. In times of ease he is overlooked, but in times of stress he rides again. And of all the hag-ridden brothers he is the worst, for as he rides he scatters the seeds of cruelty and intolerance, and of the cold and mortal illness of selfishness. He is the elder brother of Death, and War, and Pestilence, and Famine, and he leads them, but he is very old; a bag of bones, a skeleton, and so, unlike his brothers, he has little substance. Any brave, coolheaded man can knock him down. And always with him, back of the cantle of his saddle, rides his little familiar, the small dwarf, Worry.

Deep in the American consciousness is the knowledge that the worst part of a bucking horse is the dread of him, and that no mountain road is ever so bad as it looks from a distance.

MAN'S GREATEST ENEMY—MAN?

By Dorothy Thompson

IF we are to believe the all-but-unanimous voices of our times, the leading passion of mankind in this age is for security. In international affairs, UNO is urged as universal security against war. When Great Britain interferes in Greece or elsewhere, it is for the "security of her life lines with the Empire"; when the Soviet Union claims a dominant position in Eastern Europe and the Balkans, or the United States reaffirms and strengthens the Monroe Doctrine or claims Pacific and Atlantic island bases, it is on the argument these are "vital security zones." Thus, to a certain extent, the aim for security pursues contradictory policies: a world is envisaged rooted in equal liberty and justice with equal security for all, yet that is perhaps Utopian, so beside it a world is constructed of "security spheres," based on inequality of rights between the strong and the weak; and this, too, is acceptable to millions if only it will bring security from war.

For a full generation now, even in the most liberty-loving nations, the blessing of security has overshadowed the charms of freedom, and all the social reforms of our age have security as their objective—the security of bank depositors, home owners, job holders, investors in new companies, the sick, the unemployed, the orphaned and the old. Socialism grows in prestige, not because it has produced a more opulent or beautiful civilization, but because it seems, to millions of men, to promise greater security.

Yet, though more has been done in all countries, in domestic legislation, to secure security than in any previous generation, the passion for security arises out of a continued, and even mounting, feeling of insecurity. All the laws, regulations, pensions, insurances, and guaranties do not abolish the fears endemic to our civilization.

THESE fears are, in part, the result of science, which is creating a new world faster than the mind can adjust itself to it. An atomic bomb is dropped in a New Mexico desert, and suddenly the whole world, knowing little of science, is forced to realize that matter is not anything firm and solid, but is all energy, which can explode—leaving "not a wrack behind." Before the people have reached comprehension of radar, it bounces an echo off the moon, and we are called to recognition of the fact that the earth is but a speck in a universe, and men speculate on the possibility of interplanetary wars.

Not only are there weapons which are the creation of the physical scientists, but the chemists and biologists have also been busy. We learn that one faction of our General Staff advocated besieging rather than invading Japan, because of the invention of a chemical poisonous to all plant life, which, dropped in tablets, could have destroyed the Japanese rice crop and brought the enemy to terms by mass starvation.

We learn that we can produce mass epidemics among plants and animals and have spent many millions on perfecting these inventions. There have always been wars, but never before were there wars which threatened the end of the human race, and even of the planet.

Then there is the insecurity induced by fear of revolutions, so many of which we have seen in our lifetimes—those ideological and class struggles, invariably accompanied by reigns of terror to which whole classes or, in the Nazi revolution, whole races fall victims. These, too, are waged in the name of "security," to be achieved through a horror of massacres and exterminations, the security of majorities to be bought by the illimitable sufferings of minorities.

In fact, while the cry for security resounds, nothing, not even the ground under our feet, appears secure. Yet what threatens mankind? Of what is it afraid?

No one thinks the earth is going to disintegrate of itself—not for millions of years. Bacteria have menaced life for centuries, but science has all but banished the plagues that once decimated societies—smallpox, bubonic plague, cholera, yellow fever. Some societies—above all the British—have avoided the radical overturns of revolution for centuries. Nature menaces us less than in any previous epoch. Famine and poverty due to lack of raw materials were never less necessary.

So we are not afraid of Nature, nor of atomic science, nor of pestilences, nor of wild animals. We are afraid only of Man. Atomic bombs will rest in peace unless or until some men decide to use them. Man is not menaced by the planet. The planet is menaced by man. Pestilences will successfully be fought until some men decide to spread them. Revolutions will be bypassed, unless some men determine otherwise. The enemy of Man is Man, and the insecurity man feels is his doubt of his own image.

Norman Cousins has written a sensational book called Modern Man is Obsolete. Old-fashioned man, he would argue, is more "obsolete." But is that true?

I think it is not true. Man is not obsolete, and the solution for his insecurities has been in his hands for thousands of years. It is also in his own nature. He is an animal—not a machine—and he is the creator and master of the works of his own hand and brain.

He is—in the most primitive sense—a creature of "instincts" and urges, chief generators of which are the egoistic impulse, toward self-assertion and self-expression—the urge to be noticed, as something separate and apart; the hunger instinct; and the erotic instinct, which draws him toward sex and toward all the sublimations of love. When these are satisfied on a level compatible with that orderly life which we call "stable civilization" we have peace, prosperity, cooperation. When they are frustrated, we have aberrations and explosions.

What mankind is looking for, under the slogan of security, is actually happiness. And despite all our inventions and progress, Man himself has changed less than the world around him. All of us would feel extremely uncomfortable if we lived in the material world of Aristotle, St. Thomas Aquinas or even of Karl Marx, but reading them, they seem just like us—or some of us.

Our mass civilizations frustrate the ego, by reducing (Continued on Page 170)

Can you tell before you taste?

It's easy to tell when foods look good to eat. But how can you tell—beforehand—that they'll taste good, too—and be nutritious? For, you know, flavors—as well as certain vitamins—are often "cooked away" in the home preparation of foods. And long transportation from farm to table can also rob foods of these good qualities.

One way to guard against such losses, say food authorities,* is to depend on canned foods—for the reasons given below!

*For example, see Aug. 10, 1944 "Journal of Nutrition"

Doesn't this look good? Prune juice, Mexican corn, lima beans, lobster à la king, apricots, cookies, tea . . . "and they all came out of a can!"

FOODS IN CANS are generally prepared by pressure cooking. In fact, each steel-and-tin can is really a miniature "pressure cooker." This means canned foods are cooked quickly—at high temperature—in a minimum of water—all air and light excluded—vitamins, minerals and flavors sealed in.

EVEN PICKING is a painstaking process on farms that grow fruits and vegetables for canning. And, when you buy food in a can, no hand can touch it but yours—for the protective can permits no tampering with its contents! Processed canned foods do not have to be stored under refrigeration before opening.

CLEANLINESS is the first rule of the modern cannery. Tomatoes, for instance, within a few hours of picking, are washed under high-pressure water sprays—then "juiced," or made into one of many other delicious tomato products. You can be as proud to serve canned vegetables as those grown in your own garden.

FOODS IN CANS ARE

SAFE from dirt, germs, odors.

SAFE from air, light, moisture.

SAFE even after the can is opened—because, in the canning process, both the can and its contents are sterilized. Simply cover the top and place in the refrigerator.

No other Container Protects like the Can

CAN MANUFACTURERS INSTITUTE, INC., NEW YORK

Families are Fun

HI, THERE, PRETTY GIRL!

Can that mean you? If you can't answer that greeting, if you're the kind of gal who never gets a nod or a whistle, now's the time to perk up and look pretty. And here's just the thing to get you started! The new Sub-Deb booklet LET'S BE LOVELY, No. 2253, 5 cents. Order it now from the Reference Library, LADIES' HOME JOURNAL, Independence Square, Philadelphia 5, Pennsylvania. It's a must!

TWO OF A KIND

It would be easy to be an interesting character, lush and lovely, something just this side of Lana Turner, if a gal could have the house all to herself. But when a girl has to split a bedroom with a younger sister, dry supper dishes for six every night and share the living room every evening with her whole family—what chance does she have for individual development? It's not easy! For instance, maybe you were all set for a big evening with your current boy interest. You had planned to wear your best blue sweater (it was just last Friday night that he gave you that "eyes like violets" routine) and, in fact, you had to wear that blue sweater to make the evening right. But your younger sister had ideas, too, and slipped off to a local movie, earlier, wearing not only your blue sweater but a pair of your best fuzzy socks as well! And just the night you wanted to have the gals over for a home hen party, your brother decided to work on his model airplanes right in the middle of the living-room floor. And every morning, just when you're rushing to make that first eight-thirty class, both your brother and sister bottleneck the bathroom by taking two showers each, decide to try a different hair-do, a new bow tie or just daydream among the bath powders, washcloths and the last hot water in the house. Life can be beautiful—but it's not always easy when you have to share that life with other characters just as busy living as you are!

HEADS OF THE HOUSE

And there are times when your mother and dad aren't much help either. You can count on your mother to keep clean towels in the linen closet, fresh milk in the icebox and whip up a batch of pancakes for breakfast when you're in the mood for pancakes. But you can't always count on her for the really important things. There are times when she can't remember that you're grown up! You may have evening ideas about a formal in black satin with sequins, while she insists that something pale blue with small bows or a puff of ostrich feather is "more your type." And it's sometimes difficult to understand why she can't see the glamour in dark lipstick and sun-tan powder base, the kind of make-up that gives a girl date assurance, but insists you keep that pink-and-white look just as if you stepped out of a brisk, cold shower. She can be downright difficult about seeing that you eat a big breakfast (and finish that oatmeal, sister!) on each school day, wear your rubbers when the weather is wet and drink hot lemonade before going to bed when you and your date walk home in the rain.

And how many times have you discovered that the best laid plans of mouse and girls can get off the beam—especially if your dad has anything to say? How can any girl be number-one popularity gal in her class with a father who won't let her borrow the car every other night, insists she do her homework every weekday evening and won't let her stay out till the whee hours of the morning, even for very special occasions? Fathers like to throw their weight around (rather than that folding money) when it comes to weekly allowances, extra jingling money for cokes and carfare and readjusting the family budget to include a new spring coat for you when there is nothing wrong with the one that was new just this time last year. Dads can be funny about thinking a gal is in high school simply to get an education, completely disregarding such important things as collecting dates, football sweaters and class rings. And it's hard to talk business with a man who is more interested in stock reports than Van Johnson, and who hides behind an evening paper when he might give out with a little solid advice on what makes with men, dates and life in general. You may have no complaints to put down in black and white, there is nothing definitely wrong with your mother and dad that you could put your finger on—except that they insist on keeping a finger on you!

IT TAKES A HEAP OF LIVING

And besides the blues you could sing about your family as a group, there are a few choruses of complaints you might add about the house itself. It's all very well to picture the "ideal" girl's room with fluffy curtains, pastel walls, cuddly armchairs and boudoir table flounced in ruffles—but yours doesn't actually look that way. You've got to be contented with split living, sharing bed and boudoir, drawer and closet space and even your privacy with a disrupting younger sister! And to homey décor of flat-painted walls, sturdy bedspreads and hooked rugs, you usually add the touches of three pairs of old shoes sticking out from under the bed, a pile of books on the nearest chair, a dust of powder and a blob of nail polish on the dresser top and a pair of blue jeans draped artistically from the doorknob.

And your bathroom is not exactly a show place of glittery chrome and porcelain, scented with powders and fragrant after-bath colognes, but too often just a place littered with damp towels you forgot to hang up, two pairs of wool socks drying over the shower rod and finished off by a bar of soft soap someone left melting away in the tub. And to go downstairs in the house (and you went downstairs so fast this morning you forgot to close the bedroom door or straighten the hall rug that you kicked into wrinkles as you passed on the run), the list gets longer!

A house can't hold a family from the cops-and-robbers stages right up to high school without collecting a few scars to show for it. There may be a couple of nicks on the coffee table left from the days when your youngest brother was scooting around the room in his kiddie car, there may be a burn on the arm of the best chair where your dad dozed off with a cigar in his hand, and the rug may be a bit worn near the hall from so many dashes to answer the family phone. When you are asking the gang over for the evening, that room may look a bit shabby to you, but when you stop to think it over—there's something wonderfully attractive about that lived-in, loved-in look. A house is exactly what you make it. When you're a little gal, it's up to your mother and dad to fill it with furniture, keep it neat and clean and do their best to make you happy there. But once you're a big gal (all right, if you're old enough to stay out till midnight you're old enough to make your own bed before you go to school in the morning), you've got to give a hand too. So if you aren't completely satisfied with the atmosphere or the armchairs, the decorating or the dusting—how about helping with the improvements yourself?

A GAL AT HOME

Families are funny setups. At times you may rebel at the intrusion on your freedom and privacy; but after a few days on your own with a diet of drugstore sandwiches, no one with whom to talk and two movies a day to fill the time, you'd be glad to get back to a home, even to a crowded, noisy, busy home where people have to get to breakfast on time, eat spinach if it's served at the table and even powder their noses five to the bathroom. Nine times out of ten, a gal who can't get along with her family can't get along with most other people either. After all, your family still likes you after living with you—and isn't that an acid test for any friendship?

A gal who is high on the hit parade in school and at home stands a good chance for happiness. Some one of these days off in the bright, blue yonder, you'll find the man in your life and start off with some new ideas, high hopes and a few bright stars in your eyes—but you're just going to start the whole home-and-hearthside business all over again. Why not start having that kind of fun now?

Don't Ignore These Symptoms!

HERE'S THE EASY, DELIGHTFUL TREATMENT

Women: Part hair, all over the scalp, and apply Listerine Antiseptic with finger tips or cotton. Rub in well. Carefully done, it can't hurt your wave. Men: Douse full-strength Listerine on the scalp. Follow with good, vigorous massage. Listerine Antiseptic is the same antiseptic that has been famous in the field of oral hygiene for over 60 years.

How to help safeguard the beauty of # Your Lovely Hair!

IT'S the simplest little precaution imaginable—yet so effective! Every time you wash your hair, just use Listerine Antiseptic—massaging it well in, on hair and scalp. That's all!

Thousands of fastidious women use this pleasant little treatment as a precaution against infectious dandruff, which bothers so many people. Women know that flakes and scales can ruin the smartest hair-do . . . utterly destroy the charm of beautiful hair.

A causative agent of infectious dandruff, according to many noted dermatologists, is a stubborn germ called the "bottle bacillus" (Pityrosporum ovale). Listerine Antiseptic kills this germ by the million! And does it in such a cool, refreshing way! You'll find the treatment easy, quick and wonderfully clean-feeling.

If you already have Infectious Dandruff

If those telltale flakes and scales persist . . . if you're pestered by intolerable itching—it's no time to delay. These things may be symptoms of infectious dandruff—a warning that the infection is already at work. Don't experiment with so-called "overnight" cures or greasy lotions. Don't wait till shampoo-time. Get going—at once—with Listerine Antiseptic—two treatments a day and keep it up. How wonderful to see flakes and scales start to disappear! What a comfort to alleviate that itching.

This twice-a-day Listerine Antiseptic treatment for hair and scalp has been tested clinically. Tested for a full month, it actually removed, or markedly improved dandruff symptoms for 76% of the sufferers from this embarrassing disease.

So help guard your lovely hair with Listerine Antiseptic treatments with every shampoo. Or, if infectious dandruff has gotten a start, give two treatments a day for quick, comforting aid.

LAMBERT PHARMACAL COMPANY, St. Louis, Mo.

The tested treatment

LISTERINE ANTISEPTIC and MASSAGE

FOR BEAUTY THAT BLOOMS

in your skin...

Spring-clean with Edna Wallace Hopper Twin Treatment
. . . help rid your skin of dry outer flakes
. . . dirt that clogs pore openings.

Does your skin look dull and tired—just when you want a brighter "new face" to go with your pretty Spring clothes? Then get busy. Today give yourself an Edna Wallace Hopper White Clay Pack. Repeat once a week. Then, every day, the beauty care of Homogenized Facial Cream. Here's how:

Once a week . . . this thrilling beauty mask!

Spread White Clay Pack over clean face and neck. Relax while mask dries (8 to 10 minutes). Marvelous, the stimulating effect on tense, drab skin as this beauty mask helps to cleanse pore openings of wastes. As it helps to flake away dry, faded "top skin".

Instantly, you'll see a fresher new glow to your skin. A brighter tone, coaxed by White Clay Pack's gentle blushing action. And you'll feel a satin-smoothness that means more glamour for your make-up. A glamour you'll help to guard this easy effective way . . .

Daily . . . to safeguard your clearer skin

To cleanse, lubricate and soften your skin every day—as well as accent the beauty of your weekly White Clay Pack, simply use Hopper Homogenized Facial Cream. Like this:

Pat on with upward, outward strokes, right from the base of your neck (see diagram). The gentlest of pats around each eye. Remove with tissues. Then notice the exquisite new softness of your cheek—its fresher look. For extra dry skin, smooth on a thin film of blush pink Homogenized Facial Cream after your weekly White Clay Pack. And don't miss its benefits as a beautifying night cream. You'll have a "dewy" young look that makes you lovelier—makes you loved!

Edna Wallace Hopper Twin Treatment

for a lovelier, younger look

Our Readers Write Us

Last Time I Saw Paris They Were Out of Oeufs

Paris.

Dear Beatrice: As unfortunately has become usual, I shall start this letter with food problems. The last parcel was a great improvement on earlier ones; indeed, it had everything we needed, but as you suggest I will tell you what we want most:

1. We could do with a lot more cheese, and butter would be appreciated if available. There are no eggs whatsoever in France, so if you can send us powdered eggs it would be fine, in any quantity. After that come meat, chocolate, rice, coffee and soap. Nothing else is really needed, fats being still by far the highest requirement on the list.

2. Life in Paris is still very austere. Electricity is being constantly cut off, at any time of the day and night; food is insufficient, poor, hard to get and expensive. There will not be enough heat to last till warm weather, even when heating only one room in every flat. Transports are still primitive and people are inclined to grumble an awful lot. Yet those who should know say that there will be a terrific recovery and it is just a question of being patient when things seem, on the contrary, to be getting worse and worse.

While this may be true from a purely economic standpoint, there is always the chance that it may be hampered or even jeopardized by political developments. In the long run, the chances are very good for a prosperous, healthy and powerful France, but the next months will be critical. A—— M——.

P. S.: Two Danish parcels just arrived—superb.

Dreamed of the Journal

Manila, P. I.

Dear Miss Batchelder: In all those horrible years under the brutal Japanese rule, I often thought about the LADIES' HOME JOURNAL, which was my favorite magazine, and about its editors—especially my favorite one, the food editor. I would have given anything I had for a copy of the JOURNAL then.

When the American liberators came, the first thing I thought was, "Now we can send for some news from the States." But it took several months more before civilians were allowed mail for the States. Sometimes I could not help wondering if you were still living; but then, I forget the war never came actually to your door. Unlike our poor Philippines, where if we went about asking for friends or relatives whom we last saw alive and healthy, we would only find out that more than half had been killed by inhuman Japs.

You don't ask people here, "How is So-and-so?" You ask, "Is he still living?" I say to myself at such times, how silly of me to think that way about my friends in America, because war did not reach their shores after all. I'm very sure almost that all of you are there still, making the JOURNAL the same as if nothing ever happened. Am I right?

I am almost sure those gorgeous pictures of food on your pages are still there, prettier than ever, and those pictures of gardens that look too good to be true.

I hope the Diary of Domesticity is still going on. We seemed to live our dreams of seeing New England and its beautiful springs and still winters when we read it.

Here in the Philippines the G.I.'s are leaving fast. They used to be more than the population of the city itself, but now we see only a few of them walking about the ruined city.

I am sending a picture of the baby in our family. We named him after your late President, whom we all loved, and also after your great general and admiral (Nimitz). We like Halsey very much, too, but adding William would be too much, so we left it out reluctantly. Franklin Douglas Chester Garcia, my brother's child, is one and a half years old and always full of smiles. We hope he will grow up into a big man and visit you all there someday.

The war and battle of Manila has left us with three rickety chairs and a table and a few magazines of prewar vintage which we had been guarding carefully, plus a few books. We used to have a radio and a piano which was the joy of the family, but they were wiped out and now belong to memories of the past only. Even my beloved waffle iron has gone, but it was sold during the Jap regime to keep us from starvation.

But now that hunger is of the past it surprises me to hear people beginning to kick. Maybe their returned energy does it, I don't know, human nature's sometimes peculiar. There are so many things to be thankful for that I find very little time to complain and whine. It is true that the city is all in ruins and dust and slums, but on a bright sunny day and standing by the seaside, no amount of ruins can depress me. And among the most beautiful sights on earth are the stately ships on the blue bay and the scores of sailors in dazzling white with bell-shaped trousers, strolling in groups. They are about the cleanest-looking creatures we have ever seen here and the jolliest too.

Franklin Douglas Chester Garcia.

The biggest ocean on earth lies between your country and mine, but it only exists in imagination for our hearts are so near to you, bound by the common ties of human justice, tolerance and charity.

Ever your admirer,
ELVIRA CRUZ.

Oh, Our Aching Backs!

Evanston, Illinois.

Dear Editor: I find I do not like the JOURNAL at all.

MRS. W. D. METZGER.

Victoria, B. C., Canada.

Dear Editor: It is without doubt the best women's magazine on the market.

DOROTHY P. AUSTIN.

St. Joseph, Missouri.

Dear Editors: The JOURNAL is the best magazine-for-the-whole-family.

MRS. S. S. RAY.

Due to lack of sufficient paper, we cannot begin to supply the current demand for the JOURNAL. In fact, we have had to limit circulation aims to 5,000,000 by January 1, 1947. So it is just as well, perhaps, that not everyone likes the JOURNAL, right now. ED.

Better Relations Dept.

Cincinnati, Ohio.

Dear Sir: I would like to add my belated thanks to the many on Quality.

The most levelheaded comment I have heard came from the Negro president of a national CIO union. The value and significance of publication of this story in the JOURNAL, he said, lay in the fact that thousands who are almost completely ignorant of conditions facing the Negro in the South were thereby given some of these facts in a form which they were most likely to read.

I want to thank you for your assistance to the cause of better relations between races and groups in America.

Sincerely yours,
MARSHALL BRAGDON.
Executive Secretary, the Mayor's Friendly Relations Committee.

(Continued on Page 13)

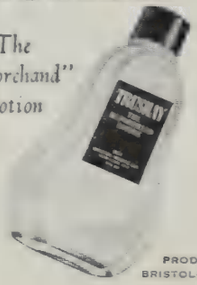
"Sweet enough to eat!" he whispers. And you... with your fresh, white frills, your soft Trushay-tended hands... you planned it that way!



How faithfully this different hand lotion rewards its faithful users!

You can use fragrant, creamy Trushay a special "beforehand" way... before tubbing lingerie, before dishes. It guards hands even in hot, soapy water.

And be sure to use Trushay whenever, wherever your skin needs its softening touch.

TRUSHAY

The "Beforehand" Lotion

PRODUCT OF BRISTOL-MYERS

America's all Excited about the...

ZENITH COBRA TONE ARM

The Sensational NEW Way to Play Records!

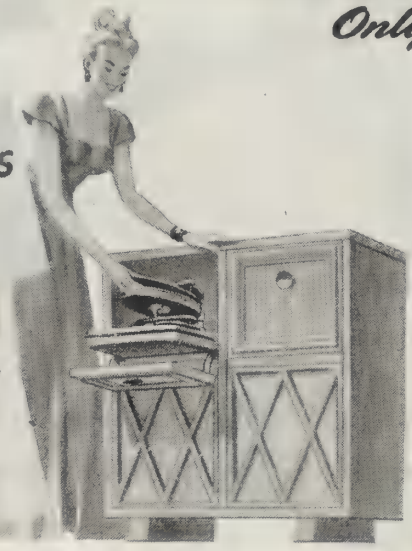
GOODBYE HISS, SCRATCH, RATTLE!

NO NEEDLES TO CHANGE!



BRINGS OUT HIGH AND LOW NOTES UNHEARD BEFORE!

RECORDS LAST HUNDREDS OF PLAYS LONGER!

DROPPING ARM ON RECORD- EVEN SCRAPING- HARMS NOTHING!

Only Zenith has this! The Zenith Cobra Tone Arm is so revolutionary that radio stations all over America are using it to broadcast records!

In fact, the Cobra is not just a new tone arm but an entirely new principle! It reproduces tones on a Radionic Wave... uses no old-fashioned crystals or magnets.

You won't know your own records when you first play them with the Cobra. You'll hear high and low notes never heard before because they were masked and muffled. And annoying surface noise is gone, because no other tone arm rests so lightly (⅔ of an ounce) on the surface of the records!

Think of it—no needles to change! And the "Floating Filament" in the head of the Cobra so reduces wear on records that they last hundreds of plays longer. What's more, this filament is instantly retractable, so you can drop—even scrape the Cobra across records—and harm nothing!

See this exciting demonstration today. It will thrill and amaze you!

COPYRIGHT 1946, ZENITH RADIO CORPORATION

WORLD'S FASTEST AUTOMATIC RECORD CHANGER!

America's all excited about the Zenith Silent-Speed Changer, too. See it change 10 and 12 inch records mixed, automatically, in only 3½ seconds! No complicated "gadgets," levers, knives. It's smooth and gentle as a mother's arms!

ZENITH RADIO

•LONG DISTANCE•

30 YEARS OF "KNOW-HOW" IN RADIONICS EXCLUSIVELY

(Continued from Page 10)

Undoing "Good Work"?

Brooklyn, New York.

Dear Editor: The novel Quality started out as a story with a worth-while message and ended with a do-nothing attitude. The author's conclusion that the magnanimity of "quality folk" will give to the Negro people more and better education, political equality and law enforcement is obviously fallacious, as may be seen by their lack of action so far. A few more pieces of journalism like this will undo your previous good work in making a truly united nation out of our country.

Very truly yours,
MRS. BARBARA SEGAN.
MRS. RITA SAFER.

As "The Little Flower" used to say, as mayor of New York City, what one needs is "patience and fortitude." ED.

There's Nothing Like A Short Quick Trip

Wilkes-Barre, Pennsylvania.

Dear Editor: On a recent voyage from a distant Pacific isle it was my pleasure to run across a copy of The New Yorker for 28 July, 1945, from which enclosed advertisement is torn. The scene in the upper panel must either take place Stateside or overseas. If it takes place Stateside, there is no reason for a man to be downcast. He has 80 points and is in the States. What more can he want?

Never Underestimate the Power of a Woman!

Therefore we must assume that he is overseas. Now, let us consider his point score. A breakdown of the figures indicates that he has been in service 38 months, has served 27 months overseas and has accumulated 15 points for battle stars or awards. These points must be figured to date rather than as of V-E Day because, if they were figured any other way, the twins could not be included. As of the end of July, he had 80 points and was overseas. Closer examination of the figures shows he spent only 11 months in the States before he was shipped overseas. Therefore when could he have fathered those twins?

Sincerely,
MICHAEL ELLIS.

P.S.: Of course I am still not underestimating the power of a woman.

It's all perfectly legitimate. Our soldier had an emergency furlough. ED.

m-m-M-MM-MMM!!!

Dodge City, Kansas.

Dear Editors: Your magazine is terrif. In case you're not aware of it, loads of fifteen-year-olds get beyond the sub-deb page of the JOURNAL. Your article Meet Three Career Girls was enrapturing.

Please write some more about New York in your magical magazine.

Very truly—I-can-dream-can't-I?—yours,
(MISS) J. McFADDEN.

A Quiet Sky is Still Strange to Dorothy

The Duke's Cottage, Rudgwick, England.

My dear Bruce and Beatrice: London was quite wonderful, like a circus broken loose. Handsome men in Stetsons. Upstanding persons in flowing burnooses. And with us, too, was your dear Mrs. Roosevelt. I hoped to take her a box of eggs if only my hens obliged, with love from one of her warmest admirers. She always seems to me an example of the woman who, bitten at, never snaps back, and her page in the JOURNAL is one of my favorite ones. I do hope she and all the rest of our honored guests brought warm underwear. We have had one of those curious British winters, when one day it freezes, and you pile on everything. The next day, a June temperature bursts on a startled world, and roses and violets (my garden is full of them) roar into ill-advised bloom. Unwise persons then shed a clout, and at 4 P.M., far from home, lo, the wind changes, and it snows and freezes. Then we cannot imagine where we got that horrid cold.

Later. I wonder what the outcome of this great UNO conference will be. And what will happen to this poor old world, unless we can all agree. I still find it very peculiar to look out the windows and see the night sky all plain, and trimmed with nothing but stars, and a curious thing—not, I find, peculiar to me—is that three or four aircraft bustling over, which they do rarely now, and at long intervals, bring one out in a sudden cold sweat! Hangover from other days, I suppose.

Daughter Mary, like the lady in white on your recent cover, will soon be starting to show her daughter how to knit a little blue sock. The courage of these young things amazes me, but I suppose I was just as brave, long ago. Having babies far from home and friends, in a bungalow on a hilltop, round which jungle cats yowled and bawled. Maybe it is with middle age that caution creeps in.

My love to you all,
DOROTHY BLACK.

To all those who have asked Dorothy to stay with them in Miami, Hollywood and various other spots—any one of which is far superior to the climate in England—we must regrettably report that Dorothy herself is back in England, doing the best with the climate which Winston Churchill reports as "salubrious if not indulgent." Dorothy says "only my distance from them prevents my accepting all their invitations." ED.

Authors Should Sign the Pledge

Colville, Washington.

Dear Editors: Of course, I enjoy the JOURNAL. But do all the fiction writers spend their time, or have their characters spend so much of theirs, drinking cocktails and highballs, and smoking cigarettes? A great life, I'll say. I am seventy-three years old, and live on a 640-acre ranch and wouldn't be interested in such a life.

MRS. P. H. TOMLINSON.

That is one of our quarrels with writers. If all people smoked and drank as much as the average character in a story, the tobacco and liquor manufacturers would have to harness atomic energy to fill the demand. Truth is, writers, like the rest of us, are occasionally lazy. Drinking and smoking have become the clichés of writers and the occupational diseases of heroes and heroines. If you believe authors, no character ever pulls his ear, twitches his nose, crosses his ankles, squirms more comfortably into his underwear, or just sits. Not at all. They spend hours "working on a drink," or even "selecting a cigarette." We wish the Authors League would pass a resolution. ED.

Proud of UNRRA

Mrs. Dorothy McCallum, JOURNAL reader of Victoria, B. C., sent us the following excerpts of a recent letter from her daughter.

Prague, Czechoslovakia.

Dearest Mum: I think I am going to like my job. I have seen enough of the

(Continued on Page 116)

AT EASE!

for the REST of his life!

ENGLISH CLUB (48)

—in his Beautiful Streit "Slumber" Chair

ALL THE LUXURY all the comfort he's been dreaming about . . . rolled up into one big beautiful chair—the Streit "Slumber" Chair. It makes a man twice as glad to be home again.

If you want to be convinced that the "Slumber" Chair is the most comfortable chair in the world, just try relaxing in one. The thick, upholstered, spring-filled back and seat cushion cradle the body gently in a natural pocket . . . and the comfort-height, matching footstool rests the legs on an even keel.

You'll agree with thousands of others that, "for the REST of your life there's nothing to compare with the Streit Slumber Chair".

AUTHENTIC PERIOD DESIGNS! Streit Chairs are designed to harmonize with many periods of furniture—choose the one that fits your decorative scheme.

EARLY AMERICAN (18)

JEFFERSON (15)

Streit SLUMBER CHAIR

This triangular trade-mark appears on the back rail of each genuine Streit "Slumber" Chair. Look for it.

Only the Streit "Slumber" Chair has these exclusive features

1. Every "Slumber" Chair has a matching footstool with concealed compartment for books, needlework, etc.; 2. Three-position seat and back adjustment; 3. Both seat and back recline with each adjustment; 4. Reclining seat action prevents slipping forward and provides EQUAL WEIGHT DISTRIBUTION for perfect relaxation; 5. Always knee-high—the front of the seat remains the same height from the floor with each adjustment; 6. The luxuriously soft, thick cushions snuggle up firmly to support the small of the back.

THE BEAUTIFUL Streit "SLUMBER" CHAIR

ON SALE AT FURNITURE AND DEPARTMENT STORES EVERYWHERE

IT'S NEW!

THE CORNED BEEF HASH

WITH THAT "FRESH-MADE" FLAVOR!

...IT'S ARMOUR STAR

Your first taste tells you there's a delicious difference in this corned beef hash! The meat is juicier . . . far fresher to taste! The potatoes are firmer, whiter! This exciting improvement grew out of new cooking methods, developed by Armour during the war. Tomorrow, use the menu given here to please your family with a double-quick corned beef hash dinner.

© ARMOUR AND COMPANY 1946

Tempting Spring Dinner

Armour Tomato Juice
Baked Armour Star Corned Beef Hash*
Buttered Broccoli Spring Onions
Compote of Pineapple and Strawberries

Bake 30 minutes in 350° F. oven. Garnish with line of pickle relish through center, bordered by chopped hard cooked egg white and sieved yolk. Serves 3-4.*

Fifty Years Ago in the Journal

IN April, 1896, New York sweltered in ninety-degree heat, Theodore Dreiser wrote the lyrics for his brother's hit, On the Banks of the Wabash, Far Away, and Jim Corbett signed to fight Fitzsimmons. College bookshops displayed James Barrie's Sentimental Tommy, and Jude the Obscure, by Thomas Hardy; but, according to the Boston Journal, Edward Bok's Successward was "unquestionably the book of the day for young men."

And showing that young men haven't changed much, Lilian Bell writes in the April, 1896, Journal, "When a man speaks of a 'simple white muslin' in the softly admiring tone he generally adopts to go with it, he means anything on earth which produces in his mind the effect of youth and innocence. A ball dress or a cotton morning gown is to him 'a simple white muslin.'"

"Hortense: The best cosmetics are exercise in the open air, care to your diet, and good, kind, hopeful thoughts that will bring a pleasant expression into your face."

"An artistic way to treat the floors of bedrooms," advises Helen Jay, "is to enamel them in the colors used on metal bedsteads."

"For an American girl, I recommend a tepid bath taken all through the warm months, and a sponge bath of tepid water during the cold ones," believes Ruth Ashmore.

Wedding backdrop: "Take a tennis net, fishnet or hammock, and weave white flowers and ferns in and out of the meshes. Charming!"

"A row of gutta-percha buttons extends from the edge of each sleeve to the elbow," Isabel Mallon describes an Easter gown. "The high crush collar is black satin, the black straw hat burdened with plumes and a high pompon of white lace."

High tea: "Chicken and waffles, fried oysters and hot biscuit, ice cream, Charlotte russe, pickles, preserves, bread and butter, coffee and tea."

"Prudence: Until two people are engaged, it is wisest for them to be as formal as possible, and never speak to or of each other without the prefix Mr. or Miss."

"I cannot recommend the use of peroxide of hydrogen on the hair," rebukes Ruth Ashmore. "The color obtained by it gives a woman a very undesirable appearance."

JOURNAL ABOUT TOWN

HAAS

Any light means "go" to New York pedestrians, which adds greatly to the hazards of rainy-day bus driving.

GOSSIP ABOUT PEOPLE YOU KNOW, EDITORS YOU LIKE AND WHAT GOES ON IN NEW YORK

WHEN a group of editors like the Journal's travels more than half a million miles a year getting material for the magazine, one of the minor problems faced in unfamiliar cities is what to do about crossing the street. Accustomed to New York, where pedestrians have the right of way even when they're wrong, and women have learned to dart through traffic with the skill of a dancer, we get self-conscious in a city like Syracuse, where people wait politely for the green before they try to cross the street, even with no vehicles in sight; and in San Francisco we're just as likely to get a summons.

Recently the Goulds went over to have dinner with the Viscount and Viscountess Astor in their very pleasant suite at the Ritz. During dinner Lady Astor spoke of how in London they'd wondered where they'd stay here in New York, having heard that all hotels were filled to overflowing—until their son Bill told them, "Why, you shouldn't have any difficulty getting into the Ritz. After all, remember, you own it." Lord Astor had forgotten.

The Ritz is home to the Astors.

Judy Barry has found a lunch place downtown with a juke box which has a really revolutionary feature. The box has a nickel slot that buys five minutes of silence.*

At a luncheon given here lately by a large grocery chain, Alice Blinn, who went mostly to hear Harold Stassen, returned with an item about hats and coffee. You get a coupon with every pound of the chain store's brand, which you mail with a dollar to Chicago and receive materials and pattern for making a hat of either calot or beret style, in almost any color you want—taking only ten minutes to make, they claim. . . . "How was Stassen?" we asked Miss B. . . . "Wonderful!" she said.

A familiar sign of peace in town this spring will have been the famous Flower Show, which should be just finishing now—the first in four years. With Peace the theme, and more people expected to pack into Grand Central Palace than ever before, the new rose, Peace, gets a special garden to itself, and modern architecture makes its first appearance at the show in the form of a prefabricated beach house which sells for three thousand dollars—taking a lot of attention from the flowers.

Sonja Henie hates ice in her drinking water. . . . In Denver, you can't photograph a woman in a bathing suit without her consent; and it's against the law in England to marry your mother-in-law. . . . Mary Martin's new show, LUTE SONG, had its première in 1391 in China. . . . In her act, Hildegarde loses several hundred expensive lace handkerchiefs a year. Admirers steal them. . . . Only one in every seventy-five marriages between college-educated men and women fails, despite the fact they have few children. . . . British author James Hilton likes Hollywood because it cured his asthma. . . . After the success of Chili Williams and Choo-Choo Johnson, one Conover model wanted to call herself Spring Fever. . . . Winston Churchill made his first speech in America in 1900. Mark Twain introduced him. . . . There's a concern in New York which disinfects your phone twice a week. . . . Mayo Clinic's Dr. Earl Elkins says that if bobby-soxers continue to wear moccasins and ballet slippers, they'll end up with "sled runners for feet."

The jewelry people tell us that within the past six months engagement rings have been going greater guns than ever—and mostly it's the girls who are buying them!

Rumors around the Workshop now are that the next assembly of the United Nations Organization will be held right next door at one of the largest theaters in the world, the Center. By far the biggest in the world is the Music Hall, right down underneath the Workshop.

Our Sub-Deb Department, headed by Maureen Daly, is full of lovely young girls, so we were somewhat startled to learn that the department had a new baby! Seems they decided to adopt one, which means they send $15 a month to the Foster Parents Plan, here in town, which sum supports a child somewhere in Europe. Anyone able can do the same. Bob Hope has "adopted" a ten-year-old Dutch girl, Pineke Zijda; and Beatrice Blackmar Gould has kept several babies alive that way: first a Spanish baby marooned in France, then a French child in England, and now an English child in England—all in addition to Ivor and Lucille Drummond, whom she cared for in her home here during the war.

Pineke—Bob gives her new Hope.

We're waiting to see if Sixth Avenue's new name really sticks before changing the Workshop's address on our stationery, but in the meanwhile Dawn Crowell tells us of a barber-shop down the street which advertises an "Avenue of the Americas Haircut." Extra long Latin sideburns.

This Magazine Cover got its start in 1927

That's MADELON MASON smiling at you from that magazine cover—she's one of this year's most famous cover girls.

You might say this cover got its start in 1927, for Madelon has had that Ivory Look for all her 19 years. Her radiant complexion has already put her on the cover of more than fifteen famous magazines.

HOW DOES A COVER GIRL GET THAT WAY?

Well, with Madelon's first bath as a baby, she started regular care with pure, mild Ivory Soap. Here's one of her early baby pictures.

Madelon won a beauty contest when she was five, which proves that you're never too young (or too old) to start getting an Ivory complexion.

Today she says: "I still use Ivory Soap—'cause I know many doctors advise it for skin care—it's mild enough even for babies!"

"PLEASE SEND PIN-UP PICTURE," FANS WRITE

Madelon does, by hundreds! Boys started asking for Madelon's picture when her first cover appeared—and they've never stopped.

"The finest compliments I get are from fans who write in," she says. "They say I'm their idea of a real All-American Girl! So I've lots of reasons for sticking to Ivory care!"

BEING A FAMOUS MODEL ISN'T EASY

Madelon's on the go all day—every cover means hours of difficult posing. "But no matter how tired I am," Madelon says, "I never neglect my complexion. You can't afford to be careless about that if you want that Ivory Look!"

If you want a softer, smoother, lovelier skin, change to Madelon's beauty secret—regular, gentle cleansings with pure, mild Ivory Soap!

More Doctors advise Ivory than any other soap..

99 44/100% pure it floats!

Watch out for Waste! Make your Ivory last—it contains critical materials!

The Gifts of Love

PEOPLE said marriage had changed Jane Rankin, but they didn't agree on just how she was different. If the unsmiling seriousness with which her eyes met theirs had irritated them, if her shyness had seemed unfriendliness, the people in Allison now said she'd come down off her high horse, that her ladyship was almost civil, and they speculated on just what sort of a fellow she'd married.

William Rankin, Ph.D., professor of chemistry at Allison University, watched his younger daughter in her new marriage and was glad, and a little relieved. It was good to see her giving herself to marriage. And to see marriage changing her—as a windbreak changes the contours of a tree, so its bleak skeleton side becomes fringed as it was meant to be, so that it yields with grace where it had been rigid in resistance.

He rather hoped she wouldn't have children for a while—though he'd like the feel of a little girl's hand in his again. Linda's twins had been born before she'd grown into her marriage—with the result that she never quite did. He'd never really understood his other daughter Linda, only indulged her. Yet she was intelligent; she just didn't like thinking.

The major-domo bowed to the junior Mrs. Harlan Stokes and took her to the best table. Mrs. Stokes belonged to the inner circle by marriage, so—as was often the case—she was beautiful.

"A dry sherry, Vernon." Linda removed one white glove with cultivated ennui. Deliberately, as if it were a curving silver dagger, she laid the mood that had been troubling her all day on the table top, next to the onyx ash tray. He was beautiful. He ought to be boorish, boring, or otherwise impossible, but he wasn't. He was all kinds of smooth and he was married to your kid sister. And Jane, with her good glands and Phi Beta Kappa key, would have been equally content with an assistant in dad's department or a peppy insurance salesman.

★ ★ This novel was awarded a major prize in the Avery Hopwood and Jule Hopwood contest in fiction for 1945 at the University of Michigan. Copyright, 1946, by Andrina Iverson Gilmartin. Condensed from the novel soon to be published by Farrar, Straus & Co., Inc. ★ ★

Privately, Linda would have been pleased to see Jane a minister's wife, or married to a brilliant young surgeon with bad manners. But Jane had picked herself this lean, bronze giant with a look in his eyes that made your stomach contract with ecstasy and nausea.

Warren had been around, it seemed, before he met Jane. Hilda Holt's brother had been at school with him and she was positive he'd been engaged to a girl in Boston. Linda could imagine women loving Warren since he wore knee pants, but when he danced with her—as he had last night—clocks stopped until she realized he was not noticing how beautifully she danced or how deftly she juggled bright quips.

"You're rather a bore, darling. You've talked about Jane all evening. And after all, she's my sister, so I know her too."

He'd smiled—that smile that ate your heart out. "I suppose. I just happen to be in love with her."

Linda felt the sharpness of the dagger's bright edge. Because Harlan's such a sap at times, everybody else's marriage looks better to me. Jane's as sexless as a milk bottle, and he'll take her primness about three years and be fed up. But until he comes to, I'll be happier seeing less of him—or them. Besides, Harlan had been on the nasty side going home last night. Handling him wasn't as easy as it used to be.

"Hi, chum." Hilda dropped her furs and bag. "I need a drink. And not sherry, if you know what I mean. Here comes Tess. . . . Hi-ya, toots? What do you know that's new and exciting?"

Tess smirked and squeezed into the triangle they'd left for her. "You should ask. 'Lo, Linda. Don't look a day older than you did last night. Wow, have I got a head! It was your birthday we were celebrating, wasn't it? I can't seem to remember much about it. But that Warren—where'd Jane find him? He's delovely."

Linda laughed. "Control yourself, Tessie. We're keeping him in the family." She bit her lip. I shouldn't have said that. Hilda's a cat. Now I'll have to play her right if I don't want to get myself clawed to a fringe.

"Warren ——"

"Be right there."

Jane poured cream into a blue willow pitcher, and set two grapefruit halves on the red-checked tablecloth under the window. A pale November sun touched the copper ladles on the wall and brightened the green of the philodendron trailing from a chintz-skirted plate shelf. It was an early American kitchen with the grimness left out—or rather, as much like one as an apartment house kitchen-dining space could be made to look. An old blue soup tureen stood between brass candlesticks on the window sill, a red, cross-stitched sampler said there was no place like home; the Cleveland Plain Dealer said it was Friday, November 24, 1933.

SHE heard the closet door close and turned toward the stove. If only you had some idea how your face looked when you weren't even sure of what you were feeling. She stirred the oatmeal and turned off the burner. His face would look new-shaven and remote. It always did at breakfast. She'd just had time to run a lipstick across her mouth, but he'd look neat as new shoes.

"Good morning." His hands were on her shoulders, turning her around. He spoke slowly, as if he'd been waiting a long time to say it, as if it weren't already seven-forty-seven and they weren't seventeen minutes later than usual.

"Warren, I love you." It wasn't what she'd meant to say, nor even what she'd been thinking. But there it was. I love you. Before eight o'clock in the morning. And sounding so desperate.

He kissed her gently, as if he would comfort her for the admission. "Meet me in town tonight. Take a cab down. We'll do something special—by ourselves." He pulled out her chair and opened the paper.

She looked at his sun-browned hands, noted vaguely the tie he'd chosen, saw him frown at something he was reading. But she felt nothing—not even her usual annoyance at the discrepancy between her striped chambray and his English worsted.

"About six?" He'd finished his second cup of coffee. "Where'll you be?"

"Down at the lake, I guess. If it's too cold, I'll walk over to the building."

"Okay." He went into the hall and she heard him humming Lady be Good. After a minute she followed him. He tipped her chin and kissed her squarely on the mouth. "I never felt less like leaving you."

The door closed and she dropped into the nearest chair. And now? How much wiser men were than women. The pulse in her throat hammered. This was marriage then. This was what he'd meant, what he'd been asking for all the turbulent two years since they'd met.

LOVELY, red-letter day, October 12, 1931. Marjorie, still looking like a coed in her polo coat and beret, stopped at the library on her way to the grocery. "Can you come to dinner Monday? John's bringing a man home with him." There was nothing unusual about it. She'd been a fourth at Marjorie's dinner and bridge tables for years.

Monday had been a bright, blue day framed in maple leaves and gold. She wore her new beige suit and stopped at the florist's for Marjorie's favorite yellow roses. Going out to dinner was always an adventure. She pushed the bell.

"Oh, Jane, I'm so glad you're early!"

She offered her green flower box. "So'm I. But what's wrong?"

"I wasn't going to tell you just yet. I'm going to have a baby."

"Oh, Margy, how nice."

"Well, I thought so yesterday, and I probably will tomorrow again, but right now—— My vacuum went on the fritz this morning, so I got real smarty and tried to clean the rugs with wet tea leaves and about died. I forgot to defrost last night and now I'm not sure my dessert will be firm, and just this minute I spilled almost a pound of coffee on the kitchen floor, and I'm not even dressed yet."

"Poor dear. Coffee and what else do you need?"

"Nothing, I guess. You're sure you don't mind? I called John, but he's left. It's Warren Gregory tonight, did I tell you? John says he's nice. And thank you for the flowers. I'll fix the door so you can get in."

Marjorie and John with a baby. It'd be adorable. She got the coffee and a bag of the first fall nuts. "And some of those apples," she decided suddenly. Marjorie and John were going to be a family. Families always ate apples on October evenings—or they ought to. She forgot about feeling svelte and well dressed and lifted her face to the quickening wind.

"Hello, I'm back."

"Good."

She raised startled eyes to the face above hers.

"You're Miss Rankin."

"Yes, I am."

"I'm Warren Gregory. John's in the kitchen. Let me take your packages."

"Thank you. Just put them on the table. They don't need anything done to them—yet." She walked slowly upstairs.

Marjorie said, "Come in here, will you, Jane?" Her face was flushed and not twinkling as it usually did. "I've tried on practically everything I own and they're all too tight. And they fit me yesterday, I swear they did. Have you seen him? Is he nice?" She turned back to the triple mirrors. "I look hideous."

"No, you don't. Look, if you don't mind, I could slit these seams at the waist and if you wore a wider belt to cover—maybe a gold one?"

Marjorie took a deep breath. "I don't look too funny?"

"You look lovely."

"Aw, Jane, you're so nice. I hope you marry someone just as special as John."

"I hope I do too."

"Perfume and a hanky, and I'm all set." Her eyes had begun to dance again. "You take your time. Forget about Margy's domestic doldrums."

Jane sat down on the dressing-table bench, put her make-up on with special care, and started downstairs. Maybe he preferred blondes. Maybe he thought long hair stodgy. Maybe he'd been unwillingly roped into this.

"Hello, Jane." John held out his hand. "Marge says you've been pulling her chestnuts out of the fire. Come on, your drink's waiting." The living room smelled of roses and wood smoke. "And this is Warren Gregory. He says you met in the vestibule."

"Yes."

"Will you sit here, Miss Rankin?" He pushed the little wing chair closer to the fire. He was taller than he'd seemed at first. Very tall, really. And bronzed. As if the sun had taken the color from his hair and tinted his face and hands, so the effect was monotone except for the amazing blueness of his eyes.

MARJORIE came in with a tray of olives wrapped in sizzling bacon. "What, in the gloaming, oh, my darlings? Jane, light the candles."

"She's like this on Mondays," John apologized. "Bossy."

Jane stood on tiptoe to reach the candles in the sconce above the mantle. "I feel like an altar boy."

"No-o." John shook his head. "From where I stand, more like a hosiery ad by McClelland Barclay. What's the matter, Warren? Don't you like your drink?"

He said, "Very much. I was just noticing the glasses. They're clever."

"That's the password." Marjorie settled beside him on the sofa. "We never invite people back unless they say something nice about our glasses. Jane gave them to us for Christmas."

That kind of evening. Nothing startling said. Nobody terribly clever. But everything a lot of fun. Warren had been graduated from M.I.T. in '26, so she thought he must be twenty-eight or so. He had an apartment (Continued on Page 118)

"YOU'RE MY WIFE," WARREN TOLD HER. "YOU BELONG TO ME."

BUT HER MIND INSISTED, "I'M JANE. I BELONG TO MYSELF."

ILLUSTRATED BY ALEX ROSS

He slumped into his chair, hands covering his face. "I love you with all that's best in me," she said. "Isn't that enough?"

But even as he laughed and held Danny close, he was remembering the pool Danny had fallen into, and thinking what might have happened if someone had not been there to pull him out.

Time Enough

BY MARGARET WEYMOUTH JACKSON

"ANOTHER thing that I want you to do," said Tom Nelson at the breakfast table, "is to get Danny out of that fenced yard. All the place needs is a couple of towers, with guards with machine guns, to make a first-class stalag."

There was a little silence. Jane was resolved not to quarrel with her husband. Her primary need was to get along with him, and she could do it. She doubted if he realized how bossy he had been ever since he came home. It was taking a good deal of patience to keep the peace. But she looked out into her mother's back yard, and could not help thinking that Tom was most unfair.

There was, to be sure, a good stout white-painted picket fence all around that part of the yard which was behind the house, with a gate that latched firmly. But it was a large space, with flowers and shrubs planted inside the fence. There was a sand pile, with buckets and shovels and even more desirable pie pans and spoons from the kitchen. There was a comfortable old-fashioned lawn swing where Jane had spent many pleasant hours, with sewing or a book, while Danny played by himself, or with his young cousins or neighborhood children. The place bore no remote resemblance to a prison compound. But Jane tried to remember that Tom had been forming his own theories and ideas.

Through the trees, now rich in autumn foliage, the roofs and dormer windows of neighboring houses of the town could be seen. Here, during the war, other girls, like herself and her sister Ellen, had stayed in prolonged daughter status with their small children beside them. These young mothers considered Mrs. Wolcott's back yard the finest place to play in Barberry Lane.

"You must remember, Tom," Jane said mildly, "that it's only a few hundred yards up the lane to the highway, which is jammed with heavy traffic all the time. If Danny isn't in the yard, he must be watched incessantly."

"Then watch him incessantly," said Tom grandly. "Make it your first duty!"

Jane heard a small sound, scarcely discernible, but easily identified as a snort from her mother. Jane held her peace.

Tom elaborated his idea. "Women do not seem to be aware of it, but it does something to the masculine soul to be fenced in. Something disastrous. I never want any of our children in a play pen or a fenced yard. I'll get a man today to help me remove the fence."

"Hey!" said Mrs. Wolcott. "After all, it's my fence. I like it. And I have other grandchildren who need it. Trudy, for instance, is only fifteen months old, and still needs a play pen. If you want to leave the gate open when Danny's out there alone, or if you want to take him out on the street, that's up to you. But I'd like to keep my fence."

"Another reason Danny shouldn't be fenced," said Tom, pursuing his own line of thought without regard to his mother-in-law's protest, "is that he has to learn to take care of himself and he may as well start now. I've had boys to train who had never even slept away from home in their eighteen or nineteen years. Their way was unnecessarily hard. They couldn't make a decision. Danny may as well begin now to learn to be a little man."

"You haven't forgotten that he's only twenty-seven months old, have you?" asked Jane.

Danny, who heard his name and knew that they were talking about him, rapped on the high chair with his spoon like a good committee chairman. "Shereal gone-gone," Danny told them; "want tusht."

JANE took the cereal dish away and gave Danny a small piece of buttered toast. He wadded it up in his fat fist and began to scrub his high chair with it.

"Don't do that!" said Tom. "It's revolting!"

There was a shocked silence. Nothing that Danny did could possibly be considered deserving of such a word. Sometimes, they admitted reluctantly, he was a little naughty, or a little willful. But—revolting! Tom took the wadded bread from Danny's small fat fingers and tried to straighten it out. He spoke to his small son soberly, sternly.

"There are too many children in the world who never had a piece of white bread with butter on it in their whole lives," said Tom. "You must not waste your food. Now eat it, Danny."

Danny looked at his mother, gauged her lower lip with calipered accuracy, and he began to cry, a pitiful little blubber. He held out his arms to his mother and the big tears gathered in his blue eyes.

"Don't pity him, Jane," said Tom. "He must learn obedience, discipline. Eat your toast now, Danny. You asked for it."

But Tom did not have his son's uncanny ability to judge a situation, and trouble threatened. Danny hurled himself back in his chair, bumping his head hard, and began to scream. Mrs. Wolcott left the table abruptly, went out of the house and drove away in her car.

Jane smiled and said to Danny, "No, Danny, you must mind your father. That's what daddies are for. So eat your toast and don't play with it."

DANNY stopped screaming and looked at his mother in utter bewilderment. His look was so accusing that she flinched. No traitor was ever more severely condemned than was Danny's mother by that one burning look. But she withdrew her gaze from him. All this Tom saw, and for the first time he felt some sense of the complexities of her problems. Danny began to cry again, laid his head down on his folded arm on the high chair and sobbed heartbreakingly.

Jane got up and began to stack the dishes. She said, in a low voice, "You started this, Tom. You must finish it, if it takes all day, or he will never mind you. But next time think before you speak."

"There's nothing to think about," Tom said. "He shouldn't waste food. Eat it, Danny."

"Pot!" said Danny. This was always good for an emergency. His mother took him down and in a few minutes returned him to his high chair. Tom sat in his place and Danny in his and they eyed each other. Danny picked up the bread, made a motion as though to scrub it on his high-chair tray, then he laughed gaily, and to Jane's astonishment he put the wadded bread into his mouth and choked it down! He stood in the high chair and put one foot on his tray. "Down!" he demanded imperiously. "Danny good boy. Go bye-bye."

Tom lifted him down to the floor and Jane wiped his face and hands and removed his bib. She had had several battles with Danny and had not won them all. She was a little chagrined that Danny had obeyed his father so readily. She hoped the victory would not go to Tom's head. (Continued on Page 228)

ILLUSTRATED BY WALTER BAUMHOFER

IT SEEMED TO JANE THAT THE THREE YEARS TOM HAD BEEN IN THE ARMY HAD MADE HIM OUTGROW A LOT OF THINGS—PERHAPS EVEN A HOME WHICH SUDDENLY APPEARED CRAMPED

For a moment the discovery held actual horror, then Sally was at his elbow, a laugh behind her soft whisper.

Brook and River Meet

BY GLADYS TABER

ILLUSTRATED BY JON WHITCOMB

THE phone was ringing again. Billy, of course, didn't hear it because he was down the hall in his own room practicing his trumpet. A trumpet was a powerful instrument in an ordinary-size New York apartment. He was playing The Atchison, Topeka and the Santa Fe. His mother called three times, and then pounded on his door.

"Billy! Telephone! Telephone!"

The trumpet squawked fiercely and sizzled down. Billy emerged dreamily. "Hi, mom." He waved a brown hand.

"I don't know how you do it," she said.

"Do what?"

"Always need a haircut," she sighed.

Billy smiled vaguely and reached the phone. He draped his thin six feet over the phone table in an inverted-curve effect, held the receiver upside down and said pleasantly, "The Shadow speaking. Leave us discuss the murder quietly."

Kay went back to sorting things to take to the country. She had some phoning to do herself, but she gave it up. Billy would be glued to the phone half an hour, and at the end would say, "I'll ankle down right after lunch."

It was always the same. Pal Sam phoned and they talked endlessly and then met immediately afterward. All day they engaged in the business of being busy sixteen-year-olds, and the minute Billy got home again Pal Sam was calling up.

As nearly as Kay could make out, they generally went to the school gym and "wrassled around," and then went roller skating, and bicycled in Central Park, and rested by swimming in the school pool. If they weren't driven home by parents, they would eat hamburgers and chocolate ice cream and frankfurters and mixed sodas and then practice basketball a couple of hours. Then they topped off with a movie, preferring to sit through twice if it really gave.

And when Billy came home, his clothes looked like the Retreat from Moscow. Kay always took them separately to the laundry around the corner and apologized as she delivered them.

"The gym floor is dirty," Billy said, "and we always take our shoes off."

If only they would take some interest in girls! Kay was beginning to worry. Billy and Pal Sam had been forced to go to a good dancing class and undoubtedly they could perform suitably, but no one had ever seen them. They were frequently invited to parties which they felt no compulsion to attend. They were, Kay thought, a pair of completely antisocial savages.

TODAY she had planned to get a little help from Billy. The radio needed to go down the street to the shop and be checked. Big Bill's country shoes had to be resoled. She wanted some English muffins and a chocolate cake from Schrafft's to take to the country. And Billy had three pairs of slacks at the tailor's being let down in a final attempt to salvage them. They ought to make boy's pants of rubber material that would stretch down every week.

Kay piled clean curtains in a carton. The bedroom was simply full of junk to go to the country, and the worst of it was, the first trip back to town there would be just as much to carry in.

"Billy! Do hang up!" she called.

"Got a conference with Truman," Billy explained in the phone. "I'll ankle along. Meet you."

He wandered in, holding out a pack of cards.

"Pick any one," he said largely.

Kay said, "Darling, I just can't take time for you to do card tricks on me. We're going to the country Saturday and I've all this ——" She waved at the scattered debris of living. "And I need you to run errands."

"Well, look, mom, I got a very important routine today. Pal Sam and I ——"

"Never mind. You can take some time for the good of the family."

"I don't feel so good today. I'm awful tired." His brown eyes were wistful. "I kind of feel I'm coming down with something."

"Well, what were you planning with Pal Sam?"

"Oh, we're just going to smoosh around. Guy in the magic place has some new box tricks. And a coupla fellows are meeting us for basketball. I'll grab something to eat for supper so you won't have any bother at all today."

"If you don't feel well ——" But it was hopeless.

"I can just sort of relax on the gym floor and throw it off." His mouth was smiling. "I'll do the errands in the morning, honest." Then he put on his sweetest look, and it was the look that would melt the Pyramids. "How about my taking the car?"

"No," said Kay. "You know we don't ever use the car in town. You can go on the bus or the subway."

"Mom, the car needs some driving around."

KAY ran her hands through her nicely waved brown hair. "I sometimes wish you hadn't gotten that junior driving license," she said desperately. "But you cannot racket around New York in the old car, and that is flat."

"Pal Sam gets his car when his dad is in town."

"All right. I know you're underprivileged and your parents don't love you. But you can't have the car. It's going to fall to pieces any minute as it is and you're too young ——"

"Woman—please—not that!" His lifted hand begged her. "Not my age!"

"Furthermore," she said, trying to look severe, "I've made an appointment for you to go to the dentist before we leave this week end and I'll thank you not to come down with a head cold and have to postpone it. This summer we aren't going to run back and forth from Bethel to New York every other day."

Billy seemed to vanish instantly. She heard the door slam, and his receding whistle. It's Gotta be This or That!

It was a beautiful, soft day. Kay went to the window and looked down eight stories to the dark canyon of the street. The great trucks were rolling again, the taxis water-bugged over the stream of traffic, the war was over and everything was still terrible. What would they do if Billy never took an interest in girls? Everything would be so nice and peaceful if he just began to go around with girls. Movies and Child's for eggs and bacon and the girl's parents to undertake to get the children in early.

She ought to be glad he was through the age of running up and down in the elevator, ringing apartment bells and scooting out of sight. But raising a child in the city had so many hazards! Thank goodness, they'd be in Bethel soon and nothing to combat but his allergies.

The phone rang. It was Pal Sam wanting to know whether Billy had left. Kay packed seventeen empty quart jars, two summer blankets, a box of boogie records. The phone rang again. Somebody's mother wanted to invite Billy to a party. In a sudden access of determination, Kay said lightly, "He'd love to come. What time?" Now she was in for it. Maybe she could bribe him to go, with the latest Duke Ellington release.

When Bill, Sr., came home, she was throwing everything she couldn't decide about down the incinerator.

"Where's Billy?" he asked, kissing her. The smell of the subway was all over him and the smell of moth flakes all over her. They both made faces and drew back.

"He's getting his vitamins the hard way," she said. "Honestly, Bill, I am worried about him. I think he's—retarded or something. What were you doing at his age in Keokuk, Iowa?"

Bill dropped his hat. "I was all settled down with a girl named—a girl named—Louellen. I wonder whatever happened to her. She was a blonde."

"What did you do with her?"

(Continued on Page 100)

The only actual thing parents can be certain of is that a sixteen-year-old, like spring weather, is entirely unpredictable

LEARNING TO

THE pre-atomic popularity of bingo, gin rummy and soap opera suggests that we did not know what to do with the leisure we had before we went to war. Now that war work is over and atomic energy is here, we shall have much more leisure than we had before. What shall we do with it?

The old recipe of eight hours for work, eight hours for sleep and eight hours for love failed to take Sunday, among other things, into account. When we are all working thirty hours a week—a thirty-hour bill for Government employees is pending in Congress—we shall find ourselves with eighty-two waking hours on our hands. How shall we spend them?

The educator's answer is "Education," just as the baseball player's answer is "Baseball." But the educator can argue that thinking is the proper leisure-time activity of the thinking animal and, in addition, that in the present depressing state of civilization, thinking is indicated.

Civilians and veterans after every American war have shown a tendency to attend classes of some sort. The war just ended interrupted the education of many more millions of young men and women than were ever affected before. Thus the country now faces the greatest potential demand for education since the invention of the public school. And the potential demand comes from the largest and, educationally, most neglected group in the country, the adults. Total figures on draftee illiteracy in this war are not obtainable, but we know that the Army inducted 150,000 illiterates between June, 1943, and May, 1944; that the Navy, Marines and Coast Guard inducted some 50,000 more; and that Selective Service, by September 1, 1943, had rejected 341,000 registrants "because of lack of educational accomplishments." This condition among the young suggests an even worse condition among their elders, during whose youth education was much more limited than it is today.

WHAT KIND OF EDUCATION?

And the armed forces were concerned, when they spoke of "education," primarily with mere literacy. We all know now that mere literacy, indispensable as it is, is not enough. The extremely high degree of literacy in Germany and Japan did not protect their citizens against the sales talks of imperialism, Fascism and racism. A century ago the proposal that every child had a right to literacy was considered revolutionary. With the discovery that national literacy, even if we attain it, will not save the nation, we are compelled to advance the revolutionary proposal of genuine education for everybody throughout life.

Those who make the proposal of truly universal education may be suspected of believing that education is the hope of the world. Americans above all other people have asserted this faith most loudly. We have supposed that though we did not know too well how to manage our affairs, our children, who would get more schooling than we did, would know better. And so, as the motto of the University of Chicago puts it, we would let knowledge grow from more to more that life might be enriched. There was plenty of time; things would go on getting better and better, and bigger and bigger, and in a century or two we would have the kingdom of heaven here below.

But, besides discovering that we are not literate and that literacy is not enough, we are making the discovery that it is later than we thought. If education is indeed the hope of the world, we have got to start educating in a hurry. Our situation was grim before Hitler; we repelled him and our situation is critical. We have found, in atomic energy, the means of wiping ourselves off the earth. We know that the adult generation of today may have to save us if we can still be saved. We can't be saved by children or adolescents. And we know that the next war's atomic weapons will make the robot bomb look like the flintlock, just as the B-29 has made a museum piece of the "crate" that was flown in the last war.

If education, then, is the hope of the world, and the world is in a critical condition, we have got to educate our adults; not merely some of them, but all. And we have got to educate them, not merely amuse them, make them literate or train them for jobs.

Common sense supports Montesquieu's declaration that as the principle of a monarchy is honor and the principle of a tyranny fear, so the principle of a republic is education. The issue is not simply that of the consent of the governed; after all, the subject of a monarch or the slave of a tyrant in some sense "consents" to be ruled. The question, where all men rule and are ruled in turn, is the question of intelligent consent. If this nation wants democracy, everybody in it who has the franchise has got to be intelligent. Otherwise democracy is not self-government but, as Hobbes put it, "an oligarchy of orators."

We have built schoolhouses everywhere, and, though the instruction is inadequate and the children of the poor whites and the rich Negroes have not received equal opportunity with those of the rich whites, we have made remarkable progress in the extension of a minimum degree of literacy. But, preoccupied with our school-building fervor, we have neglected the business of carrying education into adult life. As it is the American ideal that education should continue to age eighteen, so it is the American practice that it should stop there. When a poor boy gets his high-school diploma, or a rich boy his college degree, he is through with education and ready to live. The time for learning has passed, and the time for making money has begun.

Thus there has been no real adult education in America. There have, it is true, been movements that paraded under this title; and some of them were fervent and even effective. But on the whole they have been romantic, diversionary or commercial. The Lyceum and Chautauqua movements, in science and religion respectively, were once popular. University extension courses, first undertaken on a large scale by President Harper, of the University of Chicago, have had considerable enrollments. Vocational courses of all sorts, including courses in literature that give schoolteachers enough credits to get a better-paying job, are on the rise everywhere. Churches and civic groups have sponsored popular forums where, one week, an explorer packs the house on the subject of Antarctica and the next week a general's wife packs it even fuller with an expurgated description of her husband's personal habits.

SCHOOLING IN LIFE, NOT JOBS

The nearest approach we have had to the adult education of England and the Scandinavian countries has been that of some of the more enlightened trade-unions, especially those like the International Ladies Garment Workers, whose members are largely immigrants who have brought cultural consciousness with them. But even here programs of the kind known as "practical" have predominated. They have been devoted not so much to education as to that single part of education which is education for political action.

None of these phenomena is adult education. The very prefix "adult" suggests that the sponsors are thinking of something different from education. The education of an adult is the same as the education of a child. It is a continuation of childhood education, the purpose of which is to communicate human skills to human beings and acquaint them with the enduring problems of life and society. The means of educating adults are, of course, different from those of educating children. Adults are not expected to stand in corners, stay after school or raise their hands for permission to leave the room. But education, once literacy has been achieved, is the same for all, and its end is the good life and the good society.

If men are to govern themselves and their community, the education they all need has nothing to do with vocational training. Vocational training, whether or not it is useful in getting a man a job, is indifferent to the good life and the good society. It is equally useful, if it is useful at all, to a libertine, a slave and a freeman. It is equally useful, if it is useful at all, in preserving a fascist state and a democratic state. And, for the most part, it is not useful at all. When there are jobs to be had, our population can get jobs; when there aren't, it can't. Employers are clamoring in increasing numbers for well-educated, rather than well-trained, applicants.

Prof. Alanson H. Edgerton, of the University of Wisconsin, has completed a twelve-year study of vocational training which discloses that three quarters of the employers prefer versatility in employees.

LIVE

Which will we learn faster: the lesson of destruction in the laboratory or the lesson of survival in the schoolroom?

BY ROBERT MAYNARD HUTCHINS

"Personality," Professor Edgerton reports, appears to be rated higher than skill or intelligence. Almost three quarters of all dismissals are due to irritability, tactlessness, unfairness and bad manners. Professor Edgerton says that the three C's to be desired in vocational training are courtesy, courage and co-operation.

But personality, courtesy, courage and co-operation cannot be produced by vocational training. To the extent that they can be deliberately produced, they can best be produced by the home, the community and an education which inquires into their nature. Vocational training produces vocational techniques, and, in a push-button age, more and more vocational techniques are more easily acquired on the job than in institutions which vainly attempt to imitate the job.

Everybody needs courtesy, courage and co-operation, not just to get or hold a job, but to live a human life and organize a human society. The objectives of education are temperance, prudence, fortitude and justice, together with the mastery of the basic human techniques of reading and writing, and the use of these techniques to examine the perennial problems of man in terms of the experience of the human race. We are men before we are salesmen or Englishmen. We are human before we are American. We are citizens before we are engineers or accountants. We all need an education for human and political activity, and we need it more as adults than we do as children.

The stock objections to education for adults are two. The first is that they haven't time. If, however, depression and war are in part the result of moral and political ignorance, it would seem imperative to take the time from business and bingo, lest, as the result of depression and war, we lose our business and our bingo altogether. The worst thing that can happen either to a man or a society is to lose the ability to learn. The hard-shelled reactionary is reactionary because his shell has hardened. It is the abandonment of the activity of learning that atrophies the ability, not the loss of the ability that atrophies the activity.

It may be true that you can't teach old dogs new tricks. But men are not dogs and thinking is not tricky. The myth that grownups cannot learn so easily as children is like the myth that Negroes cannot learn so easily as whites or peasants so easily as landlords. It is contradicted by the evidence.

BUT CAN ADULTS LEARN?

Professor Thorndike, of Columbia, has come to the conclusion that, although the ability to learn seems to reach its height at twenty-five and drops until, at forty-five, it corresponds to what it was at eighteen, "the change from eighteen to forty-five is so slight that there is no reason for diffidence, on the part of those in the prime of life, about undertaking new branches of learning." Professors Sorenson and Price, of the University of Minnesota, found that "the decline in the mental abilities of adults is functional; it results from disuse and not from organic degeneration."

Adults have to think if they are to govern themselves and one another, and their necessity is greater than that of children, who have smaller responsibilities. And, far from being harder to teach than children, they are easier. Remember, we are speaking here of education, and not of conditioning or training. If the aim of education is the good life and the good society, only the adult is fully capable of receiving it. As Aristotle observed, it is the old, not the young, who have had sufficient experience with the pressing problems of life to understand what the problems mean when they study them. The child who reads Macbeth reads a wonderful blood-and-thunder story; the adult who reads it may obtain, among other things, some insight into the fatal interaction of marriage and ambition.

Every experiment in the liberal education of adults, beginning with John Erskine's classes for American soldiers in France in 1919, has confirmed the suspicion not merely that adults can learn and are eager to do so, but also that ordinary adults can master difficult subjects regardless of their previous schooling. Liberal education is equally novel to American college graduates and to adults who never went to school, to veterans and to civilians, to the old and to the young. There has been little liberal education in America for more than half a century.

We are talking, these days, of one world, of common humanity, and of a world organization based on common principles and purposes. If we are going to build a world community, we have got to build it on the common characteristics of all men. We cannot build it on the differences of language, color, custom or vocation. We have got to build it on the common understanding that cuts across all differences, and the common understanding we seek is based on the fact that all men are moral and political animals; all of them facing, whatever their individual differences, the same moral and political problems, using the same instrument, human reason, to solve them. The common textbooks of mankind are its great books, beginning with Homer and the Bible. Dante and Shakespeare are universal and timeless men examining universal and timeless problems. Their works are the only tools of learning that bind men together.

While the liberal education of adults is the only conceivable education in a world community, I would not suggest that its spread will create that community. Liberal education is only one of the means by which we have got to try to save ourselves from suicide. It is still the most urgent necessity, after a minimum of external goods, of the individual. Without continual learning—and continual learning is impossible without continual thinking—the individual cannot continue to live the human life he began in school. He cannot solve his problems, or even recognize them.

The very fact that adult education has been neglected gives us an opportunity to do something with it. The education of the young is bogged down in apparatus having nothing to do with education, and in academic aspirations having nothing to do with teaching. Professors receive advancement for their achievements in specialized research and, as a result, are indifferent to the progress of their students. Schools look more and more like real-estate developments. Administration is crowding out education. Universities are sinking under the weight of records, credits, big-time athletics, housing, degrees and discipline. They require as many vice-presidents as banks, and the instructors themselves are required to spend more and more of their time on bookkeeping.

The ideal of adult education—as of adolescent education—is Socrates on a street corner, asking questions. This ideal is still realizable at the adult level. Liberal education requires a room, a table and chairs, a set of books nearly all of which can be bought in cheap editions, and a teacher without special training. Records, along with the rest of the overhead, fall to a minimum. The single qualification for the instructors is that they have read and thought about the books to be studied; for the students, that they want to.

HOMER, THE BIBLE AND FREUD

There may be several equally good ways of achieving the goal of liberal education. I happen to have a prejudice in favor of good books. The great books, from Homer and the Bible to William James and Freud, constitute the cornerstones of the human tradition and exemplify the liberal arts. In New York City they were used by the People's Institute in the Twenties, in a program carried on in fifteen classes held in branch libraries and churches. The Washington public libraries now have eight "great books" evening classes meeting weekly. In the Chicago area a teacher-training program undertaken last year by the University of Chicago, in co-operation with the Chicago Public Library and thirteen other public-library systems and township high schools, has flowered, without high-powered promotion, into forty classes, running from Gary, Indiana, to Racine, Wisconsin, with a total enrollment of some 12,500 students.

All these ventures were or are supported either by foundation grants or by the libraries and school systems involved. On a private tuition basis the University of Chicago has sixteen classes in operation, with a tuition charge of $30 a year for a two-hour meeting once every two weeks. Two classes have opened in Indianapolis, and one has been in existence in a Chicago suburb for (Continued on Page 209)

Johnny with the Spindly Legs

Johnny sat watching her with steady eyes. "You gonna stay?" he asked at last, then added philosophically, "I guess not—everybody always goes away."

BY FLORENCE CUMMINGS

"VIC, who was the first one, Vic? Huh, Vic?" Johnny asked, pushing his glass of milk away. But Vic, who was eighteen and quite handsome, was reading a long letter from a girl, and he didn't hear Johnny at all.

"Lola, who was the first one?" Johnny repeated, pulling the morning newspaper down so he could see Lola's puffy, sleepy face, and could tell whether an answer might be expected.

"Don't do that, Johnny!" Lola snapped. "Ye gods, mother! Can't you teach that child not to do that?"

"Do what, darling?" Mrs. Millikan placated. Lola was her first-born, spoiled and strong-willed, and Mrs. Millikan was rather afraid of her.

"Not to yank at the paper when someone's trying to read," Lola grumbled. "Ye gods, how I wish I lived alone!" She pushed her chair back noisily and left the table.

Vic looked up. "What's eating her?" he asked, with complete disinterest, and returned to his letter.

Mrs. Millikan sighed and gulped the rest of her coffee. "Really," she said, "sometimes that girl's disposition —— You shouldn't annoy her that way, Johnny."

Johnny, not quite six, knitted his brows as he looked at his mother. "I want to know who was the first one," he repeated doggedly. He had discovered that if you asked everyone, sometimes you got an answer.

"The first what, dear?" his mother asked, in a tone of tired forbearance.

The boy was so often puzzling to her. His child's world was a foreign place she thought she had left behind when Vic and Lola were growing up. It was such a dreadful time for a new child to be born—six months after his father's death, and with Mrs. Millikan's whole life in turmoil. The terrifying responsibility of a big business suddenly falling like lead on her shoulders, two self-centered and rebellious adolescent children—there was simply no room in this life for a baby. Besides, he was a much more difficult child than either of the others had been. He was queerly turned-inward. He spoke in enigmas.

"The first what, Johnny?" she repeated wearily, and continued, without pause, "Gracious, how I hope that new couple turns out to have a grain of sense in their combined heads. What's her name again? Oh, yes—Almie."

Ever since Mr. Millikan's death, Mrs. Millikan had taken to voicing her worries to the children. It did not matter that they seldom answered. The sound of the problems stated aloud seemed to give her a certain assurance that they were soluble.

"I hope to heaven she's not a dunce," Mrs. Millikan sighed, "but, dunce or no dunce, she'll have to toe the mark. I won't take from her what I took from that last one—waited on her hand and foot, and where did it get me? There's only one way to treat those people—make them knuckle down. Almie!" she called, while Johnny swung his foot and looked out the window, crooning:

"Who was the first one, the first one, the first one ——"

Almie put her handsome, wide brown face through the swinging door from the kitchen and fixed Mrs. Millikan with a proud and steady eye. "Yes, ma'am?" she said, her tone clearly implying that you could go exactly so far and not one inch farther in giving orders to Almie Peal. "Call me?"

"Yes, Almie," replied Mrs. Millikan aggressively. She really was in awe of this calm, positive Negress, but she was darned if she would show it. Not after what the previous couple had done to her. And the one before that. Walking out without notice. After she'd treated them with gloves on. Let them go out at night whenever they wanted. Bought them candy and magazines. And then they go and leave her in the lurch. Make a fool of her. Well, never again! From now on, make them toe the mark. That's the only way to handle such people, the only language they understood. "Almie," she said loudly, "Tuesday is the day for thorough-cleaning the kitchen." (Mrs. Millikan had a "system.") "I want you to give the refrigerator a very thorough cleaning. Take everything out, and then take out the trays and ——"

"I knows how to clean a refijator," Almie interrupted coolly.

Mrs. Millikan paused briefly, stunned, but quickly recovered. "And tell Sam I want him to take all the small rugs out in the yard and give them a good beating."

ALMIE made no comment. She could just imagine lazy Sam giving anything a good beating. Whatever made her take that man back? He was no good, nohow. She would have to leave and get herself a job alone, again. You take a couple's job with Sam, and you find yourself doing a couple's job alone. Shiftless no-good. Shouldn't have took him back.

"And I want you to use the vacuum in all the rooms, Almie," Mrs. Millikan continued, warming to her task. "And get behind things. Most of the furniture is not heavy, and you can move it easily."

Victor got up to catch the bus for college. "Hey, ma," he said, "tell her to wash my socks and underwear. That other one left me with nothing to wear."

Mrs. Millikan licked her lips. She had already given Almie more than enough to do, but this was no time to back water. You couldn't show any weakness or they'd walk all over you. "Yes, Almie, I want you to look through the laundry and take out all the socks and underwear and wash them. Better do that first thing, so they'll have time to dry."

"Then the refijator gots to wait," Almie said.

"Why can't you do that this afternoon?" Mrs. Millikan demanded nervously. She hoped this one wasn't going to be defiant. She got very upset when they were defiant.

"Ef I do, then the vacuuming gots to wait. Somethin' gots to wait," Almie concluded resignedly, as though she really regretted disappointing the thing that would have to wait.

LOLA appeared in her chic, radio-actress hat. "Mother," she said, "please have her press my red crepe. I want to wear it tonight."

Mrs. Millikan tapped the table nervously. She supposed she'd better be a little careful. After all, with little Johnny and the business —— "Almie," she said, frowning, "suppose you let Sam do the vacuuming today. He can let the garden work go."

Almie pursed her lips and sucked noisily through her front teeth. She was thinking that in all likelihood Sam would have let the garden work go anyway. And that if he had to go to the market for groceries, he would not come back in time for vacuuming or anything else, that worthless good-for-nothing! This minute he was sitting out front in the car waiting to take Mrs. Millikan and Lola to the station. He'd be sure to get out there well ahead of time, Sam would. He liked sitting in the big car, reading last night's paper.

Mrs. Millikan interpreted the silence as a definite act of defiance. "You won't forget my daughter's dress, Almie!" she said sharply, getting up from the table.

"Ain't likely to," Almie replied slowly. "But that don't mean I'll squeeze time to do it."

The nerve of her, Mrs. Millikan fumed, but she controlled herself. "You just try and you can, Almie, she said positively. "And keep an eye on Johnny. He'll be home from school today on account of a teachers' meeting. Fix him something nice for lunch. . . . What would you like for lunch, Johnny?"

Johnny was looking out the window, swinging the cord of the Venetian (Continued on Page 204)

"You listen to me," Almie began, her voice a furious threat to the trembling Sam. And then she caught sight of Johnny; something in his face stopped her.

Almie was a wonderful cook — but it takes a little loving to put flesh on a child's bones.

THE HUSBAND

Brent's taste ran to the pleasant things: good cooking, a well-run house, a young lively creature who liked the same things he did.

THE BOARDER

Nella had that sort of youthful glow that makes any woman—even one who is just a little older—feel sneaky at the joints.

THE WIFE

Abigail was discovering that there are times in a woman's life when the family circle suddenly threatens to shape into a triangle.

All Men Like Red

BY EDITH BRECHT

THE voices in the garden under Abigail Spears were going strong. Aunt Fanny's and Brent's. Abigail's gray eyes under the curly brown bang grew troubled. She supposed every young married woman had a major problem: if not in the shape of an Aunt Fanny—and a very substantial shape it was—then something equally unmaneuverable and difficult; maybe much more difficult, like infidelity. At least she hadn't that. But the thought of infidelity and Brent was ridiculous. Later, Abigail remembered that.

"Scarlet sage," Aunt Fanny was announcing in a voice that brooked no contradiction, "is always a good, dependable bloomer!"

"So it is! So it is!" Brent agreed with hurried emphasis. "Only I don't happen to like it!"

"All men like red!" Aunt Fanny said flatly.

"I happen to have planned putting petunias here," Brent digressed with excruciating politeness.

"Sage'll be nicer, autumn," Aunt Fanny persisted. "We'll all like it better. Petunias get so leggy then; they straddle everywhere."

The odds were on Aunt Fanny. If Brent hadn't the world's best liver he'd knock her down verbally. The trouble was she wouldn't stay down, and he knew it, and the free-for-all would keep going like a merry-go-round. But after all, it was his garden, and her aunt, and he'd put up with such a lot. She really had to do something! She'd been saying that the past two winters, but now she meant it. Aunt Fanny's autumn-sage talk showed she planned another, and Brent was getting a look in the back of his eye she didn't like.

Well, she'd manage it when Aunt Fanny left for the summer. Take a boarder and have her holed in before Aunt Fanny got back. Mr. Higgins, the district superintendent, had asked if she'd consider the high-school art teacher last fall. She could probably get someone. Then Aunt Fanny could come for a few weeks' visit in the little sewing room.

But Brent was demanding, as loud and outraged as he ever got, "Where did that come from?"

"What?" Aunt Fanny asked. "Oh." Then with genuine pleasure, "Why, it's Mrs. Turner!"

Abigail looked quickly at the front walk, but it was empty.

Aunt Fanny was laughing now; the easy, self-indulgent laughter people keep for their own idiosyncrasies. "Just a lily, Brent. I call it Mrs. Turner because she gave it to me. She's a friend. Had such trouble with her daughter Bessie. Left her husband. Just picked up and went off with another man. She was a nice sort, too; so was the man she went with. We never understood it."

But Brent dammed the tide of reminiscence chokingly: "I wanted this bed kept all blue and gold!"

"Well, but a lily looks nice anywhere!" Aunt Fanny remonstrated as if, after all, there were such a thing as unreason. Then she added with enough satisfaction for both of them, "Certainly glad the frost didn't nip her."

Abigail looked down on the short, stout figure bent possessively over her lily. Brent had taste, and Aunt Fanny hadn't, but she had force, so he might as well not have had it. Abigail studied the flat, white topknot under her. Aunt Fanny had worn her hair that way since 1900.

"If a style becomes you, why change, I always say."

"Why, indeed?" Brent agreed, his infinitely expressive forehead wrinkled. But his subtlety was lost on Aunt Fanny, who understood nothing but an ungloved hand.

Aunt Fanny was seventy and hearty, with white hair that had the gentle quality of milkweed silk and utterly belied the indomitable wire of her spirit. There was something about her hair back-view, where you couldn't see the fire of her light blue eye, that made Abigail tender. Partly because it was wispy and old, but mostly because she'd been the grandmother she'd never had; the grandaunt who raised her mother. Only sometimes, especially with Brent——

Brent's face below her was surging now with repressed feeling, like a heavy curtain over an open window. He'd been worn out converting his textile job to peace and had a right to some in his own home, and didn't get it—not with Aunt Fanny!

Abigail had had to say last year, "I didn't ask her for the whole winter, dear," just as she had to say it the year before. "You know she wrote was it all right to visit, and you said, 'By all means.'"

"'Visit,' was the word suggested, I believe," Brent said painfully.

"I know, dear, but she just sort of stayed. You know I'm her only relative—except her stepsister Sue."

"But why give us eight months and Sue only four? It's hardly fair to Sue."

"Because she likes it better here. She says Sue's aggressive." Brent's eye met hers, so she kissed him and said, "I know. But she is fond of you!"

"She sees my possibilities." Brent had humor. But it was dying. Snuffed out in infringements and directions in his own home.

There was the matter of food. Aunt Fanny was an amazing hand in the kitchen, indefatigable and willing; when she took paring knife in hand, potatoes gave up their

(Continued on Page 92)

ILLUSTRATED BY ARTHUR SARNOFF

ILLUSTRATED BY

SEVEN HUNDRED A WEEK

Ran said, "When you let your heart show, people are apt to kick it around. You'd better learn to be like me." Stacy believed that a battered heart was better than no heart at all. ★ By Alec Rackowe

MRS. FORREST always said that the reason her youngest daughter and only unmarried child attended meetings at the Manor Club was because she met dogs there. Stacy would have agreed about the dogs if not the rest. Her one cross was that the apartment they had lived in since dad had died and Rod, Sally and Jen had married was too small to house even one dog.

On this particularly lovely April afternoon they met several dogs as they walked—Mrs. Forrest white-haired and youthful in her well-worn English tweeds, and Stacy young and vivid in her green skirt and brown jacket and her smooth-flowing mass of bright red hair. Stacy greeted the dogs by name and they wagged their tails genially without raising their muzzles from newly revealed scents.

Mrs. Forrest asked equably, "How on earth do you know which is which?"

Stacy gave her mother a puzzled look from wide green eyes. "How does one distinguish other people's children?"

Mrs. Forrest had a tinkling laugh. "But one black cocker looks exactly like another black cocker."

Stacy's sheening hair swayed with the shake of her head. "You can always tell the ones you know."

Mrs. Forrest looked baffled.

Stacy stopped to talk to a red setter nosing about the square. She came skipping to rejoin her mother. At twenty-one Stacy still skipped. "Mike is always going off on two-or-three-day bats. I sent him home."

Mrs. Forrest looked to the blue heavens. The forsythia about the brown clapboarding of the Manor Club was in full bloom. There were cars parked all along the boulevard, and the mullioned windows were open, framing a futuristic tone picture of feminine voices.

Mrs. Forrest didn't wait for Stacy. She knew better. Stacy smiled at the half-dozen odd dogs fastened by their leashes to bushes and railings. Six assorted tails wagged furiously and Stacy sat down on the steps and greeted the dogs one by one. They yelped and barked for recognition, and between the Manor Club members inside and the dogs outside there was quite a commotion.

Perhaps that is why Stacy never heard any shouting. The first thing she knew of anything askew was a flash of bluish gray and a subsequent terrific shemozzle. All the dogs barked wildly and the Emsleighs' wire-haired tried to break his leash so that he could better cope with the Kerry blue who had descended upon him like Jove from a thunderhead.

Stacy gasped. She jumped up and took the Kerry by the scruff; thrust her free hand under his jaws and pried. It was quite a job, but as soon as she had loosed his grip and lifted him in her arms he wagged his tail. The wire-haired raved, but Stacy only said, "You're not hurt, Sam," and fixed the Kerry with stern eyes. "You mug," she said severely. "Can't you be civilized?"

The Kerry wriggled happily and tried to lick Stacy's cheek. A good six inches above the crown of Stacy's five-six an exasperated male voice demanded, "Don't you know any better than to put your hands into a dogfight? Did you get bitten?"

Stacy turned, the Kerry blue in her arms. She had to look up, and what she saw, blinking a little as was her wont when she was annoyed, was a very tall and quite dark young man. He wore a baggy gray tweed jacket and his hatless head was crowned with jet hair. His eyes, as Stacy stared at him haughtily, were gray. They changed somewhat. The exasperation faded and was succeeded by a certain stunned look that had come into the eyes of not a few young men at first sight of Stacy Forrest.

He said abruptly, "Here, give me that stinker."

Stacy started automatically to hand over the dog. Then she drew back quickly. "What do you want with him?" she demanded. "He's Duke, the Marshals' dog. You're not one of the Marshals."

The young man frowned. His face was long with prominent cheekbones and a straight nose that went with the length of his jaw. His hair fell over a wide forehead in a nicely negligent way. It wasn't just that he was a good-looking young man. He was different.

He gestured at the battered sedan blocking the boulevard. "Wash and brush up. P. u. and deliver. I've just p. u.'d him at the Marshals'. When he's bathed and combed he'll be delivered."

Stacy's red lips made an O. Her creamy face lighted with interest. "You're from the Dog and Cat Hospital. You work there?"

"I work there," the young man agreed somberly. He reached for the dog and Stacy passed Duke over. The young man said, "I had the window open six inches for air, but he made it. This time he can smother with me." He looked at Stacy, opened his lips and then shut them again and left.

Stacy wished he'd stayed to talk. She looked after him. The car complained and smoked; Duke scrabbled at the window and the dogs at her feet clamored for attention. Stacy told them absently to shut up and went inside to the other clamor.

It was three hours later that the oddest coincidence occurred—at five o'clock, to be exact.

They'd had tea at the club. Mrs. Forrest was dressing to go out to dinner at the Channings' on the circle. Stacy had lots of time. She was going to have a bite and do a movie with Dave Bagdell, and maybe run up to the Lodge later for a coke and a dance.

There was forsythia in the green bowls about the room. Stacy curled up in the biggest chair and looked over the local paper. It had only four pages, so one naturally read everything, and there, staring back at her from the Classified columns, was an ad. It said:

Wanted. Receptionist for animal hospital. Good wages and long hours. Inquire at Manor Dog and Cat Hospital. Randolph Kelsey, V. D.

Stacy put down the paper and said, "Well," to the apple-green walls.

Mrs. Forrest came in at that moment looking most distinguished in a blue dinner gown and her real-looking pearls. She lifted the dark brows that went so well with her hair. "Me?"

"This ad in the paper," Stacy said. "It's fate or Kismet or something. I think I'm going to go to work."

MRS. FORREST took the paper from Stacy's lap. "Are you? I thought you were going to marry one of the eager seals who have been mooning around here for ages. Settle down and have ten dogs the first year and a divorce the next—unless you have a baby the next and get rid of the dogs in time."

Stacy's eyes were dreamy, her red lips parted. She said absently, "Dogs and babies are ham and eggs. They go together."

"But not ten on the canine side." Mrs. Forrest looked at the ad columns. "What was it that interested you so? Never mind, I see something about dogs—oh-oh!"

Stacy didn't pay much attention to Dave Bagdell that night. The movie was a washout and Dave held her hand too tightly and was rather tiresome with his same hedged proposal at the Lodge. "Look, Stacy—we could be happy, you know that. A couple of dogs would be all right, too—but no more." Stacy just let it drift over her and got home to bed before her mother showed.

At nine the next morning she walked over to the Post Road and the strict white oblong that was the Manor Hospital. She'd been there before, but she hadn't liked old Doctor Morse, who had run the place. A new man had it now. This Doctor Kelsey who had put in the ad.

The reception room was black linoleum and cream walls with some good dog etchings on the walls and throwaways on the tables. A gray-haired man in a smock came from an inside room.

Stacy said, "I've come about the job. Are you Doctor Kelsey?"

The gray-haired man shook his head. "I'm Tim Lake, the kennelman." He rubbed his chin and looked hard at Stacy. "You sure you want to work here?"

"I think so," Stacy said. "Would you object?"

"Golly, no," Tim Lake said. "I'd like it. It would be nice to have a pretty girl around." He grinned at Stacy. "I'll give doc a yell. He's over in the house." His gesture embraced the casement windows, and through them Stacy saw the white salt-box house next door. "Don't go away," Tim said, and Stacy said earnestly:

"I won't."

(Continued on Page 110)

As she stared at him haughtily, the exasperation faded from the young man's face, and was succeeded by a stunned look, one often seen in the eyes of young men who see Stacy Forrest for the first time.

PROFILE OF SUCCESS

By Evelyn Sager

EACH year a new crop of eager young women arrives in New York to find jobs. War or peace, prosperity or depression, apartments or no-vacancies, they keep on coming. These young women from the hinterlands are fresh as paint, trim as two-masted schooners, and disconcertingly levelheaded. Some want jobs for a satisfying, self-sustaining interlude between college and marriage. Others are tracking down the jobs they've set their sights for. In the city which boastfully claims to be the center of fashion, the spark plug of business, the Mecca of journalism, they expect to find more doors to knock on, more doors to open.

They look deceivingly alike, these energetic young applicants who wear out their heels on New York's impersonal asphalt, call on their fathers' college classmates, fill out inquisitive application blanks. Yet in each crop are a very few destined to play a forceful hand in selecting what America will wear, producing what America will use and editing what America will read. They will be the cream of the working-woman population, the career women.

What are the ingredients that enable some to reach for and hit the top? For the answer we consulted five career women who have already made their marks. Each has replied with a profile of her candidate for success.

If It's Merchandising, says Sara Pennoyer, vice-president of Bonwit Teller, the girl who is aiming for the top starts at the bottom—and if she thinks she is above selling, she will soon learn she is above retailing. There is no substitute for firsthand experience with the recalcitrant customer or the eight-hour nightmare labeled "Reduced for Clearance."

The ambitious girl who chooses merchandising starts out with vitality, willingness to work hard and strong feet. She is pretty much of an extrovert, enjoys exerting her personality. If material, color and line are her daily meat—if she can spot the weakness in a dress collection, a furniture display or a hooked-rug exhibit and multiply the sales appeal with a deft touch of substitution or subtraction—she is off to a runaway start. If she is destined for the topmost jobs, she probably has a touch of promotion genius added to her merchandising talents: she has ideas.

Her background may be fashion, art school or business administration; it may be Latin and Greek. Nothing is wasted. If she was born with the sixth sense of style, or acquired it from a style-conscious family background, she has the inside track on store psychology: she knows from the start that there is style in everything that sells—from aigrettes to zippers.

As a salesgirl she sells the best "book" in the department—not by high pressure but by the extra legwork and touch of tact so sorely missed in wartime merchandising. As a buyer she is not content with running up the best sales total in the store, scouting for the best products in the market, and bullying the wholesaler into selling her scarce items; she brings fresh ideas and a sample of public opinion to the manufacturer—she makes him an ally. Her feeling for fashion, fabric and people is married to a personality that leads—she's the "group-influencing type."

She is not retailing in a cloistered cell—and knows it. She reads the papers, develops a cosmopolitan point of view; she is alert to the impact of the Duchess of Windsor's visit to Paris showings in an American pencil-slim skirt; she weighs the effect of loose money on "dress-up" styles; she watches the fashion magazines and society columns like a talent scout.

She gets there fast because she grabs the breaks when they come. She skips as many steps as she can, if she knows she is ready to handle the bigger job. She takes disappointments hard, but not home. She brings the best of her to work, and checks the foibles in the locker room. She may start in a college shop or her home-town store, but she's bound to gravitate to New York, where she can keep her eye on the market and the opportunities. She respects her job and her store—and couldn't live without either.

"All 400,000 things may be priced low, but must I carry every one of them home today?"

CARTOON REPRINTED PERMISSION THE NEW YORKER. COPYRIGHT THE F.-R. PUBLISHING CORPORATION

"What is it? How many to a customer?"

If It's Advertising, says Margaret Fishback, erstwhile copy chief at R. H. Macy in New York and presently one of the top-bracket free-lance copy writers, the girl who is most likely to succeed is the girl who is writing to eat—not to produce the great American novel. She is selling a flair for words, not a flame of genius. She is bright, witty, a word stylist—and her tongue and pen are touched with acid.

She does not slide along on her talent because she knows the story of the tortoise and the hare has its advertising counterpart: the girl who does a good, diligent job may outdistance the girl who does a brilliant job when the mood takes her. She knows that no matter how "hot" her copy may be, she is no use to the boss unless she is there to write the hot copy when he needs her. Maybe she does not have the highest brain content per cubic inch, but she makes skillful use of what she has. She is a supersaleswoman—and her stock in trade is herself and her ideas.

She likes the swank that goes with advertising, but does not upholster her own personality with plush. Even when she faces a rash of dead lines or a three-time rewrite, she likes what she is doing and would not earn her living through any other form of torture. She keeps her eye on the ball, does not regard her job as a mere stopgap to marriage. She is long on humor, charm, short on temper and temperament (on the way up, anyhow!). Perhaps she comes from a liberal-arts college where she majored in English and bull sessions, or from a business-administration course. She may not have gone to college at all. Her background is anything and everything.

She is only one of thousands launching a mass attack on New York advertising agencies and stores. She gets her first break through 100 per cent pull or 99 per cent

What has two hands, one good head and a million potentialities? If you've got luck—she is probably the tenth girl the tired copy chief has seen in a week, but she arrives on the day when there is copy to be written, and no one to write it. She looks likely. She is hired. She does not stay long in any one job, unless she is advancing fast. She has a highly developed news sense—and watches the trends shrewdly. She may not understand political and economic complexities, but she can give a précis of Walter Lippmann over the coffee cups. She reads periodicals and best sellers, sees the best shows; knows who is who—and even more important, who knows whom. She is smart and smooth—and she is in the smartest, smoothest business of them all.

If It's Fashion Designing, says Claire McCardell, top-flight designer of casual clothes for the long, lean figure, the girl whose name is slated to become a coveted label is one who is not afraid to wear her own clothes from the start; she is her own best advertisement. She has been designing her own clothes since she graduated from gym bloomers. She has a flair—and some wildly original ideas. She learns to temper her products to sell.

She buys as much training as she can afford in fashion designing, sketching, history of art; she picks up a good knowledge of sewing and materials.

If she goes into fashion with any notion of glamour, she soon learns there is little glitter, lots of work. She puts in long hours at the drawing board, in the sample room. She starts with any job she can get in a good fashion house; she models the clothes, sells them, copies them; in the time left over she designs her own things in hopes of catching the boss's eye. She picks up pins and tricks of the trade. She does not jump from job to job—even if the prospect is richly tempting—until she is ready, because above all it takes time to make her ready for the top. Even with out-in-the-field experience added to school theory, she must have time to mold her taste to practicality and the market—without destroying her freshness of design; time to train her eye to unfaltering selection; time to test her judgment in season after season of success and failure.

She has more than a little of the shrewd businesswoman in her make-up, because a collection of clothes is a major investment—approximately $100,000; because she measures her success by the amount of clothes she sells, not the amount of publicity she receives. She is flexible enough to relinquish a pet idea when it is too smart, too new. Most important of all, she reminds herself daily that she is not designing clothes for Venus de Milo and the cover girls, but for the average American woman.

She needs a sturdy personality to weather daily crises with buyers, tailors, models. She is lucky—lucky to be talented. But even with this gift she needs a few breaks, a helping hand, a financial boost. She learns to be in the opportune place lest the opportune moment arise. She does not design in a vacuum. She is interested in Americana, in the news, in people. Before the war she went to Paris showings—and tested her ability to pick winners at the preview. Now she will go again, but keep a sharp eye on home competition.

Through it all she sticks, because it may be hash at the bottom, but it's gravy on top. Clothes are her hobby and her job.

CARTOON REPRINTED PERMISSION THE NEW YORKER. COPYRIGHT THE F.-R. PUBLISHING CORPORATION

"Oh, you needn't worry about what you show me. I'm trying to be silly."

If It's Business, says Carlene Roberts, assistant vice-president of American Airlines, the girl who is slated for a man-size job is not allergic to authority. She takes control without dramatizing her power. She is natural, easy to be with, although you sense a powerhouse of energy and ability pushing her ahead. She works hard and long without forgetting what makes Jack and Jill dull. She handles a maze of details, with the forest well in mind. At no place on her rapid climb does she sacrifice her integrity—for a raise, a better job, a fat contract; maybe she is idealistic, maybe she knows it is bad business. She has what men like to boast of as a masculine trait: capacity for making decisions based on reason and logic, and the ability to present them with clarity and force.

Chances are nine out of ten she will start as a stenographer or a secretary, with a high-school diploma in shorthand or a college degree in domestic science. Once she finds herself up to the neck in business and loving it, she learns the method and madness behind profits and losses. She is secretary to the big boss, but does not make that her goal. She aims for a job of her own; makes haste slowly, but avoids the ruts.

She puts her foot in the door of the masculine business sanctum through skill and intelligence. She rises through leadership. Not only does she do her own job well, but she is able to do a bigger job because she picks others who will do jobs well for her. She becomes a top-drawer executive because she has sense and sensibilities as well as the sharp foresight of a chess player. She knows what makes her people tick, knows that the brusque, bludgeoning executive is out of mode; that the new-style executive has a loyal, productive staff because she is a fair, sympathetic, tolerant boss. She shares responsibility with them—and credit for a job well done.

She is working in a man's world, and never forgets it. She has to be steadier, more organized, less temperamental than her masculine colleagues. She has to be twice as good! She enters his world without taking on masculine protective coloration—she cannot be a hail-fellow-well-met; she cannot protect herself, either, with feminine wiles, or she will be accused of pulling her sex during working hours. She has to steer a tough middle course. But she makes it her business to get where she is going.

If It's Journalism, says Dorothy Dunbar Bromley, Woman's Editor of the New York Herald Tribune, the crackajack reporter looks for the truth as well as the facts. She thinks incisively and independently, scorns clichés. She is well read, and reads well; she draws continuously on the fund of knowledge acquired in college, but knows where to find more. She drives herself to produce A copy, although C copy would pass the city desk. She is confident of her own intellectual equipment, but not cocky; asks pertinent questions without impertinence; has manners without manner. She is in journalism because she wants to write for a living, to see her by-line around, or—in a few cases—because she considers her publication a forceful social medium. She chooses a college where there is respect for current writing, where professors do not frighten her by setting up the classics as the single standard, where contests encourage young talent.

She tries for a job on a large metropolitan daily, but takes the next best. She stays in any job only as long as she is growing and learning. She would, if she could, work for the publication she respects most.

She rises steadily because she has physical and emotional stamina; because her work is consistently excellent in content and style; (Continued on Page 106)

CARTOON REPRINTED PERMISSION THE NEW YORKER. COPYRIGHT THE F.-R. PUBLISHING CORPORATION

"The boss has had his eye on you, Miss Swanson, and so have I, for that matter."

what five of America's top career women tell you it takes—the answer may be You!

HIDDEN TREASURES

TWO YEARS OLD

Adele Simpson bolero suit, actually two years old. For your own similar one, cut sleeves to new length; add pretty eyelet blouse, important hat—Braagaard's sailor.

TAILLEUR 1941–1946

Take any classic suit of the past five years (this one by Bernard Rubel); add bright flannel vest, white blouse with deep collar points, foulard stock.

Pushed to the back of your closet—hanging there in the dark—practically every woman has at least one "perfectly good" dress or suit which can't quite face the bright light of a new season. We've asked famous American designers about these clothes on your conscience—find that they have them, too, even as you and I. In each case they have taken one of their own originals from a year or two years ago—twin sisters, or at least first cousins, to the clothes you have—and made the fashion changes or additions that give them freshness and importance. A white eyelet blouse with new full sleeves, and a Breton sailor for a navy-blue bolero suit; a new high neckline of polka-dot crepe for a basic dress; a bright vest and ascot for a classic tailleur; a coat cut off to a new length, a cotton tunic for a wool skirt—you can make these changes yourself, or take them to your favorite tailor. ★ BY WILHELA CUSHMAN
Fashion Editor of the Journal

Old treasures with hidden charms . . . this is the way

IN YOUR CLOSET

PHOTOGRAPHS BY LESLIE GILL

COAT TRANSFORMATION

Last year's coat from George Carmel. New length; patch pockets from cut-off fabric; wide leather belt. New band and veil on a 1944 John Frederic's hat.

they look before the changes make them fresh and new.

ANY NAVY SKIRT

Lightweight wool or crepe skirt, slim and straight. Add a crisp plaid cotton tunic like this one by Adele Simpson, Phelps bag, Milan hat, white cotton gloves.

YEAR-OLD NAVY CREPE

Any basic crepe dress. Add fresh polka-dot frou neckline, a touch of green ribbon; cut sleeves, make rolled cuff, as Andre suggests. Finish with new hat and bag.

NO INFLATION IN THESE FASHIONS

Good American dollars, now as always, will buy your money's worth of fashion—if wisely spent. A little black dress at $17.95 can have the expensive look. A two-piece wool jersey in the full-skirt silhouette-of-the-year (under $30) is prewar quality, tops in current fashion. This spring of 1946 there will be thousands of dresses and suits that represent values that are non-inflationary. Three of the fashions on these pages come from a famous house that sells more than half a million dresses and suits a year—from $17.95 to $22.95, in thousands of stores, in all forty-eight states. The rayon shantung in the heart-button dress and the long-sleeved suit is the same quality as that used in 1941. Pure silk is available—and not extravagant. Fine linen, both Irish and American, is a joy to see again for late spring and summer. Silhouettes and fashion details have no price premium. You can prove it in your local shops. ★ BY RUTH MARY PACKARD

LITTLE BLACK DRESS to adore—for its gold heart buttons, pretty neckline and sleeves, new pockets; rayon shantung; jet jewelry.

PHOTOGRAPHS BY GENE FENN

SILHOUETTE-OF-THE-YEAR—full skirt, slim basque, for day or dinner; in black wool jersey by Claire McCardell; Mago Hayes' hat.

BROWN SHANTUNG SUIT—perfect for business, shopping, travel. April to September. Worn with white straw hat and cotton gloves.

HEAVENLY PURE SILK print for afternoon or evening; draped hipline, shoulder-tip neckline, little puffed sleeves; by Ceil Chapman.

TAFFETA IS FASHION for important luncheon and afternoon suits. Adele Simpson's bolero style with little leg-o'-mutton sleeves, full skirt.

DRESSMAKER SHIRTWAIST dress; new push-up sleeves, soft fullness; checked rayon sheer, tested for cleaning, treated to resist wrinkles.

TOWN LINEN, slim tunic silhouette in turquoise blue, Clare Potter's distinguished spring-into-summer fashion; Mago Hayes' natural straw hat.

SPRING GOES TO A SUB-DEB'S HEAD

In crisp straws for Bretons and bonnets, in gingham checks for berets and stocking caps! Taffeta ribbons are a Sub-Deb special; in brightest colors they trim the band of a starched piqué or tie into gay bows for the crown of a straw. Hair is shining clean and goes halfway up for afternoon in ringlets at the back of the neck tied with a giant bow—all the way up for evening in a topknot with ribbons to match your dress! Crowning glory for an Easter Sunday suit is a white Breton sailor with navy taffeta streamers and spring-colored flowers (real or artificial); or a young bonnet tied under the chin with a plaid bow. Thirty cents' worth of gingham will make a braided headband in your three favorite colors! When you shop for your new spring hat, try them all on first. You might start out to buy a bonnet and end up with a beret; but, most important, whichever it is—it should look the prettiest on you! ★ BY DAWN CROWELL

Spring, the sweet spring. Sally Victor's wide-brimmed Breton in golden straw. Long black velvet streamers; gay, colorful flowers for the crown.

Breton sailor in white straw. Wide navy taffeta ribbons and bow. Tiny bunches of multicolored flowers tucked in the crown.

Young silhouette. Gingham beret in red, white and blue checks; three crisp streamers. Wrist-length matching gloves. Wear with summer cottons.

Gingham stocking cap to match a gingham dress. Green-and-white checks tied in a knot at the end, and fringed. Faced with white starched piqué.

A new headband: Three lengths of material braided (as you braid your hair).

With hair swept way on top your head, pin in bows: one in front, one in back.

Newest hair-do: hair brushed back and tied with big bow. Soft, loose ringlets.

PHOTOGRAPHS BY LESLIE GILL  DRAWINGS BY LEE LUNZER

Pretty worn on the back of the head. Rough natural straw wide-brimmed Breton sailor has large taffeta bows in red, blue and green plaid to trim the crown.

Bonnet for a special spring date. Pretty with dressy dresses, or with a new Easter coat; natural straw; large gingham bows. One ties under the chin.

Spick-and-span white piqué beret. Wear by itself or trim with plaid taffeta ribbon; silver pin. Matching ribbon bow at the neck of blouse or dickey.

A Matter of Style

HORSES, LIKE CHILDREN, REFLECT THEIR TRAINERS; AND CHRIS FOUND THAT A GOOD WAY TO JUDGE HUSBAND MATERIAL IS TO WATCH A HORSE A MAN HAS TRAINED.

By Newlin B. Wildes

I could have killed Jimmy! Gazing at

MY mother broke the news at breakfast. "Your Cousin Chris is coming to spend a few weeks with us," she said. My mother is small and brown and very calm—usually. She gets along with everybody—Bostonians and garbage men and people from Texas. They like her.

"All the way from California?" June said. "How old is she?"

"She's twenty-one," I said.

"I didn't ask you," June said. June is fourteen, two years older than I am. She wears long evening dresses to dances. I am going to have her blue dress next year.

"What's she coming way back here for?" I asked.

"She's going to work in a store," my mother said, "Detros."

"Gee!" I said. "Detros!" That was a very swank spot. It had a doorman.

"Is she engaged?" June asked.

My mother said no. I looked at June. Oh, boy—now there would be some excitement.

My father got up gloomily. My father is tall and lean and puts his feet up on things. "The house will be full of men," he said unhappily. "Men everywhere. Men mooning." He went into the den and shut the door. My mother has a great many relations. They come to see us.

"M-m-m-m, men," I said. I like to look at men. June and I cleared away the dishes. "Do you suppose she would be the one for Jimmy?" I said.

"No," June said. She said it very short. I think that she likes Jimmy herself. So do I, but he's a whole lot too old for us—that way. He's twenty-four.

old blister as if it were the most fascinating thing in the whole world, while Chris had the same look turned on Allen.

In the middle of the afternoon we drove down to the village station to meet Chris. I could hardly wait.

"How long since you've seen this gal?" my father said, still unhappily.

"Five years," my mother said. My father sighed.

The train roared in. A few locals got off. And then—my eyes went out on stems. "Whew!" I said. I fumbled at the door handle. My father got out ahead of me. He started down the platform. He moved as if his legs were in a hurry and his mind wasn't. Or vice versa. But he didn't fool me. My mother was kissing this girl. And what a girl.

Most of the older girls that we see in Kitasset are tweedy jobs out buying groceries for their families or being coy with husbands at parties. They are nice but, as my father says, the pennant has been decided and they are just playing out the schedule. But this girl. Boy!

She was a tall and blond girl with her hair caught low in a little net, and a funny round tilt for a hat that was smart, and all in black and very high heels and beautiful legs. Her face had just enough tan, with a perfect mouth and dark eyes, but the thing that you noticed most was that she was so very cool and calm and collected, and seemed to have everything under control—as if she were on a magazine cover and nothing could ever disarrange her. As if she were a cake on the pantry shelf that mustn't be cut into until company comes. Or a show window in a furniture store. She impressed me. She fascinated me. I wished that we had washed the windows to the station wagon. I wondered if the dogs would have that old shoe on the front lawn again. "She won't do for Jimmy," I whispered to June. We were in the back seat. June did not pay any attention to me. I am used to that.

We went home. Chris would not like our place. I knew it. Ours is a sort of unfarmed farm, and the grounds are more for fun and ball games than they are for keeping clipped and trimmed, and the dogs burrow some, and the house is long and white and the south side needs a little paint—"if we can ever get anybody to do it." Inside there are big closets that you can heave things into, and the fireplaces are blackened and the divans have deep sat-in spots near the lights, and the mantelpieces have pipes and a lot of things on them that should be put away. We like it, but I had never thought of it in the way Chris described it.

She got out, and brushed off a few dog hairs that flew up from the back of the car, and then she said, "Why, how quaint."

It was more the way she said it, and I looked at June, and my father's neck got red and he yanked at the bags. It did not bother my mother. After a while she showed Chris to her room. That was what June and I had been waiting for.

We gave her five minutes, the last three of which we stood outside her door. Then we knocked. Her two biggest suitcases were open, and they were full of the most wonderful clothes. Soft pinkish things that draped in loose slinky folds and had big confusing monograms on them, and slippers with feathers and all kinds of bottles and kits and brushes and a pair of crimson pajamas with "Chris" in black letters at the pocket. They were super. I saw June sort of eying them for size, but they were beyond me. I wear flannel pajamas mostly. But not with feet in them any more.

"They're beautiful," June said respectfully, and Chris said "Thank you," brightly.

"Is that why you're going to work at Detros," I said, "because you like clothes?"

"Well, yes, mostly," Chris said. "I want to be a stylist, perhaps a designer someday, and have my own studio. Detros is the first step."

We did not know anything about stylists and designers, June and I. We just stood there. My hands were very dirty. I put them in the pockets of my dungarees. I felt as if I were backstage in one of those super movie reviews. It was out of this world.

"Have you got a boy friend?" I said. June looked at me disgustedly. But I wanted to know.

Chris laughed. "No," she said, "no boy friend."

I wanted to ask why, but I thought maybe I had better not. There was one other thing I wanted to know. I was pretty sure of the answer, but I asked anyway. "Do you like horses?" I said. It sounded so abrupt that it startled even me. I felt sort of silly. But Chris looked up from her things and smiled, and it was the nicest smile she had shown yet. It was the most natural smile.

"As a matter of fact," she said, "I do. I simply love horses. All animals, for that matter. I brought my riding things with me because I knew that you all rode and I thought that perhaps you'd teach me. You see, I don't know much about riding, but I want to."

(Continued on Page 216)

ILLUSTRATED BY ARTHUR WILLIAM BROWN

GARDEN AND PHOTOGRAPH BY THE AUTHOR

The right ingredients make a garden that gives more than it takes.

BLOOM ALONG

By Richard Pratt

ONE of the tricks to a little easygoing garden against the house—unless you've time and effort to spare for serious physical horticulture—is how to make it attract the most attention while demanding the least. There are five simple parts to the trick, all appearing in the picture: the pool, the paving, the plants, the fence and the furniture. The pool is a plain sheet-metal tank, as much larger or smaller than three-by-six as you like, and eighteen inches deep. The paving is of any flat stones you can find, or of thin concrete slabs you can make. The plants are principally petunias and Shasta daisies; the former by far the country's favorite annual and most famous bloomer; the latter the most persistently flowering perennial of my acquaintance. Both will furnish color from June to frost, and the Shasta-daisy plants will of course keep on growing year after year. The fence can be high or low, open or tight, depending on what lies beyond, and the furniture should be colorful and easy to move. It's a garden two determined workers can make in a day, and almost anyone over a week end. You lay it out with stakes and string; take off the topsoil where the pool and paving go; dig out for the tank, and set it absolutely level, with the rim below the paving surface by the thickness of the flagging. Then you throw in underfill for the paving—anything loose, like cinders, sand, gravel—and lay the flagging, letting the edges lap over the pool, and filling the joints with sandy soil. The rest is simply a matter of preparing the beds, setting out the plants—and then sitting down for a little refreshment.

If You Ask Me

BY ELEANOR ROOSEVELT

Would you advise a girl to marry a man who has just returned from overseas as soon as possible, or should she wait five or six months until he is settled in civilian life?

That is a personal question which everyone, I think, has to decide for herself. If you marry a man who has just returned from overseas, you will know you are going to have not only the usual period of adjustment which comes in every marriage, but the added adjustment which every man must make on his return to civilian life. If a woman truly loves a man, however, and fully understands what she is doing, she may feel that they can work out their new life better together than apart, but that is something they have to decide and no one can decide it for them.

Is it true that most Frenchmen preferred the German occupation to the presence of the Allied troops, particularly American? If this is so, what can we do to overcome the prejudice? What, also, have we done to deserve it?

No. I do not think that most Frenchmen prefer German occupation to the presence of Allied troops, particularly Americans. Naturally they had to make up their minds to considerable destruction of their towns and villages which, under the Germans, had not been destroyed. When they found themselves constantly worse off than they had been before liberation which they longed for, life took on a sad aspect; but by and large, I feel sure that the French as a whole are grateful that they are free again. I think we can make the effort to understand them better. That is always a good antidote to any prejudice. The only thing we have done to deserve dislike anywhere in the world is to be rather satisfied with ourselves and therefore not very anxious to find out about other people.

Why doesn't everyone in the United States have to pay an income tax of at least five dollars? Don't you think this would make everyone feel a sense of responsibility as a citizen?

I do not know why you set five dollars as the sum to be paid. I think everyone should pay an income tax, but there are some incomes so low that five dollars would be almost impossible to accumulate during the year, so I think everyone should pay a percentage of what he actually has earned during the year.

Do you think the UNO can really control the use of atomic bombs?

Certainly, if it is made strong by the nations who join.

Do you believe the Ruhr should be internationalized?

I do not think at present that my opinion is of any value, as I have made no very intensive study of the question, but my feeling is that this part of Europe has been a bone of contention for a great many years and its internationalization would be a benefit to the whole of the European area and remove future causes of contention.

Have you a favorite period in furniture and interior decorating?

Yes. Early American.

Would you say the current campaign—magazine and merchandising mainly—to publicize the life and times of a teen-ager is giving the adolescent an overdose of spotlight?

Yes. I think much less attention should be paid by the advertising field to this age.

---

Letters should be addressed to Mrs. Roosevelt, c/o the LADIES' HOME JOURNAL. It should be understood that Mrs. Roosevelt's answers reflect only her own opinions, and are not necessarily the opinions of the Editors of the JOURNAL.

Do you think the invention of the atomic bomb has advanced or retarded civilization?

I think it advanced civilization in that it saved for us a great many young lives of a great many different nationalities which might otherwise have been lost in this period and therefore would have retarded the development of civilization. Whether in the future it is an aid to civilization depends on the scientists and our younger generation. Both groups know its potentialities for destruction.

CARTOON BY TONY BARLOW. REPRINTED PERMISSION THE NEW YORKER. COPYRIGHT THE F.-R. PUBLISHING CORPORATION

"Won't you please make up your mind, Mabel?"

Do you feel, generally speaking, that it is better for a girl to marry before she is twenty-five, and that compromise and adjustment become progressively harder as she matures as a singleton?

Yes. I think for a woman it is much easier to adjust if she marries between the ages of twenty and twenty-five, and probably easier to begin to have children and adjust to a family life that includes old and young.

It has been estimated that 15,000,000 women will be earning their living by 1950. In your opinion, should industry and the community encourage and underwrite nursery schools for the children of working mothers?

Very decidedly. I think it is absolutely vital for the good of future generations that nursery schools be made available to care for the children of working mothers during the entire day. The next generation will seriously suffer from both the physical and mental standpoints if this is not done.

Do you think that if a Republican President is elected in 1948, the world will lose faith in U. S. leadership?

That depends upon the President.

My mother and I disagree sharply in our judgment of people. How important, under the circumstances, should it be to have my mother approve of the man I marry?

This is a very difficult question, as it involves the feeling that you have for your mother. If it is very close, and if you are devoted to her, I think you will find that you will be able to interpret the man you marry to her and change her point of view. It is always well to weigh the opinion of older people, because they have had more experience than you possibly can have. However, you are the one who is going to marry the man and live with him, and so ultimately it will have to be your decision. I would not hurry, however, and I would make every possible effort to bring about unity in the family, since the break between the home of the past and the one you hope to make is always a sad and upsetting experience.

Those who argue for "planned parenthood" point out that the size of the family should be limited for the sake of health and economics. Don't you think it is important, too, to limit the family so that there is enough of a mother's attention and affection to go around generously?

I do, but that is one of the things that intelligent advocates of planned parenthood have stressed, and it is part of all better health conditions, since many women have not the strength to give to the older children when they have too short periods of recuperation. This is not always true, however, since we have all known women who could have a child every year and still give generously of heart and mind to all of them; but a woman's health must be the guide.

What do you think is the secret of Sweden's neutrality throughout two world wars? Is it mere geographical location or perhaps a real determination to think and act "peacefully"?

I think Sweden has been extremely fortunate. Germany in time would probably have invaded her, but they needed what she could produce and send to them more than they needed her as an enemy or a conquered nation. I doubt if it is mere geographical location, or even a desire and determination to think and act peacefully. I think it is just the economics of a situation and the military developments which made it possible for her to remain neutral.

Do you favor a uniform divorce law for the United States?

Yes.

If the Government could use money for research in wartime, why doesn't it set up peacetime research projects on cancer and other diseases?

I think that is one of the things which the U. S. Public Health Service has been asking to inaugurate for many years. Probably now the people as a whole, through their representatives, will be willing to accept the responsibility for this kind of work. In the past they haven't been willing to vote the money for such purposes, but have counted on private resources and foundations.

LOW-COST HOUSING

TEN MILLION families in this country live in homes that are classified officially as "bad"—and that means really bad. These homes are dilapidated and overcrowded; they lack proper light, air and sanitation; they are a menace to the health, safety and morals of their occupants. And whether you yourself live in one of them or not, they are still a menace to your welfare; for all of us pay somehow for the country's poor health, its dangerous conditions and the consequences of crime.

Bad homes, or slums, are everybody's business, for their ills are contagious. Good housing, therefore, might well be as much women's concern as the control of disease. It is not a simple problem: better and cheaper building methods alone will not bring about slum elimination, though they will help; nor can city or Federal aid solve the problem without the intelligent determination of citizens that there need be no slums.

What America's ten million families in bad homes pay as an average monthly rental is about $6 a room; many people say it is impossible to build decent homes for rents that low, except by Government subsidy. A group of low-rental homes in Princeton, New Jersey, shown here, has demonstrated for seven years that attractive housing can be built to rent at about $6 a room—and still be a sound investment. It illustrates, further, a new idea in financing low-cost housing which might well revolutionize low-cost housing if its principles were generally understood and adopted.

In this little community, ten families demonstrate how those other ten million families all over the country might live. The homes are pleasant, skillfully planned, modernly equipped and beautifully built. There is plenty of space within, and plenty without for greenery, play and privacy. Each four-room unit (two bedrooms, bathroom, living room and kitchen) in the group has its own two separate entrances, front and back. And the rent each family pays is $25 a month, or $6.25 a room—the average rent that ten million families pay for bad homes in the slums.

Yet this Princeton project operates at no expense to the public; the rents covering all the costs of land, construction, maintenance and financing. In this day, when Government subsidy is almost taken for granted in low-cost housing, it is startling to realize that these houses have proved a sound investment, paying to their builder a low but secure return on the money invested.

It was to illustrate the important part proper financing can play in good low-cost housing that these houses were built by Gerard B. Lambert, a Princeton man who has devoted much time to the study of housing.

His belief was almost revolutionary in a day when many people thought that Government subsidy was the only way to provide housing for the lowest third of the population. His idea was simply that, by a totally new arrangement of financing, good low-cost housing could be made to pay in dollars and cents—not the quick fantastic turnover of the speculative builder, leaving a wash of jerry-built slums in his wake, but with a small, steady, protected return similar to a Government bond.

This belief has been brilliantly demonstrated in the success of the Princeton housing project. His financing plan was this: The Princeton group has ten houses, each costing $3000—the total cost, $30,000. Each of these four-room units rents for $25 a month, or $6.25 per room.

On each $3000 unit, then, 10 per cent is charged in rent—$300 a year, $25 a month. Of this 10 per cent, 4 per cent is allocated to maintenance, a sum that the years have shown is more than adequate to provide excellent maintenance. The other 6 per cent goes over a twenty-eight-year period, to pay off the original investment (of $3000) and to provide the investor with a constant 4 per cent return on the amount of money he has put in. At the end of twenty-eight years the original investor is entirely out of the project, He has received back the sum of his original investment, $3000, and 4 per cent interest for its use.

Mr. Lambert explains that, if he had depended upon the statement that he would get only this limited amount each year, there might be skeptics, to say the least. He removed all doubt, after building the project, by turning the property over to the Princeton Housing Authority, a civic body, in exchange for $30,000 of their bonds. In this way, the Authority runs the project, collects the rents and pays Mr. Lambert 6 per cent each year on their bonds until they are retired—no more, no less.

What is done with the buildings at the end of twenty-eight years, when the bonds are retired, is an important part of the Lambert plan. It attacks the problem of having to add local taxes to rent. It is to be noted that, in the above rental of 10 per cent, no sum is set aside for city taxes. That is because at the end of twenty-eight years, at which time the original investor's interest expires, the property, under the Lambert plan, reverts to ıe city in payment of the taxes that it has ithheld (or, if the Federal Government aned the money to pay the taxes each year, ıe buildings would be held to repay the ederal Government). The theory is that at ıe end of twenty-eight years these build-gs, properly maintained, will have sufficient alue to pay off fully, and possibly more than ay off, the sum that their taxes would ave represented during that time. The city, ı either case, would certainly have the option ) get them and direct them as it thought est for social purposes.

THAT PAYS

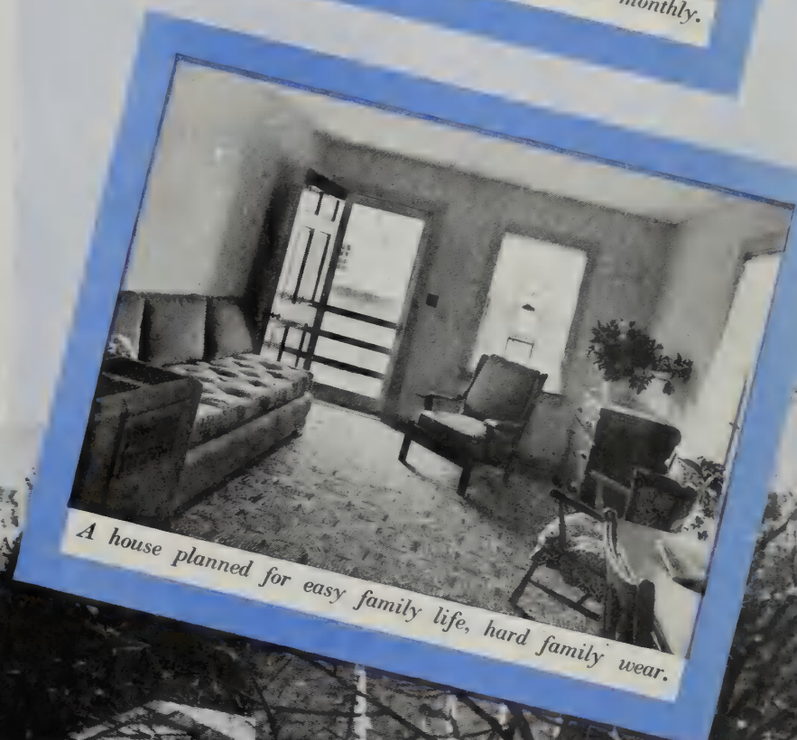
The Lambert plan, then, suggests that low-ost housing be financed by something which , in effect, like a bond; since the investor an never get more than 4 per cent return n his money, the speculative possibility is iminated. Mr. Lambert suggests further ıat, in order to protect the investor against ossible bad seasons, the Government—per-aps through FHA—guarantee the investor ½ per cent on his money. This in no sense ould be a true subsidy, since FHA already ives a guaranty on individual home loans, nd has steadily made, rather than lost, ıoney on the guaranty.

In effect, with such an arrangement, the ıvestor has bought a bond on which 2½ per ent interest is guaranteed, but on which 4 per cent interest is possible, this last 1½ per cent acting as an incentive to draw good solid capital, such as trust companies, trust funds, and so on, into this plan. Even if conditions should get so bad that the Government must step in to provide its guaranty of 2½ per cent return on the original investment (a contingency unlikely unless our whole economy collapsed), the only result would be that the Federal Government in effect has subsidized low-cost housing—a form of subsidy unquestionably desirable in an emergency.



The JOURNAL prints this Lambert plan at length because its editors feel that the rapid development of good low-cost housing (for the lowest-third income group) should be a project number one in this country's post-war development.

Naturally, good housing depends on other factors than financing: better building methods, better and more unified housing laws; wholehearted co-operation of labor is necessary too. But the recognition that adequate homes for even the poorest of our population can attract hardheaded wide-scale capital on a sound pay-as-you-go basis should mean a great deal to the women of this country. It could mean that, if they insist, there need be no slums.

PHOTOS BY GOTTSCHO-SCHLEISNER

Four rooms, modern fixtures, lots of sun—at $25 monthly.

A house planned for easy family life, hard family wear.

well as shelter to one third of a nation. ★ ★ ★

THE DARK WOOD

BY CHRISTINE WESTON

"IF ever it should happen that you hear I've been killed—don't believe it." Thus Alec Harmon reassured his wife, Stella, before sailing to his death on the Italian front. Unable to accept the reality of her loss, Stella decides to make a pilgrimage to Italy in search of his grave. Through an old friend, Dick Sparrow, she obtains passage on the clipper and shares accommodations with Bill Symes, his client who arranged their flight. Once in Italy, Stella finds that her heart is not in her mission and returns almost immediately, unaware in her intensified depression that the meeting with Bill Symes will change her entire future.

Like Stella, Bill is living in an emotional no man's land, pursuing the troubled course of his love for Regan Bycroft, wife of a war hero. For two years they have awaited Mark Bycroft's discharge in hopes that he will consent to an amicable divorce. But, passionately attached to his wife and their son, Neddy, Mark rejects such an arrangement. He writes Regan a bitter note, telling her that if she will not live with him she must live alone, separated by her own betrayal from her lover and her son.

IX

NEDDY accepted the situation with remarkable calm. He was an extraordinarily self-contained child and to Mark's terse explanation of Regan's absence—she had gone to stay with his Aunt Hester, who was ill—he merely nodded and turned to his own small affairs. Mark wondered whether he should tell him the truth, then shrank from inflicting such a shock on the unfathomed childish mind. But it was obvious to him that Neddy was accustomed to being left more or less to his own devices. Did he miss his mother? Did he wonder about her, cry for her alone in bed at night? The preoccupied eyes of his son gave Mark no clue. What did Neddy know, how much had he seen? In sudden moods of ecstasy he came close to Mark, and they frolicked together; then the man was tempted to question the son about the mother, but something always intervened—whether shame on his own part or subtlety on Neddy's, Mark was not sure. Then, as suddenly as he had come to life, the child would retreat into his old reserve, and Mark thought in despair, I shall never really understand him!

Coming home one day from the zoo, they sauntered for a little while down Fifth Avenue. Suddenly Mark felt a tug at his fingers and looked down in time to intercept a quick smile, a glance of recognition. It vanished at once, and the recipient, whoever he was, vanished also in the streaming afternoon crowd.

"See someone you know?" Mark asked, and after a slight hesitation Neddy replied:

"Mr. Symes."

"Why didn't you speak to him?"

Neddy made no answer, and stopped at a window filled with knives.

Mark released his hand and lighted a pipe. "Was it the Mr. Symes who helped you choose that picture for your mother's birthday?"

"What?"

Mark repeated the question while Neddy pressed his nose tight against the shopwindow.

"Yes," said Neddy. "Bill Symes. And Mrs. Leighton."

"You told me it was Mr. Symes who helped you choose the picture."

"Mr. Symes and Mrs. Leighton. Will you buy me that big penknife?"

"I'll give you one I have at home."

They walked on and Mark thought: What a fool I am! Regan must have hundreds of friends. What do I care whether the favorite is named Symes or Grimes? What difference can it make to me? But he was disturbed by the incident for it seemed to him suddenly as though not only his own son but the whole anonymous crowd was leagued against him. He signaled a cab and they drove home.

Octavia let them in. "Lieutenant Perry and Mrs. Perry are here to see you."

THEY rose from the two corners of the sofa, and young Perry bounded toward him like a welcoming dog. "Your maid told us you'd be in shortly, so we thought we'd wait. We hoped to find Mrs. Bycroft, too, but the maid said she was visiting a sick sister. How are you, sir?" Still clutching Mark's hand, he turned to his wife. "This is my wife, Lucy."

Mark affected a cordiality he did not feel. Thank God Octavia had saved him the embarrassment of having to explain Regan's absence. He asked his friends to sit down while he went in search of whisky and glasses. Octavia had disappeared into the kitchen, and young Perry, on the pretext of helping his host, followed him into the pantry.

"Colonel Bycroft, it's so good to see you! I hope you don't mind our dropping in like this? I was keen to have you meet Lucy. I'd hoped we might have found Mrs. Bycroft home too."

"I'm sorry you missed her," said Mark. He arranged three highball glasses on a tray, while Perry gazed at him fatuously. "There's something I want to tell you. You were dead right!"

"Eh?" he muttered miserably.

"You remember on the boat coming over you gave me a bit of advice about keeping my mouth shut? Well, I kept it shut. Lucy's marvelous, but she's got a very rigid code of honesty. It's the way she was brought up, and I wouldn't have it otherwise for the world. But if I had told her about that girl in Belgium—if I'd come out with it as I half thought I better, I doubt whether anything would have been the same again. I never thought about it in terms of another person until you made me see it that way. If you hadn't, I'd probably have gone ahead and botched the whole thing. I can't thank you enough."

"That's O.K.," said Mark. He set the whisky bottle on the tray with the glasses, and Octavia appeared carrying the ice pail.

"Mrs. Bycroft rang up. I said you and Neddy would be back later, and she said she would call again."

"Thanks, Octavia."

His hands shook as he picked up the tray.

In the parlor young Mrs. Perry and Neddy were standing in contemplation of the Braque. "I say it's upside down and Neddy says I'm wrong." Mark saw that she was being serious. She gazed at him with limpid, calflike eyes. "Am I wrong, Colonel Bycroft?"

"I'm afraid you are, this time."

Neddy turned away. "Anyone can see it's right side up." He looked at Mark. "You said you'd give me a penknife."

"You'll find it on the mantelpiece in the other room. See you don't cut yourself." The boy ran out of the room, and Mark dispensed the drinks. He lifted his glass to the young Perrys. "Here's luck!"

Lucy sipped her whisky and made a face like a child's. "Ugh, it's strong. May I have some more water?"

Mark watched her with amusement. She was, he supposed, about twenty-three, but gave the effect of one much younger.

"Colonel Bycroft, Neddy told me he chose that painting himself to give his mother for a present. Is that right?"

"Well, I think he had some assistance."

"Ah, that explains it. It did seem like such a sophisticated sort of thing for a child to have picked out by himself." She continued animatedly, "I do wish Mrs. Bycroft was here. I admire her immensely."

"Do you know her?" he asked in surprise.

"Oh, no, but I heard her talk last year. She has the best taste in clothes I ever saw!"

"She has admirable taste. And when it comes to painting, I think her son shares it."

"Well," said Lucy, "she's a very clever woman, and I suppose when you're that clever you're bound to have a queer streak or two."

"Lucy!" exclaimed her husband.

"Don't be a dope, honey. Colonel Bycroft knows what I mean."

"Sure," said Mark, laughing. "Cleverness is a kind of queerness, when you stop to think of it."

"BUT that's not what I meant. I mean when one is really clever, as your wife is, one is entitled to one's own ideas about art and things of that sort."

"We live in a clever age, don't we?" said Mark amiably. "What with the atom, and everything." He felt that he was talking with someone considerably younger than his own son.

Lucy said, "It's what I've been trying to say about your wife. She reflects our age. She's not only clever, she's good. Look at the way she loves people! All kinds of people. That takes character, you know it does. I'd like to love people that way myself—I try to. But I guess I'm not like Mrs. Bycroft. I haven't got her goodness of heart."

"You seem to know a lot about her," said Mark. "I wish she was here to appreciate your eulogy. It might embarrass her, though, to find herself in the presence of such an ardent admirer."

"Why should it? You admire her yourself, don't you?"

"Naturally!"

"When your maid told us that Mrs. Bycroft had gone to nurse her sister, I turned to Sam and said, 'That's just exactly what I'd expect of her! Here's her husband just (Continued on Page 54)

ILLUSTRATED BY CORY WHITMORE

"Restraint," Regan cried. "I'm tired of restraint. There's more to love than the waiting, Bill."

WHAT FORCE IS STRONGER THAN THE ATOMIC BOMB?

By Harry Emerson Fosdick

HENRY ADAMS, author of The Education of Henry Adams, wrote in 1900 a letter from Paris, saying that every afternoon he went to the World Exposition there and prayed to the dynamo. He had, he said, nothing else left to worship and the dynamo was tops in the modern world. "Why," he wrote, "shouldn't the dynamo be worthy of worship?"

That comes pretty nearly being the real religion of millions. For three generations, with absorbed attention, man has been inventing and producing the amazing scientific paraphernalia of our modern world. Recently at my alma mater, Colgate University, where courses are conducted for airmen, a young man was ten minutes late for registration. "I am sorry to be late, sir," he said in answer to the officer's rebuke, "but yesterday I was in Africa."

The achievements of inventive science are astounding and, as in the case of Henry Adams, the dynamo, along with the atomic bomb and its cousins and aunts, has created the new pantheon of the western world.

Nothing in our generation is quite so important as the awakening of man's intelligence and conscience to the failure of this new religion.

In 1924 Winston Churchill prophetically wrote that mankind "without having improved appreciably in virtue or enjoying wiser guidance . . . has got into its hands for the first time the tools by which it can unfailingly accomplish its own extermination."

In that suicidal business civilization is now engaged, and the cause of the catastrophe is no breakdown of inventive science—never did that flourish more amazingly—but a profound moral and spiritual collapse.

Something besides dynamos must become ascendant if civilization is to survive: moral values; namely, the sobering awareness of eternal moral laws, the creation of a unifying spiritual culture based on a philosophy of life, a faith concerning it, and ethical principles underlying it, that will put meaning and purpose into living.

The generation in which I grew up, believing in automatic and inevitable progress, was characterized by an optimistic pride never before equaled in history. As we saw ourselves, we were on a cosmic escalator willy-nilly going up until, as Samuel Butler wrote, "man becomes not only an angel but an archangel."

Today, however, we face one of the most sobering crises in history, with man showing no signs of becoming an archangel, and at the center of it is this fact: not in our mastery of the material realm so much as in the spiritual realm's mastery of us lies the solution of our problem.

Yet we do not put the spiritual first, though it must be first if we are to survive. We conduct what we call education largely without reference to it: we push such ethical principles and religious faiths as we possess into the pigeonholes of our private lives, as though eternal moral laws and universal truths did not apply to the whole world's critical need.

Confronting the appalling problems of the postwar world, many eyes are still centered on man's mastery of the material and all the gadgets that will result, as though that could not mean the robot-bombing of New York from Europe, and endless similar horrors, unless man is mastered by ethical principles and religious convictions to which he gives allegiance.

At this point Nazism should be our teacher and a warning. No nation on earth was more scientifically competent than Germany; but see the result when, under the mad leadership of Hitler, the Nazis surrendered all ethical principles, made a Master Race their deity, denied any philosophy of life that upheld the essential dignity of human personality and, as regards the Christian ethic, held it to be "fit only for cowards and weaklings."

In the old Biblical story of the flood, one early thing reported of Noah, after the deluge subsided, is that he got drunk. Human nature is much the same still. Noah may have been magnificent while the flood was on, and the danger critical, putting everything he had into the life-and-death struggle, but when the tension was over he relaxed, let down, flopped, got drunk.

We did the same thing after the last war—there are many ways of getting drunk besides using alcohol—and now millions are doing it again. After the strain, the temptation to let down morally is for many well-nigh irresistible, and every postwar era illustrates the saying of Alfred Adler, the psychiatrist: "It is easier to fight for our principles than to live up to them."

The Hebrew prophet Micah, as Doctor Moffat translates him, said to his generation, "You must no longer worship things you manufacture," and that applies to us with critical urgency in ways that Micah could not have dreamed. Our catastrophe has come from a moral and spiritual collapse and our salvation must come from the re-establishment of moral and spiritual principles and faiths.

We need to take this truth seriously with reference to our education and our religion. I come from two generations of schoolmen and have spent all my life in relationship with schools and universities; I deeply sympathize with the problems teachers face, and I agree that it is unfair to blame them because mankind lacks a unifying spiritual philosophy and a clear vision of imperative ethical principles. Our schools simply reflect the dominant ideas of our culture as a whole. They have become more and more technological and vocational; they specialize in everything for which scientific inventiveness requires a technique.

Our youth can pass through our schools with hardly a glimpse of the great heritage of ethical convictions and of philosophic and religious faiths that have made possible whatever is decent and hopeful in our western culture. As one university graduate summed up the result: "They gave us spokes, but no hub."

If we are to retain democracy we cannot go on educating our people in everything except the great faiths and ethical principles that made democracy possible in the first place. Democracy came from two main streams converging in our western culture—the Jewish-Christian and the Greek heritage—and they made democracy possible because they taught a great series of faiths about the nature of moral excellence, the sacredness of human personality, the conditions of spiritual liberty, and the grounding of ethical law in the nature of God. That is the gold standard, without which there never would have been any democracy at all, and in our education we have been going off the gold standard with a vengeance.

We face the grim prospect, therefore, of a world that is technologically one, but with no unifying spiritual faith and culture, no community of soul founded on recognition of and loyalty to common understandings of life and ethical principles in living it.

The realistic fact is that we have modern science on our hands; it is here to stay and grow and put ever wider areas of power under our control; its mastery of atomic and cosmic forces increases (Continued on Page 109)

Is Your Man Normal?

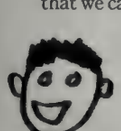
BY EARNEST HOOTON

IF you were to ask a girl whether she prefers to marry a normal or an abnormal man, she would probably plump for the normal. An intelligent girl would certainly want to know what you mean by "normal." Some Harvard scientists had to answer this question before they started a study intended to find out what "normal" young men are like. They defined normal as "the balanced, harmonious blending of functions that produce good integration."

What follows must not be taken as any sort of Scientific Guide for the Selection of Husbands. All the techniques and results of the investigations of anthropology, anatomy, physiology, pathology, genetics (the study of heredity) and sociology are incapable of producing at present any matrimonial rules of thumb. If such a definitive scientific handbook were available, you would probably not use it, anyhow. You would marry the man of your choice regardless of rules. Yet you might as well try to find out what you are getting.



Our guesses, based upon the interrelationships indicated in a few cases, may be better than your intuition, all fogged up with your emotions, sex urge, and what not. But if you try to apply what is written here to the interpretation of someone's personality, and if you find that it does not work, do not blame the investigators of the Grant Study.* They are making no claims for, or guaranties of, their findings, nor of your applications of them. The responsibility for the statements made here is mine alone, although based on the Grant Study data. It is my neck that is outthrust and already calloused from being stepped upon. Put your heel there, if you want to stamp.

What Does He Look Like?

Your first acquaintance with a person is visual, unless you correspond sight unseen, hear him on the radio or read his published stuff—and you are more than likely to be fooled by such manifestations of an invisible personality. Actually, in spite of the old saw that "appearances are deceitful," it seems probable that the body build or anatomical structure of the individual offers direct clues to the more important inner man, if one is skilled enough to recognize them. You see, science no longer considers that the workings of man's mind are independent of those of his digestive system, or of the way he is put together—his structure. The anatomy, physiology and psychology of the individual are interrelated and each influences the others. What you see is first of all the anatomy of the individual, or some of it, and virtually at the same time his physiology, as superficially shown by muscular movements, postures, facial expression, and so on. You can begin with that. However, there are many variations of the head and face that arise from the racial and familial heredity of the individual and seem to be of little importance in the diagnosis of his personality. For example, hair color, eye color and complexion are determined by complicated laws of heredity and are not clearly related to temperament, personality or to anything else we are seeking. Again, among scientists who classify the great physical divisions of mankind that we call races, much emphasis is laid upon the shape of the head—whether long and narrow, short and broad, or of a width medium relative to its length. But these seem to be of little or no importance in determining the personality of the ordinary man. Likewise the shape of the nose is another feature of partly racial origin and is decidedly unreliable as a character index.

General structure of the head, face and neck, together with that of the rest of the body, seems to afford a safer basis for constitutional and personality diagnosis than do details of the facial features. Thus a man with massive face bones, square jaws, a prominent chin and a thick columnar neck has the athletic structure that ordinarily goes with a heavy skeletal framework and rugged musculature. This description is that of the extreme development of mesomorphy, the bone and brawn structure, according to Dr. W. H. Sheldon.†

If you imagine the various human physical types arranged in a triangular area with the commonest types in the center, such an extreme type as I have described is right out at one of the three corners. At another corner is a type approaching the globular-round. Such a man is likely to have a head like a basketball, a moonlike inflated face and a soft, short neck. This type is small-boned, bay-windowed and smooth-bodied; there is no bony or muscular relief showing through the fatty covering. These very fat men represent extreme endomorphs. They are not very common, but every human being has a structural component derived from this course that makes for a generally infantile roundness, softness and pneumatic fullness.

Finally, at the third corner of the triangle is a linear type, all length without much breadth or thickness, apparently mostly skin and bones. A man of this type is likely to have a narrow head, a pinched elongated face and a pipestem neck. Such a person seems to have no muscle at all, or very little; his fragile, delicate bones stick out everywhere; he is all angles and appendages. He is an extreme ectomorph, representing the ultimate exaggeration of that third structural component, often commonly known as "a bundle of nerves."

Now of course such extreme types, at the very corners of the triangular distribution, are rare indeed, because they place the maximum emphasis upon the development of only one of the three structural components that every individual must have. In the middle of the triangle is a great cluster of types in which the three elements are more or less evenly balanced, individuals who are neither bean poles nor butterballs, nor yet gorillas. However, more types and more individuals tend to fall outside this central area, between it and the three corners of the triangle. These latter are the physical types in which there is dominance of one component but a good development of one of the other two. Thus we have dominant mesomorphs with a strong secondary endomorphy (these are the big-boned muscular men who have a considerable fatty covering), dominant mesomorphs with a strong ectomorphic secondary component (the muscular, bony men who nevertheless have very long slender legs and arms and appear athletic but a little light and brittle). All the other combinations of primary and secondary dominance of the three structural components occur and are usually easy enough to pick out in a rough way.

Before we discuss the personality characteristics that seem to go with these physical varieties, one other aspect of bodily form must be considered. Because each of us is born of woman, we men have something of the feminine in us, though naturally more of the masculine. Some men are weaker in their anatomical masculinity than others. Such types are likely to show a certain fatty fullness of the breast, slender waists, rather rounded hips and pronounced outer curves of the thighs and calves. They are by no means necessarily abnormal; only their looks are less virile than those of the bone-and-muscle boys.

What are His Personality Traits?

Here are six basic questions which, correctly answered, will block out the main features of your young man's personality.

1. How does he affect you and others? Does he impress you as "vital," "bland" or "sensitive"?

"Vital affect" men seem to display a spontaneous force and energy, without effort; they are dynamic, positive, arresting in speech and manner. "Bland affect" individuals are colorless, neutral, matter-of-fact, stolid and sometimes apathetic. The men of "sensitive affect" seem to be overalert, acutely aware of persons, things and events; subtle and complicated in thought, inclined to question conventional values and routines.

2. What are his basic interests or motivations? Mechanical and physical science, practical organizing, ideational or creative and intuitive?

This question determines the usual direction of the thought of the person by ascertaining his interests. The "mechanical and physical science" men choose such subjects in school, are interested in laboratory work and in precision methods, and are likely to be analytical, critical, accurate and logical. They want to be shown. The "practical organizing" fellows are, of course, strong on getting things done. They are doers and not thinkers; they are not interested in theory, no wide-eyed idealists. The "ideational" chaps are interested in ideas rather than things; they hate routine and monotonous, precise work; they like to talk about saving the world, or philosophy, or literary criticism; they are usually loquacious. Rather closely allied is the type called "creative and intuitive"—the only difference being that such fellows are full of more or less original ideas and brilliant hunches and are even more contemptuous of facts, humdrum occupations and precision in thought than the ideationalists. Such men are often headed for artistic or literary careers.

By this time you may know as much as you want to about your young man, but here is another important question, very easy to answer:

3. How apt is he at expressing himself in words?

Does he spout or is he tongue-tied or is he just ordinary in his desire to talk and his ability to do so?

(Continued on Page 167)

*The principal researchers of the Grant Study are: Prof. Arlie V. Bock, director; Dr. Clark Heath, physician; Dr. Frederic Lyman Wells, psychologist; Dr. Carl C. Seltzer, anthropologist; Dr. William Woods, psychiatrist; Dr. Lucien Brouha, physiologist; Miss Lewise Gregory, social investigator.

†For a popular exposition of Doctor Sheldon's system of classifying body build and temperament, cf. Nell Giles, What's Your Man Like?, LADIES' HOME JOURNAL, July, 1945.

It's Ham—No Foolin'

EASTER comes in April this year, anyway. It seems to me that that's the time for it—for April is the waking-up time of the new year. Maybe it is January first that folks go all out on as the beginning of the new cycle, but I'm for April. This is the hour when the bells of spring ring out the mean old winter and the soft notes of warmth and sunshine give us a new lease.

Take the gardens. There is something pretty wonderful about the first crocus. Something you can't explain about the early birds. Why, right now my gardener is righting up the birdhouses in the trees down by the pool and in the dogwoods by the brook. Soon they'll be rented out and things will happen.

You may believe it or not, but the robins are coming on, and a pair of bluebirds are apartment hunting in a lively, hopeful and businesslike way. Soon the lawn mower will be music in our ears and the clip, clip of hedge cutting will wake us up of mornings. And we shall know that spring is here. There's nothing like it. And it happens every year.

A custom that's old. I don't know just where it began, or why. Ham for Easter, I mean. But I know that up where I came from they claim it as an old, old custom. And so far I haven't heard anyone dispute it.

Anyway, ham for Easter dinner is like a new Easter bonnet. Something that has to be. We've had to do without both ham and hats for quite a while, but now the ham is here and no foolin'. Look at the picture and take it from me. We can go right into our Easter dinner and forget the years we went without, or ate hash. And may your new "outfit" be just as satisfying, only in a different way. It's just a case of decoration and interior decoration.

Boil the ham, if it should be boiled, and bake it as you always have, then glaze it in this slightly different way.

BAKED HAM GLAZE

After the ham is skinned and scored, glaze with the following mixture: Mix together ⅓ cup of prepared mustard, ½ cup of water, ½ cup of sugar, 1 glass of currant or any other tart jelly. Not mint—that would be terrible. Now add ½ cup of sirup

(Continued on Page 85)

By Ann Batchelder

LINE A DAY

CURRIER & IVES

1 In BRIDESHEAD REVISITED, by Evelyn Waugh, lie those enchantments he knows so well how to make real. It's a book to read where the dull embers glow, and to dream about when the soft rains fall.

2 Here's hoping your gardens are neatly dug up and the bulbs haven't grown down instead of up, as mine did once. I had a frustrated gardener that year.

3 Have I ever mentioned, amongst my frequent admonitions about French omelets, that one about beating the eggs with a fork and not a beater? Do it and see the difference.

4 One piece of news for the housekeeper with a big family or just for the two of you. Frozen orange juice, California style. Unfreeze, serve in glasses frosted on the rims with sugar and juice.

5 An experience in sweetness: fruit and berry fritters served with honey sauce. Cook to a thick sirup a cup of honey, two tablespoons of heavy cream, juice of a lemon and two tablespoons of butter. Serve hot.

6 For just a little later: pickle some nasturtium seeds in a jar of cider vinegar. Let the capers fall where they may.

7 When you are inclined to sweetbread croquettes, add to the mixture a little mace and the grated rind of half a lemon. A beautiful luncheon dish, this.

8 From an old cookbook: "When making a cake it is better to spin the butter than to 'cream' it." Got an old butter spinner for sale?

9 Watch for the opening day of the asparagus season. Don't scrape, just brush it. Break, don't cut. Tie with soft string. Cook heads up. (From one who loves asparagus.)

10 Just potatoes: Cut cold boiled ones into quarter-inch slices. Sprinkle with lemon juice, salt and pepper and a touch of mace. Now put the slices together like Noah's Ark animals, two by two.

11 Read so far? Well, heat deep fat in the right kettle, make a fritter batter, dip each coupled slice in batter and fry to the color of a fallen oak leaf. Drain, serve hot, and breathe just a breath of paprika over all.

12 For a roast of pork or breaded chops, pass a crystal bowl of puréed applesauce and currant jelly beaten together.

13 Discovery Dept.: Scalloped potatoes done with layers of cold boiled potatoes, sliced tomatoes and hamburgers. Look to the seasoning, Sally. Serve it bubbling hot.

14 Something pretty swank for the buffet: a platter of cooked chicken breasts set in chicken aspic. Garnish with black olives and tomatoes stuffed with a green salad.

15 Jelly roll spread with pineapple-and-apricot jam is as new as an Easter parade.

16 Stuffed oranges are back in all sorts of sirups for salads, garnishes and desserts. Gone a long, long while.

17 Little bites for teatime entertaining! Tiny fish balls made with shrimp, and tiny ones with a sweet onion in the middle.

18 One more—and off I go—smallest yet: fish cakes of crab meat rolled in chopped nuts.

APRIL TWILIGHT

Breathing their ultimate sigh,
The April breezes die.
How near and yet how far
Swings high the evening star.

19 Further discovery: A platter of the smallest hot rolls, scooped out and filled with seasoned scrambled eggs and creamed dried beef.

20 And have you come across chopped cooked chicken livers with bacon and peanut butter, done into bite-size sandwiches?

21 Spice and so on: Green beans do better with a little shake of nutmeg. A mere whisper of celery salt goes well in a spinach soufflé.

22 And whatever your tomato dish, don't forget the sweet basil. It is as honey to the comb or the hum to the bee.

23 Crab meat, shrimp, lobster and hard-cooked eggs, chopped and done in a Newburg sauce, set up a patty no end.

24 Smoked finnan haddie is a breakfast dish admired by some. Cut it into good slices and broil. Serve with lemon butter.

25 Answer to query: No, Albertina, Pain Perdu is not a remedy for dyspepsia. It's a fancy French name for French toast. The Pain is not getting enough of it.

26 Favorite dishes from my kitchen: Salt pork in cream gravy. Parboil the slices of pork five minutes. Dry in towels. Dip in beaten egg, roll in flour and fry until crisp.

27 Make the gravy with some of the pork fat, flour and cream. Use some pepper; it won't bite you. Serve with baked potatoes.

28 Milk never takes the place of cream for cream sauce, no matter what you do.

29 Another thing to remember: sauté the onions and fry the bread crumbs that go into a dressing for poultry. As if you didn't know!

30 They tell me the arbutus is sweet in the April woods. And that the dogtooth violets and wild columbine are fragrant once again. Doesn't seem reasonable, but so it is.

By Ann Batchelder

1776 1946

OUT OF THE PAST TO PLEASE YOU NOW

...This Truly American Soup

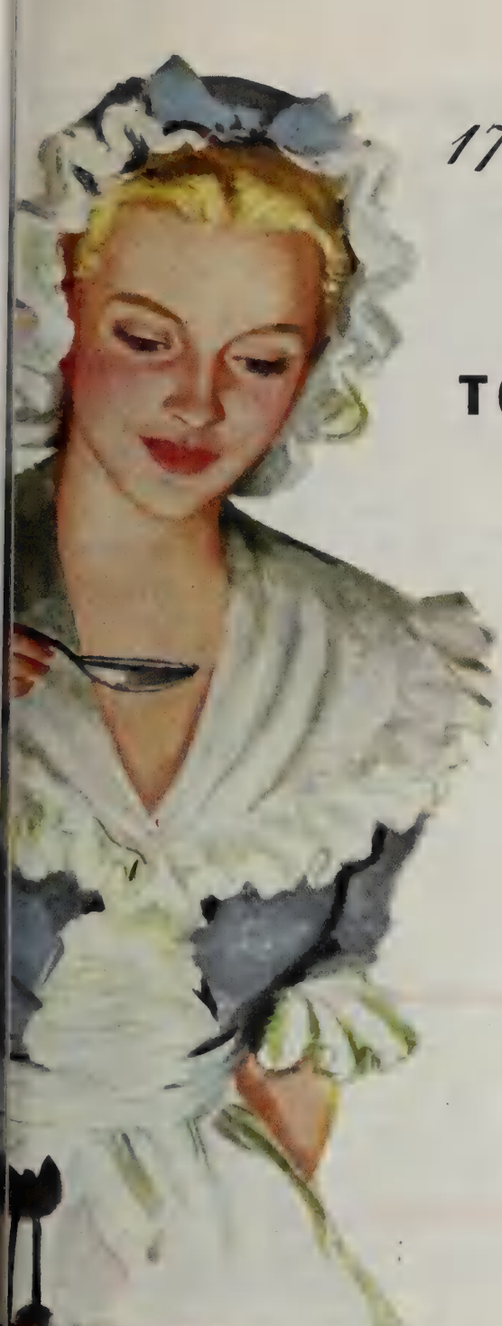
Back in the days of the thirteen colonies, Chicken Noodle Soup was a great family favorite. With patient care, early American housewives prepared their chickens, rolled their egg noodles, brewed the chicken broth in deep iron kettles to a glistening golden richness. And many a hungry husband looked up from his steaming, fragrant bowl and murmured to his wife—"Thee makes wonderful soup".



Today, of course, most Americans have the same liking for Chicken Noodle Soup. But women needn't any longer bend above the hearth, sipping and savoring. For Campbell's Chicken Noodle Soup is made to the taste of present-day America, yet in the early homespun tradition: tempting egg noodles, a broth rich with tender pieces of chicken.

You'll find plenty of this good soup now at your grocer's. Let the family have their fill again!

Campbell's

CHICKEN NOODLE SOUP

LOOK FOR THE RED-AND-WHITE LABEL

Your heart doesn't look like this!  It is a complicated pump about the size of your fist, daily circulating over 9000 quarts of blood through miles of arteries.

Given moderate care, this remarkable engine will be your friend for life. Enemies that place an extra load on your heart are—high blood pressure...hardening of the arteries... unwise physical strain  infectious diseases... and infected tonsils or teeth. Overweight  makes your heart work harder, so keep your weight down!

Are you a friend of your heart? You can be! Be moderate in your habits of exercise. Avoid loss of sleep. Have periodic physical and dental examinations.

For more information about the heart, send for Metropolitan's free booklet, 46-J, "Protecting Your Heart."

Metropolitan Life Insurance Company
(A MUTUAL COMPANY)

Frederick H. Ecker
CHAIRMAN OF THE BOARD

Leroy A. Lincoln
PRESIDENT

1 MADISON AVENUE, NEW YORK 10, N.Y.

COPYRIGHT 1946—METROPOLITAN LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY

THE DARK WOOD

(Continued from Page 46)

returned from Europe, but does she hesitate when it's a question of someone else's welfare? Not she!'"

Mark listened, the smile glued to his face.

Lucy continued earnestly, "And it's not the sentimental kind of goodness either. You can tell that by seeing her just once, as I have. It's that she has a sense of proportion. Listening to her talk, I thought to myself, 'That woman would never make a muddle out of anything. She would always know exactly what to do, and she'd go ahead and do it.'"

While Mark murmured some formal agreement, he reflected, She's right. Regan never would make a muddle out of anything that concerned her own interests. She has always known exactly what to do and she has gone ahead and done it. That was Regan for you, in a nutshell—a biographical note adduced by someone who had seen her just once! Nothing, nothing must stand in Regan's way. Possessions, those sentimental, insidious reminders of a previous condition, were quietly discarded; she was not one to quibble over the sale of her own home. And the disasters of war would not cramp her style, for the tide which had obliterated half the world had served merely to carry her in triumph nearer to her destined goal.

He said presently that he hoped the Perrys would be staying in New York long enough to meet his wife. "We must fix up something. Dinner, cocktails? I'm sure Regan will arrange it, the minute her sister can spare her."

They beamed at him. "We shall be here a couple of weeks before leaving for the West. Sam wants to stay for some sort of banquet. Tell Colonel Bycroft about it, honey."

"You'll attend, colonel? It's to be at the Rotterdam Hotel, the end of next week, in honor of General Wilmer. A sort of farewell before we all separate for good! There'll be a lot of the old outfit present, and God knows when we shall see each other again." He looked wistfully at Mark. "You wouldn't believe it, but actually it gives me a kind of pang to think of it."

I knew it, thought Mark. Reunions! He shook his head. "I always hated old Wilmer."

"So did most of us. But you should see him now. I met him on the street yesterday, and the old boy looks about a hundred. Now the shooting's over he feels he has nothing to live for. Told me himself. Practically wept on my shoulder, didn't he, Lucy?"

"Sweet old man," said Lucy, nodding. "And he was touched to hear we were going to give him a farewell party. He especially asked for you."

Mark allowed himself to be persuaded. After all, he could always get out of it at the last moment. "All right, put me down for a plate. The Rotterdam, you said? When?"

"We haven't fixed the date. I'll call you up. Maybe we could go together."

MARK said that would be fine, and they went on to talk of other things. Perry was full of plans for the future. The minute he got his discharge from the Army, he and Lucy were going back to his father's ranch in Texas. Mark listened while his friends rhapsodized over the steers they would raise, the babies they would have, the old friends who must come to visit them. They charmed him into sharing their absurd vision of golden dust and violet hills and the beryl waters of the Pecos. He felt that a guitar was all that was needed to complete the picture.

The telephone rang, and it was Regan. "Mark? I got your letter."

He stood beside the windows at the farther end of the room and held the receiver close to his ear, hoping her voice would not carry to his guests. They murmured tactfully and tinkled the ice in their glasses, but to Mark it seemed as if her voice must be ringing in every corner of the room.

The best solvent for questions of duty that I have been able to find, is to consider what would be the result of a given policy if it were followed by everybody under similar circumstances.

—HENRY HOLT: Garrulities of an Octogenarian Editor. (Houghton, Mifflin.)

"Mark, I would never have believed you could be so spiteful."

He said stiffly, "I'm sorry."

"I don't believe you are sorry. For heaven's sake, are we children? Surely there's some way of working this thing out decently and calmly. Why not? Can you give me any rational reason why we can't?"

"Regan, do you mind if we go into this later? I have guests."

"Then I'll call you tomorrow. We've simply got to meet and discuss everything like adult beings."

"Would you care to talk to Neddy?"

"Not now, thanks. I'm too upset. Your letter was horrible. I just cannot understand ——"

"Very well, then, later. How is Hester?"

He heard her angry laugh over the wire. "As though you cared about Hester!"

HE hung up and came back to his seat. "Sorry for the interruption. How about another drink?"

But they rose. "We must dash," said Perry. He gripped Mark's hand. "I'll call you up about that banquet."

Lucy turned her adolescent eyes upon him. "And perhaps while you and Sam are entertaining the general, Mrs. Bycroft and I might have dinner somewhere together. I'll write her a note."

"That would be kind of you."

Mark accompanied them into the hall. He patted them paternally and stood with a fixed smile on his lips until they had disappeared down the staircase. Back in the parlor, Octavia was clearing away the glasses. He said roughly, "Leave mine. I want another drink." When she had gone he felt ashamed of his brusqueness, ashamed of the whole ignominious role which he had elected to play this afternoon. Oh, he'd make Regan pay for this, he'd make her pay if it took the rest of his life.

The doorbell rang, and when he went to open it he found Perry standing in the hall, alone. The young man seized his arms. "Colonel Bycroft! Mark—forgive me, I couldn't help hearing something over the phone, and then I saw your face. I couldn't go away without asking whether there was something—anything ——"

"Where's Lucy?"

"I told her to wait for me at the corner." He stared at Mark. "Something is wrong, isn't it? Terribly wrong!"

"I should have explained at once. My wife has left me."

Given utterance, it sounded more ludicrous than tragic, but he was not prepared for the effect of the simple statement on Perry. His eyes widened. He clasped Mark in his arms. "I guessed it!"

Mark released himself gently. "It's all right, kid. The heavens are not going to fall. You better run along to Lucy. Tell her, and convey my apologies."

"Your apologies?" The boy seemed beside himself. "How could she do it? How could any woman? Doesn't she know the kind of guy you are?"

He went away at last, and Mark returned to the parlor. There he found Neddy busily sharpening a pencil with the penknife.

"It's sharp," said Neddy, with satisfaction. "It's almost as sharp as a razor."

"You be careful," Mark warned him, and added inconsequentially, "It's a German knife." He had picked it up on a battlefield, and it was the only souvenir he had brought home.

Neddy gazed at the knife with renewed interest. "Did it belong to a German?" he asked.

"Yes."

"Did he die?"

"Yes."

(Continued on Page 56)

She's like "a dainty rogue in porcelain," with an adorable jeune fille look!

ARTA FOLWELL TO WED STEPHEN T. EARLY, JR. EX-INFANTRY OFFICER

Mr. and Mrs. Henry Philip Folwell of Jackson, Mississippi, have announced the engagement of their daughter Miss Arta Parvin Folwell to Mr. Stephen Tyree Early, Jr., of Washington, D. C. Miss Folwell attended Washington Seminary, Mr. Early attended Staunton Academy and the University of Maryland.

MERCY STEEL—Arta helps sort and clean surgical instruments to be shipped to Europe where they are so desperately needed. Since 1940 the Medical and Surgical Relief Committee, now a nation-wide organization, has been sending supplies throughout the free world. Volunteer workers, like Arta, help collect, sort, and clean them before they are checked by trained nurses and sent on their merciful way.

SHE'S Engaged! SHE'S Lovely! SHE USES Pond's!

IT WAS AT A PARTY in Atlanta that Arta and Stephen met, and it's easy to see why she danced right into his heart for keeps.

There's a darling natural grace about everything she does. Her hair is silk-spun, her eyes warm, friendly brown, her complexion pink-and-white and baby-soft.

"I use lots of Pond's Cold Cream on my face right along," she says. "It's just the grandest cream, and makes my skin feel really super."

Yes—she's another engaged girl with a charming soft-smooth Pond's complexion! And this is how she cares for it:

Arta smooths snowy Pond's generously all over her face and throat—and pats well to soften and release dirt and make-up. Then tissues off.

She rinses with a second creaming of silky-soft Pond's, working it 'round her face with little circles of her cream-covered fingers. Tissues off again. "I like to cream double each time—for extra cleansing, extra softening," she says.

You'll love a luxury-size jar of Pond's!

Pond's your face twice a day—as Arta does—every morning when you get up, every night at bedtime. In-between clean-ups, too! It's no accident so many more women use Pond's than any other face cream at any price. Ask for a big luxury jar of soft-smooth Pond's Cold Cream today!

HER RING—a stunning diamond in a square setting with three small diamonds on each side.

A FEW OF THE MANY POND'S SOCIETY BEAUTIES

Thelma, Lady Furness
Miss Geraldine Spreckels
The Lady Moyra Forester
Mrs. George Jay Gould, Jr.
Duchess de Richelieu

(Continued from Page 54)

"Did you kill him?"

"Yes," said Mark.

X

MIRIAM SPARROW, soignée in her spring suit, sauntered up Fifth Avenue in the May sunshine, enjoying the weather and her own reflection in the store windows. She smiled impartially and without envy at the youths and maidens who passed her, and at a dowager with corrugated visage leading a dachshund on a silver chain. Her reflections brought a train of others equally optimistic and irrelevant: peace was here to stay and the world was regaining its senses, stumblingly but with visible determination and courage. For Americans—Miriam stepped aside to avoid colliding with the dachshund—, for Americans the design of life, momentarily disrupted by war, was falling into recognizable patterns. Once more the future had become private property, and battle the personal concern of individuals.

This morning at breakfast Dick had said, "Well, it looks now as if we'd banked too much on—what shall I call them?—the imponderables. Symes tells me that Colonel Bycroft has returned from overseas, and flatly refuses even to consider a divorce. It looks as if we were going to have a real fight on our hands."

Miriam had laughed. She never failed to derive a malicious amusement out of Symes' difficulties. "Whose move is it now?" she inquired lightly.

Dick frowned. "Ours, I suppose. But it's got to be a cautious one. You see, the trouble is, Bycroft has everything on his side ——"

Miriam interrupted: "I suppose this means you won't be able to lunch with Stella and me?"

"Afraid not. I've got to see Bill. He's in a state, though of course he won't admit it."

"I hope you assured him that the old-fashioned riding crop is completely outmoded?"

"Bill's no coward. It's not violence he fears, but scandal. You know his phobias on that question."

"Well, Stella and I will have to get along without you." She gazed at him with an absent-minded air. "I can't wait to see Stella. I wonder whether it will have made any difference."

"Whether what will have made any difference?"

"Italy."

"I never have understood why you place so much importance on that trip."

"Well, because it would have made a difference to me, if I'd been in her shoes."

"You mean just going to Italy and finding Alec's grave would make a difference ——"

Miriam shrugged. "I suppose that's what I mean."

Stella had telephoned the evening before, and they had arranged to meet near the Grand Army Plaza before lunch the next day.

Walking up Fifth Avenue to meet her friend, Miriam reflected, Yes, I suppose that that was what I did mean—that her trip would make a difference. Maybe I have a melodramatic mind. But it seemed like such an odd thing for Stella to do, to go to Italy. Not like her. Not like anything I know about her. She's never been away from America in her life, nor done anything even remotely adventurous or even independent. And then the feeling I've always had about her, that the shock of Alec's death numbed something, perhaps even killed something vital in her nature, leaving her defenseless, leaving her at the mercy of any self-destroying instinct which might come upon her.

Crossing the street toward the plaza, Miriam caught sight of her friend waiting on the opposite corner. They waved.

What did I expect? Miriam asked herself fearfully. That she would not come back from Italy or that she would come back different, or indifferent?

"Miriam!"

"Stella! Stella, dear."

Arm in arm, they turned and began to walk up the Mall toward the zoo.

"Dick couldn't come," Miriam said hurriedly, breaking the ice with trivialities. "He had to lunch with a client. But he sent

SPICY HAMBURGER

Mix ground beef with minced onion and parsley, salt, paprika and Lea & Perrins Sauce. Shape in small, flat cakes and pan-broil. Different! De-licious! Give stews and hash this "luxury" flavor, too—with a dash of tangy Lea & Perrins!

FREE Recipe Book. Write Lea & Perrins, Inc. 241 West St., New York 13, N. Y., Dept. 4E.

Famous for more than 100 years

LEA & PERRINS Sauce
THE ORIGINAL WORCESTERSHIRE

Cleans Pans Saves Hands

Kurly Kate
RUST PROOF
POT CLEANER
Made of STAINLESS Metal

Cleans, scours, brightens without injury to lovely hands. Rust-proof, stainless, soft to touch—KURLY KATE rinses clean under the faucet for long, repeated use.

Works with any soap or powder 10¢

CLEANS SCOURS POLISHES

you his love." She pressed Stella's arm. "How good to see you! Tell me about Italy. Was it spring there? Was it like this?" Covertly, she examined her companion's features. Wan, distrait, dressed in nondescript fashion, without make-up or any incentive to beauty, Stella inspired her with pity and dread.

"The violets were gone," Stella said. "But the chestnut trees were in bloom." She smelled the white flowers in Central Park, among the pigeons and the children. She heard the voice of Guido Vitelli saying in deep perplexity, "Going? But you've only been here a day! The train for Rome? Sure, it leaves a little after six—if it's on time."

The leaves in Central Park quivered in the breeze, and Miriam said, "It's early for lunch. Let's sit down and talk in peace."

They found an untenanted bench. "So you came by ship?" said Miriam. "How was it, better than the plane?" Stella replied that the voyage home had been comfortable but uneventful. Miriam listened to the tones of this familiar voice; she tried to penetrate its calm, to surprise some meaning in its trivial utterance. It told her nothing. Why wouldn't Stella speak openly and naturally of her visit to the Italian town where Alec had died? She had not even written her friends. And with so much to be said, all one got was a catalogue of descriptions! Had she found Alec's grave? I was his cousin, his friend, thought Miriam resentfully. Surely I have some right to know!

Stella said, "Your friend Mr. Symes was very kind to me on the plane going over."

Miriam suffered a diminuendo of emotion. "Let's walk," she said abruptly. "Queer, how chilly it gets the minute one sits down."

---

On the level, now, if everyone in the world was blind but you, would you need as many luxuries?

—H. L. HUNTINGTON: Pattering Reigns (Flyer Press).

---

They strolled beside the bright grass where young men and girls were sitting. A little boy on roller skates rushed past them, followed by a Negro woman who cried after him, "Neddy! Be careful, Neddy!"

Miriam thought bitterly, We know each other too well for this absurd reticence. Why won't she say something? She must know that I'd want to hear about Montescari. Alec belonged to all of us in different ways, and she has no right, now, to try to monopolize this last memory of him, she has no right to exclude us from that last experience in Italy. As her jealous grievance increased it assumed the guise of selfless responsibility. Why didn't Stella do something about her appearance? How Alec would have hated this eternal grieving, this dullness, this listlessness! He had loathed all the trappings of grief.

"We intend to live forever!" he proclaimed joyously one summer down at Jarley. "If you ever hear it said that I am dead, or reported missing, never believe it!" Those were his own words, repeated to her by Stella soon after he had gone away to war.

The silence had become unendurable to Miriam. She said, "I had a letter from Myrtle Anderson, from Jarley. She asked for news of you. She said she had written to you, but that you never answered her letters—not even when she told you about James' home-coming, and his wounds."

"I know," Stella murmured. "He was wounded in both legs. I meant to write, but I found it so hard to say anything."

Miriam continued sharply, "Myrtle spoke of the house. She said it was in bad shape. The roof leaks, the walls are stained with water, the floors tilted by the frost. The road, she said, was full of holes, the culvert washed out, weeds everywhere. Bugs have eaten the apple trees." She turned accusingly to her friend. "Myrtle said the grass hadn't been cut since Alec left, that the place just stands there looking more and more desolate. Oh, Stella!"

Stella stared at the rich light fingering leaves and grass, at the gay summer figures.

Count on genuine Velveeta for grand cheese flavor!

fine food value!
smooth-melting!

CHEDDAR COMING BACK!
Watch for these two famous Kraft cheddar varieties: "Old English" with the wonderfully sharp flavor, and medium-mellow Kraft American. Gradually, as the Government needs less cheddar, there'll be more for you.

ELEGANT EGGS! For croustades, cut 1½" slices of bread, trim crusts, scoop out a small amount from centers. Brush with melted butter or Parkay Margarine; toast on all sides. Serve a poached egg in each with this rich, velvet-smooth Velveeta sauce: Melt ½ lb. of Velveeta in the top of a double boiler; gradually stir in ⅓ cup of milk. A really protein-rich main dish—so delicious with Velveeta's rich yet mild cheddar cheese flavor. Use this nutritious cheese food for sandwiches, too.

The World's Favorite Cheeses are made by the Men and Women of KRAFT

Copr. 1946 by Kraft Foods Company

★GRAND RELIEF FOR MUSCLE ACHES!

★help nature carry off "fatigue acids"!

When unaccustomed exercise makes muscles sore and stiff, chances are you can blame "fatigue acids" . . . they're waste products that settle in the muscles, often making them swell and hurt! The thing to do is rub those tortured muscles with quick-acting Absorbine Jr. By stimulating local circulation, more fresh blood flows through the muscles—helps carry the "fatigue acids" away! Then as swelling subsides, pain eases—you feel grand relief you've longed for! Keep Absorbine Jr. on hand. $1.25 a bottle at your drugstore!

W. F. Young, Inc., Springfield, Mass.

★ABSORBINE Jr.

A child hurled a scarlet ball, a young sailor fed squirrels peanuts from a paper bag.

Miriam said, "Myrtle wrote that the place seemed to breathe of Alec. 'Walking round the house, looking in the windows,' she wrote, 'James and me couldn't hardly believe he wasn't there, that the door wouldn't open and him come running out to greet us, like he used to. Hard to believe, James said, hard to believe he was dead.'"

"How do we know that he is dead?" asked Stella.

Once more the scarlet ball spun through the air, and the sailor, overhearing her words, looked at her curiously.

Miriam clasped Stella's arm. "Myrtle Anderson's letter reminded me how much Alec cared about things. Nothing was commonplace in his eyes."

"Then why doesn't he come back?"

"Stella, dear ——"

"Yes! Why doesn't he come back?"

Miriam gazed at her, and it seemed as if a perverse sequence had reversed a normal trend; that the future, not the past, was imposing itself on Stella's face. What finally revealed itself, frighteningly, fleetingly, was the face of age itself—age grown cynical, age defrauded, peering through the living mask into the present. Then the lips quivered and it was Stella who looked at her.

"Oh, Miriam, why doesn't he come back?"

It was not really a question, but a cry projected harshly into the green and renascent season. It was the eternal echo, and it silenced Miriam, making her happier convictions wither one by one as if autumn, not spring, had touched them with its pitiless finger. Arm in arm, though strangely divided, she and Stella walked until they found themselves standing beside the little pond, where they paused to watch a tiny sailboat move across the water.

Miriam said at last, "Stella, he is not coming back. You know it as well as I do."

"How can we be so sure? We never saw him die. How can we say someone is dead when we don't know?"

"But, my dear, it's true!"

Stella shook her head. "We don't know. Death can be a sort of absence, going on for a long time, then coming to an end at last and the dead returning. That's what Myrtle Anderson and James must have felt when they went to the house at Jarley and expected the door to open, and Alec to come out to greet them. Why not? How dare we say ——"

"Alec couldn't have borne to hear you talk like this."

"He told me never to believe that he was dead."

"But that was not what he meant."

"Yes, he meant it."

Miriam's eyes filled with tears. "You went to Italy. You found him there.'

"That was not Alec."

"It was Alec, Stella."

"Those thousands of crosses? Alec was not among them. I know."

MIRIAM thought desperately, Something has happened, and she must tell me! I've got to make her tell me. "Stella, listen. You went to Montescari. You saw the place—the buildings, the fields, the roads where he must have walked. The place where he died. You saw his grave." Her voice slipped from her control, she felt herself trembling, and then Stella turned and faced her.

"You're wrong, Miriam. I did go to Montescari, yes. And I saw the places he must have seen—the pink and yellow houses, the hills, the roads. But I didn't find Alec. He was not there. He was not one of those dead white things marching——"

"But Stella, if he had not died you'd know, wouldn't you? Life cannot conceal itself forever from love. You'd know if Alec was alive."

"I know that he was not at Montescari," Stella repeated in a hard voice. "He was not one of those graves, one of those thousands and thousands of graves, all marching across the land and the hills. No, Alec was not one of those."

Miriam gripped her arm. "Look at me! Did you go to Montescari? Stella, answer me."

Stella watched the little boat hovering offshore. Her face was bloodless, it was without love. It was even without grief.

"Answer me, Stella!"

"I did go to Montescari," she said at last sullenly. "Of course I went to Montescari."

"And you found his grave." She was silent, and Miriam shook her arm. "You must tell me!"

"I didn't find him."

"What? But you must have! You had all the information from the Bureau of Graves Registration. You must ——"

"I didn't find him." She turned supplicating eyes on her friend, and sudden understanding illumined Miriam.

She said slowly, "You mean you didn't want to!" Then, sternly, "You mean—you ran away!"

Stella made no reply, and for several minutes they stood watching the little boat bending and veering before the wind. The murmur of the city encompassed them; its shining ramparts rose above the dwarf green of the park, its tallest shafts standing like a gesture of supreme indifference against the spring sky.

XI

DICK SPARROW met his client in a shabby restaurant in the West Forties. It was one of those places which he had learned to associate with William Symes. Faded awnings and flowerpots outside, inside a smell of garlic and sour wine. It would be crowded, stuffy and remote from the formal exigencies of Mr. Symes' public life. One of these days, thought Dick as he stooped to enter the narrow doorway, one of these days, I'm going to make Bill take me to the Chambord or Louis XIVth, or to the Ritz, where he can introduce me to his senatorial and State Department buddies. Do I always have to meet him for garlic soup in one of these pigsties?

Symes was waiting for him in the tiny entry. "Dick! I've got a table, and Regan is here." His smile was visibly forced. "We decided it was about time you and she met each other, since you'll have a good deal to talk about sooner or later."

Dick said he was delighted to meet Mrs. Bycroft, whom he had seen at a distance, but whom he had never met. Symes' reluctance to bring about this introduction was, he felt sure, due to a characteristic mixture of embarrassment and caution. Dick could imagine the man communing with himself and deciding that it simply would not do for the three of them to be seen together. Symes seemed perpetually torn between his natural desires and a chronic timidity, and as Dick pursued his handsome back through the packed dining room toward a table at the farther end, he wondered what could have occurred to bring about this gathering.

Regan greeted him with her charming smile. She's even better-looking than I imagined, thought Dick, and sat down with a pleasant sense of anticipation. In spite of the stifling heat, the crowd and the smells, Regan radiated a wonderful air of freshness and elegance. Dick liked her voice, which reminded him of a boy's. He noticed her intense self-consciousness and the excitement which lurked just beneath the surface. He saw, too, that she was unmistakably in love, and that she did not share her lover's nervous propensity for concealment, for when Symes seated himself beside her she immediately took his hand.

"I've asked Bill again and again to bring you to lunch, Mr. Sparrow, and at last he's gotten round to it." She looked at Symes. "Tell me, darling, why do you always insist that we eat in these loathsome joints?"

"Do you really mind? The food's very good, and the liquor isn't so bad."

Dick thought, I wish he'd remember how often he repeats that apology, or that he'd content himself with admitting he likes to eat in dives because they're good places to hide in when one is with one's mistress and a fairly well-known divorce lawyer.

Regan gave Dick an amused glance. "Bill's such a coward! He's afraid somebody respectable will see us together before we're properly married. I'm surprised you don't wear a false beard and smoked glasses on these occasions, darling!"

Instant Relief from CORNS, SORE TOES

Dr. Scholl's Super-Soft Zino-pads

For quick relief beyond belief, use Super-soft Dr. Scholl's Zino-pads. The instant you apply them on corns, sore toes, painful shoe friction stops; pressure is lifted. Thin, soothing, cushioning, protective. Separate wonder-working little Medications included for speedily removing corns. Richly tailored. Skin-tone blended. Worn almost invisibly. No bulk, no unsightly taping.

For super-quality, value and effectiveness—insist on Super-soft Dr. Scholl's Zino-pads. Cost but a trifle. Sold at Drug, Shoe, Department Stores and Toiletry Counters.

2 SIZES FOR CORNS, SORE TOES

Special Size for Small Corns

Regular Size for Corns, Sore Toes

Dr Scholl's Zino-pads

FREE! "WESTERN" VACATIONLANDS

● Description of famous western vacation regions with pictorial map of the West. Will help you to plan your summer or fall vacation. Also information on Union Pacific travel facilities.

●

Folder contains information about California, Pacific Northwest, Colorado, Sun Valley, Yellowstone, National Parks of Utah-Arizona and other scenic regions. Mail coupon for free copy.

UNION PACIFIC RAILROAD

Passenger Dept.
Union Pacific Railroad,
Room 14, Omaha, Nebraska

Please send free copy of "Western Vacationlands."

Name _____

Address _____

City _____ State _____

"Or a cloak and dagger," said Dick, liking her spirit.

"Regan's talking nonsense," Symes protested. He assumed a genial air. "I suppose I am inherently decorous, though I try not to be. One's upbringing has a way of sticking, and mine was horribly strict."

"Strict!" echoed Regan. "They practically kept you in a strait jacket, didn't they, my poor sweet?"

"Well, I suppose I was a difficult child, in addition to being an only one."

The words were followed by an uneasy pause, and Dick thought of Regan's own son, Neddy. Thus in a single unpremeditated step all three were drawn closer to the subject which was uppermost in their minds, but it was left to Regan to broach it, and she did so with a directness which many of her friends regarded as typical, but which usually concealed more than it revealed.

"Well," she began, "I have no intention of putting a strait jacket on my son, nor do I intend to let anyone else do it." She looked at Dick. "Bill's told you about my little boy, Mr. Sparrow?"

Dick nodded, and Symes gazed at the tablecloth with its pattern of the previous meal and the purple bruises of spilled wine.

Regan went on, "I can see, quite clearly, that I have a fight on my hands, but I've got to go through with it for Neddy's sake. It's quite evident that he cannot be left indefinitely in his father's care."

"Just a minute," Symes interrupted. "Let's order lunch, then we won't have the waiter hanging round listening." He lifted an authoritative finger and intercepted a dingy white jacket as it tried to squeeze past him. The waiter took their order and departed, and Symes turned to Regan. "Sorry, darling! Now perhaps you'd better tell Dick everything, from the beginning."

SHE made a gesture of resignation and disdain. "My husband is behaving inexcusably—no, I mean it, really inexcusably. Of course I expected he'd be hurt and angry. That would have been natural enough—I was prepared for it. The whole situation is tragic. But I did think that he would accept it finally, that he would recognize it as being inevitable, and that he would behave—well, like a gentleman!" She smiled faintly. "He has always seemed to me to be a man of unusual delicacy of feeling; when, in the past, situations like this arose between some of our friends, Mark was always sensible and broad-minded in his judgments. More so, often, than I. I realize, of course, that one's point of view can be quite different when one faces such problems oneself, but I hadn't bargained for Mark's attitude." She paused, then added with bitterness, "For his brutality!"

Dick murmured something about the effects of war and of separation on a man's nervous system, and she nodded.

"Of course I see all that! As I say, I expected difficulties. But I did not expect brutality." She turned her magnificent gray eyes upon Dick. "Mr. Sparrow, Mark won't let me see my child!"

"But I had gathered, from Bill, that Colonel Bycroft did not object to your seeing Neddy, or to your talking with him over the telephone."

"THAT was in the beginning, when he wrote me a hateful letter. But hateful! Since then I have called up the apartment—my apartment, mind you; it's in my name and I pay the rent!—I've called up, and Mark always answers, or when he doesn't Octavia Evans does, and it is obvious to me that Mark has somehow influenced her in his favor. Bribed her, probably. At any rate, between them they frustrate every move I make to see Neddy. I've had just one conversation with him, and he sounded miserable. It almost broke my heart. Since then, whenever I call up to say I'd like to come to my apartment, I'm told that Neddy is out with his father, or, if Mark answers, that he is out with Octavia." Her voice trembled. "Of course I could go to the school and see Neddy there, but I'd rather not risk it, for I have no idea what Mark may have said to the teachers or how much he may have poisoned their minds against me. Well, last night I called the apartment again, and Mark said Neddy was asleep. He added that on second thought he'd decided he did not care for me to see Neddy anyway. He said"—she flushed—"he said that he was not at all sure he approved of my influence on the child. My child! And he hinted that he did not approve of my friends either. Meaning, of course, just one thing."

"Do you think he knows about you and Bill, then?"

Symes said quickly, "How could he? There is no one who could tell him anything. You and Regan's sister Hester are the only people in our confidence."

Dick reflected that although he was often in the company of people who knew William Symes, he had never heard them speculate unkindly on the man's private life, nor could he recall hearing anything to the discredit of Mrs. Bycroft. In a century—and a society—where no holds are barred, there remained the simple distinction between those who were frankly bad and those who were bad but not frank. One had to concede that outwardly, at least, Symes and Regan had behaved themselves. That they could be lovers for two years and the fact pass undetected was, in the lawyer's sardonic opinion, a feat nothing short of extraordinary.

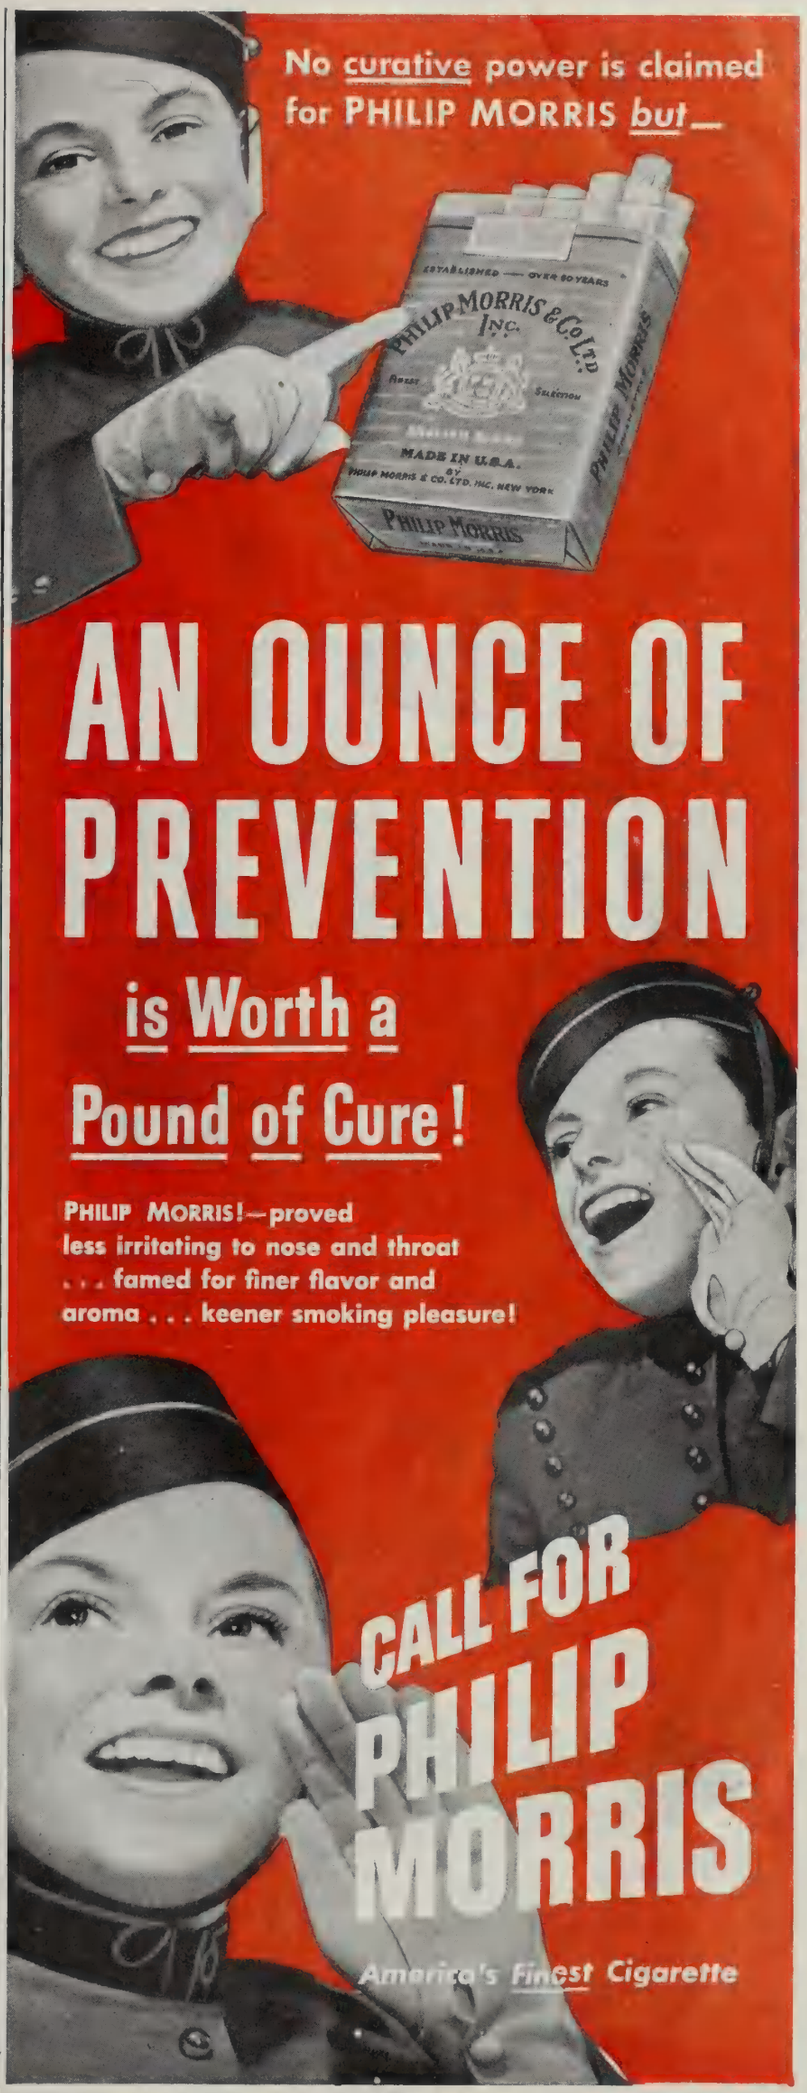
"What about your son Neddy?" he asked, after a pause. "Does he know anything, suspect anything?"

Regan shook her head. "He's only six! And naturally I've told him nothing, nor allowed him the slightest glimpse into this part of my life."

"But he knows Bill?"

"Certainly. Why not? Whenever they meet it is in the company of other friends."

"I see. You don't mind if I ask questions? It's important that I understand the situation thoroughly." She nodded, and Dick continued: "You are quite sure Neddy has never intercepted any signal of affection be-



(Continued on Page 61)

Paper, Mister?

BY ETHEL JACOBSON

What does he hymn to the morning sun
When your love arises and day's begun
And he gives you a fond, matutinal kiss?
You know it by heart, and it goes like this:
"Where is the morning paper, sweet?"

It's there at his breakfast plate, intact.
Crowned by a rose, as a matter of fact.
And you only extracted the fashion section,
A recipe for some choice confection,
The clearance specials the rag abounds in,
And used Page One to dump coffee grounds in
And—Lor', such langwidge! He needs a muzzle!
Begrudging you even the crossword puzzle!
Let him throw catfits, have the vapors:
You never so much as touch the papers!
It's witchcraft no mere man understands:
The vanishing news in a woman's hands.

"Attracting a man is a cinch!"

says Joan Davis

Laff-lovely CBS Radio Star heard Monday Nights

1. One good way is to lasso any man, drag him within easy reach, and put your foot on the back of his Adam's apple.

Of course after two or three days your foot may get tired.

So you'll probably prefer the mild technique I've worked out with that wonderful, new, white floating Swan Soap. There's nothing like Swan to help you get along with men. For instance...

2. Take my grocer. (Is he a dream!) The other day I told him, "Shopping's tough but I can get along without lots of different soaps—long as I've got Swan! Swan's my One-and-Only for complexion, bath, dishes, laundry!"

"You're pretty smart!" he says. Hear that? Right away he's telling me I'm pretty!

3. Then last night my boy friend phoned. "Joanie," he says, "I can't go through with our date!"

"Mac!" I cried. "I've been Swanning my complexion just for you! Mild Swan helps babies' skin stay beautiful—so imagine what Swan's done for me! I'm a dream!" . . . "This I have got to see," says Mac. Isn't it wonderful how Swan saved my romance?

4. Swan helps me give wonderful parties. While I relax in the living room, the boys just flock to the kitchen to Swan the dishes.

If I get lonely, I go in and tell 'em how Swan swishes into dishpan suds faster than other floating soaps. I show 'em how soft 'n white Swan helps keep my hands. Then they show me snapshots of their girl friends. We have a beautiful understanding!

5. I can't promise that Swan'll help you get along with men as well as I do. But you'll adore Swan 'cause it's four swell soaps in one! Simply stupendous for complexion, bath, dishes, and laundry! Switch to Swan . . . and switch your radio dial my way, too.

I play Joan Davis on THE JOAN DAVIS SHOW (Imagine!), featuring Andy Russell, CBS, Monday Nights. Tune in!

→ IT'S STILL IMPORTANT not to waste soap! It's made of vital materials.

(Continued from Page 59)

tween you? Children can be terribly observant, you know. He might have, without your being aware of it."

Symes said, "Not a chance! Neddy knows me merely as one of his mother's many friends. I've taken him shopping, and to the zoo, and that sort of thing, but I've always invited another friend to come along too—another child, or a woman—so that Neddy's mental associations with me would not be too concentrated." He frowned. "I wonder, though, whether I didn't make a mistake the other day. I was walking up Fifth Avenue and met Neddy with his father. It was at an intersection and there was a crowd waiting to cross the street. Neddy saw me and for a minute looked as if he would run to greet me. I acted instinctively, out of surprise and I suppose out of embarrassment, and passed them, pretending I didn't see them." He looked anxiously at Dick. "Regan thinks I may have made a psychological mistake and that it would have been better to have stopped and spoken to the child."

"You've never met Colonel Bycroft?"

"That afternoon on Fifth Avenue was the first time I set eyes on him."

"Do you think he saw you?"

"I'd say no, but I can't be sure."

Dick shrugged. "I can't see that it's important. The only reason for keeping your identity out of the way, for the present, is that we can't be absolutely sure of his reactions, and we certainly don't want a row. Isn't that just about it?"

Symes gave a short, uneasy laugh. "We certainly don't want a row, or at any rate Regan and I don't want one, as you know. Making all due allowances for a man's feelings of injured pride, it does seem as if this thing could be settled without—without vulgarity."

Dick repressed a smile. "You're expecting a good deal. He'd be superhuman if he didn't harbor some resentment."

I know of no more contemptible expression in the English language than these three words, "to get even." I can understand a healthy anger and I can fully sympathize with a perfectly normal desire to go forth and give a beating to a fellow who has done you a mean trick. I am entirely familiar with most of the lower impulses to which human flesh and blood are at times subject and which are apt to manifest themselves in very unpleasant ways. But if I were to classify the whole register of sins (big sins and little sins and fifty-fifty sins) I would place at the top of the list that pollution of the soul which manifests itself in the wish "to get even."

—HENDRIK WILLEM VAN LOON: In Our Battle.

Regan objected sharply. "I don't see why he should! He knows I have no intention of living with him. He has no idea that I am in love with anyone else, or that I want to marry again. He knows that Neddy's place is with me, and that Neddy must be protected from scandal. He knows that a child, especially a boy, will forgive his father on a question like this, but that he will never forgive his mother. When I ask Mark to let me bring the divorce suit he knows it is because I am thinking of Neddy. However, I doubt whether Mark cares much for either of us. He is acting out of wounded pride and a spirit of revenge. I'm sick to death of all these stories we hear, and have heard, of the effect of their wives' infidelity on soldiers. One would suppose the war was wholly to blame, when the chances, in innumerable cases, are that many marriages would have gone on the rocks, war or no war! And what about the men? Do you mean to tell me that their morals have been so exemplary?" She finished with temper, "All these hurt feelings, recriminations, outraged virtue and all the rest of it! Blackmail, that's all. Men using the war, and their medals, and their wounds, and their sufferings, as blackmail! The fact remains that when men and women are through with each other, they're through. And that's all there is to it."

The waiter returned and Symes ordered another round of cocktails. When he had departed Dick asked Regan how far she thought she could trust the Negro maid.

"I don't have to trust her. She knows no more about my affairs than Neddy does."

Something shrewish had crept into her voice, and Dick felt a twinge of pity for Mark Bycroft. Regan's beauty struck him, now, as something cold, and he guessed that it must arouse, in certain men, the instinct of Midas. She was like gold, inspiring sensuality, possessiveness, cruelty. He could understand that a man, young and exceptionally sensitive, might fall under her dominion, and he had no doubt it explained her marriage to Bycroft. He could understand, too, the influence she wielded over a nature like Symes'. Symes had the Midas touch, for the gold of power, of self-importance, of security.

The waiter brought their drinks, and as the liquor moved through their veins it served the purpose for which it was intended, erasing the barriers which exist between people who do not know each other well; easing communication, disguising emotion in a pleasant, equivocal haze.

To Regan, Dick advised patience. "You must give your husband time—time to get used to the idea, time to realize that your decision is irrevocable. No man can live in a temper forever, and if you're patient he may come around to seeing things your way sooner than you imagine."

"I've waited two years," Regan reminded him. "I just wish there were some quicker way."

"Dick has the right idea," Symes interposed hurriedly. Then with a peculiar artlessness he added, "You must remember, Regan, that we cannot afford to be put in the wrong by Mark. Isn't that right, Dick?"

"Dead right," said Dick. "Hold on for a few months and see what happens. After all, the man is human. Anything can happen."

Regan looked at him closely. "What do you mean, anything?"

"He might get tired of living alone."

She frowned. "Yes, he might. He's very"—she hesitated, and gave a slight laugh—"he's very much of a man. In that case, we'd have something to bargain on, wouldn't we? I mean, if he were to put himself in the wrong, by any chance?"

"There is always that chance," said Dick.

"Here's hoping!" Her face glowed like some brilliant artificial flower. He noticed the exquisite line of her shoulders, the firm and delicate texture of her skin, and felt his impartiality crumble somewhat.

XII

That evening Symes went to Washington and Regan accompanied him to Penn Station to see him off. These partings had become, for her, an unbearable nervous strain. Waiting beside him for the gates to open, she talked calmly enough, but her eyes had a heaviness, and her hand, resting on his arm, twitched convulsively when he moved.

"I think," she said, "Dick Sparrow is a good person to have on our side. I'm glad he's your friend. If anyone can help us out of this hole, he can."

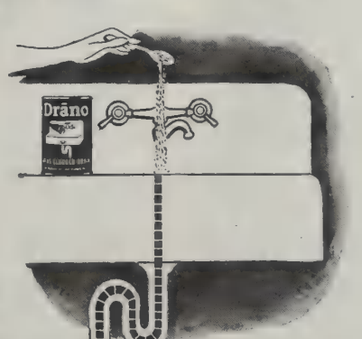
Symes' glance had traveled rapidly over the crowd at the gate; there seemed to be no one he knew, and he began to relax. He had thought it unwise for Regan to come to the station, but she insisted, and he saw that in her present mood she was not to be denied. More and more, as time went on, these moods seemed to prevail, and he found himself remembering his mother, the implacable woman he had loved with a frightened and helpless passion.

"Oh, Dick's all right. I trust him. Anyway, there is not much we can do, now, except follow his advice."

"It means waiting!"

"Well, we're used to waiting, aren't we? And maybe it won't be for much longer. I can't believe that Mark ——"

(Continued on Page 63)



"What? Filthy Sewer Germs in my sink drain?"

Yes, Sewer Germs breed in every drain - - only two inches from where you wash silver dishes and food (Survey by Molnar Laboratories New York) Scrubbing can't touch these enemies of health. It takes Drāno to boil them out! And Drāno is harmless to septic tanks: makes them work better, cuts down odors.

Make your sink safe, sanitary—use Drāno to boil out SEWER GERMS! Drāno opens clogged drains, too. Use it regularly — keep your drains free-running, free of SEWER GERMS.

NEVER OVER 25¢ at grocery, drug, and hardware stores.

Drāno

T. M. Reg. U.S. Pat. Off. by The Drackett Co.

OPENS CLOGGED DRAINS

CLEARS OUT SEWER GERMS

Always, at the Easter Season...

GAY JONQUILS made from yellow turnips! Edible Easter eggs! For recipe, write Martha Logan, Box AA, Swift & Company, Chicago 9.

Here in America the ancient tradition of ham at Easter time has become specially identified with one particular ham . . . Swift's Premium. For that name has signified "the finest" to generations of American homemakers. Only Swift's Premium Ham would do full justice to feasts and honored guests. Because so many families cherish the tradition of Swift's Premium Ham for Easter, Swift is doing its best to insure fair distribution of available supplies.

Swift's Premium Ham

BROWN SUGAR CURED!

(Continued from Page 61)

hey sauntered to and fro on the edge of crowd in a blare of loud-speakers and hollow roar of the great terminal. Regan ned to phrases worn smooth by repetition, wing well enough that she never would used to waiting, that the delay might for much longer than either of them ed contemplate.

he murmured suddenly, "You do love don't you?"

Why, Regan!"

Yes, I know I'm a fool. But sometimes thought of losing you ——"

Silly!"

Bill, why not make a clean breast of it let Mark bring the suit?"

He stopped and stared at her in utter disef. "Are you crazy? Have you any idea at a smart lawyer could do to you and me e tried such a thing? Besides," he added ckly, "Mark might not come across. n't you see, he has all the cards?"

This fact, grim and inexorable, dimmed view of the hideous amphitheater where y resumed their walk in company with milling, anonymous hordes.

Symes pressed her hand against his side. egan, I'll be home Thursday. Meet me, l you?"

An inexplicable hostility died at once. She her fingers into his. "Bill, darling, dar-g."

"There go the gates. I won't kiss you."

"Yes, kiss me."

The crowd began to suck them in its dertow toward the gates. Symes drew gan to him and kissed her. "Thursday, nember!"

"Thursday!" She let him go.

At the gate he twisted round and she saw harassed face, heard him cry above the al wave of bodies: "Not Thursday! I got—going to that dinner for General ilmer!" Then he had disappeared, his wn suit lost among other brown suits, straw hat among all the others.

She waited a moment, thinking, I could on the train with him and go to Washington, e a room at the Willard, see him when he 't busy. Why not? If we were married that how it would be. He would never travel with-t me, I would not allow him out of my sight, would not forsake me for dinner with some goat of a general or congressman, or anyone e. But now the vast submarine atmosere of the station engulfed her, and the wd, drawn by invisible currents, drifted away in separate directions. She pictured her lover sitting in the club car, reaching for his cigarettes, unfolding his newspaper, falling into easy conversation with strangers. His world had claimed him, that world from which she was excluded! She shook her head in fierce protest. She would not endure this state of affairs much longer. It was absurd, inhuman, indecent.

A shapeless woman carrying a baby almost ran her down, then paused to inquire something in unintelligible English. "You better ask a porter," Regan advised her impatiently, hating the fat brown face with its moles and its mustache, hating the stupidity of anything that permitted itself to become so gross. The woman blinked her little whale eyes in bewilderment, the baby blinked its tiny pin-point ones, and Regan turned to the escalator. Something made her glance back, and she saw the woman still standing there, clutching the baby. She looked utterly stranded; one of her brown stockings slipped slowly down a Gargantuan leg, a tear slipped down her cheek. With a shudder of disgust Regan gained the escalator and was borne upward to the fading light of Eighth Avenue and a cacophony of traffic.

She looked at her watch. Four-thirty. She had told Hester she would be home by six. There was time to spend on herself and she decided to go to the Metropolitan and look at the El Grecos. She boarded a bus and thought of the time she had last gazed at El Greco's livid faces, at his draperies of electric blue and chartreuse. That had been just before Symes went to Lisbon. They had lunched at Longchamps on West 57th Street, then walked to the museum. The thought of Mark's home-coming had hung heavy upon them, but they had avoided the subject and engaged, instead, in a silly quarrel about El Greco—the kind of quarrel she might have had with Mark, but which she never expected to have with Symes, who usually shared her enthusiasm. Yet that day he said:

"El Greco bores me! Everything is perpendicular, and there is that air of perversion about all his figures—a sickliness. Look at those angels! They make me think of your sister Hester."

His tone hurt her. "But when you saw the St. Martin in Washington, last year, you agreed that it was one of the most beautiful things in the world."

"All I said was I liked the horse."

They argued, and Regan lost her temper. They had parted in an atmosphere of bitter-

"Mother, I hardly think Fletcher is interested in how I looked when I was eight months old!"

Call it salad or dessert!

Avocado
Orange Sections
Lemon French Dressing
Ritz Crackers

Fruit like jewels—nested in an avocado and served with golden Ritz! What a dream-dish! Salad-dessert in one—a smart new idea Ritz makes click! For Ritz' unique nut-like flavor rounds out the goodness of any fruit dish. Gives it a rich satisfaction that makes you sigh "ah" when it's finished. No other cracker ever tasted so good as Ritz—so golden-flavored—so delightfully crisp. Try this sparkling "Ritz fruit plate" soon—get a "family" package of Ritz today!

NOTHING TASTES AS GOOD AS RITZ—BUT RITZ!

NABISCO
RITZ
REG. U.S. PAT. OFF.
One of the many fine foods baked by Nabisco
NAtional BIScuit COmpany

Fresh, fragrant oranges . . . heavy with juice, ripened to extra sweetness . . . are deliciously blended into this fruit-laden marmalade. Spoon it thickly on fresh, crisp toast . . . let it roll its luscious way over your piping hotcakes. For those who prefer a more tart flavor, we also prepare a special orange-grapefruit variety. Either kind is nature's richest bounty for your family's enjoyment at the breakfast table!

EVERBEST Preserves

The 23 famous Everbest Specialties include:
Old Fashioned Tomato Preserves
Seedless Cherry Jam ■ Spiced Peach with Cherry
Seedless Black Raspberry • Seedless Blackberry Jam ■ Orange Marmalade better than anyone's home-made kind

Yours for the Asking!
Intriguing recipes for delicious cookies, desserts, icings, tea-time treats. Illustrated.

Glaser, Crandell Co., Dept. B4, 2000 S. Western Avenue, Chicago 8
Please send me your booklet, "How To Make Life Sweeter with Everbest Preserves."
Name _____
Address _____
City _____ State _____

ness, but made it up again on the eve of his flight to Lisbon. She had not wanted him to go to Lisbon, though she knew he had to go. She did not want him to leave her for a day, though she knew this was childish of her. She did not want to differ with him over the merits or faults of El Greco, or over anything else. She wanted her lover for herself, and she wanted him body and soul, a phrase which she used often in his hearing, feeling that her passion glorified its triteness. Time was running out and the two marvelous years of their love affair were approaching a crisis. Mark's return was bound to make everything complicated, even dangerous. And what, after all, Regan asked herself, do we get from restraint? We are both past our youth; we can, at best, look forward to the next twenty years of comparative vitality. Oh, if Mark would only behave reasonably!

She frowned and made room on the seat beside her for an ancient Italian carrying bundles. "Grazie," he murmured. "Tenk you!"

The bus moved on and she thought, I'll stay on it and take a taxi across the park to the museum. That will give me lots of time before I go back to Hester.

And she began to reflect on her sister. Strange that Hester should have shared so much of the character and life of their mother, while she, Regan, had taken after their father. The first two were hypochondriacs, but she and her father had been self-willed and strong. And that was just as well, thought Regan, remembering the frustrations of family life. She had early come to the conclusion that the weak, the old and the sickly are intolerable burdens on youth and health. How she had resented her sister and mother! And with what speed she made up her own mind that she never would be an old maid, or poor, or powerless. Beauty had taken care of the first contingency, her father's favoritism of the second, and her own character of the third. Since their mother's death five years ago, Hester, plain and pallid and ill, had assumed a sort of composite personality, so that there were occasions when Regan confused the living with the dead. It sometimes occurred to her that Hester must hate her for being what she was, just as she despised Hester and sometimes hated her for being Hester. And yet, mused Regan, she is the only person I have ever trusted. Can it be that hating each other as we do, we dare not betray each other as we might if we loved? We are afraid of each other, and fear makes the bond between us. How strange Hester was, when one came to think about her like this, remotely and in cold blood. How perceptive, intelligent, bitter, with her unpredictable humor!

We have no shrines, most of us, any more—we Protestant-Puritan-Pagan-Anglo-Saxon Occidentals—no tranquil Buddhas or symbols of the passion by the roadside, no solemn temples, few cool, silent churches, always open and inviting to withdrawal for a moment from the hurly-burly of the world. It is not my business to determine whether that means loss or gain. But one thing it is always in our power to do—to withdraw now and then from the periphery to the center, from the ceaseless whirl of the life that streams and eddies around us to the deep serenity of those great souls of better centuries who give

Authentic tidings of invisible things;
of ebb and flow, and ever-during power;
And central peace, substituting at the heart of endless agitation.

—JOHN LIVINGSTON LOWES: Reading Books. (Houghton, Mifflin.)

REGAN reconstructed the occasion, a few weeks ago, when she had left Mark and had gone to her sister's apartment on Riverside Drive. Hester was lying, as usual, on her couch by the window, surrounded by cushions, books, magazines, paper handkerchiefs and vitamins. The room had a peculiar close, aromatic smell of an asthmatic's chamber and it always made the healthy Regan feel a bit sick until she had got used to it.

When her sister entered, Hester switched off the radio and said, "Well! Here you are! I expected you last night. Did you actually take the bull by the horns?" Hester's pale eyes followed the handsome sister as the latter walked to the window and gazed at the river. She went on quickly: "I must say I don't see why you come here instead of going to Bill. However, I suppose it would be a bit indiscreet, considering everything." Her speech was that of one who talks to herself—continuous, fluent, erratic—and fo a few moments Regan stood without answer ing. There is no use in getting mad at her, sh decided. She never will forgive me for havin two men dangling round when she has neve had one and has learned to hate the whole sex

Behind her, Hester sneezed. "Reach m the box, will you? It's under the couch."

REGAN reached her the tissues. One found them everywhere, tucked into corners o chairs, sofas, under pillows. Wastebasket overflowed with them. So did Hester's pockets. Her progress through life was one long paper chase of damp and beastly little wads of tissue. Why, Regan wondered, if she is determined to suffer, doesn't she suffer silently, invisibly?

"Where's Neddy?" asked Hester. "Wouldn't Mark let you bring him? By the way, how does he look—Mark, I mean? Handsome as ever? Oh, not to you, I suppose, not now anyway, since you've looked so long at Bill Symes. Not the same type at all, are they? I marvel at your switching as you do from one type to another. But I always rather admired Mark. That mixture of friendliness and reserve! That integrity! Tell me what he said about Germany. Has he got to know the Russians? Does he think we shall have to fight them after all?"

God give me patience, thought Regan. "We didn't talk very much about anything," she said with an effort at calmness. "Aside from the wear and tear of his experience, Mark looked pretty much the same as when you last saw him."

"It's been such ages since I saw him! He never came near me during his last leave, you remember. No reason why he should have, of course. He never cared a whoop about me, though he was always kind and considerate when we met. A real gent, in other words. Something your Bill is not—if you'll excuse my frankness."

Regan lighted a cigarette. "Go on. I'll wait till you're through, then maybe we can really talk."

"I wish you wouldn't smoke in here. It hurts my lungs. I thought I was in for another attack this afternoon, but it passed. This dry weather must be good for me, after all, though it didn't make much difference last summer, when I thought I was really going to die! To go back to Mark. You know, Regan, I've never really understood why you married him. I mean aside from the fact that you would probably have married anyone to get away from mother and me. But why did you choose him?"

"Why shouldn't I have chosen him?"

"Because he's so absolutely different from you. And because you never actually cared a button for him."

"Must we discuss it again? It's all water over the dam, anyway."

"So are lots of things. Mother, father, the war, the house—you've junked it all, haven't you? Now it's Mark's turn. I don't understand why you married him, or why he married you."

"What do you mean by that?"

Hester smiled. "I have a suspicion that Mark always saw through you, but that he deceived himself because he was—what shall I call it?—infatuated."

"You don't have to call it anything."

"Of course, as you say, it's all ancient history, now that you're through with him. You've set your sights high. I keep asking myself whether Bill Symes is the last on your list. But it isn't so easy to write off ancient history, and I'm surprised you should want to. The past must have some impor-

(Continued on Page 66)

There are two sides to this picture!

Each boy in each bed is being helped back to health by a new medical development. Each of these developments owes much, surprisingly enough, to milk — and each does a completely different job!

Billy, on one side, will soon be on his feet, thanks to the antibiotics. Their job is to attack infection, destroy "bugs." In short — kill. One of these is penicillin, which is derived from a mold nourished by milk sugar.

Jimmy, on the other side, is gaining strength from a group of "builder-uppers." Their job is to restore tissues, replenish organs. Concisely, to give life. These are the aminos—basic elements of protein, furnished in abundance by milk.

Both sides of this picture illustrate a story of extensive milk research. At National Dairy plants, proteins, sugars and aminos are produced from milk and supplied for numerous pharmaceuticals which are making great contributions to the nation's health and knowledge of nutrition.

Similar research has resulted in a brand-new kind of baby food — in a smart textile fiber—in a delicious flavoring agent—and in many other such products whose acquaintance you are making. By this means, National Dairy constantly works to extend the usefulness of milk—nature's most nearly perfect food—so that it may perform an even fuller service to you and your family.

Dedicated to the wider use and better understanding of dairy products as human food . . . as a base for the development of new products and materials . . . as a source of health and enduring progress on the farms and in the towns and cities of America.

Kraft · Sealtest · Breyers

NATIONAL DAIRY
PRODUCTS CORPORATION
AND AFFILIATED COMPANIES

Makes such sm-o-o-o-th Sauces!

WEST OF THE ROCKIES IT'S DURKEE'S TROCO

So Mild... So Sweet... So Country-fresh in Flavor!

Add rich flavor to fish, vegetable and macaroni dishes with White Sauce prepared with Durkee's Margarine! Your sauces are always so smooth because Durkee's is an unusually smooth, evenly blended margarine. It's produced by Durkee's own scientific process which churns the pure, nutritious vegetable oils with the fresh, pasteurized skim milk. A "find" for cooking and baking and a big help to the food budget, too. So economical that your family can spread delicious Durkee's liberally on bread. Durkee's Margarine is an important energy food and enriched with Vitamin A.

Try this Salmon Loaf Supreme with White Sauce

2 cups fresh or canned salmon
Rind and juice, 1 lemon
2 eggs, beaten
2 tbsp. melted Durkee's Margarine
½ cup milk
½ teaspoon salt
⅛ teaspoon Durkee's Pepper
Garnish: riced egg and parsley

Bone salmon, flake and combine ingredients. Place in steamer and cook slowly 1 hour. (Or bake in moderate oven about 30 min.) Serve with White Sauce and peas.

Medium White Sauce: Scald 1 c. milk; partly cool. Melt 2 tbsp. Durkee's Margarine in small pan over low heat. Slowly stir in 2 tbsp. flour. Cook and stir until smooth. Stir into warm milk in top of double boiler. When blended, place over low heat, stir until sauce thickens. Season. Beat well, cover, simmer about 20 min. Yield: 1 c. sauce.

SALMON SALAD!

Dress it up with

DURKEE'S DRESSING

Fish salads your specialty? Next time you make Salmon Salad or other favorites, mix them with Durkee's Dressing! Its keen, delicious tang gives a richer flavor to all salads—makes a taste-hit with everyone! Write for EASY-TO-DO Recipes, Durkee's, Dept. LJ4-6, Elmhurst, L. I.

Durkee Famous Foods . . . Division of the Glidden Company

Other Durkee Favorites: Durkee's Spices . . . Cocoanut . . . Worcestershire Sauce

(Continued from Page 64)

tance for you, with your leaning toward art and letters and all the rest of it. Have you read T. S. Eliot lately? Doesn't it sometimes strike you how near he is to Dante?"

She was mocking, and Regan thought, How long am I going to stand it living here with her?

"Mark had kind of a stupid streak in him, though," Hester went on meditatively. "I suppose one might call it honesty. But you haven't told me how he behaved. What did he say? What did he do? Did he try to hit you?"

"Oh, for heaven's sake, Hester!"

"Well, he might have. He's full of violence, I think. I've always suspected that he has had to work harder than most men to control himself. And I've wondered how he endured your hypocrisies, how he kept his hands off you sometimes when you were being so darned superior!" She paused. "I kept wondering and wondering, last night, why you didn't show up as you said you would. You had it all planned that you'd meet his boat, take him back to the apartment, give him a drink and break the news to him. After which you'd come over here. But you never came. Why not?"

"Because I changed my mind."

"You spent the night there? With Mark?" Her eyes became omnivorous.

Regan turned her back and stared out the window.

"Whew!" whistled the invalid behind her. "That's going some, even for you, my dear! How would Bill like that?"

Regan whirled round. "Now look here ——"

Hester was laughing, her pale blue eyes brimming with tears, her thin pointed nose raw and pink. "It's very funny, you know. You don't see it, but it is funny, Regan. All these things you and Bill think so tragic and important, they are really a scream!"

Regan regarded her in silence. There were moments, and this was one of them, when she wished, quite simply, that Hester might die, and it did not lessen the intensity of her wish to realize that Hester was fully aware of it.

The first Christmas card was sent during the reign of Queen Victoria, in 1845. Queen Elizabeth made a point-blank request that her subjects give her Christmas gifts of money, brocaded petticoats, velvets, costly jewels or furs, to replenish her wardrobe. Among these presents was the first pair of silk stockings ever made in Europe. There was a period during which public singing of Christmas carols was forbidden. The Puritans passed a law in 1659 to the effect that "whoever shall be found observing any such day as Christmas, or the like, either by forbearing of labor, feasting, or in any other way, shall be fined 5 shillings." In two countries the bringer of Christmas gifts is a woman—in Italy, La Befana, and in Russia, Baboushka. But instead of December twenty-fifth, the gifts are distributed on Twelfth Night.

Adapted from a quiz by Marjorie Mueller Freer in She.

Now, riding uptown on the bus, Regan thought about Hester and Mark. They should have married, she decided savagely. Mark, the chivalrous, would have made an ideal mate for the hypochondriac Hester, and when he went to war she would have asked nothing better than to lie on her couch and await his return. Yes, Hester would have made a perfect wife, though of course she could never have produced Neddy. Remembrance of her son roused further disquiet in Regan. She stared out the window at the teeming sidewalk. All she asked was to be allowed to spend the rest of her life with Bill Symes. War, which had leveled other lives, other destinies, had made hers worth while! War had brought her a lover. She would give up everything, everyone—yes, she would give up Neddy, if that would insure her future with Symes. She brooded on the vision of life as she had always yearned for it, as she had never ceased to strive for it, as she had striven even as the wife of Mark Bycroft. Her dull middle-class family never had an idea beyond their own tiny orbit. The world of art and literature, the exciting world of society and politics and public life held little or no interest for any of them, not even for her father, with his obstinate, powerful, single-track mentality. Why, they had not even troubled to give her a decent education, and hers had stopped when she graduated from high school. For the rest, she had had to shift for herself, and shift she did, and to good purpose. She read, she went to lectures, to picture galleries, to concerts; she listened to the conversation of people she believed to be wiser and better informed than herself. Unobtrusively, like a sponge, she had soaked up a kind of education and it made her restless. Something was always lacking—that something which the prostrate Hester seemed to acquire by merely lying abed and gazing at the ceiling. But for Regan something was always missing—that creative impulse without which in one form or another all wisdom and all effort seem fruitless and unillumined. Then passion for Symes had unleashed her energies and given them direction. She took her cue from him, as he quite often took his from her, and talents and insights which could not find expression in art, or satisfaction in contemplation, sought their level in the espousal of causes lost and found, and in a calculating and spurious radicalism.

Hester had looked on with the eerie amusement she always brought to bear on her sister's activities. "What a self-deluded creature you are, Regan!" she exclaimed on one occasion. "As though you really cared about Jews, Negroes, the labor movement, about anything or anyone except yourself!"

Regan had retorted with the candor which remained her sole weapon against this discerning genie, "All right, I don't have to care about them. Loving humanity, as you pretend to, doesn't help much these days. Legislation — compulsion, if you like—is what moves mountains." And she added with a sneer, "But idealism never was your strong point, was it, dear?"

Hester had retorted, "The trouble with your brand of idealism is that it springs, not from love of people, but from contempt of them."

Old clapperclaw, thought Regan, and dropped the subject.

At the Metropolitan she had the El Grecos to herself. She went from canvas to canvas, her eye absorbing the marvel of paint and conception while her intelligence demanded frantically, What does he mean? What is he trying to say? Why is he wonderful—or is he wonderful, after all? She didn't know. Dully she told herself that she was one of those who might die without ever finding out. The air of the great room seemed lifeless, the floor and walls adamant, and the funereal hush got on her nerves. She abandoned El Greco and wandered aimlessly from one room to another in growing desolation. The thought of returning to Hester became increasingly repugnant to her, but where else was she to go? Already her own apartment, Mark, Neddy, Octavia Evans, had assumed an unreality in her thoughts. She suffered from a frightening sense that something was happening to her among these ancient canvases and statuary, that some hostile influence flowed from them toward her, pressing upon her flesh and her spirit. The strange idea persisted, became a conviction which made her heart beat violently. It's claustrophobia, she told herself, and the glib assurance carried her safely to the great staircase, down it and into the open air. But her legs still trembled, and she hated herself for her absurd superstition.

She left the museum and walked slowly up the avenue in a flickering dance of leaves. Children were going home with parents and nursemaids, couples lounged on the stone benches against the wall, an old man walked ahead of her, leading an old dog on a leash. The city's life seemed to be repeating its

(Continued on Page 68)

"This Jell-O shortage certainly brings out the artist in me!"

We do not really recommend that one small box of Jell-O be extended to serve, for instance, four tables of bridge.

Still, as long as Jell-O and Jell-O Puddings are still so scarce and precious, the hostess who can make them go far and look gorgeous will continue to get a big hand.

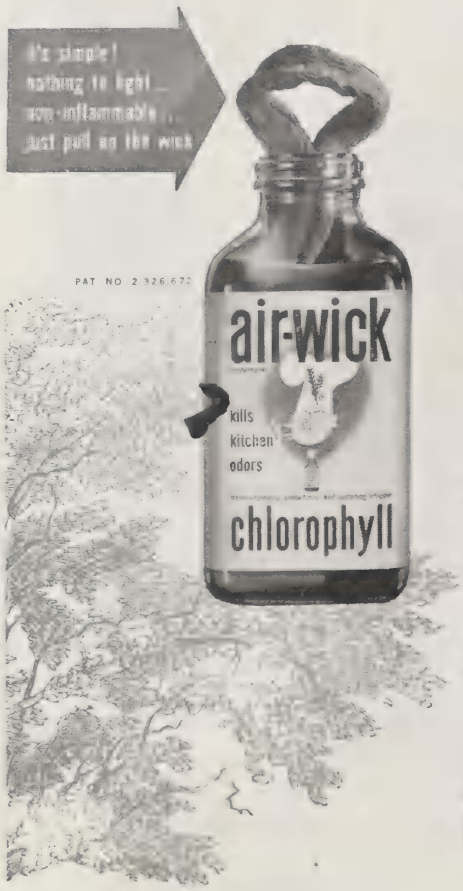
Some day—and it may not be too many months off—the sugar supply will be more plentiful and we can make enough Jell-O products so you can enjoy them any time, on gala days or any day.

Meanwhile, even though you can't make them often, you can always make them fun!

Three spring symphonies, made delicious with Jell-O's "locked-in" flavor: Raspberry Jell-O, half-whipped, half-plain, garnished with maraschino cherries and mint. Lemon and Lime Jell-O, in quivering flakes. A sunshiny dish of fresh oranges molded in Orange Jell-O.

Easter Egg Pudding delights the small fry—cool, satin-smooth Vanilla Pudding decorated with candy eggs in a nest of whipped cream. Another Jell-O Pudding favorite is rich Butterscotch topped with crunchy nut meats.

It's your lucky day when you find yellow-ripe bananas and rich, dark Jell-O Chocolate Pudding to make this company pie. Remember the old-fashioned chocolaty pie grandma used to make? This is it, only more so!



PRODUCTS OF GENERAL FOODS

What's found only in Jell-O? That "locked-in" Jell-O Flavor!

Jell-O Puddings—Like Grandma's—only more so!

Jell-O is a trade-mark owned by General Foods read what others say about air-wick

...the revolutionary new way to kill unpleasant household odors

Mr. Guilford D. Fisher, 200 West Virginia Ave., West Chester, Pa.
"My secretary first suggested air-wick after heavy smoking in my office. We have three bottles at home now... one in the bathroom, another in the kitchen and a third for use in living-room and closets. I don't see how we ever got along without it."

Mrs. J. W. Hagenmiller, 65 Bergen Ave., Ridgefield Park, N.J.
"I live in a three room apartment. Every time I used to cook fish or cabbage, I dared not invite guests for the next few days. A friend told me about air-wick. Her description sounded too good to be true. But what she told me did not even start to do it justice. All disagreeable odors disappeared miraculously."

Mrs. H. R. White, Norfolk, Va.
"Ever since the first time I used air-wick, I have been exclaiming over its complete efficiency. I think it's wonderful. I use air-wick whenever I'm cooking onions or other foods with an unpleasant odor... and I hasten to freshen up the living-room with air-wick whenever I am expecting guests."

These are typical of the thousands of unsolicited letters which have been received from air-wick* users throughout America. air-wick is a little bottle with a magic wick. Simply open the bottle and pull up the wick a few minutes before you start cooking. Unpleasant cooking odors simply disappear. Keep a bottle of air-wick open in the living-room whenever you expect heavy smoking. Use air-wick to freshen stuffy closets and bathrooms... freshen the air in the nursery and sickroom. air-wick is not an antiseptic, and it has no medicinal odor. You'll find air-wick at all better stores. air-wick contains chlorophyll ... the substance which nature uses to freshen the air in garden and forest.

why risk offending?

...get air-wick

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping
REPLACEMENT OR REFUND OF MONEY IF DEFECTIVE OR NOT AS ADVERTISED THEREIN

*air-wick deodorizer and household freshener is fully protected by U.S. patent.
air-wick is a trademark of Seeman Brothers, Inc., New York 13, N.Y.

(Continued from Page 66)

patterns, endlessly inhaling and exhaling a variegated breath.

Regan walked till the sun had gone, then took a crosstown bus to Riverside Drive. There were several empty seats, but obeying a self-conscious impulse she chose one beside a young Negro sailor and almost immediately regretted it. He had been drinking, and she felt his black eyes move upon her face, her breast, her knees. Had he been white she would have moved to another seat, but he was black and it had become one of her tenets that one must never wound the sensibilities of a black man as one might risk wounding those of a white one. The boy, aware, probably, of her dilemma, and enjoying it, took advantage of the movement of the bus to sway against her. His breath brushed her face; uncrossing his legs, he allowed his knee to press hers. Regan stared before her at the row of heads, and at the brawny shoulders of the Irish driver. There were other Negroes on the bus. If she were to move they'd suspect her of prejudice. If she remained, the sailor might become reckless, and she be forced to make a scene.

His little white cap fell off and landed in her lap, followed by his hand. "My cap in your way, ma'am?" he murmured caressingly at her shoulder.

Regan picked it up and handed it back to him without speaking. It fell off again, and in leaning over to retrieve it he dug his elbow into her thigh. Her face crimsoned, her lips set. She felt, beside her, the boy's whole black body shaken with noiseless laughter.

She got off at last, two blocks before she needed to, and the sailor got off after her. Without turning her head Regan knew that he followed her, a lithe, young figure absurd in its navy costume and little white cap. The sense of victimization which had assailed her in the museum now returned and she struggled with an instinct to run. At last she was at Hester's door, and as she stepped into the entry he passed by on the sidewalk without glancing in her direction. Then she lost sight of him, but the sound of his laughter pursued her into the apartment, into the elevator and all the way up to her sister's rooms.

XIII

MARK put down his newspaper and watched Neddy whittling a piece of wood into the semblance of a boat. It was Sunday. Rain slanted against the windows, bringing freshness and a distant rumble of thunder. Difficult, he mused, to deduce much sense, let alone grandeur, from the day's headlines. Here were all the old hatreds, the old deceits, the old hypocrisies. Here were the intolerance, the pretense, the prejudice, untouched by victory. New terrors had been added to the old, fat slugs eating away what was left of the world's heart, and he felt about as effective as that child in the corner, making a toy out of matchwood.

Well, he asked himself, what about those ambitions of yours? And what about the vote—you've still got that, haven't you?

"When I've made this boat," said Neddy, holding it up for him to see, "can we take it to the park and sail it on the pond?"

"If it ever stops raining." He looked at the boy. "Neddy, if I hire a real boat this summer would you like to come sailing with me?"

"Honest?"

"Honest, as soon as they let me out of the Army."

Neddy thought it over with his customary thoroughness. "Shall we ask mother to come with us?" he inquired at last.

Mark winced. "Do you think she'd care to?"

"I don't know," said Neddy, and picked up his penknife again.

Mark watched him for a minute. "Neddy," he said in a careful voice, "do you miss mother? I mean, would you care to go to your Aunt Hester's and visit her there for a few days?"

The boy shook his head.

Mark persisted. "But don't you miss your mother?"

"She'll come back."

It was said with such assurance that Mark glanced at him sharply. A question rose to his lips, but he did not ask it. The child seemed strangely invulnerable. How much did he know, how much did he guess—how much, actually, did he care? He longed for some glimpse into his son's mind, for he felt that he might be a repository of the secrets of the past four years. But the instinct of chivalry was strong—he could not bring himself to cross-examine, to coerce or to bribe the child to betray his mother.

Restless from inaction, Mark rose and went to the window. Sabbath inertia hung upon the city, and even the sound of its traffic seemed no more than a prodigious half-stifled yawn. Mark found himself resenting this sense of partial coma as when he was a child he used to resent the thought of other people sleeping while he was awake. Below him a woman carrying a blue umbrella walked with a graceful stride that reminded him of Regan, and from some unexplored corner of himself desire for her rose

(Continued on Page 70)

★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

Ballade of the Homing House Pets

BY GEORGIE STARBUCK GALBRAITH

A man and a feline are apt to stray,
For cats and men are a restless crew;
They'll leave you to cope with the lonely day
And sniffle the silent midnight through,
While they make for a darkling rendezvous
Or hie to a secret bivouac.
But little's the profit to pursue;
Men and pussycats always come back.

Though you feed them on manna and speak them gay,
Never the man nor the tabby grew
Whose ear was deaf to the call to play;
Though their hearts be ever so stanch and true,
They're off with a blithesome toodle-oo
To the open road or the cul-de-sac.
Yet muster your patience for,
entre nous,
Men and pussycats always come back.

Oh, cosset and coax them as ever you may,
Wheedle and worry and whistle and woo
And wait on their every whim, yet they Will wander to Dallas or Timbuktu.
But la, why indulge in a hullabaloo
Or shatter the family bric-a-brac?
With a "Hello, dear," and a plaintive mew,
Men and pussycats always come back.

L'envoi:
Princess, see that your sighs are few;
Ration your tears, for alas, alack,
Though you may not want them when they do,
Men and pussycats always come back!

"I'M SO MAD I COULD SPIT..."

"... HERE I'VE BEEN WASTING MY TIME WITH CHEAPER, ORDINARY CLEANERS WHEN I COULD HAVE BEEN USING THE MODERN 'MAGIC' OF SOLVENTOL!"

AN ENTIRELY NEW CLEANING PRINCIPLE!

Solventol is a product of this scientific age. It stems from the same modern chemical research that gave the world nylon, cellophane and plastics. Through the latest developments in synthetic-organic chemistry it brings you an entirely new cleaning principle!

Solventol is the household cleaner with triple-solvent action! It loosens, lifts and dissolves dirt and grease away—all at once! It leaves no film or "coat" to catch new dirt!

Mixed with water (for less than 3 cents a gallon), Solventol will clean ALL washable surfaces and materials: painted walls, ceilings, woodwork, floors, tile, linoleum, enamel, dishes, rubber, leather, etc.—even rugs, upholstery and laundry. And it will clean these surfaces WITHOUT RUB OR SCRUB. You merely WIPE IT ON, then WIPE IT OFF . . . no film or "coat" remains to catch new dirt, hide beauty or harbor germs. Don't expect to find anything even remotely similar in any other household cleaner! Ask for Solventol at your favorite grocery, hardware, paint or department store . . . it is packaged in attractive containers, priced at 25c, 60c, $1.00 and $1.75.

LOOSENS—LIFTS—DISSOLVES DIRT AND GREASE AWAY

Solventol

THE MODERN HOUSEHOLD CLEANER

REPLACEMENT OR REFUND OF MONEY Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping IF DEFECTIVE OR NOT AS ADVERTISED THEREIN

TRY SOLVENTOL

If your dealer can not supply you, send coupon. Purchase price refunded if not completely satisfied.

Solventol Chemical Products, Inc.,
15841 Second Boulevard, Detroit, 3, Michigan. (LHJ 4-46)
I enclose $1.00 for which please send me 1 4-lb. can of Solventol.

Name_____

Address_____

City_____ Zone_____ State_____

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY

Delicious V-8 Vegetable Juices Wakes Up Your Taste

The goodness of a whole garden in every Tempting Sip

When you taste fresh vegetables in the inspired combination that is V-8* Vegetable Juices—there you discover a harmony that is itself a new flavor—with a zest, a bracing freshness as distinctively superior as it is temptingly delicious. And V-8, good by itself, has the happy property of making other foods taste better. So enjoy V-8 freely—for breakfast—with wafers as an appetizer—or by the big glassful with a sandwich or snack . . . enjoy it for its flavor, and too, as a delightful source of fresh vegetable nutrients so important every day.

*V-8 is a trademark owned in the United States by Standard Brands Incorporated; in Canada by Standard Brands Limited.

Ask for V-8 at your food store, restaurant and fountain

DRINK V-8 EVERY DAY FOR VEGETABLES THE TASTY WAY

(Continued from Page 68)

up and clutched him. He thought of Sunday mornings in the country, the long drowsy hours in bed. How beautiful she was in bed, smiling when he turned toward her, her voice still thick with sleep, her eyelids trembling under his kiss. How could such things be forgotten, or counted as trivial, once they had been? What had happened? What had happened to the world, to his world, to everybody's world? Why, if Regan could respond to one man, could she not respond to him, who knew her better than anyone else? He was not a prude, he was not a fool; he had not demanded fidelity, but he had expected that they could live out their lives together with passion, good humor and tolerance.

He watched rain falling against the buildings across the street, painting the sidewalks in the pale colors of a clearing sky, illumining the windows, the bright enamel on taxicabs, and he thought, Suppose I call her up now and suggest that she join Neddy and me for a walk in the park? We could meet somewhere, have tea together, talk. We could be friends. And perhaps from that point we could start all over again with the excitement of strangers turning at last to love. But to be friends is what really matters. To be friends! He hesitated. It's for me to make the first move, for me to say, "Look, let's call it a day. You're free to come and go as you please, and so am I. Divorce me if you want—I'll help you. Who knows, perhaps even after the divorce you may change your mind and come back. While we live we shall be, in some measure, related. Two people who have felt as we have felt can't remain indifferent."

Warm, generous emotions coursed through him. He would call her at Hester's, now, this moment. He turned in a sort of frenzy, startling Neddy. An exclamation burst from the child and he held up his hand from which blood dripped in a stream onto the chair. Mark went to him quickly.

"Come to the bathroom," he said. "Hold it under the cold-water faucet while I get a bandage."

Neddy was white. "I'm bleeding," he whispered. "Look, I'm bleeding!"

Mark saw that the wound was not serious. "Sit where you are," he said. "I'll get a bandage."

He ran to Regan's room and found a fresh handkerchief in her bureau drawer. Kneeling beside Neddy, he shook out the square of white linen, but Neddy snatched his hand away.

"Not that! You can't use that. It's mother's best handkerchief."

"It'll wash," Mark said. "Here, give me your hand."

"No," said Neddy. "No, I don't want you to. Mother wouldn't like it."

MARK restrained his temper. "Give me your hand—do you want to get blood all over everything?"

Neddy was shivering. "Go away. I don't care if I am bleeding. Go away!"

Mark seized his hand. "Little idiot—let me tie that up." He started to wrap the handkerchief round Neddy's hand, but the child shrank from him and began to scream:

"Leave me alone! Don't touch me!"

Rage flared in Mark. "Stay still, will you?" he shouted.

The boy drew one foot back, then shot it forth, striking the man in the chest. Then he was out of the chair and across the room, screaming, "I hate you! Go away! Don't touch me!"

Mark rose. "Come here," he said. "Come back here."

But Neddy fled through the door into his mother's bedroom, his screams tingling through Mark's nerves. For a moment he hesitated, at a loss; then he followed the child and found him cowering in a corner by the bed.

"If you touch me I'll kill you," came the threat, choked and sobbing. "I'll kill you with this penknife, I will!"

Then Mark saw he held the penknife open in his hand. "You won't kill me. You'll put that knife down and come over here so I can bandage your hand. Come on."

"No!" shrieked Neddy.

Something cruel and exultant swarmed in the man's brain. "Then I'm coming to get you," he said, and started forward. Neddy's screams stopped. For a moment he stood motionless, his eyes dark with fear, then he hurled himself at Mark, the knife uplifted. Mark caught him, twisted the knife from his fingers and held the hysterical body against his breast. His own anger passed as he felt the child's helpless trembling. "Neddy," he whispered. "Neddy, poor little Neddy."

PRESENTLY Neddy drew a long shuddering breath and murmured, "Look, I've stopped bleeding."

"So you have. Better go in the bathroom and wash it off."

When the child had gone he picked up the knife and snapped it shut, then slipped it into his pocket. In the parlor he found Regan's handkerchief lying on the floor. It was an expensive, fragile affair embroidered with her initials, and bearing a gilt-paper label marked "Portugal." A present? And from whom? Mark crumpled it in his hand. The excitement of the past few minutes had left him chilled and lucid, and his original impulse to call Regan on the telephone had vanished. He no longer wanted to talk to her or to see her; he felt again that the distance between them was, indeed, impassable. From now on he would have to attend to Neddy. How little they understood each other, how mysterious the bonds which held them, and which at the same time seemed to draw them apart! He closed his eyes, seeing the small, cowering figure, its eyes dark with fear, its arm uplifted, clutching the open blade. Would Neddy have to kill a man, someday, as he had had to kill the owner of that knife? The German was rotten in his grave, rotten and forgotten. Had he left a wife, a son, somewhere among the ruins of his town? Mark remembered the pity he had felt for the dead man; he had picked up the knife not as a souvenir, but as a memorial. We are bound to our enemies, he thought, almost as closely as we are bound to our loves.

Neddy came into the room and Mark turned to see a tranquil face. "It's stopped raining," said Neddy. "Can we go to the park now and sail my boat?"

Mark said, "Here is your mother's handkerchief. Do you want to put it back in her bureau?"

Neddy glanced at it without interest. "No. Where is my boat?" He spied it on the chair and pounced on it. "Will you buy me some paint, so I can paint it?"

Mark smoothed the crumpled handkerchief. "You were quite right," he said, "not to let me use this for a bandage. It's a very fine handkerchief. Did you give it to mother?"

"Mr. Symes gave it to her. He gave her a whole dozen. He brought them from Lisbon, on the clipper." He glanced impatiently at Mark. "When will you hire a real boat so we can go sailing?"

Mark answered absently. Then he carried the handkerchief back to Regan's bureau and replaced it among the others. Neddy was right, there were several still unused in a corner of the top drawer. He gazed at a collection of feminine objects—jewelry, perfume, gloves. Their fragrance hurt him.

(Continued on Page 72)

---

It is a well-known fact that those who stutter in talking can sing without any impediment.

Many years ago a parson was in the middle of his sermon when his servant boy entered the church, hurried down the aisle and tried to tell him something. The lad was greatly excited and stuttered and stuttered, until the parson, who had stopped to listen, said, "Sing it."

The congregation sat silently waiting, and then the boy began in appropriate musical notes, "The barn is afire! The barn is afire!"

—THE CRAYON.

THE WAY TO A MAN'S HEART IS SURER THAN EVER!

Crisco improves all 3

CAKES, PIES, FRIED FOODS

He Loves Pie!
CRISCO brings you
Flaky Pie Crust Every Time!

CRISCO ORANGE BLOSSOM PIE

¾ cup sugar • 4 tbsps. flour • 2 tbsps. cornstarch
¼ tsp. salt • 1½ cups water • ⅓ cup orange juice
1 tbsp. lemon juice • Rind of 1 orange • 3 eggs, separated
1 tbsp. Crisco • Single-crust recipe Crisco Pastry

In top of double boiler, combine sugar, flour, cornstarch and salt; slowly add boiling water. Cook over direct heat until thick—about 5 min. Place over hot water and continue cooking for 15 min.; stir occasionally. Combine beaten egg yolks with juices and grated rind. Add to first mixture and cook 2 min. more. Remove from heat and add Crisco. Cool and pour into baked Crisco pie shell. (It's true, girls! Even a beginner can get flaky, tender pie crust every single time! Just follow the sure-fire Crisco Pastry Method and be sure to use Crisco. It's easy—try it and see!)

MERINGUE: Beat egg whites till stiff. Slowly add 6 tbsps. granulated sugar and continue beating till sugar is dissolved. Pile on pie after filling has cooled and bake in slow oven (325°F.) about 15 minutes. All Measurements Level.

Win His Heart with CRISCO'S
Lighter, Richer Cakes!

CRISCO MOCHA NUT LAYER CAKE

Now—better cakes on every count! For lightness . . . richness, moistness . . . texture, the new Crisco Success cakes top the cakes you used to bake. Measure into mixing bowl:

2 cups cake flour (sifted before measuring)
1⅓ cups sugar • ½ cup Crisco • 1 tsp. salt • ⅔ cup milk

Stir vigorously by hand or with mixer (medium speed) 2 minutes. Now stir in (yes, all by itself):

3½ tsps. baking powder
Add: 4 egg whites (unbeaten) • ⅓ cup milk • 1 tsp. vanilla

Blend by hand or in mixer (medium speed) for 2 minutes. The batter will be smooth and thin. Pour into two square 8" layer pans which have been Criscoed and lined with waxed paper. Bake in moderate oven (360°F.) about 25 minutes. (Crisco has a baking secret that gives you lighter cakes than the most expensive shortening! With Crisco—only with Crisco—we promise you a better cake all 'round from this recipe.) Frost with mocha icing; decorate with nuts. All Measurements Level. Double-action or phosphate type (Calumet, Davis, Rumford, Clabber Girl, KC, etc.). With tartrate type (Royal, etc.), use 4½ tsps.*

Watch Him go for CRISCO'S
Light, Digestible Fried Foods!

CRISCO VEAL CUTLET, ITALIAN STYLE

Flatten out a small veal steak. Cut into pieces for serving. Dip in flour, beaten egg and fine bread crumbs. Fry in Crisco in a large skillet till tender. (Scared fried foods may cause upsets? Don't worry! Foods fried to a crisp, golden brown in pure, all-vegetable Crisco not only taste better—they set so light and easy even children may eat 'em!) Spread tomato sauce over cutlets, and place a thin slice of American cheese on each piece. Cover skillet and heat gently till cheese melts.

CRISCO COOK BOOK—Send 10¢ in coin and a Crisco label (any size) to Crisco, Dept. HJ, Box 837, Cincinnati 1, Ohio, for the 64-page "Recipes for Good Eating." Offer good in United States, including Hawaii.

CRISCO is America's Largest-Selling Vegetable Shortening—IT'S DIGESTIBLE!

All kinds of women

...WIN A MALE
...MAKE A HOME

CAMPUS QUEEN
Her lips stay lovely for hours without retouching — thanks to Don Juan Lipstick

Modern HOMEMAKER
Happy husband says her Don Juan Lipstick stays on

Important HE
Don't leave silly looking lipstick smears on him

CAREER WOMAN
Confident of her smart, efficient appearance — proud of her Don Juan Lipstick

You

If you are to be styled right, with your lipstick, you must select right. So select Don Juan, the smartly styled lipstick that stays on (and your lips stay lovely) when you eat, drink or kiss, if used as directed.

And then . . . color, glamour, appeal — YOU, wearing Don Juan Lipstick; charm, poise, pride — YOU.

Don Juan Lipstick is smoothly applied and comes in many fashion shades. Don Juan is not drying or smeary and gives you all you hope for in a lipstick. Use it and see!

Don Juan
THE LIPSTICK THAT STAYS ON

For Beauty's Sake: Matching powder, rouge and cake make-up. Sold in Canada, too.

Try new Medium Red, a true red, flattering, youthful looking, or Raspberry, darker, exciting. Other shades, too.

(Continued from Page 70)

He shut the drawer and went back to Neddy. "Get your hat, kid. We're going for a walk."

XIV

FATHER and son went for many walks thereafter, up and down the great avenues, west and east to the rivers. Neddy watched the barges and the ferryboats and asked questions to which his father made bored or absent-minded replies. If there was a growing understanding between them, it was tacit. Neither spoke of Regan; her personality became a will-o'-the-wisp, glimpsed and lost in the course of their pathetic and disjointed communion.

As the weather became warmer nostalgia for the country grew on Mark. He hired a car and they drove to Connecticut and ate their lunch in a field beside a red farmhouse. An elderly Pole came out from the house and spoke to them. Mark's uniform interested him, and he talked about the war. The sound of his broken English mingled with the sound of cattle stirring in the barn, with the crowing of bantams and the rattle of milk cans. The sun shone on the farmer's gray hair, on his brown arms, and Mark saw him as a creature grown out of the earth itself, procreative, passionate, independent of speech. Afterward, as he drove back to the city, he thought of men like that one, men who moved incredulously amid the ruins of their farms, eying the dead and bloated horse which had once drawn a plow, gathering in their rough hands the fragments of china and the wedding portrait of fifty years before. And as the glittering spires of the city rose before him he smelled again the acrid odors of cattle urine and rank grass, the hot scent of hay, sweat on a flannel shirt—tincture, these, of humanity sprung from the earth and from the ruins of the earth. Patient, ponderous, lyrical, would it recur amidst the ashes of some future time?

All faint blue and fading gold now, the city claimed them, its windows pricked with fire, its towers dark against the summer sky. Pausing for a traffic light, Mark listened to music coming from the radio of a car near his. Overhead a plane swam with a soft throbbing of motors; he had a glimpse of its lights, red and green, an emerald, a ruby, drifting among the stars. Beside him Neddy curled like a puppy, sound asleep, and a melancholy happiness stole upon Mark. Then the music was drowned in an uproar of horns and motors, and he drove on. Entering his own street, he saw a figure which reminded him of Regan. Was it Regan? Should he overtake her just to make sure? And then what? He stopped the car at the curb beside his door and sat for a few moments, watching the figure grow dim and vanish in the gloom. Then he wakened Neddy and went into the house.

In the parlor the child, still half asleep, blinked and looked round him. "Mother's been here," he said.

"What makes you think so?"

"I can tell."

Mark started to speak, then he spied a note lying on the table near the windows. As he walked across the room to pick it up he thought he smelled the faint perfume she used, as, no doubt, Neddy had smelled it.

Mark: You probably forgot that I have a key and also the right to enter my own apartment whenever I want. I would have come before this, but hated the thought of a scene before Neddy and Octavia. It has now been almost three weeks since I saw Neddy, and a full week since I talked with him, or you, over the telephone. How long do you propose to continue this cruel and absurd performance? I have already suggested that we meet and discuss matters, amicably or not as you prefer, here or any other place you suggest. The sooner the better. Heaven knows what Neddy must be thinking, but I know that this separation from his mother cannot be good for him. He and I have always been very close. How can you be so spiteful to the people you professed to love?

REGAN.

As Mark stood with Regan's letter in his hand he felt a question pose itself in the silence between himself and Neddy. For a moment he thought the boy was about to cry; his eyes filled, a drawn look came upon his

"Problem days" are over, She's busy, happy, free— Meds' extra-safe protection Gives her new liberty!

Meds, you know, were perfected by a woman doctor to give greater, quicker absorbency—and to give you the satisfying confidence of extra-security. Just try Meds internal protection "next time." You'll agree that it's the easy, commonsense way!

- Meds alone have the "SAFETY-WELL"—designed for your extra protection.
- Meds are made of real COTTON—soft and super-absorbent for extra comfort.
- Meds expand quickly and adapt themselves easily to individual needs.

Meds only 25¢

FOR 10 IN APPLICATORS

Note special design of Meds applicators. Firm, smooth, easy to use, completely disposable.

Doctor's Fast Relief For Aching, Hot, Tired Feet

If your feet tire, ache, pain, burn, perspire excessively from exertion and fatigue, rub them with Dr. Scholl's Foot Balm. The prompt, soothing relief you enjoy will amaze you. Dr. Scholl's Foot Balm puts you right back on your feet—comforted, rested, refreshed. Get a jar today. Costs but a trifle. Be sure to send one to your boy in Service, too. He needs it!

features, life seemed to diminish in his small body. Mark thought helplessly, If he should break down, what could I do? He remembered, with horror, the afternoon of Neddy's mishap with the penknife. But Neddy did not break down. Silence ebbed slowly, giving way to the ticking of clocks, to the sound of voices in the street, to the music of a radio somewhere in the building.

Neddy was staring at him. "Why can't we go and live in the country all the time?" he asked.

"Maybe we will, soon."

"Is that what mother said in her letter?"

"She just said she was sorry to miss us this afternoon."

He gazed at his son. He wanted, suddenly, to touch him, to say something tender and inconsequential that might bridge the gulf between them. But Neddy, apparently satisfied, turned away to read the comic papers which were strewn on the sofa.

Next morning Mark tore the month of May from the calendar on Regan's desk and tossed it in the wastebasket. June first! Three weeks had passed since his return from Europe, and since Regan's departure. A letter from the War Department informed him that his application for discharge from the Army was receiving "due consideration." The letter, like the date on the calendar, struck Mark as being symbolic. He left the desk and walked to the mirror, where he examined his features. Well, there he stood, Mark Bycroft, aged thirty-three and some months, a man still in his prime, whole and healthy, survivor of four catastrophic years of history. He felt that they had left him almost indecently unchanged in appearance. Even his wounds were invisible; decorously clothed, they sent forth aching reminders on a damp day, exactly as old wounds were supposed to do. The telephone rang in the parlor, and he thought, That's Regan. Let her ring. Let Octavia take the message. He had no wish to hear Regan's precise voice reminding him that there were bigger things in life than his own petty concerns.

And of all the joys of life which may fairly come under the head of recreation, there is nothing more great, more refreshing, more beneficial in the widest sense of the word, than a real love of the beauty of the world. Some people cannot feel it. To such people I can only say, as Turner once said to a lady who complained she could not see sunsets as he painted them, "Don't you wish you could, madam?" But to those who have some feeling that the natural world has beauty in it I would say, cultivate this feeling and encourage it in every way you can. Consider the seasons, the joy of the spring, the splendor of summer, the sunset colors of the autumn, the delicate and graceful bareness of winter trees, the beauty of snow, the beauty of light upon water, and what the old Greek called "the unnumbered smiling of the sea."

—VISCOUNT GREY: Quoted in Under the Bridge by Ferris Greenslet. (Houghton, Miffin).

The telephone rang on and he pictured it where it stood between the dictionary and the pencil sharpener. The book, fat with words, stayed silent, the pencil sharpener did not move, but the telephone rang on and on, monotonously, insistently. "Don't imagine you can ignore me," it said. "Don't imagine you can escape me! I am not what you think I am—I am a personality! A charge, a responsibility. Something may have gone seriously awry and you'll find it out too late, and perhaps go to your grave with your curiosity unappeased. Yes, you will!" But perhaps it was someone calling Regan? One of her friends? One of her lovers, maybe? The lover, forgetful for a moment of her desertion of home, husband and son.

Mark considered the possibility. I might answer the thing, he mused, and introduce myself thus: "I am Colonel Bycroft. My wife is not at home. May I take the message?" And he tried to construct a voice, masculine, embarrassed, with its undercurrent of guilt.

He had been standing all this time before the mirror on Regan's bureau. Now the expression on his face startled him into keener scrutiny. He thought, Am I nothing more than a dumb, jealous fool like all the million other cuckolds in the country? A bleached Othello, toying with his wife's handkerchief, flinching before a flock of bat-eared suspicions?

Octavia called, "Lieutenant Perry on the telephone, Colonel Bycroft!"

He had forgotten young Perry.

The boy's voice sounded desperately friendly. "Mark? I've wanted to call you before this, but I was afraid to bother you. How are things?"

Mark replied that things were about as usual. In the pause which followed he visualized Perry's face, contorted with embarrassment. Then words came with a rush:

"Look, Mark. That dinner for General Wilmer. It's next week, Thursday, at the Rotterdam. You're coming? The old boy's tickled pink about it. I guess he's felt right along that he wasn't such a success. This will make him feel better. He retires this year, you know. It's probably the last chance we'll have to see him, or each other. We've managed to rope in a lot of his pals. It's going to be a madhouse. Everything is all fixed up, and I called just to make sure you'd be there."

"Sure I'll be there," said Mark. A sudden craving for masculine society came upon him, a longing for the rough physical contacts of Army life, for the disciplined, unimaginative companionship which he had hated unremittingly for four years.

"Six-thirty at the Rotterdam. I'll watch out for you. How is Neddy?"

"He's fine, thanks."

There was a slight pause. "And you?" asked Perry diffidently. "How are you making out? Any news from Washington?"

"I may have to take a trip over to the War Department and prod them along. What are your plans?"

"Lucy and I are going out West the second I'm through." He paused again, then, eagerly: "Mark, you won't come with us?"

"What?" He laughed.

"You and Neddy. Out West. Why not? There's plenty of room at the ranch. And the swellest country. You could live with us until you got the—the future straightened out. The kid would love it. Think it over. You don't want to spend your life among these skyscrapers, do you?"

"I'll think it over," Mark promised, to get rid of him. "And I'll let you know Thursday night." He hung up, and encountered Octavia's gaze. "I've just been offered a job, Octavia. Herding cows in God's own country."

She picked up the Chinese Buddha, dusted it and replaced it on its stand. "Colonel Bycroft, may I speak my mind?"

"All of it?" he asked lightly.

She watched him as he stood before her, filling his pipe. "Why won't you let Neddy go? It would be better, in the end."

He looked at her sharply. "Better? Better for whom?"

"For all of you. Let him go. He'll come back to you in the end."

"After she's poisoned him against me? Just as she's poisoned me against most things?"

"You're not acting like your real nature, colonel."

He sat on the arm of a chair and considered her. "You think I'm putting on an act," he said at last. "Maybe I am. Maybe she is too."

"All of us is, one way and another—except Neddy."

"And he can do a pretty good job when he wants to. For instance, when he wants to shield something or someone."

She met his gaze. "Who would you say he was trying to shield?"

"His mother, naturally—or his mother's lover. Octavia, you've been good enough to take an interest in Neddy and me, so I feel entitled to ask you a question. Is my wife in love with someone else?"

Potpourri

OLD WORLD FRAGRANCE

NEW AS TOMORROW

Flowers and spice and everything nice . . . that's what Potpourri Cologne is made of. And it's meant to be worn by the woman who is as sweet—and as smart —as the fragrance itself.

In a full line of Bath Luxuries . . .
Potpourri Cologne, 1.00 and 2.00* Bath Oil, 1.25* Dusting Powder, 1.00
*Soap (box of three), 1.00 Talc Mitt, 1.00
Plus tax*

Prince Matchabelli

711 FIFTH AVENUE, NEW YORK

Away with Fingertip Monotony!

PATRICE MUNSEL...

Brilliant Young Star of New York's Metropolitan Opera and Radio's "Family Hour," shows you the

NEWEST STRATEGY OF ALLURE

Dinner Slacks from McMullen
Hat by Sally Victor
Jewelry from Georg Jensen

Starlight Sorcery

For a festive evening costume, Patrice does her fingertips the Dura-Gloss "Quick Trick" way—sheathing them completely in Dura-Gloss BLACKBERRY to give them a longer, dramatic look.

Dinner at Home

Patrice changes her fingertip make-up to harmonize with colorful, tangerine dinner slacks. Doing the "Double Quick Trick," she applies Dura-Gloss LAUREL—leaving moons exposed—for a vivid, striking costume.

Day in Town

Doing her fingertips the Dura-Gloss "Quick Trick" way, Patrice gives them a clean-cut, tailored look in keeping with her smart Adrian suit. She applies Dura-Gloss FLARE RED to her nails, leaving both moons and tips exposed.

It's charged with excitement . . .

DURA-GLOSS Fingertip Allure

GIVE YOUR NAILS THE SPICE OF VARIETY!

So Easy With Dura-Gloss "Quick Trick" Technique

1. Quick Trick
For lasting fingertip allure, try this Dura-Gloss method: Apply one coat of Dura-Coat—two coats of Dura-Gloss polish. Quick dry with Dura-Gloss Dryer.

2. Double Quick Trick
When time is short, use this Dura-Gloss method: Apply one coat of Dura-Coat—one coat of Dura-Gloss polish. Quick dry with Dura-Gloss Dryer.

Every fashionable shade of Nail Polish made is made by Dura-Gloss

Copr. 1946, Lorr Laboratories, Paterson, N. J., Founded by E. T. Reynolds

"I don't know, colonel. How should I know?"

"You've worked here for two years, you've seen people come and go. You must have seen—suspected ——"

"They were just names to me. I give you my word, I never saw, or heard, anything one could call unusual."

"And Neddy?"

She looked at him sternly. "Some children know everything. But that's one question you got no right to ask him."

Mark moved aside and let her pass. He felt as if he had been very properly, and not too tenderly, put in his place.

XV

THE lobby of the Rotterdam Hotel was a vast rectangular space illumined by what is called indirect lighting. The floor was several inches deep in purplish carpet, interrupted at rigid intervals by outcroppings of furniture of a size and shape better suited to elephants than men. Mark's first impression on entering was that here was an ideal spot for the assignation of lovers, murderers, bank robbers or political spies, for in addition to a confused décor—the walls were a combination of what looked like fumed oak and embossed leather, with here and there an avalanche of fake tapestry—the place swarmed with humanity in varying degrees of physical and spiritual agitation. Some lounged in the elephantine chairs, reading newspapers and timetables or casting eager glances at the three sets of revolving doors which never seemed to stop, sucking in an outgoing victim or ejecting one; people seemed glued to the long line of dial telephones which stood alongside the elegant cave reserved for room clerks, managers and switchboard operators. Most of the occupants of the lobby just stood about in forlorn knots; some rushed toward one another with outcries and claspings and were forthwith sucked into the orbit of a revolving door and liberated on the sidewalk, or they were drawn, chattering like toucans, into the dim cavern of the dining room or the cocktail lounge. Still others stalked or skulked in the wake of liveried adolescents carrying suitcases, and were wafted upward in cages of gold plate and bronze.

It was a microcosm of the city, and Mark perceived, in these people, in this place, the soul of the city itself—squamous and impermanent. But he had seen enough of crowds: crowds of homeless, crowds of prisoners, crowds of the armed and the disarmed. Now as he stood in the lobby of the Rotterdam Hotel a memory of all those faces surged toward him out of the past; he felt that he might be thrown down and trampled under the weight of amorphous humanity, under a mountain of broken shoes, broken glass, bones, rags and rust.

"Mark!" Perry seized his elbow, beaming. "Gosh, I'm glad to see you." Mark was turned deftly away from the revolving doors toward which he was headed.

"I'm sorry to be late," he murmured in frustrated accents. "I thought you said seven."

"Six-thirty. But it doesn't matter. Everyone's going to be more or less late. They've started on the drinks, and we have the privilege of being as late as we please, provided we pay for it." He squeezed Mark's arm. "You never saw such a bunch! Quite a few civilians, too, and most of our crowd are out of uniform now. They've most all showed up. I never thought old Wilmer rated so high, did you? Poor old devil."

Mark decided that he must get drunk. It would be the only way to survive the evening, the only way to escape from the sense of suffocation which he already felt creeping upon him.

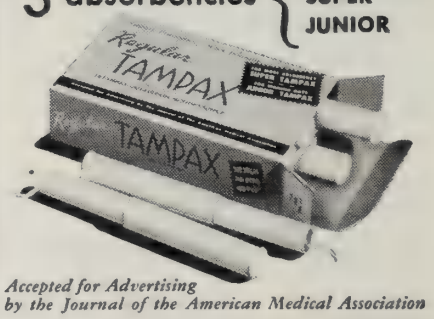
Perry looked at him anxiously. "You all right, pal?"

"Sure I'm all right."

"I've been thinking about you. Worrying. So has Lucy. Ever since that afternoon when we called, and you told us—told me ——"

"Forget it."

"But we both felt terrible."



WHEN the daughter asks advice about new things, new ways, the mother is not sitting in judgment—not really! It is she who is on trial. Is she up to date? Has she taken the trouble to follow new developments? Is she backward in her duty? Will her daughter continue to trust and confide?

Such situations arise when Tampax is discovered and discussed. This method of monthly sanitary protection for women is distinctly different. Invented by a doctor for internal wear, Tampax requires no belts, pins or external pads. It causes no odor and of course can cause no ridges or bulges under any costume. Tampax is inserted by means of a dainty throw-away applicator and you cannot feel its presence when it's in place.

The use of Tampax has spread tremendously. Millions now use it. Sold at drug stores and notion counters in 3 absorbency-sizes to meet varying needs. A full month's supply will slip easily into your purse. Economy Box holds 4 months' average supply. Tampax Incorporated, Palmer, Mass.

3 absorbencies { REGULAR SUPER JUNIOR

Accepted for Advertising by the Journal of the American Medical Association

TAMPAX INCORPORATED LHJ-46-H
Palmer, Mass.

Please send me in plain wrapper a trial package of Tampax. I enclose 10¢ (stamps or silver) to cover cost of mailing. Size is checked below.

( ) REGULAR ( ) SUPER ( ) JUNIOR

Name_____

Address_____

City_____ State_____

AND "ILLUSION" HALF SIZES
Martha Manning
DRESSES IN WOMEN'S

MARIAN STEPHENSON

The You, You Want to Be

Martha Manning fashions smart simplicity with soft flattery to make you appear taller, slimmer, younger . . . the lovelier you. Floral clustered lace medallions and glowing glass buttons dramatically accent cool refreshing Moonlight Mesh. Women's sizes 38 to 44. About $11.00. Exclusively at one fine store in most cities.

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

"Well, you can forget it now."

"That's what you say, Mark. It's like you to say it, to act as if nothing had happened. You were always like that. While everyone else beefed or whined you always acted as if the whole show was quite normal. I ——"

"Forget it, will you? Just to oblige me."

Perry shook his head. "Listen, what about it? What about coming West with Lucy and me? We could fix you up on the ranch—you and Neddy. We're friends, aren't we? We're buddies. You've helped me out of holes—helped me —— You don't have to be proud. You'd be doing us a favor, an honor!"

"What are you talking about?"

The boy was flushed and stammering. "You make it so darned difficult for a guy to say anything, do anything for you! Do you know what would have happened if I'd done what I meant to and told Lucy about that girl in Belgium? Well, I'd have salved my soul all right, but Lucy'd have walked out on me." He snapped his fingers dramatically. "Just like that, she would have! I know it, now. And if it hadn't been for you—for your decent common sense ——"

Mark shook himself free and managed to laugh. "I can't go West with you, Perry. You're generous to suggest it. But I've got to stay here and look after my kid, and try to find a job and make some sort of life. It's just as dull as that. I'm not cut out for the great open spaces. I'm not heroic, not even romantic. I'm ordinary, and I want an ordinary life."

"O.K.," said Perry, incapable of taking offense at his hero. "Let's go up. We've engaged a suite for the evening."

---

The important thing is not so much that every child should be taught, as that every child should be given the wish to learn.

—JOHN LUBBOCK:
Quoted in National Parent-Teacher.

---

They took an elevator to the seventeenth floor. The suite reserved for the occasion was crammed with men and turgid with the aura, half sensual, half sentimental, which attends such gatherings. There were, of course, no women, and yet Mark had the feeling that he was actually in the midst of a crowd of mamma's boys. He recognized the typical American atmosphere, faintly guilty, faintly scurrilous, characteristic of a mob of adolescents out on a spree. His hand was seized and wrung, his shoulders smacked, his hair ruffled and his neck embraced by half-a-dozen comrades of the field, all more or less intoxicated. They bawled in his ears and shoved drinks at him, and little by little his aloof and critical mood began to soften. He had not known how lonely he was, how hurt. Now he felt the stirrings of affection for these men, some of whom he had disliked in the past and who, he knew, must have disliked him.

A commotion occurred in the center of the crowd which parted to exude the small, virile figure of General Horatio Wilmer. This one-star comedian with his rubber legs, this absurd creature notorious for his courage, his bad judgment, his worse language, his appalling mistakes and spectacular good luck, was, this evening, tearfully enjoying what must have been the happiest and proudest hour of his career. Men who had execrated him and wished him dead a thousand times now hailed him with emotion and told him to his face what a fine general he was. They gazed at him as if they believed he really deserved the triple row of ribbons on his blouse, as if they had forgotten, if indeed they had ever known, what a complete and absolute ass he had made of himself in the past.

Spying Mark, he advanced and attempted to embrace him, not very successfully, since he was easily a head the shorter of the two. "Marcroft!" he cried. "Marcroft, old pal! How are you anyway?"

Mark patted the little man rather gingerly on the shoulder, remembering the occasions

EVELYN BYRD LAPRADE—This lovely young member of the distinguished Byrd family of Virginia is delighted with Pond's new "sheer-gauge" powder. "It brings exquisitely clear, subtle color to my skin!" Miss LaPrade says.

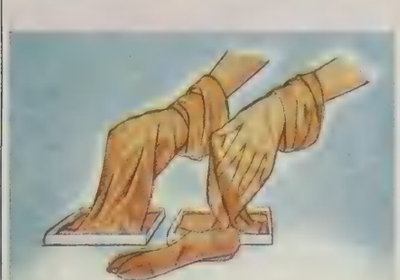
What gives Pond's powder such glowy, ultra-smooth color "ON"?

Pond's powder is "Sheer-gauge"!

The more "sheer-gauge" your stockings are, the more glamorous their color looks "on." The filmy tone looks so smooth over your skin . . . so beautifully expensive!



Today—Pond's "sheer-gauge" face powder brings that same kind of glamour to your complexion. Because Pond's is blended sheer—to suffuse your skin with that same unmistakable "luxury" look! The same flawless, ultra-smooth color flattery.

Choose from a wide range of exquisite Pond's shades. You'll find that "sheer-gauge" Pond's shades look heavenly in the box—but even more heavenly "on"!

Special!
Pond's Make-up Trio

A lovely big box of Pond's Dreamflower Powder, with matching Pond's "Lips" and Pond's "Cheeks." It's a $1 value for only 79¢ plus tax. Wonderful for prizes . . . for gifts . . . and for you!

"Sheer-gauge" means more glamorous color for your face, too!

Two stockings—same shade in the box—but so different "on"! Pond's Dreamflower Powder shades look lovelier "on" because they're so "sheer-gauge"!

Pond's Dreamflower Powder

—made "sheer-gauge" by experts in beauty!

Hips aren't your big problem, Honey!

YOU CAN TAKE your hips right off your mind, Angel. For no one finds fault with your figure!

But you'd be smart to exercise a little more care about personal charm. Being streamlined, you know, won't protect you against underarm odor. Or lessen the offense when others find you guilty.

So keep on trusting your bath—for past perspiration. But put your trust in Mum to prevent risk of future underarm odor.

Creamy, snowy-white Mum smooths on in 30 seconds. Keeps you fresh and free from underarm odor all day or evening. Helps you stay nice to be near.

Mum is gentle—is harmless to skin and fabrics. Won't dry out in the jar or form irritating crystals. So why take chances when you can be sure with Mum? Ask for it today.

• • •

For Sanitary Napkins — Mum is gentle, safe, dependable . . . ideal for this use, too.

Product of Bristol-Myers

Mum

TAKES THE ODOR OUT OF PERSPIRATION

when it had been his fate to suffer the general's uninhibited broadsides.

"Scotch," whispered the general in his ear. "Scotch, boy, Scotch! Two cases of it. They chipped in and bought it for me, bless their hearts! This whole show is in my honor. Thought it up themselves." Tears filled his eyes. "If you knew what this meant to me, Marcroft! If I could find words ——"

He was led away by other adorers, and Mark turned, trying to fit names to the vaguely familiar, civilian faces round him.

"Remember me?" inquired a man standing beside him. "You and I were at Magdeburg together, the morning news came of Roosevelt's death."

Mark remembered him, and they talked about that death which had seemed so remote from their immediate experience. They reminded each other how they had tried to place the moment in history, how they had argued about the greatness of the dead man and of his epoch.

Someone standing by broke into the conversation: "You were in Germany, but I was on leave in New York the evening the news broke about the President. I was in the Ritz having a drink with some friends. A guy was sitting at the little piano at the farther end of the room, playing something. The Moonlight Sonata, I think it was. I saw a waiter go up to him and say something, and he closed the piano quickly and went out. A woman at the next table to ours said, 'Tell him to play some more! We like it.' And the waiter turned to her and said in a harsh whisper, 'Madam, there is no more music—the President is dead.' After that we all sat and looked at each other in a sort of desperate silence. I remember I thought, 'This is going to hit all over the world, not just here in the bar of the Ritz-Carlton in New York, but all over the world.' I saw the same look in everybody's face. I'd voted for him four times, but I knew there were many there who hadn't. And yet it seemed as if we all stopped breathing, just for a minute. Afterward I went and walked about the streets alone. It was warm and still. Saks had a corner window lighted, with his picture in it, and a black wreath. I saw people carrying newspapers rolled up, sort of like college diplomas or something. Everyone was walking slowly, aimlessly, carrying a rolled-up newspaper. And then I went to Rockefeller Center and watched the flags being lowered to half-staff."

A FOURTH voice chimed in: "When I heard the news I hadn't slept since God knows when and it'd have taken an eighty-eight mm. shell to jerk me awake. But there was a Jewish boy in my outfit, came to me crying like a kid about the President's death. Crying, he was. He seemed to believe that it was just about the end of the world. He said to me, 'Look, because that guy has died today, millions will die tomorrow, all over the world.' I remember I said to him, 'O.K., boy, O.K. Go away and let me die in peace!' Remember that fellow? One with the big green popeyes? Sternberger, his name was. He was killed two days later."

The conversation soared with a humming sound punctuated by bursts of laughter and an occasional crash of breaking glass. Reminiscences flew back and forth. Old battles were fought again. Small pools of silence welled about the names of dead friends.

Mark thought, This is a precedent, and it will recur year after year whenever a bunch of us gets together. We'll relive the war and our share in it, the occasion which brought us together, the memories which bind us to each other. Except for these we would be strangers, perhaps enemies. As the years go on we shall see less and less of each other. Peace will claim us, peace and the preoccupations of peace. Our children will grow up in a world of atomic revolution, taking in its wonders with a matter-of-fact calm. We ourselves will grow fat and bald. The war will join the long catalogue of wars which began in the ninth millenium B.C. Our heroes will be leaf mold.

The general had just completed one of his famous stories and was being roundly applauded. He was followed by a handsome major who described the occasion when he brought a lady friend to the Rotterdam Hotel one night when he was home on leave from the war. "I managed to inveigle her through the revolving doors and across the lobby into an elevator. We rose to the nineteenth floor—and there I lost her!"

"No!" came the vociferous chorus.

"I DID, I tell you. We had agreed to proceed separately, not to rouse suspicion in the breast of any hotel dick who might be snooping around. You know what this place is like! Every corridor exactly like another. Every door just like its neighbor. The walls, ceilings, rooms, furniture counterparts of each other. Even the people who run the place look like quintuplets multiplied by ten. Well, so help me! I chased my girl up and down the corridors, in and out of elevators, down into the lobby, through the revolving doors into the street, back to the nineteenth floor—and I never did catch up with her. I never found out what became of her. Next day I was alerted, and that was that."

"Boy, that reminds me! My first leave home—forty-three, I think it was—I had a date to meet a girl at Penn Station ——"

Mark felt a touch on his sleeve. A young man was smiling at him. "Colonel Bycroft? My name is Osgood. We haven't met, but I've heard your wife talk on the radio, and I wanted to tell you how much I admire her."

Mark smiled, conscious of young Perry standing rigidly beside him.

"I do envy you," said Mr. Osgood. "I envy any guy who comes back from the war and finds his wife waiting for him. Mine didn't wait. You know, I never did think I'd care a lot. I'm kind of the happy-go-lucky type, and I'd seen enough, one way and another, in the war and places, so I discounted the emotions and all that. I'd been in the Army ten years before I married. The Army had always taken good care of me. Then I got married and my wife took care of me. Now I'm on my own, and, do you know, I've lost the knack of taking care of myself. Or maybe I never had it." He peered at Mark. "Finding a place to live in—finding someone to do my laundry—get my shoes mended." He blinked. "You wouldn't believe what it's

(Continued on Page 78)

"Guess who I sold a vacuum sweeper to."

"All our Tomorrows we'll be together"

We were apart such ages, darling.

"But never again," you've said. "Marry me now, so I'll be sure these sweet hands are mine." Of course I married you, darling. Of course my hands are yours. And you've seen, now, how I keep my hands soft as you love them—with Jergens Lotion . . . Jergens is greatly the favorite hand care with lovely women. Hollywood Stars use Jergens Lotion, 7 to 1.

"Some day we'll have a house like this," you say—"and a maid, so your little hands will stay soft." My hands will stay soft, dearest. I'll use Jergens Lotion—keep an extra bottle of Jergens in our kitchen.

Famous hand care—now even more effective. Using advanced knowledge of skin-care, gained during the war—Jergens skin scientists now make Jergens Lotion more effective than ever. "My hands feel even softer and smoother;" "Hands are protected longer;" women said after making tests with this postwar Jergens Lotion.

Yours, now—the satisfaction of using this even finer Jergens Lotion. Oh, yes! Those two ingredients many doctors use for special help in skin-smoothing are still part of Jergens Lotion. Easy as ever to use—no oiliness—no stickiness. In the stores—same bottle—still 10¢ to $1.00 (plus tax).

For the Softest, Adorable Hands, use

JERGENS LOTION

Now more Effective than ever—thanks to Wartime Research

"Sure—same old floor but a different wax!"

"I'm using Tavern Wax—the lustre lasts longer—saves work, too!" Right you are, lady! Socony-Vacuum puts a special ingredient in Tavern Floor Wax. It comes from a tropical palm tree, and it's called Carnauba wax. This amazingly durable, imported wax gives Tavern-waxed floors a longer-lasting lustre. Helps Tavern's tough surface shed dirt, wear better, clean easier—resist even water spots!

Tavern Non-Rub Floor Wax is quickly applied to linoleum, wood, rubber or asphalt tile floors. It's dry—and shining—in 20 minutes! Tavern paste and liquid buffing waxes clean as they polish . . . bring out the beauty of wood floors . . . protect woodwork, windowsills, painted surfaces. Use the type you prefer.

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

3 KINDS OF WAX

NON-RUB PASTE LIQUID

Try these other Tavern Housekeeping Aids

Tavern Furniture Gloss
Tavern Paint Cleaner
Tavern Rug Cleaner
Tavern Parowax or Paraseal Wax
Tavern Dry Cleaner
Tavern Window Cleaner
Tavern Lustre Cloth
Tavern Electric Motor Oil
Tavern Leather Preserver

SOCONY-VACUUM

Typical symbol of hospitality—Star Tavern, Rusper, England

TAVERN HOME PRODUCTS

(Continued from Page 76)

like, not having someone around to attend to those things. You wouldn't believe!"

Mark felt wild laughter rising in him, but before he could offer condolences Perry broke in. "I've got to have another drink. How about you, Mark?"

They moved toward a table set with refreshments. Mark felt the liquor in his blood, but his brain was wide awake. Liquor telescopes events, lifts reality into a mere multiplicity of sounds and actions from which, eventually, only the unexpected is retained and recalled.

PERRY was replenishing their glasses when Mark heard, behind him, a voice say heartily, "Well! Bill Symes, how are you? Last I heard you'd gone to Lisbon."

The name plummeted through the gay confusion in his mind. He waited till his glass was filled, then moved slowly to one side and looked round. Heads, shoulders, backs swirled before his gaze; men in uniform and men in civilian clothes, some familiar and some strange. The voice that had just spoken was lost in the uproar, the owner of the name had himself melted into the throng. Or had he imagined the incident? Was it an echo, stirred by the whisky he had drunk, and by some subtle release of tension within him?

Perry was looking at him. "Anything the matter?"

Mark said, "Do you know anyone called William Symes?"

"Never heard of him. Friend of yours?"

"Friend of my wife's." Mark had meant the words to sound inconsequential, but his voice betrayed him. He added, "I'm probably drunk. I thought I heard the name Symes."

"I heard it too."

"Well, it's of no consequence."

"I can find out easily enough if he's here," said Perry. "I'll ask the general. He knows all the guests."

"Never mind. It's not important."

Mark turned away and Perry watched him from a distance speculatively. He was nudged by the bereft Mr. Osgood. "They tell me you married since we last met!" His voice was accusing. "Lucky—or are you?"

"I'm lucky all right," conceded Perry. "Listen, do you know anyone here called Symes?"

"Never heard of him." His eyes became glassy. "Say, you know I've got ulcers? Ever since I got out of the Army and into advertising, I got ulcers. I'm not supposed to touch this stuff."

Perry drifted away in search of someone who would tell him which figure among them was Mr. Symes. Moving through the crowd in the opposite direction, Mark experienced a peculiar elation. It increased as he persuaded himself that he was being watched and studied by an unknown pair of eyes. What had he against William Symes? Nothing, actually. Absolutely nothing—so far as he knew. Yet the elation persisted, and he knew that he was spoiling for a fight. His intelligence warned him that it would be stupid to make a scene—that kind of scene. What, exactly, was it he expected? What did he want to have happen? He had no clear idea; all he felt, now, was a racing, tingling excitement, a nervous tension which sought relief in violence. Somewhere in this crowd was a man who had given Regan presents, and men don't give women presents for nothing.

He began to argue with himself wordlessly, deliberately relegating his own role, and that of his wife and his imaginary rival, to a sort of newspaper vulgarity.

He assured himself that all that was necessary now was for him to encounter Symes' glance—that was all. Then I'll know, Mark told himself, nodding drunkenly. Either he'll meet my eyes with an excessive candor, or he'll refuse to meet them. Then I'll know.

"I think they're going down to dinner," said Mr. Osgood, appearing, somewhat pale, from an adjoining room. People were moving toward the door.

Mark said, "Osgood, do you know anyone here called William Symes?"

"Symes? You're the second fellow that has asked me that. No, I don't."

Symes, on his way to the door, heard his name, and for a second his eyes met Mark's. Taken unawares, he half smiled, then blankness descended on his face. "Gorgeous party," he exclaimed to the man nearest him. "Absolutely gorgeous!" He disappeared into the corridor, and Mark found young Perry at his elbow.

"That was Symes," said Perry excitedly. "The big one in the brown suit. Just went out."

They were in the corridor now, in a turmoil of sauntering figures, loud voices, laughter. Mark saw Symes about to enter an elevator. Possessed by his strange agitation, he strode in pursuit, Perry at his side.

The young man read his intention and a sympathetic demon came to life in him. "Quick," he muttered. "We'll get him in the elevator."

It was easy enough to shoulder through the drunken, hilarious mob and to reach the elevator immediately after Symes had stepped into it. Mark followed him, and thereafter Perry took matters into his own hands. Seizing the operator, he pushed him out of the elevator into the corridor. He then threw the switch, the gates closed and the machine began to climb. The performance was executed with such speed and deftness that for a moment the three men stared at one another in silence. Then Perry said, "I believe there are forty or fifty floors in this building, Mark. Take your time!"

Symes stood braced against the bronze handrail. He looked coldly at Mark. "Your friend seems a bit out of hand, doesn't he?"

"My name's Bycroft. I believe you know my wife?"

"I believe I do. My name is William Symes." And he held out his hand.

The gesture, intended to disarm, and perhaps to gain time, enraged Mark. He struck the hand aside and lunged forward. But Symes had drunk very little and was in full command of his senses. He struck back hard and surely, and the blow, catching Mark in the face, flung him against the wall of the elevator, whence he crumpled to the floor. Without hesitation Symes reached across Perry's arm and threw the emergency switch, bringing the elevator to a smooth stop. While Perry knelt beside his bruised and groping friend, Symes stepped out of the elevator and into another which had paused to take on passengers for its downward journey.

In the lobby again, he paused long enough to reassure a small posse of hotel clerks and bellboys: "Just a drunken joke. It's all right—no harm done!" After which he rejoined the genial throng of guests who were headed, more or less erratically, toward the main dining room.

XVI

"WHAT do you think of it, Stella?" asked Miriam Sparrow, turning her head from side to side as she appraised the new hat, while the saleslady stood ecstatically to one side.

Stella murmured, "Terribly becoming, Miriam dear."

"That's what you've said about every hat I've tried on today," Miriam complained,

(Continued on Page 80)

When James Gordon Bennett was editor of the New York Herald he once summoned his London correspondent to meet him in Paris. The correspondent knew that his employer was a great lover of dogs. He also had a premonition that he was going to be discharged, but he was not without resources. After Bennett had kept him waiting for an hour he was finally admitted into The Presence. A half dozen poodles began greeting him by licking his face and hands. Bennett's hostility melted like magic. He not only shook hands warmly with his employee but was solicitous of his health and gave him a substantial raise in salary. When the correspondent returned to his room he changed his clothes and removed from his pockets some choice cuts of liver which he had carefully secreted in them.

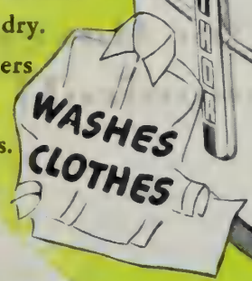
THOR washday features you'll bless – and they're Automagic!

Agitator washing action . . . thorough, dependable, perfected by Thor. Gets dirtiest clothes clean—automagically.

Agitated power rinses search out every trace of dirt and soap. You don't need rinse tubs. And your hands never touch the water.



Automagic spin-dry . . . spins clothes much, much better than wringer dry. Easier on clothes . . . easier on you.

Have you seen the unbelievable THOR Automagic Washer everyone is talking about?

Glory be! Here's the CLOTHES WASHER of your dreams!

Forget for a minute that it can be changed into a dishwasher (see below)—just consider the clothes washing features of the Thor Automagic, and you'll want one tomorrow. By agitator action, it washes dirty clothes spanking clean—floats out every trace of soap—then whirls clothes better than wringer dry. All at the flick of a dial! Dependable as Thor Washers always are—this grand AUTOMAGIC brings you years of work-free, worry-free washdays.

Thor AUTOMAGIC (TRADE MARK) WASHER

Easily installed in kitchen, laundry or utility room. No need to bolt to the floor. Let your Thor dealer show you the amazing simplicity of this "unbelievable" washer.

Change tubs (1½ minutes) and have a Dishwasher you'll revel in 7 days a week Clothes and dishes are washed in separate tubs that slip in or out in a jiffy. No part of the Thor that touches dishes ever touches clothes.

Lift out the clothes tub, slip in the dish tub—then the racks—and the Thor is a dream dishwasher that washes dishes, glass, silverware . . . without pre-rinsing.

Certainly, you can have your Thor as a clothes washer only—or as a dishwasher only. But eventually you'll want the combination . . . two wonderful washers powered by one Thor mechanism.

Heavenly days! Here's the DISHWASHER of your dreams!

You'll fall in love with the Thor Automagic Dishwasher for itself alone. It washes a full service for six at one time—eliminates pre-rinsing—even washes up the pots and pans. It's stingy with hot water and extra careful of your china and glass. Only the water moves in the Thor.

And consider this: You can buy the Thor Dishwasher as a complete unit—later, if you wish, add the clothes washing tub and attachments. Or you can start right out with the Thor Automagic combination (two units in one) and have two work saving washers just by changing tubs.

HURLEY MACHINE DIVISION
Electric Household Utilities Corporation
Chicago 50, Illinois
Thor-Canadian Company, Ltd., Toronto, Canada

Buy it 3 ways!

THOR CLOTHES WASHER

Automagic . . . wringer-less . . . work-free. Buy it now . . . later add Dishwasher unit at small extra cost.

THOR DISHWASHER

Washes all the dishes . . . even pots and pans. Buy it now . . . add the Clothes Washer unit later at small extra cost.

THOR AUTOMAGIC COMBINATION

All the features of clothes washer and dishwasher in one machine. A 7-day wonder . . . much less expensive than you imagine.

HURLEY MACHINE DIVISION
ELECTRIC HOUSEHOLD UTILITIES CORPORATION
2136 South 54th Avenue, Chicago 50, Illinois

Please send me, without obligation, your free book, "How to Make Life Easier Seven Days a Week."

Name.....

Address.....

City.....Zone.....State.....

A luncheon treat! Corn sticks spread with delicious Parkay

Still unmatched for flavor ...and still so economical!

Compare Parkay Margarine's fresh, dairy-like flavor with any spread for bread you've ever tried. See if you don't agree that it's still unmatched for flavor! For there's no matching the skill that Kraft uses in blending the fine, wholesome farm products that make Parkay taste so good. Four of the good things you eat every day are flavor-fully blended into Parkay Margarine: (1) Vegetable oils, refined to bland sweetness, (2) Pasteurized skim milk, cultured for flavor, (3) table salt for seasoning (4) important Vitamin A. And to make Parkay a rich, appetizing yellow for table use, you simply use the certified coloring in each package.

Compare the Vitamin A content—15,000 (U.S.P. XII) units of Vitamin A are added to every single pound of Parkay. It is an excellent source of this important vitamin, guaranteed uniform the whole year 'round. Compare Parkay's high food energy value—it's the caloric equal of any spread you can buy. And finally, compare the price—you'll be agreeably surprised to find that Parkay Margarine is only about half the price of costly spreads.

KRAFT FOODS COMPANY ▪ Chicago 90, Illinois

Millions prefer Parkay to any other brand!

★ ★ ★ Tune in the Great Gildersleeve every Sunday on NBC —6:30 P.M. (Eastern Time) and 8:00 P.M. (Pacific Time).

(Continued from Page 78)

sighing. "I don't believe you really care at all. I don't believe you've even noticed!"

"But I have! I think they're all becoming. You seem to have that effect on hats."

"Very true," crooned the saleslady, and touched the hat's parrot-green feather with a caressing finger. "There! Just the teeniest bit lower over the eyes, and what a difference!"

Miriam, studying herself in the triple mirror, caught a glimpse of her friend seated near by. Stella wore an abstracted expression, and her clothes looked as if they needed pressing. Miriam thought impatiently, She ought to buy herself an entire new outfit. How can any woman go round looking as she does?

"Here," she said abruptly. "You try it, Stella. It's more your style than mine."

"No, Miriam, really! I don't feel in the mood today."

The saleslady assumed an expression of polite incredulity, and Miriam rose. "Well, I can't say that I do either. Let's go and eat lunch; then maybe we'll feel better."

On Madison Avenue the sun poured mercilessly on their heads; walls and sidewalks gave forth shudders of heat.

"June," said Miriam as they paused for a traffic light before crossing to the shady side of the street. "Do you remember how we used always to head for the country in June? That seems like a hundred years ago."

"When does Dick intend to take his vacation?"

"Oh, heavens, he's up to his ears in work. Says he probably won't get off, now, till August. He's having client trouble." She fanned herself with her gloves. "I may not wait till August. The Gormans have asked me to join them next month, at the Cape. If it gets much hotter I shall." She glanced at Stella. "What are your plans for the summer?"

"I haven't any."

"You don't intend to stew in New York all summer?"

"I may."

"Stella!"

"Why not? There is nothing to take me away, and I don't mind the heat."

"You look absolutely washed out. Yes, I mean to speak my mind—you do look washed out. And washed up too. Stella, what's come over you? You used to adore going to the country, to Jarley. The war's over, everything is normal again. People coming home. The feeling of peace. After all, the world has survived, peace and happiness are real." She talked rapidly, glancing at her friend from the corner of her eye. Then, irrelevantly, with a rush: "Stella, why won't you buy yourself a new hat?"

THE lights changed and they crossed the street. Miriam's question remained unanswered, and as they walked down the avenue she felt ashamed of her impatience, aware that it was inspired less by concern for her friend than by concern for herself. Stella made her feel uncomfortable and she hated to feel uncomfortable. As she grew older she wanted happy people round her. There was rising in her, and in many of her generation, a revulsion against the tragedy of the war. She told herself that life is an affirmative thing, that people ought to make the most of what they had left. Far from making the most of it, Stella seemed determined to make as little of it as she possibly could. Though she uttered no complaint and asked for no pity, her manner and appearance were pitiful, and like her silence on that mysterious Italian journey, there seemed something obstinate, something repelling in this attitude of eternal widowhood.

"IT'S hot," said Miriam, and signaled a taxi. "Let's go to that restaurant, on Third Avenue." In the cab she turned to Stella. "There's something I want to ask you."

"Yes?"

"Would you think of selling the house?"

"The house?"

"The house at Jarley. Because Dick and I might like to buy it."

"I don't know," said Stella slowly. "I never thought of selling it."

She had not thought about selling it. She had not been near it since Alec went away. There it stood, year after year, slowly losing heart as the grass flooded its doorstep and birds built in its chimneys and worms devoured the apple trees. Another few years and it would crumble into the earth.

Miriam thought of old houses she had seen as she drove along back-country roads, houses which had been side-stepped by modern highways, houses surrendered by their owners to the woodchucks, the squirrels, the owls. Walls fell in, windows slid askew, wild, tough little trees thrust through the floors, and mildew spread like forgetfulness over everything. Was this to be the fate of Alec's house?

"Stella, let me buy it. After all, I'm Alec's cousin. It would still be in the family, and perhaps if Dick and I owned it you would feel more like coming down there."

Stella was looking at her with a curious hostility. "I don't want to sell it."

"Aren't you being very selfish?"

"It's Alec's house."

Angry words rose to Miriam's lips, but she remained silent. For a moment she felt that she hated Stella. Then the taxi stopped and they got out. Miriam paid the driver and they started toward the restaurant in a welter of heat and noise.

Stella took Miriam's arm. "Forgive me! I can't explain, but you've got to try and understand."

"You don't make it easy," said Miriam. She saw the despair in her friend's face, and remorse moved her to add quickly, "Oh, Stella, my dear! You and I mustn't quarrel."

They entered Philippe's and a waiter led them to a table at the far end, from where they commanded a view of the room. It was not large. A bar occupied part of the opposite wall, and the tables were arranged with an eye to space and privacy.

Miriam chatted to break the tension. "They have a veal casserole here that Dick says is wonderful." She deposited her gloves and pocketbook. "Ever since Dick's been seeing so much of Bill Symes, he's become a gourmet. He never used to care what he ate."

"I remember at Jarley," said Stella, "it was meat and potatoes, potatoes and meat! And those unspeakable desserts Myrtle Anderson was always cutting out of

(Continued on Page 82)

★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

Lilies of the Valley

BY CHRISTIAN GAUSS

How could these tiny bells proclaim
  Our liberty throughout the land?
They'd lose their semblance and their name,
  Crushed by an infant's thoughtless hand.

Yet safe here on the pathway's hem,
  As challenging as lofty fir,
Their upward inching slender stem
  No less is freedom's harbinger.

How lovely o'er the shining leaf
  Their stem inclined suspends each bell,
How wonderful beyond belief,
  How artful and how natural.

No clangor ever made men free,
  Nor bulk that spreads gigantic span;
A roomless, soundless harmony
  Can liberate the heart of man.

When April wakes the dreaming soul
  Throughout the world the meaning swells
When once again the echoes roll
  From their untinkled perfect bells.

★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

Delightful Easter Buffet

FEATURES OLD-FASHIONED, CHICKENY NOODLE SOUP

"EASTER BUFFET"
Lipton's Noodle Soup
Springtime Fruit Salad
Assorted Sandwiches
Refrigerator Cake
Lipton Tea

HERE'S a gay-as-spring supper idea if your family —or guests—will be around Easter night. And you'll be amazed how easy the entire meal is to fix!

Get off to a wonderful start—big, steaming bowls of Lipton's Noodle Soup. As rich and chickeny-tasting as grandma's own home-made chicken soup! And oodles of tender egg noodles floating in its golden, parsley-flecked broth!

With Lipton's grand soup mix, you'll serve a fragrant, fresh-cooked noodle soup after just 7 minutes' cooking time! And thrifty? Why, a 10¢ package of Lipton's serves 4 to 6—with real, old-fashioned noodle soup.

REFRIGERATOR CAKE

(A finale for your supper, that's as glorious as the first course of Lipton's.) Melt 1 (7-oz.) package semi-sweet chocolate bits in top of double boiler over hot water. Stir in 3 tablespoons sugar, 3 tablespoons water and dash of salt. Add 2 beaten egg yolks and cook, stirring constantly, for 2 minutes. Add ½ teaspoon vanilla and fold into 2 egg whites beaten until stiff but not dry. Line loaf pan with waxed paper. Cover bottom and sides with vanilla cookies. Arrange alternate layers of chocolate mixture and cookies in pan. Chill overnight. Serve cold garnished with whipped cream. Serves 4 to 6. Put Lipton's on your shopping list today so you'll have it on hand Easter night—or any Sunday night.

10¢
ALSO IN THRIFTY 3-PACK CARTONS

LIPTON'S CONTINENTAL NOODLE SOUP

Made by the makers of that brisk Lipton Tea

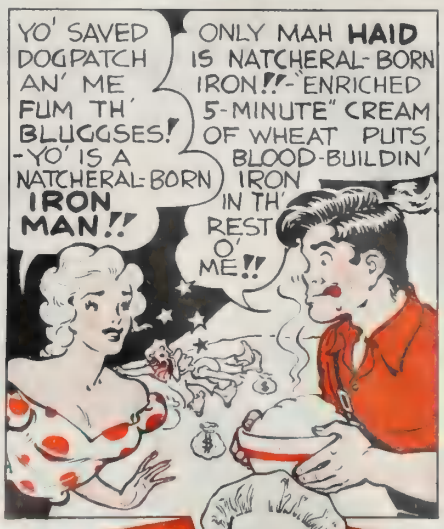
Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping



"Enriched 5 MINUTE" and "REGULAR"
CREAM OF WHEAT
The Great American Family Cereal
"CREAM OF WHEAT" AND CHEF TRADEMARKS REG. U. S. PAT. OFF.

(Continued from Page 80)

the newspaper and bringing over for me to cook."

Miriam signaled the waiter. "Martinis," she told him. "Two, and dry, if you please."

They watched him slouch away to the bar, and Miriam said:

"Another reason why I'll be glad when Dick retires is because of his stomach. All these years of worrying about other people's troubles, and of helping them to drown their connubial sorrows six days a week, is making him dyspeptic."

The waiter returned with their cocktails and a menu. They sipped, and friendliness was re-established between them. The Venetian blinds were drawn against the glare of the street. A little black cat leaped onto a shelf behind the bar and began to pick its way gingerly among the rows of bottles.

Stella asked what Dick intended to do for amusement when he retired.

"He talks about farming," said Miriam, with a laugh. "Farming! Possibly because it's the farthest removed from his present job. I tell him he'd do better to settle in some nice civilized country spot and write his memoirs. Or he could do a book on marriage, and call it Unhappily Ever After. I've got two of his characters all lined up for him—Bill Symes and his girl friend, Regan."

"From what I remember of Mr. Symes," said Stella, "I wouldn't think he was the sort to put up with unhappiness, or even with inconvenience, for very long." She tried to recall him as she spoke, but his face was blurred, then lost, among deeper memories.

"Well," said Miriam, "I've reached a point where I do believe I shall be glad to get out of the city."

"You know you don't really enjoy bugs, and bushes, and heat—and sunburn!" Stella told her.

Miriam shook her head. "I've reached the age at which one looks back and—if one is frank enough and brave enough—admits that there has been a criminal waste of time, a criminal negligence of opportunity." She frowned. "I should have had children—or I should have gone in for something constructive. As it is, I've lived the life of a happy parasite, and I feel—rather vaguely, I admit—I feel an urge toward penance."

"Is it the Martini, or are you being serious?"

"It's both. I have to be a teeny bit tight to face things. The trouble is, the mood—and the impulse toward penance—usually passes off with the alcohol. Then I feel somehow that I have accomplished something, and so return to my useless, contented, parasitic existence with a salved conscience." She glanced at her friend. "I sometimes wonder how many there are like me—women married to hard-working men, women who began by being intelligent, passionate, generous. Women who put off having kids till it was too late. Women who fiddled about with committees and boards and this and that out of sheerest ennui. Women who gave a pint or two of blood to help the war effort"—she took another sip from her glass—"women who have never really felt anything very much since they were twenty years old—or, maybe, since they were twenty-five."

"And you believe that life in the country is the answer?"

Miriam shrugged her plump shoulders. "Well, it's a symbol, at any rate. It always has been a symbol to Dick and me." She added gently, "Just as you and Alec were symbols of youth, I suppose. Of everything that is fresh and desirable." When Stella remained silent Miriam went on in a low voice: "I sometimes think of that first time I ever saw you, the evening that Alec brought you to have dinner with Dick and me at the Lafayette. It seemed as if the light, everywhere, became brighter when you two came in. Alec was carrying a book, and he quizzed me about some misquotation or other. What was it, do you remember?"

Frost at night . . . warm sun at noon—that's ideal weather for a good crop of maple syrup and sugar.

Old-fashioned real maple sugar flavor

In the maple sugar country, folks young and old love to follow the whiff of wood smoke to the sugar house . . . to enjoy that luscious treat—real maple sugar flavor.

To give you that flavor in Vermont Maid Syrup, we choose maple sugar that has a rich, full flavor. Then blend it with cane and other sugars. This blending enhances the maple flavor—makes it richer, more delicious. Get Vermont Maid at your grocer's.

Penick & Ford, Ltd., Inc., Burlington, Vermont.

Vermont Maid Syrup

Plants Grow "Like Magic"

Plants have no boarding house reach. Reach the roots with HY-GRO—13-26-13. Dissolve in water. Pour on. Plants get food at once. Amazing results. Ideal starter solution and all-season fertilizer. Ask your dealer for HY-GRO—in 25c and $1 jars. For folder write: McCormick & Co., Inc., Baltimore 2, Md.

HY-GRO SOLUBLE PLANT FOOD

A·1 SAUCE

Very good for a FISH!

Fish is a dish to balance with flavor. Add a dash of mouth-watering A-1 Sauce. It makes the family wish for fish.

Write for recipe booklet

G. F. Heublein & Bro. Inc. Hartford, Conn.

The DASH that makes the DISH

GINGERBREAD
Spring Tonic

for winter-weary appetites

It's really wonderful . . . the way golden-brown gingerbread adds spice to Spring meals. And it's a time-saving idea always to make your gingerbread the sure, quick, easy Duff way.

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

With all Duff's Mixes
Just add
WATER

PRODUCTS OF AMERICAN HOME FOODS INC.

WAFFLE · GINGERBREAD · HOT MUFFIN

Stella watched the cat as it crept along the shelf among the bottles. It was apparently headed toward the corner beside the window, where a man sat drinking a glass of beer. The cat moved adroitly, though it had a mere inch of latitude between the edge of the shelf and the crowding bottles.

Miriam finished without waiting for an answer to her question, "I'm just a teeny bit tight now, so I don't mind confessing to you that I was filled with envy for you and Alec that evening."

Their waiter came and took away the empty glasses. A train roared by on the elevated, and the cat, coming to the end of its journey, poised a moment, then leaped onto the table where the solitary man sat finishing his beer. It was Mark Bycroft, and as the cat landed at his elbow he stroked it, his profile turned for a moment toward the two women.

Miriam noticed him and caught her breath. "I don't know," she murmured. "Maybe I'm dreaming, but doesn't he look like—doesn't he remind you of someone?"

Stella glanced up from the menu. "Doesn't who remind me?"

"The soldier there in the corner by the window." Miriam stared at him. She was shortsighted, but too vain to wear glasses.

Stella followed her gaze. "Alec." The name formed on her lips.

Miriam touched her hand. "Stella, Stella dear!"

---

During his first campaign when Winston Churchill's son, Randolph Churchill, was campaigning for election, he often found it difficult to hold the attention of his audience. To make matters worse, on one occasion, in the middle of his speech, his distinguished father, in an effort to give him support, came into the room flanked by a group of statesmen. The audience rose in a body to give "Winnie" a rousing welcome. When order was restored the youthful orator with equanimity looked toward his father and his father's distinguished friends and said: "As I was saying when I was rudely interrupted ——" The audience then broke into cheers and listened intently to the end of young Churchill's speech.

---

Mark rose and turned, facing them as he walked to the bar, where he paid for his beer. He picked up his cap from a neighboring chair and went out, the door swinging after him.

Miriam said breathlessly, "He was like Alec! Heavier, of course, and I'd say older. But what a weird resemblance. Stella ——"

"I'm all right," said Stella.

Miriam gazed at her in anxiety. "I shouldn't have said anything, but he startled me so, for a moment."

The waiter came to take their order and she asked him whether he knew the name of the gentleman who had just left, the officer who had sat by the window drinking beer. The waiter shook his head. "He has come two or three times, but I do not know his name. There are so many people, they come and they go." He tugged a pencil from behind his ear. "I recommend the veal casserole for mesdames. Not too much onion—just a little!" He pressed thumb and finger together in an eloquent gesture. "And the meat so tender a baby could eat it!"

"We'll have the casserole," said Miriam distractedly.

She was afraid to look at Stella, who sat gazing at the empty table by the window. The cat had returned and was pursuing a fly round the empty beer glass. For some minutes the two women sat absorbed in their reflections and memories. But in Stella's eyes there was more than memory. And when at last Miriam dared to look at her she saw no longer the sad Pietà but a face restored and transformed by radiance.

(To be Continued)

HOUSEHOLD FAVORITE!

For handy, "see-through" food protection, you can't beat strong, pliable WAXTEX! Wrap sandwiches, cake, fresh meats and left-overs. It keeps dry foods dry, moist foods moist . . . longer!

WAXTEX

HEAVY WAXED PAPER

Marathon Corporation, Menasha, Wisconsin

No other mixer has the Advantages of

Sunbeam
AUTOMATIC
MIXMASTER
REG. U.S. PAT. OFF.

POWERFUL governor controlled MOTOR maintains automatic Full Power on all speeds. Beaters never vary their speed as batter thins-out or thickens-up, whether set slow or fast for EVEN mixing.

JUICE EXTRACTOR
You don't attach it—just set it on when wanted.

AUTOMATIC BEATER EJECTORS
Tilt the handle—out drop beaters. No pulling. No messy fingers. Easy to clean.

PORTABLE
Pull trigger and lift off motor-and-beaters for portable use.

MIXES
MASHES
WHIPS
BEATS
STIRS
BLENDS
JUICES
FOLDS
CREAMS

"Dial" YOUR FAVORITE RECIPE
MIXING CAKES . . FOLDING
MASHING POTATOES
MIXING COOKIES & FRUIT CAKES
JUICING CITRUS FRUITS
WHIPPING POTATOES
WHIPPING CREAM
BEATING UNCOOKED ICINGS
BEATING EGGS
BEATING COOKED ICINGS

Only Mixmaster has the exclusive MIX-FINDER Dial on which all the everyday mixing speeds are plainly indicated. You simply "tune in" the recipe. And you know the results will have that "success secret" of delicious foods—even, scientific mixing. Higher, lighter, velvety-textured cakes . . . creamy-fluff mashed potatoes . . . smooth-as-silk icings, sauces . . . more juice from the same oranges. No end to the time, arm-work and money it saves. See your dealer today.

On sale wherever good electric appliances are sold.

CHICAGO FLEXIBLE SHAFT COMPANY, 5600 Roosevelt Rd., Dept. 50, Chicago 50, Ill.
Canada Factory: 321 Weston Rd., So., Toronto 9. Over Half a Century Making Quality Products.

Famous for Sunbeam TOASTER, IRONMASTER, COFFEEMASTER, SHAVEMASTER, etc.

The Secrets in this Creole Sauce!

WANT to transform simple, inexpensive dishes into real creations? Like to make guests think you inherited the choicest family recipes of the Deep South? Then add this easy Creole Sauce to your bag of cooking tricks.

It's as piquant as a Southern belle — and as smooth as her velvet ribbon. It has as many whispered flavors as a Southern sky has stars. All blended by the magic of Mazola — that golden salad oil pressed from the hearts of ripened corn.

Mazola makes so many good things! Serve with your Creole treats a crackly-crisp bowl of cole slaw — crowned with the famous Mazola cooked salad dressing.

Honey-chile! Yo're doin' yo'rself mighty proud!

©Corn Products Sales Co.

HAMBURGERS CREOLE

Season 1½ pounds ground beef with 1½ teaspoons salt and ¼ teaspoon pepper. Form into cakes about 1 inch thick. Brown on both sides in well-greased skillet or under broiler. Place in baking dish; cover with *Creole Sauce. Bake in hot oven (400° F.) 15 minutes. Garnish with toast points. Makes 6 servings.

SHRIMPS AND EGGS CREOLE

Arrange 2 cups cooked or canned whole shrimps and 6 hard-cooked eggs, halved, on hot platter. Cover with *Creole Sauce. Border with rice. Makes 6 servings.

EGGS CREOLE: Use 9 hard-cooked eggs and omit shrimp.

*CREOLE SAUCE

Heat ⅓ cup Mazola in saucepan; add 1 green pepper, cut in strips, 1 cup sliced onions and 1 clove garlic; cover and cook slowly until slightly tender but not brown. Add 3½ cups canned tomatoes, ¼ teaspoon chili powder, 1 teaspoon sugar, 1 whole clove, 1 teaspoon salt, ¼ teaspoon pepper and ⅛ teaspoon celery seed; cook over low heat, stirring occasionally, about ½ hour. Blend 2 tablespoons corn starch with 2 tablespoons water and add to sauce. Continue cooking 10 minutes, stirring constantly until sauce thickens. Remove garlic and clove before serving.

COOKED SALAD DRESSING

Mix 2 tablespoons corn starch, 1 tablespoon sugar, 2 teaspoons dry mustard, 2 teaspoons salt, ⅛ teaspoon pepper, ½ teaspoon paprika and a few grains cayenne with ¼ cup milk to make a smooth paste. Add ¾ cup milk. Cook over low heat, stirring constantly until mixture boils and thickens. Remove from heat. Add 2 egg yolks, slightly beaten, mixed with ¼ cup vinegar; then gradually add ¾ cup Mazola, beating briskly with rotary beater until smooth and thoroughly blended. Chill before using. Makes 2 cups.

IT'S HAM—NO FOOLIN'

(Continued from Page 51)

from pickled crab apples, peaches or pears. Heat together until well blended. Baste the ham with the glaze. After about twenty-five minutes in a moderately slow oven, 325° F., put on the decoration—this time halves of blanched almonds for petals, 3 cloves for centers. In alternate squares use strips of angelica, or tinted citron if you like it. The strips make the leaves for the blossoms. Glaze again and bake another fifteen minutes or so.

First things come first. Like the fellow who climbed the ladder from the top down, here I am forgetting to start off as I ought to—which is so like me! To begin with, we have tomato juice in a new dress.

TOMATO-CHEESE ICE

Cream together: 2 tablespoons of sieved or grated blue cheese, 1 package of cream cheese, ¼ teaspoon of grated onion, 1 teaspoon of Worcestershire sauce, 1 teaspoon of salt, ⅛ teaspoon of pepper and 2 tablespoons of lemon juice. Add gradually 2 cups of tomato juice, blending in smoothly after each addition. Pour into the freezing tray. Freeze to mushy stage, or until all but a portion in the center is frozen. Break up and beat smooth in a chilled bowl with a chilled beater. Quickly fold in 2 egg whites, stiffly beaten. Return to the freezing tray. Freeze again until just frozen but not too hard. Serve in eggcups for an Easter touch if you have them—otherwise small sherbets are the thing.

EGG CANAPÉS

Cut bread into egg-shaped ovals. Hard cook 2 eggs for small canapés. When cold and shelled, cut slices off the curved surfaces of the eggs—enough for a small piece for each canapé. Sieve the yolks and mix with mayonnaise. Season with salt and pepper and ½ teaspoon of vinegar. Toast the "cutouts." Spread toast lightly with egg-yolk mixture. Top with rounds of egg white. Pipe the remainder of puréed yolks around the edges with a pastry tube. And garnish the canapés at one end with tiny strips of green pepper.

Interpolating the Easter eggs. The flowers in the bowl are as real as anything, but we have produced some Easter-egg flowers that no hen ever dreamed of, even on an upholstered roost. They are made this way: Hard cook as many eggs as you wish for decoration. Color in pastel shades with Easter-egg dye, or use the liquid vegetable coloring in hot water with a little vinegar added to "set" the color. To prepare the base: The cardboard cylinder on which paper towels are rolled is just the thing to set the eggs on. Cut this with a saw-edged bread knife into one-and-one-quarter-inch rings, and cover with strips of heavy white letter paper.

Now for the petals: Select a color for the petals that goes well with the color of your eggs. Our color scheme is green and yellow, as you well see. Melt 2 bars of ordinary paraffin such as you use for jelly for the petals of 6 eggs. Cool until it can be kneaded but is not set. To add the color, use a color paste. Liquid colors just will not blend with the paraffin. Use a toothpick to transfer the color to the paraffin. Work the wax in the hands like putty. This takes a little patience, as occasionally the paraffin gets too cold and stiff and must be warmed over low heat now and then. To get a real spring green, add a little yellow coloring in with the green. Go slow and don't get too much color. You can always add more, but you can't take the color out once it's in. To shape the petals: Pinch off a piece of the colored paraffin about the size of a marble. Stretch and pull it thin with your fingers into a petal shape. Think of a petal when you do it and you soon achieve one. Press it on the egg just above where it sets into the base. Do a petal at a time, overlapping them slightly—just as the petals of a rose are attached to the center of the rose. After the petals are attached you can pinch and pull them to give the finishing touches while the paraffin is still pliable.

(Continued on Page 87)

LITTLE GUY

Imperial Crystal

. . . in the Living Room

Useful, of course . . . but most important is the atmosphere of warmth, graciousness, beauty that Imperial hand-crafted crystal contributes to better living, everywhere. Choose the radiant simplicity of Candlewick or the resplendent 18th Century charm of Cape Cod . . . both were designed for living-room welcome and hospitality.

Hand-crafted at IMPERIAL GLASS CORPORATION, Bellaire, Ohio

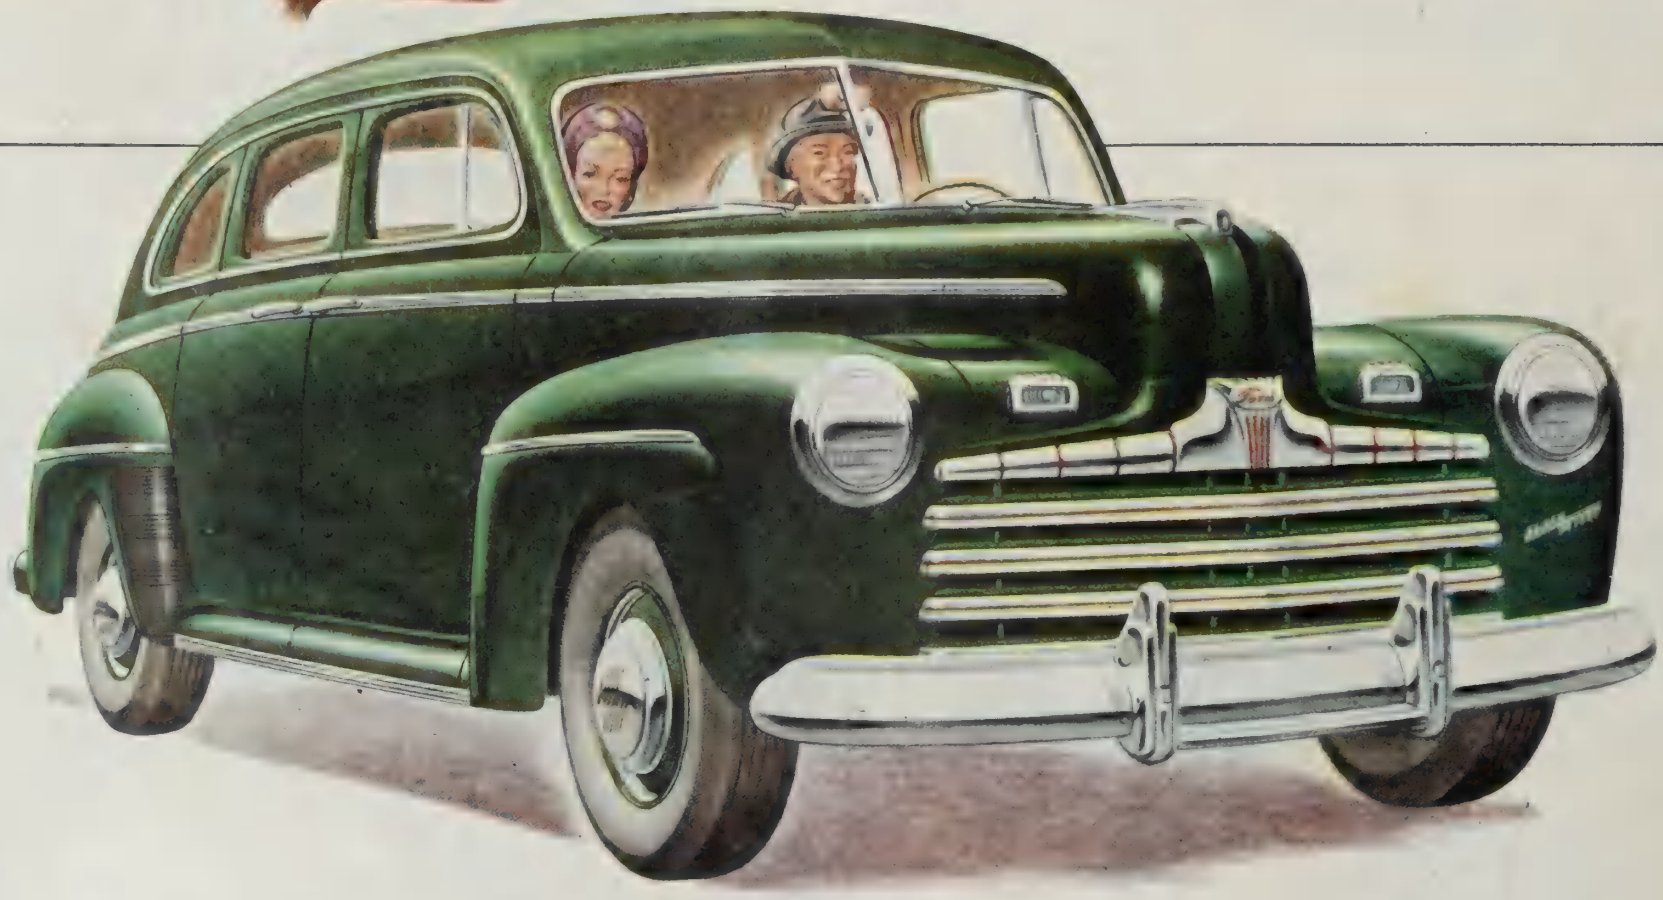
ITS BIG NEW 100 H.P. V-8 ENGINE SAYS: "Let's Go!"

• You'll want to start packing your suitcases when you own the big new Ford!



Its new 100 h.p. V-8 engine...its roomy, luxurious interior...and its smooth-riding multi-leaf springs all whisper to you: "Let's go...as far as you like!"

You'll also love the "looks" of your big new Ford...with its lower, wider, handsomer appearance!

Ask to see it at your Ford dealer's today.

TUNE IN

The FORD-Bob Crosby Show... CBS, Wednesdays, 9:30-10 P.M., E.S.T.
The FORD Sunday Evening Hour.... ABC, Sundays, 8-9 P.M., E.S.T.

There's a Ford in your future!

(Continued from Page 85)

Speaking of flowers. Did I hear some ask how to make the daffodils that garnish the ham? I thought so!

DAFFODIL GARNISH

These are easier to make than they look. White or yellow turnip can be used for the centers, thin slices of carrot for the petals. To do: Have ready a bowl of ice cubes in water. Scrape a carrot or two. Cut a long diagonal slice off the large end. Discard this, and then cut thin diagonal slices; use a vegetable peeler or a very sharp knife. The thinner the slices are, the better they curl. Drop them into the ice water and let them stand until they curl. Cut a peeled turnip into thick one to one-and-a-half-inch slices. Cut out cylinders of turnip from the slices with an apple corer. Put 5 petals and 1 center together. Secure at the base with a toothpick. Drop each flower in ice water and let chill until serving time. This will keep the petals in curl.

Now to dessert. Rolls and spiced things and all that you will see in the picture. You've heard of those before. They are old tried-and-true friends and you may play a hundred changes. But here's a dessert, one of my most favorite ones. And I could eat a lot right now. In fact, here I go to see if I can find any left over.

JELLIED APRICOT-AND-BANANA RING

Drain 1 large can of apricots. Soften 2 envelopes of unflavored gelatin in ½ cup of apricot sirup. Heat 1 cup of apricot sirup to boiling and add the softened gelatin. Stir until dissolved. Purée enough apricots through a sieve to make 2 cups. Add to the apricot gelatin with the juice of 1 lemon and ½ cup of sugar. Chill until thick and sirupy.

Make a boiled custard. Beat 2 eggs slightly. Add ¼ cup of sugar and a pinch of salt. Scald 1½ cups of milk and add to the egg mixture. Cook in a double boiler, stirring constantly until it coats the spoon. Remove from the stove. Add 1 teaspoon of vanilla and 1 envelope of unflavored gelatin softened in ¼ cup of cold water. Stir until dissolved. Cool quickly in ice water and add 2 bananas mashed or sieved.

Have a one-and-a-half-quart mold ready. Rinse in cold water. Plan on two layers of apricot and one of banana custard. Put half the apricot mixture in the mold. Chill until firm. Add all the banana gelatin. Chill until firm. Add the rest of the apricot mixture. Chill several hours or overnight. When you turn it out, garnish with apricot halves, banana slices and fresh mint, if you can get it. Serve with lemon cream sauce.

LEMON CREAM SAUCE

Whip 1 cup of heavy cream until stiff. Fold in 4 teaspoons of lemon juice, the rind of 1 lemon and ¼ cup of sugar. Chill and serve with the dessert.

So April has come. The little crocuses are up and doing. The Solomon's-seal is stealing the show. And down among the rocks the dogtooth violets are breathing the soft April air. The maple-sugar season is over and done. And so is this piece.

UNDER-COVER STUFF

(Continued from Page 5)

THREE O'CLOCK DINNER and had it accepted, thanked her colored maid and told her that if it hadn't been for her help the book would never have been written. The maid was pleased no end and told all her friends about the success of "our books." Not long afterward, at a large gathering of colored folks, she was publicly congratulated. As she told Miss Pinckney, "I took a bow for you—real graceful too."

• • •

Remember the mystery that surrounded Ethel Vance, author of ESCAPE, the famous anti-Nazi novel that came out in 1939? Who was the obviously professional writer hiding behind that bland pseudonym, and why? For three years the secret was tightly kept by the publisher. But in 1942 it came out, as you may remember: Ethel Vance was Grace Zaring Stone, author of THE BITTER TEA OF GENERAL YEN—practically the only one of the American and English women writers who had not been suspected. The explanation was that Mrs. Stone's daughter, married to a Hungarian nobleman and living in Axis territory, would be endangered if the truth were known, and it was not until she escaped that the disclosure was made. Now both mother and daughter are safe in America and both have books out.

WINTER MEETING, by Ethel Vance, is the love story of a serious-minded New England career girl with a soldier just home from overseas, a Polish boy from the Middle West, considerably younger than the girl—a Henry James character pitted against one of James Farrell's. The problem would be difficult on any count, but Miss Vance further complicates it by introducing the religious angle. . . . MORE WAS LOST, by Eleanor Perényi, the daughter, is a thoroughly delightful account of life on a Hungarian estate in the days just before the war and into the war. It all happened less than ten years ago—this life as remote from vacuum cleaners and telephones and atomic bombs as were the Middle Ages. But it is gone forever, which gives the book an almost documentary interest.

When Baroness Perényi escaped to this country, her husband remained in Europe, but her child had the good fortune—in spite of the picturesqueness of that other world—to be born on these shores.

Another mystery that kept the literary public guessing for not three, but ten years, was Joseph Shearing. Remember THE STRANGE CASE OF LUCILE CLERY, or MOSS ROSE, or BLANCHE FURY? Sinister, evil, ghostly, strange tales, several rounds up from the regulation thrillers? They were obviously the work of someone who knew England and France equally well, and had a thorough knowledge of both French and English criminology. When the author confessed (also in 1942, the year of confessions) it turned out that she had indeed all these qualifications. Joseph Shearing was Mrs. Gabrielle Margaret Vere Campbell Long, an Englishwoman who knew France only too well. She had lived in Paris as a girl, trying to support by her writing a Bohemian-minded Latin Quarter mother and an extravagant sister. To give the public what it would most surely buy, she had made a study of actual crime cases. In fact, THE STRANGE CASE OF LUCILE CLERY is the same murder that Rachel Field wrote about in ALL THIS, AND HEAVEN TOO—the murder of the Duchesse de Praslin in Paris in 1847. Edmund Pearson, expert on murder cases both real and literary, considers the Shearing novels the best of their kind.

• • •

And were we surprised—speaking of mystery stories and pseudonyms—to see Ellery Queen in person. It was at a party given by Pocket Books for the authors whose books had sold over a million copies. The award is Gertrude, a metal kangaroo.* NEW ADVENTURES OF ELLERY QUEEN *sold the required number, and when the award was announced from the platform, two men rose to receive it—a Mr. Dannay and a Mr. Lee. To our eyes they looked very much alike, both short, dark, slightly bald and wearing glasses.

• • •

Two good recent thrillers are THE FIFTH MAN, *a Tommy Hambeldon spy tale by the inimitable Manning Coles, and Robert Wilder's WRITTEN ON THE WIND, the story of a tobacco magnate's murder strangely like one that filled the papers a few years back.

■ ■ ■

THE SNAKE PIT, by Mary Jane Ward, is one of the novels that are going to cause a furor. Some persons, particularly women,

Finest promise of a perfect prom...

Finest

OUT-OF-THIS-WORLD CANAPES

Spread rounds of bread with cream cheese mixed with salted nuts; top with bread circles; fill centers with jelly.

Wrap Stokely's Finest Green Asparagus Tips in bread squares spread with mayonnaise; secure with toothpicks.

Coat pecan halves with cream cheese; press together.

And to set off these snacks in the most tempting way, garnish with bright rows of pickles. Choose the spiciest, crispest pickle chips . . . Stokely's Finest. Samples of each day's pack of these mouth-watering pickles are carefully checked at Stokely's laboratories to make sure their quality is always the Finest.

Always Delicious

Products of Stokely-Van Camp, Inc., Indianapolis

are going to refuse to read it when they hear what it is about, as they did THE LOST WEEKEND. But those who do read it are not going to be able to put it down. At the publishing house and in the magazine office where the book was being considered, editors and stenographers were reading over one another's shoulders. The galleys had to be divided so two or more could get at it at the same time. To this particular reader it is one of the outstanding novels of the season.

LITHOGRAPH BY LUIS QUINTANILLA

For those in bedlam there is no rest.

Strange as it may seem in the light of the material, we were frequently highly amused. The heroine (indistinguishable from the author) has a sense of humor that saves the situation. Which is something psychologists might look into—this matter of the sense of humor. Maybe everyone with a high sense of the ridiculous has too much imagination to be quite normal. Maybe all our best jokes are moments of madness—escape—little excursions into a world of our own. But we're getting ahead of ourselves.

The heroine of THE SNAKE PIT is beyond a doubt one of the most delightful human beings we've ever met in print. She is sharp of eye, never fooled about the creatures she is thrown in with, patient in the face of what seems to be insurmountable tragedy, but not meek. She is kind in her serious judgments, and casually generous with everything that belongs to her, little though that be. If she were the heroine of a suburban-family story or a career girl or a cause célèbre, she'd always lose out, because she is one of those unfortunates who can't manage their own affairs or other people's lives to their own advantage. (The nicest people never can.) In the particular strange world in which this novel puts her, however, she does, eventually, come out on top.

It is the story of a hospital for the mentally ill—not for the insane, we are told, but for invalids who have had nervous breakdowns. The difference is not clear as the novel progresses. V. Cunningham is one of the cases on Floor 4 when we meet her, and it is from her point of view that the story is told. Because of this angle, we identify ourselves so completely with the heroine that it becomes quite as hard for us to distinguish the dry mop from the wet mop (when both mops are dry) as for her. It is also very difficult in the laundry to be sure of not mixing the slips and the nightgowns when they look identical folded. As you see, the institution uses its inmates as household help. There is also the matter of doctors who sometimes diagnose incorrectly and are too unsure of themselves to admit it—with disastrous consequences.

Within the covers of this book exists a world that no one knows anything about who hasn't been committed into or worked in such an asylum. It answers a thousand questions that morbid curiosity has roused. It leaves no doubt in the mind that there are better institutions to be found elsewhere, and more careful treatment, and that this is by no means typical. The descriptions are never ghastly. It is the accumulation of small details, the picture of small mean people along with good-natured lazy ones, that builds up the tremendous effect. When you've finished the book you've been an inmate of the snake pit yourself. But you're out, you're free, you know what it's all about and you needn't be morbidly curious any longer. What's more, the girl herself is out, happily married, and hard at work.

• • •

Jimmy Sheean (Vincent Sheean only in print) is a tall handsome man approaching middle age. He is six feet two, with blue eyes, red hair turned white, a high forehead and unmistakably Irish cast of countenance. When his PERSONAL HISTORY came out in 1935 it was compared with THE EDUCATION OF HENRY ADAMS, as the portrait of an American against the backdrop of his times—the troubled idealism of the twentieth century in Sheean's case, the materialistic nineteenth in Adams'. Both protagonists were the sensitive articulate voices of their day. Jimmy Sheean speaks for the postwar generation: a boy still when America entered the first war, one of the gay young despondents of Paris in the heyday of the '20's, a "leftist" during the political '30's. If Scott Fitzgerald is the Soul of that generation, Sheean is the Intellect—spokesman for the between-wars intelligentsia, emphasis on politics. The first day of his first job as foreign correspondent on the Paris Herald was the day that Mussolini marched on Rome, and he has managed to be on the spot for headline events ever since: in China in 1927, in Palestine in 1929, in Spain in 1938. During the second war he was with the Intelligence branch of the Air Forces from shortly after Pearl Harbor until late 1944: in Africa, Sicily, Italy; in China, Burma and India with the B-29 operation; in Europe from the Battle of the Bulge to the collapse of Germany, which he saw, characteristically, from the front seat of General Patton's Third Army.

INTERNATIONAL

Jimmy Sheean starts for the spot.

THIS HOUSE AGAINST THIS HOUSE, dealing with World War II, is the fourth of his semiautobiographical series: PERSONAL HISTORY; NOT PEACE BUT A SWORD; and BETWEEN THE THUNDER AND THE SUN. The books that the public knows least are the ones that Sheean himself likes best. They are his novels, SANFELICE, which was Franz Werfel's great favorite, and A DAY OF BATTLE, which General Patton was always quoting. We hear that he is now working on another novel. But fact or fiction, there is always a glow over everything that Jimmy Sheean writes. Like most Irishmen, he is a romantic. Like all Irishmen, he takes sides—and passionately. Incidentally, the introduction to THIS HOUSE AGAINST THIS HOUSE is a masterful review of Europe between wars—a prelude with all the interwoven themes of catastrophe.

• • •

Fawn Brodie was writing her book about Joseph Smith, the Mormon, NO MAN KNOWS MY HISTORY, for seven years. Dur-

(Continued on Page 90)

Finest promise of a perfect prom...
Finest
MIXER FOR THE YOUNGER SET
2 cups Stokely's Finest Citrusip
2 cups Stokely's Finest Pineapple Juice
2 qts. sweet soda
2 cups crushed ice
20 Maraschino cherries
Chill juices and soda; mix together. Add crushed ice. Serve in punch cups garnished with cherries. Serves 20. Fill a pitcher with equal amounts of Stokely's Finest Grapefruit Juice and ginger ale, well iced. For a third choice, serve chilled Stokely's Finest Tomato Juice, garnished with long lemon curls. And as every young prom-trotter should know, perfect juices must be made only from the very finest fruits . . . carefully selected, carefully pressed. That's why you find rich, tangy flavor when you choose nothing but the finest . . . Stokely's Finest!
Finest
OUT-OF-THIS-WORLD CANAPES
Spread rounds of bread with cream cheese mixed with salted nuts; top with bread circles; fill centers with jelly.
Wrap Stokely's Finest Green Asparagus Tips in bread squares spread with mayonnaise; secure with toothpicks.
Coat pecan halves with cream cheese; press together.
And to set off these snacks in the most tempting way, garnish with bright rows of pickles. Choose the spiciest, crispest pickle chips . . . Stokely's Finest. Samples of each day's pack of these mouth-watering pickles are carefully checked at Stokely's laboratories to make sure their quality is always the Finest.
Stokely's
Always Delicious
Products of Stokely-Van Camp, Inc., Indianapolis

I'm so happy I waited for my NATIONAL Presto COOKER!

REG. U.S. PAT. OFF.

NOW— My Kitchen Time is Cut from Hours to Minutes . . .

"THANKS to my beautifully designed, easy-to-clean, easy-to-use PRESTO COOKER! With its exclusive HOMEC seal, it certainly makes cooking a pleasure . . .

"Just think! Now I cook asparagus or peas in 1 to 2 minutes . . . a 4 pound pot roast is ready to serve, deliciously tender, in 35 minutes . . . fried chicken in 10 to 15 minutes . . . and many other foods are prepared in comparably short times with most of their natural garden-fresh colors and flavors, vitamins and minerals retained."

NO WONDER millions of homemakers everywhere insist on PRESTO COOKERS . . . backed by 25 years of scientific research and pressure cooking experience, thorough testing and ingenious manufacturing, PRESTO COOKERS are not a war-born experiment. Three great factories are now producing thousands of PRESTO COOKERS daily. If you have to wait, you'll be happy you waited for a PRESTO COOKER—"Your Best Kitchen Helper."

TO GET YOUR PRESTO SOONER . . .

Register your order with your dealer now. PRESTO COOKERS are sold in department stores, hardware stores—wherever quality housewares are available.

LOOK for this name plate. . . . . Then, you're sure it's a PRESTO COOKER

NATIONAL Presto COOKER

FREE! Illustrated booklet. Write: PRESTO, Dept. P467, Eau Claire, Wis.

NATIONAL PRESSURE COOKER CO. General Offices and Factory: Eau Claire, Wis.

World's Largest Manufacturers of Pressure Cooking and Canning Utensils

BRANCH FACTORIES: Los Angeles, California; Wallaceburg, Ontario

Copyright 1946 N. P. C. Co.

(Continued from Page 88)

ing that time she had a husband to look out for, and a baby. She had to come in from New Haven, where they live and where her husband teaches at Yale, in order to do research in the New York public library. She had to go out to Salt Lake City to worm her way into the Mormon library, where she was none too popular. And she stayed in Palmyra, New York, long enough to read through the newspapers of the years that Joseph Smith lived in that town. (What better way to find out at firsthand what were the early influences!) But now she is through, the book is a success, and she looks fresh as a daisy. She doesn't care if she never writes another book (though she undoubtedly will): she is having her second baby in peace.

• • •

Kipling, the most popular writer of his day, has been in a slump for years, but the pendulum seems to be swinging back. RUDYARD KIPLING, the new biography by Hilton Brown, may have had something to do with it, but we're inclined to think it's a matter of you can't keep a good man down.

Though you'd never sense it from the hearty optimism of his stories, Kipling was a tragic little figure as a boy. Born in India, he lived there until he was six years old—in the midst of palms and sacred cows and snakes and monkeys. He knew Hindustani better than English, and with his Hindu ayah he'd go day after day into the crowded bazaar. There he'd see priests and magicians, and birth and death and sex. Being English and of the ruling class, he was a little sahib and he knew what that meant too. The tragedy fell when at six he was transported from this florid jungleland to cold, bleak England and put into the care of strict middle-class Victorian relatives, who at once suspected and distrusted the queer foreign child. For five years he was disciplined, punished, terrorized and bullied. Once he had a placard "liar" on his back when he went to school. The result was a nervous breakdown during which he nearly lost his eyesight. When his mother came home from India in alarm and went up to see him in bed, he is said to have put up his hand to ward off a blow.

COURTESY N. Y. TIMES

Mr. Rudyard Kipling Takes a Bloomin' Day Aht, on the Blasted 'eath, Along With Britannia, 'is Gurl.

The end, of course, is a happy one. Kipling eventually, at seventeen, went back to India, was alive once more, wrote exuberantly for seven years, and at twenty-four had published DEPARMENTAL DITTIES, PLAIN TALES FROM THE HILLS, SOLDIERS THREE, UNDER THE DEODARS, THE STORY OF THE GADSBYS, THE PHANTOM RICKSHAW, WEE WILLIE WINKEE—quite enough output for any writer in a lifetime. If you've forgotten how good a storyteller he is, reread WITHOUT BENEFIT OF CLERGY; and if they don't already know them, read THE JUNGLE BOOKS to the children from cover to cover.

• • •

Jim Corbett, author of the fascinating MAN-EATERS OF KUMAON, is another Anglo-Indian. But his parents never made the mistake of sending him to England. In fact, he never saw England until he went there as a soldier in World War I. Mr. Corbett lives in Kumaun, in Northern India, close to the jungles, the mountains, the natives and the tigers, and from all accounts no one could be better adjusted to his environment. He is one of the great hunters of the world, but his interest is not in the kill. It is in the wild life of the countryside itself, where he has spent a lifetime of prowling and watching and listening. This book of his is not a sportsman's tale. It is a detective story: the highly intelligent trained spy out to catch the murderer—in this case the man-eating tigers who in certain cases have individually killed up to four hundred victims in a given small area. The detective-hunter makes note of a broken twig, a flattened blade of grass. He disguises himself by imitating the call of a bird or the howl of a monkey. It's hair-raising and it's wholesome, and we recommend the book as pure escape—special emphasis on the nervous and the overworked. Christopher Morley gives another reason for reading it (in his review in the Book of the Month Club News): "I suppose it would be silly to import a sex angle . . . but even as most man-eating tigers are female, most Corbett-reading enthusiasts are likely to be male. . . . I suggest that the Man of the House take it off to his den. It will teach or suggest a lot, in a very quiet way." And we add: let the Woman of the House get at it first!

If tigers can make literary news, so can alligators. There are four articles necessary, it seems, to catch an alligator, and one of them is a book. The other three are a telescope, a pair of tweezers and a snuffbox. The procedure is as follows: You sit on the bank of a wide sluggish river, reading a dull book. It is so dull that as you read you fall asleep. At this point the alligator slowly oozes out of the slime, approaches you, sees the book and starts to read it. He in turn finds it dull and he, too, goes to sleep. But when he does so the book falls out of your lap. This wakes you. You take your telescope and look at the sleeping alligator through the wrong end. Then you take the tweezers, pick up the alligator with them, and put him in the snuffbox.

• • •

Maggie "Owen" Wadelton has a new book out, SARAH MANDRAKE. But the thing to keep in mind about this little Irish-girl-grown-up is her two earlier books, THE BOOK OF MAGGIE OWEN and MAGGIE NO DOUBT. These gems have been neglected—her own child journals, one written in Ireland, rich, horsey, heavy-drinking, debonair Ireland upon which the child looked with complete objectivity; the other in New York of 1908, where she lived at the Plaza Hotel and went for treatment at the "Prespaterian" Hospital. "This is a great large town full up of wonders no doubt. I came into it with a great weariness upon me and was put into me bed. When I waked I peered forth and beheld the image of a gold gentleman mounted on a gold horse with a gold angel striding before him bearing a gold branch. 'Tis a United States saint no doubt." (She was looking down on the statue of General Sherman at the entrance to Central Park!) . . . It's Maggie Owen's son, Tommy Wadelton, who, while still a child, wrote the two books, MY MOTHER IS A VIOLENT WOMAN, and MY FATHER IS A QUIET MAN.

• • •

There's another Irishman in the current book news: AND THAT'S NO LIE is the life story of John Lenihan, written by Beatrice Bill Talbot*. John Lenihan was born in County Roscommon, spent his youth in the stable and on the race track, and came as a young man to Boston, Massachusetts, where he has lived the past forty or so years. "I wouldn't go back to Ireland for a million dollars," says he.*

Ham, Ham -Beautiful Ham

Easter time...
Peace time...
Ham time...

Yes, and it's beautiful to see that rosy ham more often at your meat store, to serve it more freely on your table.

But as we welcome back good tender ham, let's not forget it offers more than a flavor we've been missing. There's protein in ham (and the protein of meat contains all of the amino acids which are essential to life). Remember too that ham is especially rich in thiamine (vitamin $B_1$).

Handsome Ham is here again!

ACCEPTED AMERICAN MEDICAL ASSN. Council on Foods and Nutrition

This Seal means that all nutritional statements made in this advertisement are acceptable to the Council on Foods and Nutrition of the American Medical Association.

AMERICAN MEAT INSTITUTE

Headquarters, Chicago · · · Members throughout the U. S.

WARTIME LESSON

Hoover peacetime service continued on a 48-hour basis during the war. That built new respect and friendship for the Hoover Cleaner. Before buying any appliance, ask yourself if it has an honest service behind it.

SEE IT. . . The new popular-priced Hoover Cleaner is a greater value than ever in beauty, in features, and cleaning ease. Worth waiting for by those who want the cleaner that's preferred two to one over any other make.

Cleaning tools plug in easily here!

THE HOOVER

REG. U. S. PAT. OFF.

IT BEATS • AS IT SWEEPS • AS IT CLEANS

THE HOOVER COMPANY, NORTH CANTON, OHIO
HAMILTON, ONTARIO, CANADA

ALL MEN LIKE RED

(Continued from Page 29)

coverings in neat, translucent coils, and red beets cooked in half the time. It saved gas. But Brent liked inspired food: a pinch of ginger in his hot cereal, and sherry and cream beaten into his baked sweet potatoes.

"I was never one for dressing up good food," Aunt Fanny vetoed. "There's no need for it. Things should taste as they're intended."

And because when she first came Abigail thought her a temporary guest, she made concessions. Anyway, with no maid, and Aunt Fanny in the kitchen, it seemed the thing to do. So the creamed asparagus went unwed to shrimp and the stewed chicken lacked its saffron.

"I used to look forward to my meals," Brent complained.

"But, darling, the vitamins are still there," Abigail assured him.

And of course that was only food.

There was the matter of the red pillow, quilted and placed by Aunt Fanny's own hand in a corner of the mist-blue sofa in the living room. "Brings it up!" she said with satisfaction. It did. Brent preferred muted, low-key tones, and the pillow was the color of an old-fashioned suit of red wool underwear, and practically as assertive as Aunt Fanny herself.

And of course there were other things, like the flowers they bought in winter. Before you had a chance to moon over them, or say "I'll fix them!" Aunt Fanny had them rammed in the tallest, narrowest-necked vase she could find, and Brent was gasping, "They're choking me! I can't breathe!"

But most trying of all were the daily steers. The guidance in matters of general living. The movies they were talked out of, and the ones they were talked into, and the radio programs—the endless radio programs! Aunt Fanny's favorites carrying every precinct by the impact of sheer forceful argument.

Brent got cagey and gave her a little radio of her own, but she preferred the one in the living room. "Not that the other isn't nice," she hastened to assure him. Aunt Fanny was always appreciative. "But I like being downstairs. There's something about a family circle; people enjoying the same things together." So Brent borrowed the little radio and sat in his bedroom, until urged down by a flood of infectious, warmhearted vigor: "Brent! I say, Brent! Do come and listen to this, will you?" As if he couldn't possibly get it on his own, until Brent, who was fundamentally sweet, came down, and from then on it was a steady run with Aunt Fanny at the dial.

PROGRAMS utterly foreign to Abigail's and Brent's tastes became household topics—spiced with human-relations problems read aloud from the daily papers. Unseen Adviser, and Dorothy Dix, and Mr. Alexander pushed world affairs into second place—though they had their turn too. Aunt Fanny was fair-minded. But the intimate side of humanity interested her most, and Brent was drawn without will into discussions of judgments on recalcitrant young and the unhappily married.

There were, however, sides of Aunt Fanny that had no flaws: like her cosseting for petty ills; her readiness with a needle, and her prompt rallying if an enemy struck—she was always loyal. And she enjoyed Brent's humor—what she understood of it.

"She presents a conflict," Brent admitted, and demonstrated a picture of a man slowly being destroyed by it. "She's lovable, but if she'd spend only four or five weeks, say, and then come back again."

The voices under Abigail had withdrawn to another corner of the garden, but still carried.

"Roses like to be in a bed alone!" Aunt Fanny's voice was dogged.

This struggle about the roses was an old battle-scarred affair dating back to the first spring she'd come. Boiled down, it was simply her effort to get Brent to move three blue

BEST RUG RUINED

Just ONE application of HEX would have saved it!

*Don't let this happen to your rugs . . . it's so easy to have proven protection with HEX!

THOROUGH! Hex liquid mothproofing penetrates right into every wool fiber. Scientific tests prove that moths absolutely will not harm fabrics treated with Hex!*

QUICK! Just one quick and easy spraying of Hex on woolens gives them lasting, proven moth-protection. No unpleasant odor! No storing away necessary!

ECONOMICAL! One bottle of Hex will protect hundreds of dollars' worth of woolens. Buy Hex at your hardware, drug, variety, or department store today!

A KOPPERS PRODUCT

Brighten Your Home with

MYSTIC FOAM

The Modern Cleaner for

UPHOLSTERY, RUGS AND FINE FABRICS

Comes ready to use. No muss, fuss or dust. Safe...won't burn or explode, non-poisonous. Dries in 30 minutes—can't leave rings. Has no odor and leaves none. Used by airlines, railroads and famous hotels. Don't confuse Mystic Foam with products having similar names, or with "something you once tried." If your department, hardware, paint or grocery store doesn't have Mystic Foam or Mystic Zip, he'll get it for you—or, send us his name and address.

THE MYSTIC FOAM CORP.
Cleveland 14, Ohio
The Mystic Foam Co., Los Angeles 5, Cal. International Waxes, Ltd. Toronto 6, Ont., Can.

IN CANS OR BOTTLES

Try Mystic Foam's Kid Sister . . .

MYSTIC ZIP

★ Cleans walls, woodwork, venetian blinds, etc. No mixing... no rinsing... no drying.

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

ADVERTISED IN AMERICAN MEDICAL ASSOCIATION PUBLICATIONS

MYSTIC FOAM

Cleans So Well So Easily . . . and for So Little delphiniums he liked as a backing for his Pink Radiance rosebushes.

Abigail saw his face: distressed forehead, chin elongated, eyes harassed. He was much too thin. His good frame was becoming just that—not a picking on his bones. It wasn't all Aunt Fanny; he'd always been slim, but she wasn't helping. He couldn't relax; couldn't even potter among his flowers without argument. Something had to be done, and soon!

As if to seal the matter, Abigail turned away and looked out her front window and saw Harvey Higgins, the district superintendent of schools, walking up the road. Mr. Higgins lived two blocks farther on with his mother. It was he who pleaded for living quarters for the art teacher, Neila Davis, last autumn, and looked distressed when Abigail refused. Though for the matter of that, Mr. Higgins usually did look distressed, because he wore his flat brown hair too long, and his spectacles had a way of sliding down his nose, making his eyes clutch at them. He was older than Brent and unmarried, and he admired Neila very much—which was a little funny, because he was so self-effacing, and Neila Davis had glamour.

Abigail considered the tall, stalking figure, then made a dash for it. "Mr. Higgins! Mr. Higgins!" she called, a little breathless from her canter. "Has Neila Davis found a place for this coming fall?"

Harvey Higgins really had a nice face if you studied it; the trouble was, nobody did. But it grew depressed at her question and his glasses slid a little farther down his nose from the shake of his head.

"No," he said. "And what she's going to do, I'll not tell you," and he looked so cooperative, you knew he would if he could. "Those people where she stayed were impossible. They fried onions practically all the time."

The most insignificant man can be complete if he works within the limits of his capacities, innate or acquired; but even fine talents can be obscured, neutralized, and destroyed by lack of this indispensable requirement of symmetry.

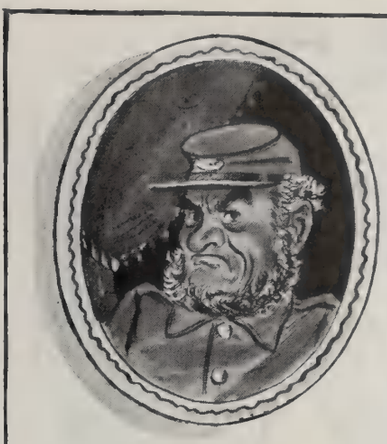
—From Maxims and Reflections of Goethe, Translated by Bailey Saunders. (Published by the Macmillan Company)

Abigail looked sympathetic. "The reason I asked," she said, "I was thinking I might have a room this fall."

"Oh, Mrs. Spears!" The gratitude in Mr. Higgins' nice gray eyes was really lovely.



It was done. She'd tell Brent that night. Aunt Fanny could still visit. Besides, it would be fun having a young girl around to liven things.

Just the same, Abigail had the most curious feeling as she opened the screen door and went into her house. As if maybe in getting Aunt Fanny out she had let trouble in, had laid the setting for a human-relations problem of her own. Sort of a Nemesis on Aunt Fanny's behalf. What if Neila and Brent —— But that was absurd! Just the same, uneasiness brushed her until Aunt Fanny came sailing in from the garden snorting over her bout with Brent.

"Delphinium in a rose bed! When roses like to be alone!"

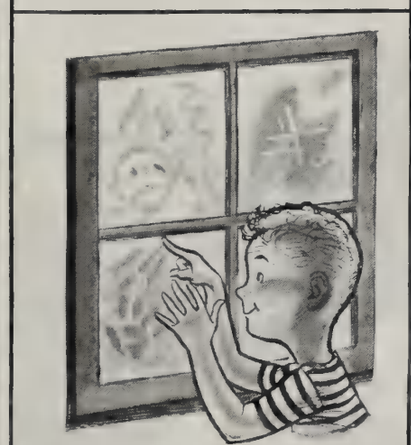
No, it was much better this way! It was Brent's home, and Aunt Fanny was financially independent. She could live in the same town with her stepsister Sue and some of her friends. And she'd always be welcome to visit, but she couldn't stay and take over.

The beginning of August, Abigail wrote Aunt Fanny a carefully worded letter stressing the room shortage, civic interest and the need of the Wynston public-school system. It was tactful and affectionate. It mentioned missing Aunt Fanny's presence, and stated how the little sewing room had been fixed up for at least an expected month's or six weeks' visit whenever she chose—its size precluding a longer stay. It even went so far as to speak vaguely of a future when rooms would be

Grandpa had a dirty face—
His photograph, I mean . . .



A spray of Windex on the glass
Made Grandpa shining-clean!

Mother's lipstick's such a mess!
At least, it used to be . . .

Till Windex made her mirror bright
So she could really see!

Finger marks upon the pane
Speak of Little Brother . . .

Windex whisks 'em right away,
"It's wonderful!" says Mother.

Spray it on and wipe it off—
Windex is a dream!
Cleans your glass so easily,
And makes it really gleam!

Get Brighter Windows Quicker With—

WINDEX

Trade-Mark Reg. U. S. Pat. Off. by The Drackett Company

WINDEX is a must for house cleaning! No streaking, no film, when you insist on this noninflammable, oil-free cleaner. Don't trust cheap substitutes!

Costs less than a penny per window—even thriftier in the big 20-ounce size.

COPR. 1946 BY THE DRACKETT CO.

TOONERVILLE FOLKS by FONTAINE FOX

Think of serving an authentic spaghetti dinner in just 12 minutes cooking time! Saves hours of shopping, hours in the kitchen. Everything is provided in one handy carton.

The sauce is already prepared—a famous chef's own special recipe—seasoned to perfection for the American taste.

Children adore Chef Boy-Ar-Dee Spaghetti Dinner—the whole family goes for this hearty, appetite-tempting "Meal of the Week."

Here's Spaghetti in
The Grand Manner
Ready in 12 Minutes!

One handy Chef Boy-Ar-Dee carton supplies everything needed for this glamorous spaghetti dinner:

1—An 8-ounce package of choice durum wheat spaghetti.

2—A large jar of Chef Hector Boiardi's* own incomparable spaghetti sauce.

3—A canister of special, ready-grated Parmesan style cheese.

Cook spaghetti in salted boiling water for 12 minutes. Meantime, let the sauce heat slowly. Drain spaghetti. (Its high gluten content means no excess starch, so rinsing is unnecessary.) Arrange spaghetti and sauce on platter, and sprinkle over with cheese. Serves three or more persons generously.

* Pronounced BOY-AR-DEE plentiful and no demand made on the Spearses—a happy but remote state of affairs.

Brent okayed it and they both waited for the answer; waited a little anxiously. They didn't want to hurt Aunt Fanny; they cared for her. But Brent insisted what they did was right as rain. Certainly Brent looked better, just as he had last year after Aunt Fanny left. He ate his meals with zest and whistled as he pottered around the garden, evenings. It was nice, too, turning on any old radio program you liked, though at first they found themselves listening to Aunt Fanny's favorites from habit, and giggling as they turned them off again.

Aunt Fanny's reply came and held no rancor. She would come on a visit sometime, and had taken a room at the Hawthorne Inn, two blocks from her friend, Mrs. Turner, and four from her sister Sue. Abigail actually forgot her, getting the guest room ready for Neila Davis.

Then Neila came!

Afterward, Abigail thought about it step by step, the way you go back over things, hunting the mistake in what you did; trying to locate the first blunder, as if that helped after it was made.

In the first place, she should have had misgivings when she saw how lovely Neila was close-range; remembered her feelings when she decided to get Aunt Fanny out—but she didn't. Neila Davis had the sort of youthful glow that leaves anyone a little older thoughtful. She was tall and beautifully thin, with a clean chin line and a throat like a foal. Her hair was dark, and her eyes deep blue, and the planes of her face exciting. She wasn't artificial. That's where the trouble lay—because of Brent's taste.

She arrived joyously, the way she lived, full of silver mercury about everything. "You're wonderful to take me," she said gratefully.

Brent smacked his forehead, pretending to be dazzled; so Abigail threatened. "Hands off, wolf! The little gal's Higgins'!"

"Harvey's doing well by himself."

"She's not really Higgins'. He just wishes she were."

"No doubt."

To You

BY ELEANOR COLE

If we had never met you'd go your way
And live your life without a thought of me.
And I'd have spent this breathless fleeting May
Dreaming of love unknown, joy not to be.
I should have pictured you just as you came:
Tall, with fitting rhythm and a grace;
Gently loving, proud and calm of frame;
Laughter at the corners of your face.

My dearest love, God must have painted you
Inside the hidden galleries of my mind
On canvases of childhood's early blue;
He must have led us both; taught us to find. . . .
For you are all I ever hoped to see
When Love's sharp echo first awakened me.

She was nice in the house. Abigail liked the quick run of her feet on the stairs. Her cheery "Hello." Her "oh's" and "ah's" over her meals. She liked the same foods Brent did. Borsch with dill and cloves, sorrel in omelets. She clicked with them both; but then, she would with anyone.

At first the guest room had a way of surprising Abigail with Neila in it. She was only reasonably tidy, but gay in her carelessness. She put up her own French-nude curtains that coated things warmly, propped a drawing board and sheaf of water colors against one wall, hung a batik scarf over a chair—usually heaped with books—and jumbled the bureau with make-up mirror, accessories and perfumes. Her desk was cluttered with art objects: an ivory-filigree goddess, a curled jade leaf and a moon-colored bowl. And often as not the negligee, filmy and dark, that wrapped her long thin body like the wind, trailed from the foot of her bed.

The room had been very different with Aunt Fanny. You could justifiably call the arrangements portraits of two women—and not be wrong. And with all the customary contradiction of life, Aunt Fanny's—though she made no claim to color sense, or the artistic—would have received first award; for without attempt, assembled for her needs, hers, oddly enough, had the quality of lasting beauty.

The white starched curtains, Aunt Fanny's choice, let in pure winter sunlight that touched her quietly as she sat quilting her strong, bright-colored stuffs, her reed basket at her feet. Her bent, white head, under an ivy's green tendril from a glass ball above, focused the neatly framed photographs on the walls: her parents, her home and her friends, revealing in pictorial sequence her continuity of living. Two daguerreotypes on the bureau added value, and a painted china tray, an inlaid box, the blue velvet pincushion with its filet medallion, the cruet-shaped perfume bottle and the ebony-backed, silver-monogrammed brushes and mirror; and so did the church calendar, the thermometer and her fat, well-used Bible on her desk. Even with Aunt Fanny out of the room, it still presented a study with her empty rocker and her sewing boxes. Of course detached picture value was the only esthetic advantage Aunt Fanny had—so it was nice she had that.

But Abigail was thinking a lot about Aunt Fanny these days, and the reason for this thinking started one morning at breakfast.

Neila had a man-size appetite for such a thin, young thing, and Abigail had gone to the kitchen to scramble more eggs when she heard the laughter in the dining room, Brent's and Neila's, sounding in such perfect sympathy she hurried back wanting to share it.

But neither offered an explanation, and Abigail found she couldn't ask, because in its being withheld she felt suddenly as if a door had been shut quickly in her face, excluding her. And right then, with nothing more than that, Abigail was unsure in her own house.

A singular thing to have happen from the sound of two people's spontaneous laughter, but that was the way it was. And almost in the same instant she thought of those courts of human appeal and Aunt Fanny. The situations in them arose from setups exactly like this.

After that things were evident. Maybe they had been before and she hadn't noticed. Now she did. Now she felt the excitement burning in Brent like a bed of coals under everything he did. The way his voice raised, his restlessness when Neila came in, and the silence, the stillness that fell on him when she went out again.

She wasn't sure about Neila. Wasn't sure she even saw what had happened. She seemed as natural as the day she came. Abigail studied the clear, definite coloring of the face across the table at meals. She was only five years older herself, but the contrast let her down. Made her fix her hair without a bang, try another lipstick, wear her daintiest aprons with ruffled heart-shaped bibs. Made her force smiles and affectionate interest, just as Aunt Fanny's columns advocated—only Brent didn't see.

COMPARE

ORDINARY PALE GRAVY

Like this

With this

DEEP BROWN GRAVY

Made with

KITCHEN BOUQUET

Gravy makes the difference in a dinner. And Kitchen Bouquet makes the difference in the gravy—all the difference in the world.

Simply make gravy, stews, meat pies, etc. your usual way. Then add Kitchen Bouquet. See it add deep brown color right before your eyes. Taste how it brings out the true taste of meat—magnifies its flavor.

Use Kitchen Bouquet every day. Get a bottle today at your grocer's.

It Makes the Gravy

—RICH, BROWN, DELICIOUS

ONE OF GROCERY STORE PRODUCTS CO. QUALITY FOODS

Thinking it over desperately, she saw she was largely to blame. She had gone out of her way to make Neila one of them. Arrested her flight upstairs with the evening paper, urged her to play the radio and read downstairs. And she'd begun the movie-going herself.

"There's a good picture, Brent. How about it, Neila?"

"I'd love it."

It was fun, the three of them ruffling a first windfall of leaves over to the neighborhood movie and back. Once she couldn't go herself—a friend telephoned the last minute she was coming—but she packed them off anyway, not wanting to spoil the plan, thinking nothing of it.

And so it grew, until a rainy night with Neila by the fire meant stimulus for Brent: talking about color and fabric, light and shade; talking about anything or nothing, just to be with her. And Abigail, sitting in the shadows, feeling wornly familiar and obscure.

If Neila had only had a beau! But there was no one around but Harvey Higgins, and Harvey was too much diffident to call. All of which made Abigail think painfully of Aunt Fanny.

Then the high school gave its annual fall art exhibit. And Neila asked Brent the night before if he'd go up and advise.

"We'll only be a little while," she promised. So Abigail was left with the dishes and an empty house. "I'd urge you along, but you'd be bored stiff. It's fairly juvenile. But I thought Brent might have a suggestion for arrangement."

Abigail knew she should have said, "I wouldn't be bored. I'm coming," and grabbed a coat. But she couldn't. A sense of helplessness paralyzed her. If Neila had been deliberately making a play, she could—could have fought and kicked back—but the girl didn't even see what was happening. Abigail was sure of it now; Brent just liked Neila!

Modesty: The gentle art of enhancing your charm by pretending not to be aware of it.

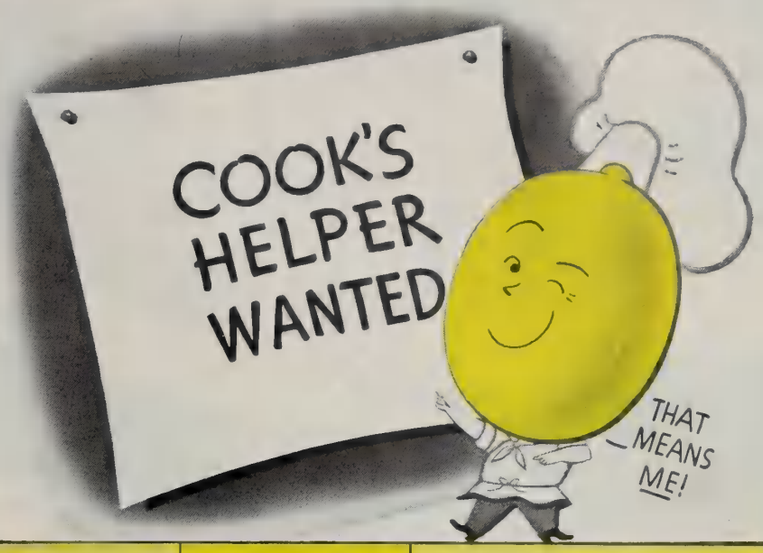
—OLIVER HERFORD: Quoted in Modern Humor for Effective Speaking: Edward Frank Allen (Citadel Press).



That night Abigail wrote Aunt Fanny. After the last Minton cup was polished and hanging on its peg, she sat down at the Windsor desk in the living room with an eye on the clock. Neila's "little while" had stretched to over an hour!

Abigail remembered suddenly all the homely interests Aunt Fanny and she shared through two winters and springs, and her pen scratched with feeling: "My biggest bird's-nest fern got a yellow streak down one side." (Just like Brent!) "And two of the jars of early applesauce we canned fermented." (Like my life is.) "There's talk of the junior choir getting white robes." (I'll die and wear one, too, if Brent stops loving me.) "And oh, yes, Mr. Teasel, the carpenter, was asking for you. He still talks about the sugar cookies you fed him." (I wonder if Neila feeds Brent flattery?)

It was a longer letter than she intended, because she couldn't bring herself to write about what troubled her, and she needed to; needed to desperately. The human spirit can stand only so much alone; at least hers could. So she kept on writing, looking at the clock now and then. Brent and Neila had been gone two full hours, and so she drew closer to her letter for help.

"Our guest is young and pretty. She's an artist, so naturally Brent finds her very congenial. They have a lot to talk about. Tonight she took him to the high school. She's having an exhibit and wants his opinion." Then suddenly, in a hand that got a little out of control, she added, "I miss not having you here this winter."

She stopped and pressed two fingers tight against her eyes. They came away wet. Assertive Aunt Fanny might be, but she was loyal. And it was a beautiful quality! She hadn't minded her anyway. It was Brent who had.

| THE FOOD | THE PROBLEM | THE ANSWER |
|---|---|---|
| FISH | "How can I give it a livelier taste?" | Easy! For real savoriness serve with garnish of fresh lemon quarters. (To eliminate cooking odor rub fish with lemon juice before baking, broiling or frying.) |
| SALADS | "Why don't my salads taste fresher?" | Simple! Just use fresh lemon juice as sour ingredient in any dressing (To make mixed greens crisp, add lemon to ice water.) |
| JUICES | "Can't I do something about the flat taste?" | A dash of lemon juice gives that refreshing "zip" that all canned juices need—fresh orange juice, too. Always serve with easy-to-squeeze lemon quarters. |
| DESSERTS | "What can I serve they'll all like?" | Mmmm! For a real sensation—Lemon Meringue Pie! FREE Sunkist Recipe Book gives 10 lemon pie recipes. Sunkist, Sec. 204, Los Angeles 55, Calif. |
| VEGETABLES | "Same old thing—where's the flavor?" | A little lemon juice, added after cooking, brings out all the fresh flavor of green and root vegetables. For a special flourish try serving with lemon butter. |
| TEA | "How do I add tang to our tea?" | Presto! You can see tea respond to fresh lemon—changing from brown to a clear gold that brings out the real bouquet and flavor. |
| VITAMINS | "We want all the vitamins we can get!" | Lemons are an excellent source of vitamin C—good source of $B_1$, "P". They aid digestion—help alkalinize the system. So keep a good supply on hand, always. |

Sunkist Lemons in trademarked tissue wrappers are the finest from 14,500 cooperating California and Arizona citrus growers.

FOR GOOD HEALTH AND GOOD FLAVOR

Sunkist

California Lemons

Add sliced bananas, sugar and cream to golden-good Nabisco Shredded Wheat. There's a breakfast that sings with "happy morning" goodness! Delicious—yes! And brimful of nourishment, too! For Nabisco Shredded Wheat is wholesome whole wheat—just steamed, shredded and baked.

Serve it COLD

it's delicious either way

Serve it HOT

Crumble biscuits, dot with butter. Pop under the broiler—and ah-h! out comes the family's favorite cereal, a brand-new, HOT breakfast treat! Because Nabisco Shredded Wheat can be served HOT without cooking—can be served a different way every morning in the week—it's the "breakfast planner's joy"! For the original Niagara Falls product, always ask for Nabisco Shredded Wheat.

The cereal you can serve a dozen ways

One of the many fine foods baked by Nabisco
NAtional BIScuit COmpany

"It's lonely without you," she finished, overcome.

Three days later a small package arrived from Aunt Fanny. It contained a set of antimacassars crocheted in ecru for the living-room furniture. They were a little coarse in texture, but Abigail fastened them on the sofa and chairs almost fiercely. Let Brent say one word! Just let him dare! But he didn't even notice them. For her part, she found a curious solace in having them. She found thinking went better on the sofa with her cheek against one and her hand on another. Aunt Fanny still cared for her, if Brent didn't.

Then Aunt Fanny answered her letter. Abigail felt let down. She didn't know exactly what she expected, but certainly not what Aunt Fanny wrote.

"Young life is always so nice in a house," she said. "Doesn't the girl have a beau? You ought to get her one. Four can have such jolly times together."

Then suddenly Abigail understood. This wasn't Aunt Fanny; it was Dorothy Dix, Unseen Adviser and Martha Foster rolled in one; it was Mr. Alexander and Anne Hirst working through Aunt Fanny. Aunt Fanny was only the conduit. Anyway, their combined advice was sound. She'd taken this thing sitting down. Just accepted it. And inertia never got you anywhere!

Abigail spent the rest of the morning thinking, and by noon called Mr. Higgins in his school office, her hand tight on the receiver—not through awe of Harvey Higgins, but if he turned her down, what then?

"I think," Abigail said with forced sprightliness, "it would be nice if you would have dinner with us tomorrow night. We could have some rummy afterward. . . . Oh, you don't play cards? Well, then we'll talk."

Mr. Higgins was delighted.

She told Neila and Brent at dinner.

"How nice," Neila cried, not caring; but Brent quirked an eyebrow. "Did you say Higgins?"

"I did," Abigail said evenly.

Mr. Higgins came, shy and amiable, and Abigail, in winter-blond crepe, left him to Neila, who was like something painted for autumn, in rust wool, and started her steak and mushrooms. But dinner wasn't launched before she got a bird's-eye view of everything. Harvey Higgins was on the outside—as she was. The little boy at the pantomime while Brent and Neila put on the show together!

ABIGAIL grew angry. Higgins had no right to be so grateful for nothing. With his glasses in place he was extremely pleasing in a sideline sort of way. He ought to hold up his chest and compete. It began to look as if having him were a mistake; as if he were nothing but a foil for Brent's animation. But she wasn't being fair. Harvey Higgins was trying.

"Your exhibit was a resounding success," he said, his eye on Neila.

"Thanks to the gentleman on your right," Neila said, fixing hers in turn on Brent. "Putting the big sketches along the side was his idea. And it added so much."

"Oh, nonsense," Brent said, looking delighted. "It was all your idea."

You pat my back, I'll pat your back! Desperately Abigail broke in. "How clever. Trust Brent!" (If you could—she couldn't. And not being able to was making a beefsteak of her heart—raw, without mushrooms.) "Have you read anything good lately, Mr. Higgins?" she asked.

"Let's see." Harvey reflected a minute. "Why, yes. I just finished a biography of Robert Schumann."

"Oh, really! I've been dying to read it!" Abigail cried. She hadn't even heard of it, but Brent and Neila weren't going to chatter, chatter, chatter, about art, feeling, nuance and light, as if there weren't anything else in this world or the next to talk about. "We'll have coffee in the living room," Abigail said, and swept them away from the table. "Your mother raises the most heavenly chrysanthemums. I love looking at them when I pass." But her little rockets fizzled and went out because Harvey wouldn't hold them up. He was too content to sit and look at Neila.

"I've had such a pleasant evening," he said, in leaving.

Have you? I haven't! Abigail wanted to say, but said, after he left, "Isn't he attractive?"

"Nice chap," Brent said indifferently.

THEN, deliberately as a cat stretches claws out of a round soft paw—a bad-natured cat—Abigail added, "Such a dependable personality! I mean there's nothing show-offish about him. No talking for effect. Just quiet and genuine!"

Brent looked offended.

But Abigail, starting to clear away the dishes that always wait when there isn't any maid, thought, You deserved that! Not that giving Brent what he deserved helped. Nothing helped. Certainly Aunt Fanny's advice hadn't. She'd given herself a lot of trouble for nothing, and Brent must see through it like a transparent wrapping.

A former congressman confessed that although he was always forgetting their faces and never remembered their names, he had no difficulty being pleasant to his constituents while in the House of Representatives.

"When I meet someone in the lobby, whom I do not know from Adam, and I see he expects me to know who he is, I take him warmly by the hand, look straight into his eyes and say, 'And how is the old complaint?' I have never known it to fail."

The next afternoon, around four-thirty, Mr. Higgins showed up with Robert Schumann and a bunch of his mother's chrysanthemums. "I hope you'll enjoy the book," he said, listening with rude hopefulness to the sounds overhead. But Abigail wouldn't call Neila down. Instead, she took a mean satisfaction in entertaining Harvey alone, just to teach him a lesson for not making more of an opportunity when it was given.

She put his flowers in water when he left, and set them on the dining-room table; stuck a few in a squat little green bowl to offer Neila, then changed her mind. Why on earth give flowers to a girl who was taking your husband! So she put them on her own dressing table instead.

Neila admired those on the dining-room table.

"Mr. Higgins brought them for me," Abigail said with satisfaction. "He's so sweet!"

Brent and Neila looked unmoved. Nobody cared what she thought! It was hopeless! So hopeless, Abigail wrote Aunt Fanny another letter:

"It's certainly nice having Neila in the house. Married people grow so stale. I had a Mr. Higgins for dinner last night. I liked him, but Neila didn't. Brent's more her type, I guess."

Aunt Fanny's reply came done up again in a Joseph's coat of personal-problem stamp: "Glad you liked Mr. Higgins—since Brent likes the teacher. What's sauce for the goose, you know! Have you bought any new clothes lately?"

That same evening, Mr. Higgins dropped in again. He was on his way to a lecture at the Baptist church. "I thought you people might enjoy it. Someone just back from Tokyo." He looked disappointed when he heard Neila was chaperoning a school dance and Brent was in town, and started edging for the door, but Abigail, remembering Aunt Fanny's goose, said:

"I'd enjoy it."

Mr. Higgins looked surprised, but took her along.

The lecture was good and there was a reception afterward with layer cake, salted peanuts and fruit punch. Abigail almost enjoyed herself. It was midnight when she got home, and Brent was in bed, but not asleep.

(Continued on Page 98)

LOOK WHO'S HERE

Let this appetizing picture of Pineapple Upside-down Cake remind you to make this wonderful dessert soon . . .
with Dole Sliced Pineapple.

To make a Fruit Cup inviting and delicious, include Dole Sliced or Chunks cut into small pieces.

Yes, Dole Pineapple products are returning to civilian life . . . to give their distinctive flavor and golden goodness to your salads, fruit cups, gelatine dishes, cakes, pies, puddings and ices . . . to garnish your baked ham and broiled chops . . . to brighten every meal you serve!

Serve Dole Pineapple Chunks
"as is." The goodness stored up in each one of those spoon-size cuts is amazing.

Plan to revive the happy habit of drinking
Dole Pineapple
Juice at breakfast and every time
you are thirsty.

Of all pies, none is more luscious than a Pineapple Meringue Pie made with Dole Crushed Pineapple.

New way to end PERSPIRATION WORRIES

1. A new type fluffy-light cream that stops underarm odor, checks perspiration safely.

2. Easier to use—goes on quicker—disappears at once. Leaves no sticky film.

3. Will not harm your clothing. Antiseptic and soothing to use in underarm areas.

4. Economical—gives more for your money than other leading brands. Buy Etiquet today at any toilet goods counter.

10¢ AND 39¢ plus tax

it's Etiquet

Formula Patented. No other like it.

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

(Continued from Page 96)

"Out with Neila?" he yawned, as if uninterested, but not fooling her one minute, just wanting word of Neila to dream on.

"No," she said; adding after a moment's thought, "Out with Harvey."

"Harvey?"

"Yes. Harvey." And not the rabbit! she was going to add, then drew in her neck. "Harvey Higgins," she said, and her manner implied Who else? and she went into the bathroom and cold-creamed her face.

"Well, did everyone have a nice time last night?" Brent asked at breakfast, with a great show of impartiality.

"So-so," Neila smiled. "Chaperoning's one of those things."

But Abigail, remembering Aunt Fanny, only smiled enigmatically. She looked at Brent for the effect, but he had started his morning paper.

That evening the household went to the movies and Abigail trooped along feeling unneeded and annoyed. When they got back they found on the doorstep a book with a note in it for Abigail.

"Oh, it's from Harvey," she said softly, trying to sound involved.

The book was Anything Can Happen, by the Papashvilys. And the note said, "I hope you enjoy it. H.H."

Abigail tucked the note back in the book, then reconsidered and took it out again. Later she saw Brent flicking the leaves, and his manner when he didn't find it was disappointed. And right then she knew! Saw what she was doing! She was a fool—not to mention Aunt Fanny and the whole human-relations crew! She was airily juggling dynamite. Giving Brent the idea she had a crush on Harvey Higgins. Handing him a valid reason to side-step himself; even leave her—if he chose! And just the thought of life without Brent overwhelmed her so she crept silently to bed, waiting until Brent slept to weep weakly in her pillow.

Two days passed full of growing aloofness from Brent; an aloofness caused by nothing you could lay a finger on, which made it so much the worse, because, salted down, it simply meant Brent didn't care any more, and didn't mind showing it. Then Sunday afternoon, when she was alone, Harvey Higgins dropped in with a remarkably lovely chrysanthemum he'd raised himself. A big, single-stemmed variety.

"I put a paper bag over its head cold nights," he explained proudly.

Abigail had been in the kitchen feeling low. Dinner had been a strained affair, so strained she was hard put to keep from sniveling afterward; in fact, her eyes were moist when Harvey rang the bell, and in wiping them she got a lash in one and couldn't get it out. She came blinking to the door and admitted Harvey and received the chrysanthemum.

He watched sympathetically while she stood on tiptoe, leaning close to the hall mirror, unsuccessfully trying to get the lash out. "Maybe I can," he volunteered finally.

She went to a living-room window then, while he bent over her, his back to the front door, and just as he fished the lash out with a corner of his immaculate handkerchief, Brent walked in.

It did look compromising. Abigail knew it did. Harvey's back bent over her, as if he might be kissing her. She saw Brent's face. His disdainful, "so-that's-the-lie-of-the-land" look.

But she smiled at Harvey and said, "Thank you." Then said to Brent, "Harvey just took something out of my eye." But Brent had disappeared upstairs, tossing an indifferent "Hello" over the banister.

Harvey didn't stay long, and right after he left Neila came flying in and out, bent on a supper invitation. So Brent and she had a supper of cold cuts. After it, she joined him in the living room, where he stopped pacing to look truculently at the filet antimacassars.

"Where'd we get those?" he demanded.

"Aunt Fanny sent them," she said; adding pointedly, "They've been there three weeks," and wished she hadn't.

Brent didn't answer, just switched on the radio. There were some moments of garbled static, then a judicial and kindly voice said, "Now as I understand it, you say your home is being destroyed by your husband setting you aside for a younger woman, and that he has seized a mistaken attempt on your part to recapture his attention by an innocent flirtation, as an excuse to divorce you?"

"Yes, sir."

Brent got another station. But back of Gabriel Heatter's pleading for better grooming, Abigail felt faint. It was horrible and prophetic! It was her situation on the wall, and the handwriting in a nutshell! It was what she got for listening to Aunt Fanny and her whole pack of human-problem hounds!

But Brent, still pacing, said, "I had a note from Aunt Fanny."

Abigail's mouth was dry. What had Aunt Fanny said? What had she dared to say!

"No particular news. I answered it. In fact, I invited her down. I thought she might be company for you. You could meet her in Philadelphia Thursday."

She didn't like it. It sounded casual, sounded merely suggestive, but back of the sound she knew it was planned! The high school had a holiday Thursday, plus a week end, and Neila would be away! It was too convenient for everyone!

Abigail went somberly to meet Aunt Fanny. Something was in the wind! Brent was too withdrawn. Why should he think she'd need Aunt Fanny for company—unless he were going to desert her? What if he and Neila —— The myriad voices, hesitant and distressed, came back over the radio to the click of train wheels: "There was another girl." "My husband left me." Neila said she was going to stay with friends—but was she?

Aunt Fanny, looking the same, wispy-haired, fiery-eyed and commanding, kissed Abigail soundly, said she looked peaked and took her to a hotel. They shopped next day, saw a show Abigail didn't like, spent the night, then took the train and a taxi home.

Abigail gave Aunt Fanny her purse to pay the taxi and let herself feverishly in the front door. She fled up the stairs, prompted by something her heart told her was not well. In the upper hall she stopped. The guest-room door was wide, and Neila and her possessions gone! Gone to the last trinket. Not a trace of her presence left except the faint, pale scent of her perfume.

Abigail got into her own room; the note, insignificant in appearance, but monumental in effect, would be on her dressing table. It was! She saw it, startling, white and oblong, across the room. She held it in trembling hands, feeling the past fall clean of the moment; all life a broken, ashen thing, starting from now. Then she read:

Sweetness: Don't scalp me. I got rid of Neila. Too much extra work for you. Too many outsiders around. I'd rather have Aunt Fanny.

Love, BRENT.

P.S. Neila's taken a room at Higgins'. Harvey's mother agreed. I asked her. B.

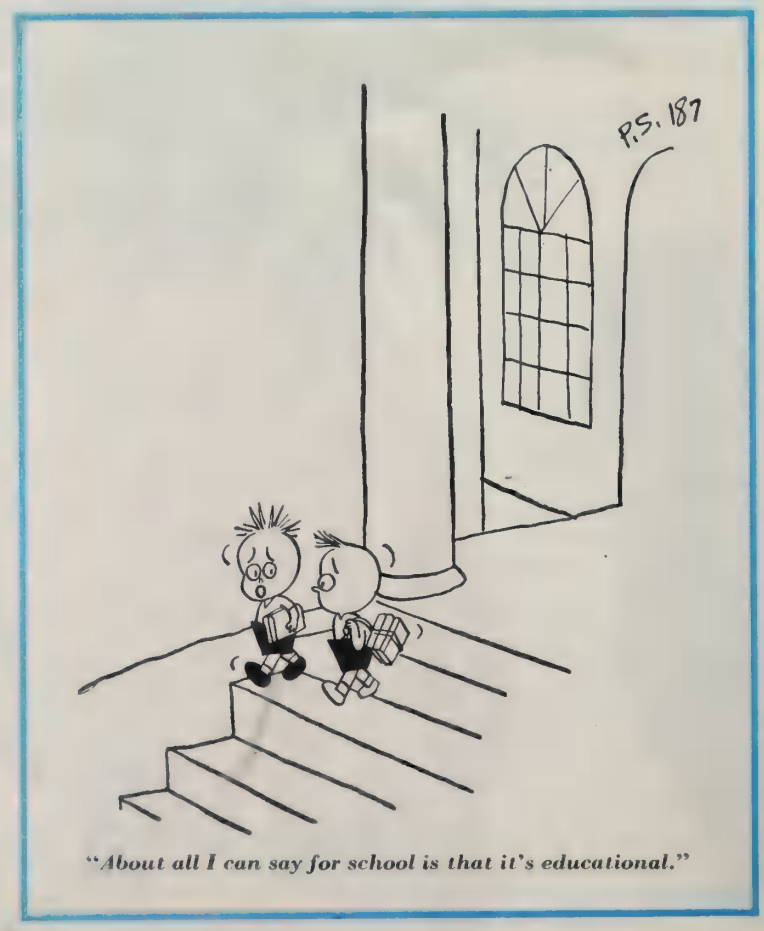
Abigail stood dazed, flooded with relief, not understanding. Then she heard Aunt Fanny's confident tread mounting the stairs and enlightened memory returned. Brent said Aunt Fanny had written him a note!

"Aunt Fanny—our guest's gone! Brent got rid of her. Aunt Fanny, what did you write him? Brent said you wrote him a note."

The high lights in Aunt Fanny's glasses obscured her eyes, her smile was cryptic. "What I wrote Brent? Let me see. I believe I asked him to be sure and mulch Mrs. Turner good—that lily named for the woman whose daughter ran off with another man. Then I think I did say, 'Who is this Mr. Higgins Abigail's writing so much about?' And I asked how Brent was; was he well and happy himself?"

Abigail's laughter rose. Aunt Fanny should have a human-relations court herself! She was wonderful!

But the front door had opened below and a voice called up, "Anybody home?" And it was Brent. Abigail took the stairs and Brent caught her halfway down. "I missed you at the station by a sixteenth of an inch." His arms held her fast. "Mind what I did?" his lips against hers.



"So glad," she sighed.

Aunt Fanny beamed down from above.

"Hi, Aunt Fanny," Brent called up. "Welcome for the coming winter!"

Aunt Fanny smiled genially, but shook her head. "No, Brent, just for a month. I rented my room at the inn for the winter, so that would be poor economy. Besides, Mrs. Turner wants me to help her quilt a set of chair covers."

Abigail looked at Brent and Brent looked back. Their home was their own again. It was then Abigail remembered that the solving of one problem presents another, but she couldn't think of another problem right now. Couldn't think of anything except how happy Brent and she were going to be with just each other in their own home!

"About all I can say for school is that it's educational."

derly down beside the toaster. "Gotta be careful they don't escape. They're nervous," he said.

"What you got in there?" asked Big Bill.

Billy lifted a corner of the box and peered. "Look," he said proudly.

His father applied a doubtful eye to the crack, and drew back hastily. "Billy, I don't think ——" he began.

"Now, don't jump to conclusions," said Billy, lifting a piece of toast. "These aren't just common ordinary rats at all. They aren't city rats."

"Rats!" Kay whipped her skirts around her knees. "Rats!"

Billy kept one hand protectingly on the box. It began to heave slightly. "I got 'em at school," he said. "They had them for biology and honest, mom, they're trained. They're the smartest rats you ever saw. They're pedigreed too. They're foreign rats!"

The really successful husband or wife is formed in the first four or five years of childhood.

—DR. ALFRED ADLER.
Quoted in Delineator.

Kay was outside the door now. "Billy Walsh," she said, "I don't care what nationality they are, you can't have them!"

"Well, look, mom, they were going to kill them. And they're so intelligent—they're trained. They're the best little things. They won't be any trouble at all."

"Oh, they won't!" Her voice was not very enthusiastic.

Big Bill retired from the field and made a business of pouring milk.

"And just what did you plan to do with them?" asked Kay.

"Why can't we take them to the country? They'll love it." He added, "There's lots of room. I'll fix them a house. They're a pair."

"That's all we need to take with us," said Kay. "A pair of trained rats."

"But honest, you'd like them if you'd get to know them."

"Billy," she said, "our own Connecticut rats ate up my best down puff last winter. We have all we can do to keep them from moving over from the neighbor's barn in droves. So you think it would be nice to take an extra pair to add to the trouble. There's no use arguing. No rats."

"Aw, gee, mom—they're especially affectionate rats."

"No rats," she said.

Billy looked at his father, and then sighed. "Well, can I just let them spend the night? I'll take 'em back to school tomorrow."

"They can't spend the night in a shoe box," she pointed out. "They'll be all over the apartment in ten minutes."

"I can put 'em in the laundry tub. The drainboard'll keep 'em from coming out."

"That's fair enough," said his father.

Kay retired. "I don't feel comfortable with rats in the kitchen, even transient rats."

She could hear the two men discussing the points of the rats. Big Bill laughed. Billy laughed too. The icebox door opened and shut. She got undressed, cold-creamed her face.

Billy stood in the door. "Do you hafta do that? You look like a zombi. Say, can I have some shredded wheat for them? They're hungry." His eyes were large and wistful. Kay nodded and he said gently, "Thanks."

"They are pretty smart," said Big Bill, coming in later. "They really do tricks."

Kay laid down her hairbrush. Her mouth quivered. "I don't see why I have to have a guilt-sense," she said, "just because I won't raise rats. Rats carry things," she said. "Beriberi or something. They eat down puffs. And you make me feel I'm simply terrible, just because I ——"

"Hey, take it easy," said Bill. "You're just tired out from packing. I stood by you, didn't I?"

"You did not," she said. "You just ate and drank and then played games with them!" She got in bed and turned her face to the

(Continued on Page 103)

NOW! Get GREATER RELIEF from

CORNS

THANKS TO BLUE-JAY with Pain-curbing Nupercaine!

GRAND NEWS for corn sufferers! Improved Blue-Jay, only corn remedy activated with pain-curbing Nupercaine, gives gentle, effective, prompt relief!

Blue-Jay's Dura-felt pad stops painful shoe pressure instantly! Then gentle medication loosens core of corn; you just lift it out!

SPECIAL BLUE-JAY for LITTLE TOE CORNS

Most corns are on little toes, so ask for the new specially-designed Little Toe Blue-Jay. Flesh-colored, inconspicuous, no bulk or bulge, and activated with same anesthetic Nupercaine as Standard Size.

Also special Blue-Jay Pads with medicated disks for soft corns between toes. Why not do as thousands are doing?

INSIST ON . . .

"America's Largest Selling Corn Plaster"

For more serious foot ailments, see a chiropodist

A product of

BAUER & BLACK

Division of The Kendall Company, Chicago 16

Valerie's Boss led her quite a mad chase

— But GAYLA HOLD-BOBS kept her hair-do in place!

■ Invisible heads, rounded-for-safety ends, long-lasting, springy action make Gayla Hold-Bob pins America's favorite brand.

Gayla

HOLD-BOB

BOBBY PINS THAT HOLD

COPYRIGHT 1946
GAYLORD PRODUCTS, INCORPORATED ■ CHICAGO 16, ILL.

"Yes!" say her feet

Time simply flies for her now. She can accept every invitation, keep busy every minute. She says Selby ARCH PRESERVER shoes worked a miracle by ridding her of foot fatigue.

But it's no miracle. It's the business of these three famous features, found only in genuine Selby ARCH PRESERVER shoes:

- steel arch bridge for firm support
- individually placed metatarsal pad for comfort
- perfectly flat innersole for comfort-plus

$8.95 to $12.95

Slightly Higher in Western States and Canada

Emmi

Gwenn

Allure

Selby ARCH PRESERVER Shoes

SUIT BY FALKENSTEIN

PHOTOGRAPH BY JOHN RAWLINGS

SELBY FIFTH AVENUE at 38th St., New York City, and Your Leading Shoe and Department Store

Manufactured for women by THE SELBY SHOE COMPANY, Portsmouth, O.; for men, E. T. WRIGHT & CO., Rockland, Mass.

IN CANADA, MURRAY-SELBY, LTD., LONDON, ONT. • IN ENGLAND, SELBY SHOES, LTD., LONDON • IN AUSTRALIA, SELBY SHOES (AUST.) LTD., SYDNEY • IN NEW ZEALAND, SWINTON & OATES, LTD., AUCKLAND • IN ARGENTINA, ALBERTO GRIMOLDI, BUENOS AIRES

SELBY SHOES THE WORLD OVER—ESTABLISHED 1877

Copr. 1946, The Selby Shoe Company

SELBY ARCH PRESERVER SHOE

(Continued from Page 101)

wall, where there was a very bad and discouraging crack. Then she turned back and said, "And you can get your own breakfast. I'm not going out there and make toast over the heads of two pedigreed rats."

Bill rattled the window. The street noises came in, so much louder now the war was over. He said, "He'll have them out by morning."

There was silence until Bill got in his own bed and turned out the light. Then Kay spoke in the darkness. "Bill," she said in a low tone, "Bill!"

"H'm?" he murmured.

"Bill, do you think he's—retarded?"

"Huh? Who? Retarded?"

"Billy. He's too old to play with rats. Maybe we haven't brought him up right."

"Nonsense, he's sound as a nut," said Bill comfortingly. "He may be a little slow developing on account of going to progressive schools so long, but he'll get over it. Take it easy. Don't worry so." There was another silence. Then Bill spoke thoughtfully. "Kay? Some fellows just naturally like animals all their lives. It doesn't mean anything. It's normal."

"You mean Billy might be a lion trainer?" Kay sat up.

"Well, no. He could be a veterinarian," Bill said.

On this comforting note, Bill began to make those whoofing sounds and Kay got up and went to the living room to relax her nerves with The Norths Meet Murder.

The next day she did the last-minute errands. Fresh oilcloth and thumbtacks and a new mop and a typewriter ribbon for Bill. They were leaving Saturday morning—if they were still alive, she thought. Billy reported by phone that Pal Sam had taken the rats. It was settled for good.

She came home at half past five and found Billy there, standing in front of her mirror and tying a bright blue tie. His face was absorbed, his eyes wide and intent. He tied the tie, untied it, tied it again, drew it off, selected another from a pile beside him on her dresser, and craned his neck to get a good view.

"What are you doing?" asked Kay, dropping armfuls of bundles. It seemed to her she was always asking him what he was doing.

"I'm tying my tie," he said truthfully.

"But you're all cleaned up!" She was dazed. "Before supper." Then she sank down on the couch and took off the worst shoe. "Billy, you had a haircut! No wonder you looked queer."

He gave her an indulgent look. "I'm going out," he said, "so I just thought I'd clean up the old chassis a bit and do a retread on the spare tire."

"Going out?"

"You know," he observed, "you're kind of getting the habit of repeating everything a guy says. It's not such a sharp idea."

"You're not going to go out and eat hot dogs again tonight and break in the gym?"

His smile was definitely kind but superior. "Well, not that," he said, tying the tie a fifth time. "Pal Sam and I are dating a couple of slick chicks from Central Park West."

"Oh," said Kay faintly, "oh, Billy."

"Now take it easy." He sounded like his father. "We haven't got matrimony in mind. We're going to Lou's shack for supper, and then ankle down to Fifty-seventh Street to Jake's. They got a hot trumpet there."

"Is Jake one of the boys I don't know?" She asked.

He laughed. "Jake's," he said, "is the best night club in this end of Manhattan."

"Billy! You aren't planning to go to a night club!"

"Pal Sam has already been there. We can get cokes and dance and listen to the hottest, smoothest trumpet—the guy really gives."

"But Billy ——"

He came over and regarded her earnestly. "Little woman," he said, "you been at me and at me to move in the social swim. Right?"

"I only thought ——"

"You been talking about how sharp it is to stagger around to a slick ch——"

"Billy, I wish you could just say girl!"

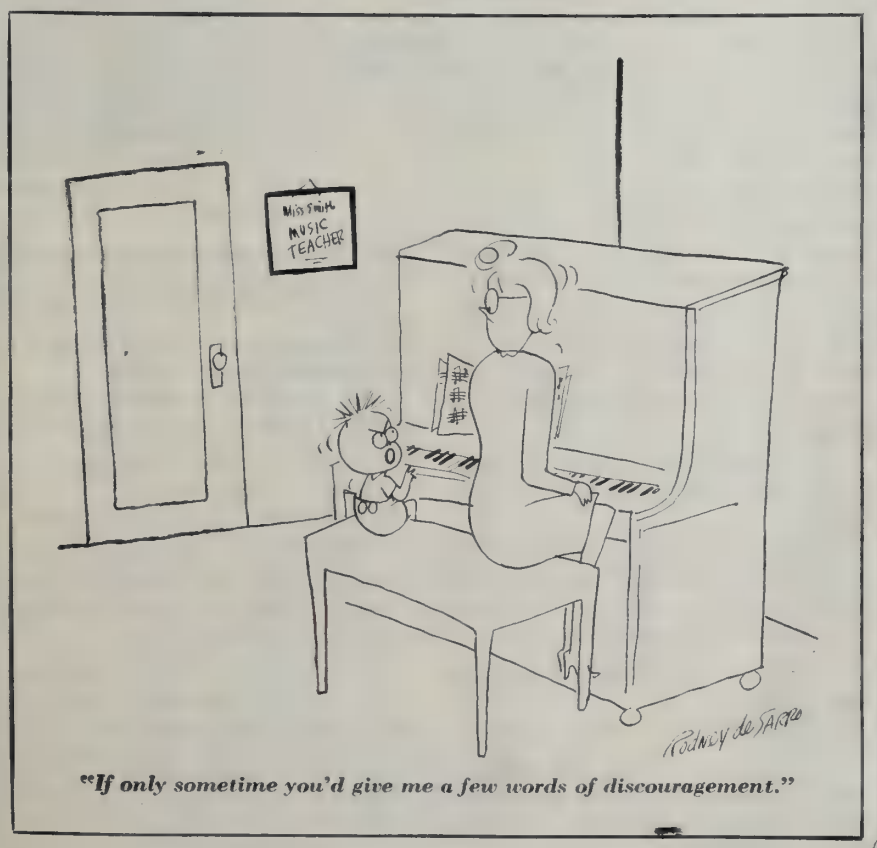
"You know what I mean anyway." He grinned. "One of those walking Chanel Number Fives. Right?"

"I don't think your father ——"

"He won't be old-fashioned if you aren't," said Billy acutely. "He's interested in my music. When I can sit and drink cokes and listen to the hottest trumpet ——"



"Who are these girls?"

"Oh, just some juniors from school, daughters of idle housewives like you. Not dingy at all."

Kay gave up. "Will you be in early?"

"Definitely. My white man's burden has to get in by one. Or else." He was at his tie again, and, knowing very well the battle was over, began to sing "We strolled the lane together; laughed at the rain—together——"

Kay went out to think it over. Where did he pick up all that horrid language? His new strange manner seemed to spring full-blown

"If only sometime you'd give me a few words of discouragement."

"I kept nylons like new 4 years with Lux!"

says JEANNE MURRAY

"These nylons were bought in Oct. 1941—and I'm still wearing them, thanks to Lux!"

Your new nylons will give you wonderful wear, too, with Lux care.

Scientific strain tests proved Lux cuts down runs over 50% in rayon, silk, lisle stockings. Nylons, too, showed amazing results. Identical stockings washed with a strong soap or rubbed with cake soap popped into runs quickly.

Over 90% of the makers of all stockings advise Lux!

Soap contains vital materials. DON'T WASTE IT!

STRAIN TESTS SHOW
STOCKINGS LAST TWICE AS LONG WITH LUX!

BURLINGTON'S
NEW TWIN Zephyrs
FEATURING VISTA-DOME CARS
Between CHICAGO and ST. PAUL-MINNEAPOLIS

● When the Burlington introduced America's first VISTA-DOME car in July, 1945, this promise was made—"if the public likes the VISTA-DOME idea—the Burlington plans a fleet of these cars for the future."

It didn't take long to find out that the public did like the idea of riding in a "penthouse on wheels." Not since the Burlington introduced America's first diesel-powered, streamlined train, back in 1934, have we seen such immediate and widespread enthusiasm.

And so—America will enjoy another "first" in modern transportation—two new diesel-powered, stainless steel Zephyrs, each of which will have five VISTA-DOME cars. These new trains are being built now. In design, construction and appointments, they will symbolize "the last word" in modernity. In terms of spaciousness, conveniences and luxurious comfort, they will surpass even the present Twin Zephyrs which they will replace in regular service between Chicago and St. Paul-Minneapolis.

So look forward to an utterly new travel thrill—to the day when you can enjoy a penthouse view as you glide along Burlington's scenic Mississippi River route "where Nature smiles 300 miles."

BURLINGTON LINES
Everywhere West
CHICAGO, BURLINGTON & QUINCY RAILROAD • COLORADO and SOUTHERN RAILWAY
FORT WORTH and DENVER CITY RAILWAY • THE WICHITA VALLEY RAILWAY
BURLINGTON-ROCK ISLAND RAILROAD
AN ESSENTIAL LINK IN TRANSCONTINENTAL TRANSPORTATION

Way of the Zephyrs
Burlington Route

from nowhere. And his easy nonchalance—that was new too.

He came out presently, dressed in his best new clothes, and he looked suddenly tall and broad-shouldered—the pads helped—and terribly grown up. His hair was brushed. His hands were clean. He had a spotless handkerchief peeping from his pocket.

"Got any cabbage?" he asked.

Kay motioned to her purse mutely. "I don't know what there is."

"There's sixteen dollars," he said. "A ten, a five and a one."

"Take it all in case of an accident," she said. "But five ought to be enough."

Billy gave her a self-conscious peck on the cheek and went off singing loudly, "I'm Chiquita Banana and I've come to say—Bananas have to ripen in a certain way ——"

Big Bill was pleased when he came in. "Now you can just relax, darling," he said. "He's off for the races."

"I don't like the idea of a night club He's too young."

"But opportunities foramusementin New York are so limited," he said seriously. "They can't go to the movies forever, or walk up and down Times Square. Now in a small town, the way we were raised, you could do so many different things."

They had a dinner of what Kay called odds and ends. The icebox had to be cleaned out. There were one fish cake, one lamb chop, a box of frozen peas, some cream cheese, three dead carrots. They had to have both applesauce and peaches for dessert.

"I'll be glad to get to Connecticut," said Bill. "where we eat regular."

THEY went to the neighborhood movie, stopped in at Child's for a snack and came in around eleven-thirty. There was no sign of Billy. They went to bed.

Kay couldn't sleep. She wondered whether Billy had good manners with the other sex.

She went back over the time he had measles. She wondered what time it was. She looked. It was one o'clock! She got up and looked out the window. The street was dark and big. It was an enormous city. She thought with sudden panic that she didn't even know the names of the girls. Where was Billy? He ought to be in. What had happened? She felt rising terror and went in to shake Bill awake.

"Bill," she said, "it's half past one!"

"Well, he'll be in any minute," Bill said. "Just go on to sleep. Nothing to worry about."

She got in bed obediently and lay rigid, seeing assorted accidents to Billy happening all over town. Before long, Bill got up and went to the living room and lit a cigarette. Then he was standing beside her.

"Where was he supposed to go?"

"Somewhere to hear a hot trumpet," said Kay, sitting up.

"I just wondered. I was just curious," said Bill.

Time went on. At three o'clock Kay and Bill were both up. "I think we'll have to call the Missing Persons Bureau," said Kay, walking up and down.

"Now just be calm," said Bill. "Everything's all right."

"All right? At this hour? At his age?"

"What was the name of the place with the trumpet?"

"Oh, I don't know. I was thinking about it being his first date and all—and oh, Bill, we don't even know what kind of girls they went with! For all we know ——"

"Now the thing to do is just take it quietly," said Bill, his voice unsteady. "Just to make you feel better, I'll phone the police and sort of explain things to them."

Kay said, "There's been an accident, I know it!"

Bill said, "Now just take it easy. After all, he's just out a little later than ——"

"It's ten minutes of four," Kay pointed out.

"With some harmless boys and girls ——"

"Girls!" said Kay bitterly. "I wish I'd never heard the word 'girl'!"

"But you've been saying ——"

"I know it! I was just out of my mind, that's all. I wish he'd play with Pal Sam all his life, that's what I wish! He can have those old rats for all of me—if he only comes home safe!" And Kay fell on the couch and began to weep.

BILL gave her a desperate look, then strode to the telephone and lifted the receiver. And as he dialed for the police, the door opened and Billy walked in.

"Gee, what's the matter?" he asked, staring in amazement at his parents. "You sick, mom? Something wrong?"

Big Bill slammed down the receiver. "Where have you been?" His voice was cased in ice. "Do you know what time it is?" He began to shout.

"Boy, do I!" Billy dropped his coat. "Boy, what a time!"

Kay sat up and stared at her son with a feverish look. "Billy Walsh," she said, her voice choking, "I suppose it means nothing to you that you've driven your poor parents completely crazy ——"

"Gee, mom, you mean you were worried?" He was astounded.

"Worried!" She flung out her hands. "Worried!"

"I was just calling the police to put in a missing-persons report," said Bill.

"Heck, I haven't been missing," Billy explained. "I've been right there all the time. I'll say I have. I couldn't get out!"

"What do you mean? Why didn't you come home at a decent hour?"

Billy sat down. "I'll tell you all about it," he said patiently, "if you give me a chance." He crossed his legs. He laughed. "It was funny at that," he said. "You see, we messed around for a while and then went to Jake's where this guy has the ——"

"Skip the trumpet," said his mother.

"Well, so we sat and had cokes. Six of us. We had ten or twelve cokes, I expect. We wanted some sandwiches, but they cost too much. And we had to have something to stay at the best front table. So after a while Bimbo—that's the other guy—had to take his date home, so they left. So Bimbo said

(Continued on Page 106)

Here Comes Spring

By Marjorie Lederer Lee

Here comes Spring
in a daisy-sprinkled dirndl
and open-toe sandals
and a wide straw hat
swinging from her arm
like a basket of flowers;
what does Spring do to look like that?

Where does Spring go
when she goes to have her hair done, all done up
with a little green spray?
It couldn't be Charles,
and it couldn't be Antoine.
What's the address, and how much does she pay?

Sure, I know that it really doesn't matter,
and dreams like that are so much tripe!
Even if I went they'd say:
"Sorry, Madam.
You-haven't-got-the-features-and-you're-not-the-type."

I'm not Spring
in a daisy-sprinkled dirndl
and open-toe sandals
and a wide straw hat
swinging from my arm
like a basket of flowers.
And that's why they'd never do my hair like that.

He's home again! Nothing like American women! No colors like Revlon "American originals" to idealize American beauty!

Take it from a man! Revlon's new color

"Bachelor's Carnation"

breaks all the rules!

Nail Enamel • Lipstick • Face Powder

"The handsomest things!"
"Bachelor's Carnation" Match Box set 1.75 Face Powder 1.00 Plus Tax

What's this? The one color that defies convention—imaginative— like the new fashions! A capricious carmine . . . with a tender passion . . . plucked from the heart of his carnation . . . turns siren on your matching lips and fingertips. And suddenly . . . it's spring! "Bachelor's Carnation" Face Powder breaks all the rules, too.

PHILCO

...the greatest refrigerator of all time !

Compare and judge for yourself

(Continued from Page 106)

She must also face the unpleasant fact that successful women are not always the most admirable; that in driving to the upper income and prestige brackets they may lose some of the warmth, humor and time for fun. Many a woman holding a less remunerative, less conspicuous job as kindergarten teacher, district nurse, town clerk is more fulfilled as a person, more beneficial to the community.

In moments of weakness the woman at the top eyes with envy the occasional leisure of the housewife, the unharried after-hours of the less executive female, the joys of total family life. The moment passes. She realizes that wanting what you don't have is an old human custom. She made her choice long ago—and her regrets are not deep-seated.

Life is like a bed. If it is insupportably uncomfortable the best thing is to get up and remake it. —O. SANDYS.

By the time she is installed behind a glass-topped desk, the tough sledding is over. It's fun at the top. Her job has become her hobby too. She knows what she wants, after all—and she wants what she has.

CHECK YOUR CQ—YOUR CAREER QUOTIENT

Answer the following questions yes or no. Be honest—don't give yourself the benefit of the doubt. If 18 or more of your answers agree with ours, you should—according to best authorities—have the proper ingredients for a big-time career. But remember, there is no sure-fire formula for making good; or if there is, the discoverer is keeping it more secret than the atomic bomb.

1. If it was a dark and stormy night, would you travel back to the office—a trip of one hour—to mail a crucial business letter you had absent-mindedly left on the desk?
2. When you're seedy—your head aches, your throat tickles and you're just a nervous wreck—would you stay to do a job which should be in the next day, but could wait another twenty-four hours?
3. When a piece of work is turned back to you, do you make it your business to find out what made it unsatisfactory?
4. Can you hold your tongue without biting it when you're just bursting with a morsel of top-secret news?
5. Do you resist morning coffee, afternoon tea and general sewing-circle chatter on the company's time?
6. When you make your debut on the job, do you wait for your new associates to break the how-about-luncheon ice?
7. Do you read a newspaper daily? A magazine regularly? A book weekly?
8. Do you keep unfavorable opinions of fellow workers and superiors to yourself?
9. If the boss puts you on a controversial hot spot, do you (a) Make agreeing noises, even though you think he's more off key than your old upright piano? (b) Remain noncommittal as a sphinx? (c) Tactfully put across the idea that you do not agree with him, but are willing to let him have his own opinion if he'll let you have yours?
10. Does it take you longer to decide where to eat than to settle a point of policy?
11. Do you secretly adore a vociferous telephone, a slew of appointments, a heavy morning mail?
12. Do you wake up on Monday morning with a "back-to-work" groan?
13. Could you go back and get a job at some place where you had formerly worked?
14. Do you recover from five o'clock slump after a leisurely dinner?
15. Do you bring an important piece of work home occasionally? Often? Never?
16. Do your low-down moments show?
17. If you were planning to spend a spare Tuesday evening drawing up a suggestion to the boss—your idea of the month—would you drop the project for a run-of-the-mill date?
18. Do you ever go over the important things on your day's schedule in the morning shower?
19. Do you pass up the correction of a small error every now and then because ten years from now it won't matter?
20. Are you a girl who can't say no?
21. Can you interrupt your conversation with an office visitor, answer the telephone, then pick up your conversation exactly where you left off—in idea if not in words?
22. Do you sling a mean alibi for every mistake and misstep?

ANSWERS:

1. Yes. Noble, but necessary.
2. Yes.
3. Yes.
4. It's tough—but the answer is "yes."
5. Yes—especially when your desk is piled high with work.
6. Yes. Always. But once the ice is broken, you're on your own.
7. If it's "yes" to newspaper, book and magazine, chalk up three separate points for yourself.
8. Yes—and here's a halo.
9. Yes for (b) and (c).
10. No. Mrs. Roosevelt once explained that she was able to accomplish all she did only because she never wasted time on unimportant decisions.
11. Yes. You're the center of attention and should love it.
12. No.
13. Yes—the art of making a graceful exit should be highly prized.
14. Yes.
15. Yes for "occasionally" and "often." But a bigger yes for occasionally than for often.
16. They shouldn't.
17. It's up to you—but we think the answer is "no."
18. Yes.
19. No, no, no!
20. No.
21. Yes.
22. No.

If you score 18 or over, you're a whiz; 15–17, you're doing O.K.; 12–14, you'll pass; 10–11, if you're career-minded, take yourself in hand; 1–9, maybe you don't want a career.

WHAT FORCE IS STRONGER THAN THE ATOMIC BOMB?

(Continued from Page 48)

daily our power to lift or to destroy mankind, and spreads with frightening rapidity to all races and nations. Unless effective moral education and great ethical religion can catch up with all this new power, begetting spiritual community, common devotion to moral aims that put justice and decency first, our science will be used to destroy us.

Any earnest dealing with this matter clearly involves our personal lives and our homes. It is easy to hand down to our sons and daughters the paraphernalia of the world; not so simple is it to hand down to them a rich spiritual culture, the great heritage of faith and ethical principles, without which nothing can be good, nothing safe.

At that major task we are not doing well. Our schools, our churches, our homes and the total pressure of man's public life are proving unequal to the task, or positively hostile to it. The kind of world our grandchildren will live in will depend on the spiritual quality that will use the powers their generation will control, powers so immense we cannot even now imagine them. Those who know what is going on in some of our laboratories are not exultant, but very sober. The new powers coming into man's hands, they say, are appalling. It is character that must be our first consideration now—character and the faiths that sustain it, the principles that direct it and the aims that give it zest and purpose.

Now, My Floors Stay Beautiful...with LESS CARE!

Self-Polishing SIMONIZ is longer lasting ... makes floor cleaning so much easier

Discover today how wonderfully easy and fast floor care can be. Enjoy longer lasting beauty and protection from the start by using famous Self-Polishing Simoniz. It's easy to apply ... just spread with cloth or mop applicator. No rubbing! No buffing! It shines as it dries. Now finishes clean up with sparkling newness. Just the swish of a damp cloth and off comes dust and dirt ... soiled spots and spilled things. Get Self-Polishing Simoniz right away. It gives the same longer lasting beauty that Simoniz made famous for cars.

And Crystal-Clear, too!

Yes, Self-Polishing Simoniz is actually crystal-clear on your floor ... lets gay linoleum colors and fine finishes "show through" with radiant freshness. Yet floors are fully protected always. No wonder millions of housewives are insisting on better-by-far Self-Polishing Simoniz. Try it today! Sold by grocery, hardware, drug, paint, 5 cents to $1, auto accessory and department stores.

THE SIMONIZ COMPANY, CHICAGO 16, ILLINOIS

Recognized for over thirty years as authorities on preservation of fine finishes

SHINES AS IT DRIES

FOR LINOLEUM, ASPHALT OR RUBBER TILE, OR FINISHED WOOD FLOORS

"ROYAL DESSERTS TASTE MORE DELICIOUS!"

—say 8 out of every 10

Survey of 1,526 Royal users reveals why millions are "Reaching for Royal"

Royal Desserts taste more delicious! Yes, that's what eight out of every ten of these women said. That's the reason they always want Royal.

Many sang the praises of Royal Vanilla Pudding. "A family favorite!" they said. "So delicate in flavor!" "Always just right!" "Can be used to make so many different desserts." And, mother, watch the youngsters' eyes shine when you serve it with the Easter garnish pictured above.

You'll want Royal Vanilla Pudding often and those other fine Royal Puddings, too—so luscious-tasting, creamy-textured, easily prepared. And they take no sugar! You'll love tangy, fruity Royal Gelatin Desserts, too. Always look for the name ROYAL!

ROYAL BUTTERSCOTCH PUDDING has the real old-time butterscotch flavor and smooth, creamy texture. Wonderful topped with a sprinkle of snowy coconut. Try it!

ROYAL CHOCOLATE PUDDING is a chocolate lover's dream—rich, luscious, chocolaty! For Chocolate Floating Island, make it with three cups of milk and top with generous spoonfuls of fluffy meringue.

SEVEN HUNDRED A WEEK

(Continued from Page 31)

When the door of one of the inner rooms opened Stacy turned her head. She said, "Oh," and got to her feet, but somehow she wasn't surprised at all. Standing in the doorway was the young man of the day before. He looked just as handsome as he had at the Manor Club. He had a smock on too. A rather mussy smock, but his cowlick fell just as it had and his gray eyes looked quite as stunned and the least bit regretful.

Stacy gave him her best smile. "I'm Eustacia Forrest, Doctor Kelsey. You are Doctor Kelsey?"

"I am." He leaned against the door, unsmiling. "Come in." He stood aside and Stacy went into the office. Files and a big desk. Two phones. Doctor Kelsey gestured at the swivel chair before the desk. "Sit down." Stacy sat. The chair revolved gently as her toe touched the floor. Doctor Kelsey said bleakly, "Tim says you've come about the job. He thinks you're just right for it. I don't."

Stacy stiffened. "How do you know? I'm a good typist. I know all the people around here and every one of the dogs."

Doctor Kelsey gestured. "You think all there is to it is sitting there and answering the phone and going out and smiling at people. It isn't so." He stared at Stacy for so long she thought he didn't see her. He said at last, "It's no lark. You won't last. Just when we're getting used to you you'll up and get married."

Stacy said gently, "If I haven't got married up to this time, I probably won't for a long time to come. I've had a few chances."

Doctor Kelsey said, "I believe that." He put his hands into the pockets of his smock. "There's the rest of it. You'll have no life of your own, and I'm sure you lead a very active social life. Nine to six every day of the week. Three nights until nine. You'll get a day off now and then, and every other Sunday, but you'll hardly notice it."

"They are long hours," Stacy agreed. "But there are compensations, I'm sure. The work itself ——"

"The work. Yes. You'll have to help me. You'll have to hold the dogs and cats while I do treatments. Be my assistant when I operate."

"That should be interesting."

"You won't ever have your lunch in peace. You'll eat at the house, and just when you're diving into Cristabel's creamed lobster, buzz-buzz and you'll have to come over here to see who it is. Some dizzy dog owner or worse, a cat lady, and you're in for half an hour of chatter and a cold lunch to go back to if you've any desire left to eat."

STACY said firmly, "I like dogs. I like cats, too, though not as much. If the job is open I'll take it on. If not, say so."

Doctor Kelsey's shoulder lifted. "It pays fifty a week and there may be a bonus now and then, but ——" That was when the phone rang. Doctor Kelsey said, "It's the one on the left. You say, 'Manor Hospital, good morning' then you get it. It's usually faintly neurotic."

The phone shrilled again. Stacy took it up. She spoke the formula, her eyes on Doctor Kelsey. He was really ever so good-looking and he worked practically up to his dark brows in dogs. Stacy couldn't understand why he wasn't deliriously happy.

Someone on the other end said querulously, "This is Mrs. Wilson at Seven Oaks. I can't understand what is wrong with Topsy."

Stacy said, "Hullo, Mrs. Wilson. This is Stacy Forrest. I think I know what's wrong with Tops. He's been pigging."

Mrs. Wilson's voice changed. "Stacy—what on earth are you doing there?"

"I'm working here. I saw Tops rummaging in the cans behind the supermarket. Tummy, isn't it?"

"I suppose so. He's been properly sick."

"We'll pick him up. How's Deb?"

Three minutes later Stacy put down the phone and smiled at Doctor Kelsey.

"Was that all right?"

HIS cowlick quivered. His voice came deep from his chest. "Some might consider you a godsend. Me ——" He didn't finish. He said, "You'll find Topsy's card in the files, under Wilson. Enter him when Tim brings him in. Enema, I suppose. Tim does those." He started to say something else, thought better of it and left.

Tim put his head in three minutes later and grinned. It was amazing how the time passed.

Stacy told her mother all about it that night. A warm bath made her tiredness vanish. "I'll get used to it soon. The hours are long, but after all, it's the sort of work I love."

Mrs. Forrest asked realistically, "Is he good-looking?"

"Yes, if you mean Doctor Kelsey."

"I do. Is he married?"

Stacy shook her gleaming bob.

"Are you going to marry him?"

Stacy considered that, sitting cross-legged on her mother's bed. "Could be. He's nice and he likes the things I like."

"Does he like you?"

"He does," Stacy said definitely. "I scare him a bit because I'm good-looking, but he'll get used to that."

Mrs. Forrest sighed. "Have him over to dinner. I'll look at him. Just curiosity, of course. Scram, dear changeling."

Stacy was up the next morning bright and early, and the mornings that followed. At the hospital at nine and smocked and ready for work five minutes later Tim and the other kennelman had the cages cleaned by then. Doctor Kelsey came from the house at nine-thirty and did the treatments, and then there was the midday meal to get ready for the dogs while Tim did baths and pluckings and people came with dogs and more dogs.

Stacy loved it. Ran Kelsey was a whiz. Her first Caesarean was so fascinating Stacy never felt a qualm. It was all so quick and wonderful. A local, a tiny incision and Ran's long finger probing inside and bringing out tiny balls of fur. Half an hour later the new mother wagging her tail in her cage while she licked her mewling, purblind offspring.

It would have been simply grand if Ran Kelsey hadn't had such a dampening effect. "Wait until you've been here awhile," he told Stacy as they were washing up after an operation. "When you get that casque of yours full of dog owners and cat ladies. You'll feel differently."

"I never will," Stacy said stoutly. "Dogs are simply darling."

Ran looked at her sidewise. "Just wait."

Stacy stared at him, feeling somehow like crying. "Golly, why do you stay in this profession if you don't like it?"

Ran dried his hands carefully. "Seven hundred a week. In six or seven years I figure that even with Uncle Sam getting his slice, the overhead and what I owe on this, I should have a hundred thousand dollars. That's why."

Stacy felt all choked. "Not—not because you love dogs?"

Ran Kelsey looked at her fully. "Seven hundred a week," he said bleakly and went out of the operating room.

---

When Scott, the Antarctic explorer, was preparing for his last expedition, he applied to Lloyd George, who was then Chancellor of the Exchequer, for financial aid. He was advised to see a certain rich man interested in polar expeditions. Scott did so and again called on Lloyd George. "Were you successful?" asked the Chancellor. "He is giving me a thousand pounds," was the reply, "but he has undertaken to raise fifty thousand more if I can persuade you to come with me. And I am to have a million if I can manage to leave you there."

---

Making a Meat Loaf Today?

VITALOX

makes meat loaves far more delicious! Adds the extra flavor of choice beef and vegetable spices. Try it!

For real beef flavor

Pours Easily! Concentrated beef juice with vegetable seasonings.

Recipes on Every Bottle

DON'T SCATTER DUST!

dust the new easy way!

DUSORB absorbs dust

★ Makes scientific dust cloths
★ No greasy or oily film
★ Doesn't streak or spot

Dust this modern way with Dusorb? . . . chemical discovery that transforms any cloth or mop into scientific dust absorbers. Leaves surfaces immaculately clean in a jiffy . . . air dust-free! Directions on package.

50c and $1

At leading drug, grocery, dept., and hardware stores. If not obtainable, order direct.

FRANCO-AMERICAN HYGIENIC CO.
Chicago 10, Illinois

WHY DON'T YOU WRITE?

Writing short stories, articles on homemaking, business, human interest stories, local and club activities, etc., will enable you to earn extra money. In your own home, on your own time, the New York Copy Desk Method teaches you how to write—the way newspaper women learn, by writing. Our unique "Writing Aptitude Test" tells whether you possess the fundamental qualities essential to successful writing. You'll enjoy this test. Write for it, without cost or obligation.

VETERANS: This course approved for Veterans' Training.

NEWSPAPER INSTITUTE OF AMERICA
Suite 575-D, One Park Avenue New York 16, N. Y.

REMEMBER ME?

I'm "THE CHORE GIRL"—the handy, knitted, copper pot-cleaning ball. I'll be back when copper's available. Watch for me!

METAL TEXTILE CORPORATION, Orange, N. J., U. S. A.

If it hadn't been for the dogs Stacy might have quit then and there. But the dogs needed her. She told her mother that in one of their bull sessions. "He's really a terrible disappointment, but the dogs are so wonderful. And when they're ill they're just like children. So pathetically helpless."

Mrs. Forrest inquired, "So you aren't going to marry him?"

Stacy said sadly, "I don't think so."

"Too bad," her mother chimed cheerfully. "Ask him to dinner anyhow. He interests me."

So Stacy asked Ran. She extended the invitation quite coolly, because by now she had decided that Ran Kelsey was an opportunist and nothing more. But he was most certainly a disturbing one.

Ran said, "Thanks. Friday? It's kind of you."

"Mother's idea," Stacy said matter-of-factly. "We'll make it at six so you can get back to relieve Tim. It's my night off."

"Fine." He was looking at her, but Stacy didn't show she was aware of that.

She looked at the Caren card. "Rix is being p.u.'d today. Do I charge for the extra day?"

"You do," Ran said evenly. He straightened to his full six feet. "When Mrs. Caren comes let me know. If I'm not here, tell her I think Rix's tonsils are pretty enlarged. He'd better have them out." His gray eyes met Stacy's wide green ones. "A lovely new angle, and they love that. Simple operation,

A piece of satire, tew be beneficial, should be so rendered that every man who reads it or hears it shall say to himself, That iz just, bekause it hits every buddy but me.

—JOSH BILLINGS:
Quoted in the Scrapbook.

and it helps a lot of them, besides being most advantageous to our seven hundred a week."

That was Saturday. On Sunday there were even more people with dogs to board and be beautified. In the few free moments Stacy could look out the back casement windows and see the golfers on the club course. Dave called her and Sam Smith did. They asked without hope for dates, and Sam sprang the now hollow jest of Stacy's having gone to the dogs.

Stacy wouldn't have minded if it hadn't been for Ran Kelsey. As she totted up the week's takings and found it to be over the seven hundred she felt her heart empty. Ran could easily be such a darling, but a man who looked upon dogs as just a means of making money was something incomprehensible to Stacy Forrest.

She was sure it couldn't be so. No one as able, as talented and as sure as Ran could be just a heartless mercenary. Yet it wasn't long until the proof hit her hard and direct.

It rained on Tuesday. On Wednesday it was like a February day. Ran went off at six to an Elks get-together and Stacy had her dinner in the salt-box house with Cristabel humming hymns in the kitchen. When Cristabel left, Stacy went back to the office, switched on the outside lights and between phone calls and the three people who came to pick up dogs she made the rounds and spoke to every one of the boarders and patients. At eight-thirty the bell rang.

When Stacy came into the reception room in her clean, well-fitting smock, a little old lady was sitting in one of the chrome chairs holding a beige cocker in her arms. She got up as Stacy came forward. She was small and gray-haired, neatly dressed. Her clear blue eyes were frightened. She held out the dog, her lips trembling.

"He's ill, I think."

Stacy took the silky body into her arms. The cocker's big eyes were lackluster. His body felt hot and she could hear the rasp of his breathing. She didn't know the dog or the old lady.

The woman said, "He hasn't been eating the last two days. Now he can't hold any-

Onion Pancakes!

by Betty Crocker

● "YEA, MAN!" That's how mister husband greets this hearty, he-man dish. Fluffy pancakes, zippy with onion, and served with browned ground beef and gravy.

Onion Pancakes: Directions perfected by our General Mills foods staff.

Sauté 1 to 1½ cups finely chopped Onion in About 2 tbsp. hot Fat
Add to your Bisquick pancake batter, made with 2 cups Bisquick
1 cup Milk
2 Eggs
2 to 4 tbsp. melted Butter

That's all, since Bisquick is a convenient blend of six ingredients. Bake pancakes as directed on the Bisquick package. They're the good butter-and-egg kind (so easy with Bisquick). And sparked up with onion! Serve hot, topped with meat and gravy.

Browned Ground Beef and Gravy:

Brown ½ lb. Ground Beef and ¼ cup Minced Onion in 2 tbsp. hot Fat
Add 1 tsp. Salt
¼ tsp. Pepper
¼ cup sifted Gold Medal Flour
Continue browning. Slowly stir in 2 cups Liquid (part milk, part water)
Continue stirring to prevent lumping. Stir in ½ tsp. "Seasoning and Coloring Sauce for Gravy"

• • •

● MUCH EASIER—making so many things with Bisquick. Just add milk for biscuits, dumplings, meatpie crusts. Simple directions on Bisquick package for ten basic bakings. You cut time and work almost in two! Doesn't that appeal to you?

• • •

● HANDS ONIONY? Rub with salt. Wash in clear water. Removes all traces of onion odor. Same for dishes, etc.

• • •

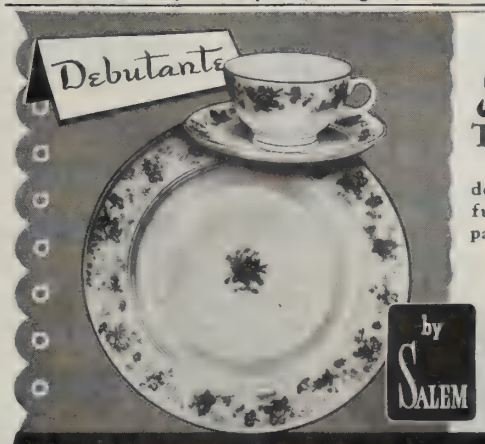
● ANYONE'S AN EXPERT with Bisquick! It's calamity-proof. Why? Because Bisquick includes only top-grade ingredients. And they're blended more skilfully than is possible at home. Completely dependable, and so handy! Try Bisquick.

General Mills, Inc.

"Bisquick" and "Betty Crocker" are registered trade marks of General Mills, Inc., Minneapolis, Minn.

LEARN MILLINERY AT HOME

Design and make exclusive hats under personal direction of one of America's noted designers. Complete materials, blocks, etc., furnished. Every step illustrated. You make exclusive salable hats right from the start. We teach you how to start a profitable business in spare time. Low cost and easy terms. Expert milliners are in demand. Free National Placement Dept. Send for free catalog.



LOUIE MILLER SCHOOL OF MILLINERY
225 N. Wabash Ave., Dept. 34, Chicago 1, Ill.

ASK FOR— PORTER Carpet Sweeper Makes sweeping a real pleasure

PORTER STEEL SPECIALTIES, SHELBYVILLE, IND.

Debutante

by SALEM

Invitation to LOVELIER TABLE SETTINGS

Choose dinnerware to fit your decorative scheme from the colorful and traditional group of Salem patterns. From gay and bold flowered decor to quiet semi-formal types. See Salem at better stores—learn its moderate cost. Frequently dealer's stocks are low, but there will be more later.

THE SALEM CHINA CO.
SALEM, OHIO

established 1898 • AMERICAN DINNERWARE of DISTINCTION

WORRY?-BUT WHY?

Get Modess with the triple-proved deodorant!

FREEDOM FROM WORRY? Garden-fresh daintiness every day of the month! Every girl wants it—and that's why so many girls are switching to Modess with the triple-proved deodorant.

TRIPLE-PROVED? Yes! Proved effective by Modess chemists; proved superior in 26 tests by impartial laboratories; proved a favorite way to guard daintiness by thousands of girls who've tried the New Modess!

NO SEPARATE POWDER? No! No sprinkling, spilling, or nuisance of any kind!

IS MODESS SOFTER? "Yes!" say 3 out of 4 women in a nationwide poll. They found Modess softer to the touch.

IS MODESS SAFER? 209 nurses, in hospital tests, proved Modess less likely to strike through than nationally known layer-type napkins.

COSTS NO MORE! So, always ask for luxurious New Modess with the triple-proved deodorant. Box of 12 is only 22¢.

MODESS COMES TWO WAYS. Full-size and Junior. If you prefer a slightly narrower napkin, get Modess Junior.

FREE! Send now for "Growing Up and Liking It," a bright modern booklet on the how and why of menstruation. Write Martha Steele, Personal Products Corp., Box 332-N, Milltown, N. J.

thing. Not even water. He just lies around." Tears welled in her eyes. "Pal is my son's dog. Art is at sea. If—if anything happened to Pal, Art would never get over it." She struggled to keep from crying as Stacy held the dog close. "I suppose I've spoiled him. I've given him the best care and food. He always had meat when rationing was on even if I didn't. He must get well. I don't care what it costs," she said. "I'll find the money somehow."

Stacy's throat was tight. She said huskily, "Come into the office. I'll make out the card."

Mrs. Marsh. Of Edge Road. In the less fashionable section of the Manor. Mrs. Marsh put her hand just once on Pal's unresponsive head and left. Stacy carried the dog into the upstairs room and put him in a cage. Pal lay down and closed his eyes wearily.

She called the Elks and asked that Doctor Kelsey come at once. It was past nine when she heard the valve-tappet tick that was the identifying sound of Ran's car. He came into the office, big and vital.

"What's wrong?"

Stacy stumbled in her eagerness to tell him. Ran stood tall and straight, listening. His eyes darkened.

"Take it easy. Dogs get ill. Dogs die. You've got to expect that."

"But not this one. He's such a poor little thing." Stacy clasped her hands. "Oh, Ran, he mustn't die. She's such a sweet old lady and Pal's master is so far away."

Ran said sharply, "Bring the dog into the examination room."

Stacy fairly flew. She came out with Pal and set him on the metal top of the table.

Ran looked at the dog. "Did you take his temperature?"

"A—a hundred and five."

Ran was running his hands over the dog, tapping, feeling with sure fingers. "Congestion. Pneumonia, pretty certain."

Stacy's breath caught. "Oh, Ran, will he die? He mustn't."

Ran said, "Stop it. Get a pneumonia jacket. We'll give him sulpha. He'll come out of it or he won't."

Stacy felt as if he had slapped her. Her silky lashes blinked rapidly. "You're heartless," she faltered. "All you think of is money."

Ran lifted his head. His gray eyes were inscrutable. "You're tired. You get along home."

"I'm not going," Stacy stormed. "I'll stay with Pal."

"You'll go home and go to bed. The world won't come to an end if one dog gets better or not." He put his hands on her shoulders. "Out!"

It must have been sheer exhaustion that enabled Stacy to sleep that night, but she was up at seven, had her breakfast and was at the hospital by eight.

Tim was cleaning the cages. He looked at Stacy as she came into the upstairs cage room. "Got a sick dog, hey? Seems to've puked up ever'thing you give him. Sulpha tablets too."

Stacy looked at Pal, his middle covered by the wadding and muslin of the pneumonia jacket. His mouth was open, his nose clogged. He didn't move when she spoke to him. "Did—did you tell Doctor Kelsey?"

"He ain't come in yet."

Stacy ran from the hospital to the house. Ran was having his coffee. He nodded as Stacy told him.

"We'll give him an intravenous shot then." His eyes met hers. He frowned. "There are other dogs in the hospital, you know. Suppose you leave it to me and take care of things." He lifted his hand. "I know. There isn't much I can do, though. Nature does most of it. We give the dog sulpha. All the sulpha can do is keep down the rate of growth of the pneumococci so that the antibodies can cope with them. If it works, Pal gets better. If not, he doesn't. Be realistic."

Stacy swallowed. She had to keep from storming at Ran. She went back into the office and started her work, but all she could think of was the pathetic little dog lying listless in his cage.

Pal wasn't any better that day. Whenever she had a free moment Stacy went in and swabbed his nostrils. He was having such a terrible time trying to breathe. He wouldn't eat. He wouldn't even drink the red juice of raw meat.

When Mrs. Marsh called in the afternoon Stacy's heart was heavy. "He's still very sick. We—we'll know by tomorrow if—if he'll make it."

Ran was grumpy the next day. It was all right with Stacy. Her heart was hard within her. She could think only of Pal. She stayed with him as much as she could, but there was nothing she could do but pray for the little cocker. And Ran, who could have done something, apparently wasn't overinterested. Pal was just another dog. A dog to do his best for—but Pal needed more than that.

Stacy had forgotten that it was Friday. That it was the night she had invited Ran for dinner. He wasn't in the hospital when she reluctantly and wearily left. Her mother was dressed in a blue frock and there was the odor of baking cake in the apartment when Stacy opened the door.

Mrs. Forrest said, "Isn't your young doctor with you?"

Stacy stared at her mother. "I forgot all about it. I—I hope he doesn't come."

Mrs. Forrest said interestedly, "You wouldn't like to tell me about it?"

"I'll cry if I do," Stacy said and her mother nodded.

"In that case, don't. Your face gets blotchy. I'm glad I got a steak. I won't put it in until he comes."

Stacy went into her room and changed. She didn't want to see Ran. She felt she couldn't be agreeable to him when Pal was lying so still in his cage, but when she came out at seven she felt only anger—not relief. Mrs. Forrest lifted one jet brow and Stacy said bitterly:

"I'm afraid he's that sort, mother. I don't think he's coming."

"I'd just as soon have a poached egg," Mrs. Forrest said soothingly. "We can save the steak. I owe the Cahills a dinner."

Ran didn't come. Mrs. Forrest said nothing, but her eyes asked a lot. Stacy couldn't tell her mother. All she could think of was Pal struggling to breathe in his cage and Ran off somewhere making contacts that brought in business. It was all right to say that Nature would decide whether Pal lived or died—perhaps that was true—but it wasn't right to think like that. To leave it like that. She didn't have a key or she would have got her polo coat and gone over to the hospital and stayed with Pal—even if she could do nothing for him.

She went to bed at eleven and she was at the hospital in the morning when Tim arrived. He unlocked the door and Stacy ran through the examination room into the cage room. All the dogs barked joyfully but Stacy only gasped, "Good morning, dogs," and made for Pal's cage. He was lying just as he had for days, his silky muzzle on his two paws.

Stacy's voice caught. "Pal, how are you?" The dog didn't move, but his stumpy tail quivered. Stacy's heart leaped. Her eyes blurred. "Oh, Pal, you're going to live, aren't you?" She wanted to run to the phone and call Mrs. Marsh. To cry, "He knew me this morning. He wagged his tail." But she didn't know if it meant Pal was going to make it. She couldn't raise false hopes.

When Ran came in at nine-thirty she told him. He looked as if he'd had a big night. Pretty seedy. He didn't say even one word

(Continued on Page 114)

That we are all lost in a world of vain illusion; and that somewhere, somehow, we must all seek Salvation and a more Abiding City—this is what old-fashioned parsons keep droning from their pulpits; and the worst of it is—what they say is true.

—LOGAN P. SMITH: All Trivia. (Harcourt Brace & Company).

MRS. ROBERT MONTGOMERY... as famous for personal charm as her celebrated husband is for brilliant acting.

"Sensational!"

says Mrs. Robert Montgomery,

"And that's why TANGEE GAY-RED is starring on Hollywood's smartest lips."

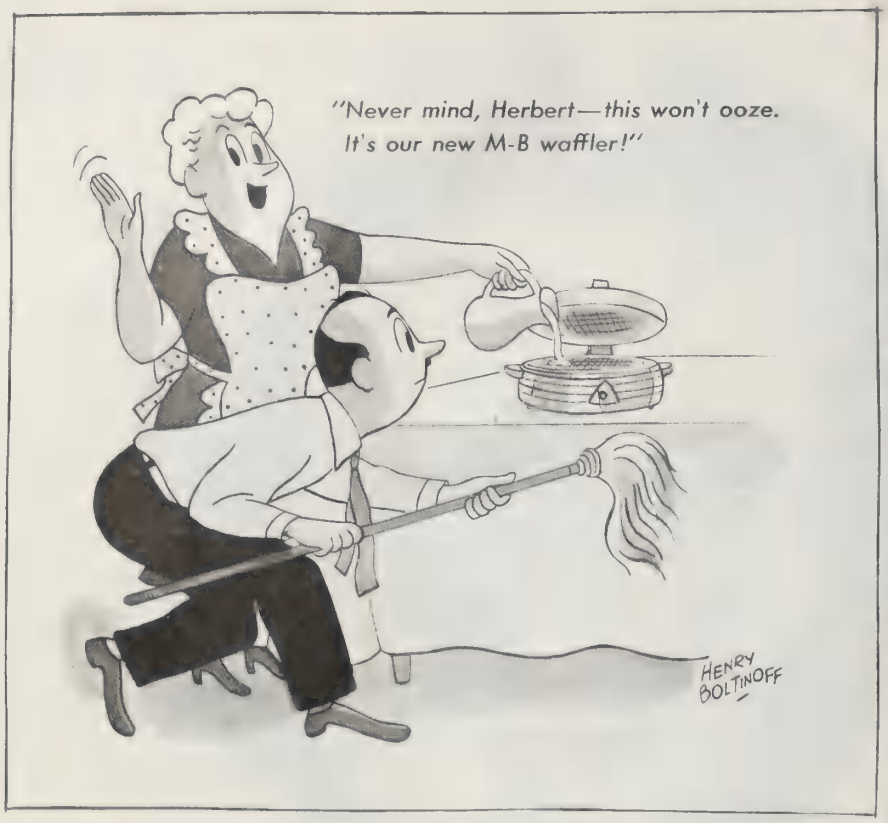
Yes, Tangee's exciting new lipstick shade—Gay-Red is the hit-color of Hollywood. In that exotic city (where a girl's face is her fortune) this Tangee sensation is being acclaimed by the loveliest ladies of the film colony. Try Tangee Gay-Red...it gives you a lift ...makes your lips look young and gay. Remember —Gay-Red comes in Tangee's outstanding creation— the Satin-Finish Lipstick.



CONSTANCE LUFT HUHN, Head of the House of Tangee and one of America's foremost authorities on beauty and make-up. Among Mrs. Huhn's most recent triumphs are the exciting new lipstick shade, Tangee Gay-Red, and the new Tangee Petal-Finish Cake Make-Up.

AT LAST... A PERFECT CAKE MAKE-UP!

Some cake make-ups you've used are fine in one way... some in another...but the new Tangee Petal-Finish Cake Make-Up is ideal in every way. It's easy to apply—stays on for extra hours—is designed to protect the skin—and does not make you look as if you were wearing a mask.

Use Tangee

and see how beautiful you can be

Ready Now! The Waffler-That-Doesn't-Ooze!

By makers of the Twin-O-Matic Waffle Baker

Manning Bowman Means Best

SMOKELESS TABLE BROILER
No smoke, odor, effort

IRON-THAT-WAGS-ITS-TAIL
Light weight—swivel cord

LONG-LAST PERCOLATOR
Dripless spout—dignified design of apology about not showing up for dinner. He'd forgotten, Stacy decided, her heart hard against him. It was just as well.

(Continued from Page 112)

Ran started his first treatment. The Appels' Afghan. He said, as Stacy held the dog's odd head and told him coldly as she could that Pal had recognized her, "I think he can make it. His temperature is down. Keep his nose clear. He's pretty weak, but he's still alive." He didn't look at her and Stacy was glad. She couldn't see for the tears, and you can't glare with tears in your eyes.

She called Mrs. Marsh as soon as the treatments were over, and the tremor in the old lady's voice made Stacy catch her lower lip with even white teeth. "I'll call you if there's anything new. He'll get well. He must."

There was a dance she didn't enjoy on Saturday night; golf on Sunday and a dull tea. She called Tim almost every hour until Tim said at last, "The pooch'll make it, Stacy. He needs a bath though." When Stacy screamed, Tim said, "I just said he needs one."

Stacy could hardly wait for the morning. Pal knew her when she came in. He wagged his tail definitely and lifted his head. His big eyes weren't dull any more, and when Stacy opened the cage and took him, foul-smelling and dirty as he was, into her arms, he snuggled his muzzle into her neck and whimpered.

"I know," Stacy crooned. "You've been awful sick, Pal boy, but you're going to get well. Art couldn't bear it if you didn't. Eat your meat and get well, dog."

She hardly spoke to Ran the next few days. He didn't seem at all concerned that Pal had come from the very doors of dog heaven. He frowned at the cards and told her what to soak the Amsdens, and Stacy hoped he wouldn't make the odious seven hundred this week. That made her think of Mrs. Marsh. It was going to be a big bill. At least another week before Pal could leave. Until he was strong enough, even though he was eating now and jumped up in his cage, quivering all over when Stacy came in.

The week ended with the seven hundred well passed. Dogs came in to board and dogs went home. There were several operations, and Stacy could admire the skill Ran possessed and yet be unmoved.

There was only Pal somehow. Mrs. Marsh coming in—not too often, because she didn't want to be a bother. Coming in and being so quietly grateful and happy. Pal getting better every day, until just before the week ended, and May was bright and warm, Tim gave him a bath with Stacy helping and they dried him under the drier and combed and brushed him until his pale coat shone. He snuggled in Stacy's arms and licked her and she didn't cry until Tim had taken him away. Taken him home. Well.

RAN didn't come in until late on Sunday. Stacy was figuring up the week's takings. Ran looked as if he'd had an afternoon of tennis. Sun-flushed skin, clear eyes. Ever so handsome.

He said, "You can have the evening off if you like. I'll carry on."

"It isn't necessary." Stacy looked up, her green eyes still. "We're under this week. Just five-seventy-five. Of course, there's Mrs. Marsh's bill. I made it out." She took a firmer hold on her pencil. "You—you're charging her full rate?"

Ran was behind her when he spoke. "A hundred and a quarter. She paid it. Mark the card. You don't have to send a bill."

The pencil shook in Stacy's fingers. She thought of Mrs. Marsh. She could hear her say, "I'll find the money somehow."

Stacy said, "That makes the seven hundred then." She got up. Her voice was even. "Will a week's notice be enough? I'm leaving."

Ran was leafing through a veterinary journal. He didn't turn. "I never thought you'd stay. Getting married?"

"I'm not," Stacy said with icy anger. "I just can't stand what you call the realistic approach."

Ran turned to her then. He said slowly, "You're hurt. That's what happens when you let your heart show. It gets kicked around."

Stacy said breathlessly, "You have to have a heart to get it kicked around. I guess I will go home."

SHE came exactly at nine the next day. She assisted with the treatments, but she didn't look at Ran, not even when she had to speak to him. Tim looked woebegone when Stacy told him she was leaving.

Stacy hoped Ran would get someone quickly. She didn't want to be around. She could still smile at people and be gentle with the dogs, but something had gone out of it all. The joy of it.

She was in the office two nights later when Mrs. Marsh came. Tim and the other kennelman had gone. Ran was probably in the house, for Cristabel was long gone, yet there were lights in the windows. Stacy had been sitting forlorn in the office. The dogs were quiet and the phones as well. She heard the buzzer and got up.

Mrs. Marsh smiled as Stacy came out and Stacy asked quickly, "How is Pal?"

"He's fine." Tiny wrinkles quivered at the corners of Mrs. Marsh's eyes. "I wrote Art. I told him all you and Doctor Kelsey have done for his dog." She fumbled in her bag and held out something to Stacy. Stacy took it. A ten-dollar bill. Mrs. Marsh said, "I'll pay more when I can, and Art will pay the rest as soon as his ship comes."

Stacy's green eyes grew wide. "But ——"

Mrs. Marsh said, "I know what it costs. And those nights Doctor Kelsey sat up with Pal. I called one night at two—I just had to—and he was with Pal. I could hear the other dogs when he spoke to me." She closed her bag. "He wouldn't tell me what the bill is, but Art will insist on paying, though money couldn't ever repay all you've both done."

When Mrs. Marsh had gone, Stacy looked at the crumpled bill. So that was why Ran hadn't come to dinner. Her lips firmed. She turned off the lights and slipped the latch on the alley door.

The door to the house was open. When Stacy came into the living room that had, somehow, no warmth to it—just a forlornness—Ran was sitting in his big chair, pipe in mouth, a book on his lap. He got to his feet, his eyes still.

Stacy held out the bill. "Does this go on last week's receipts or this week's?"

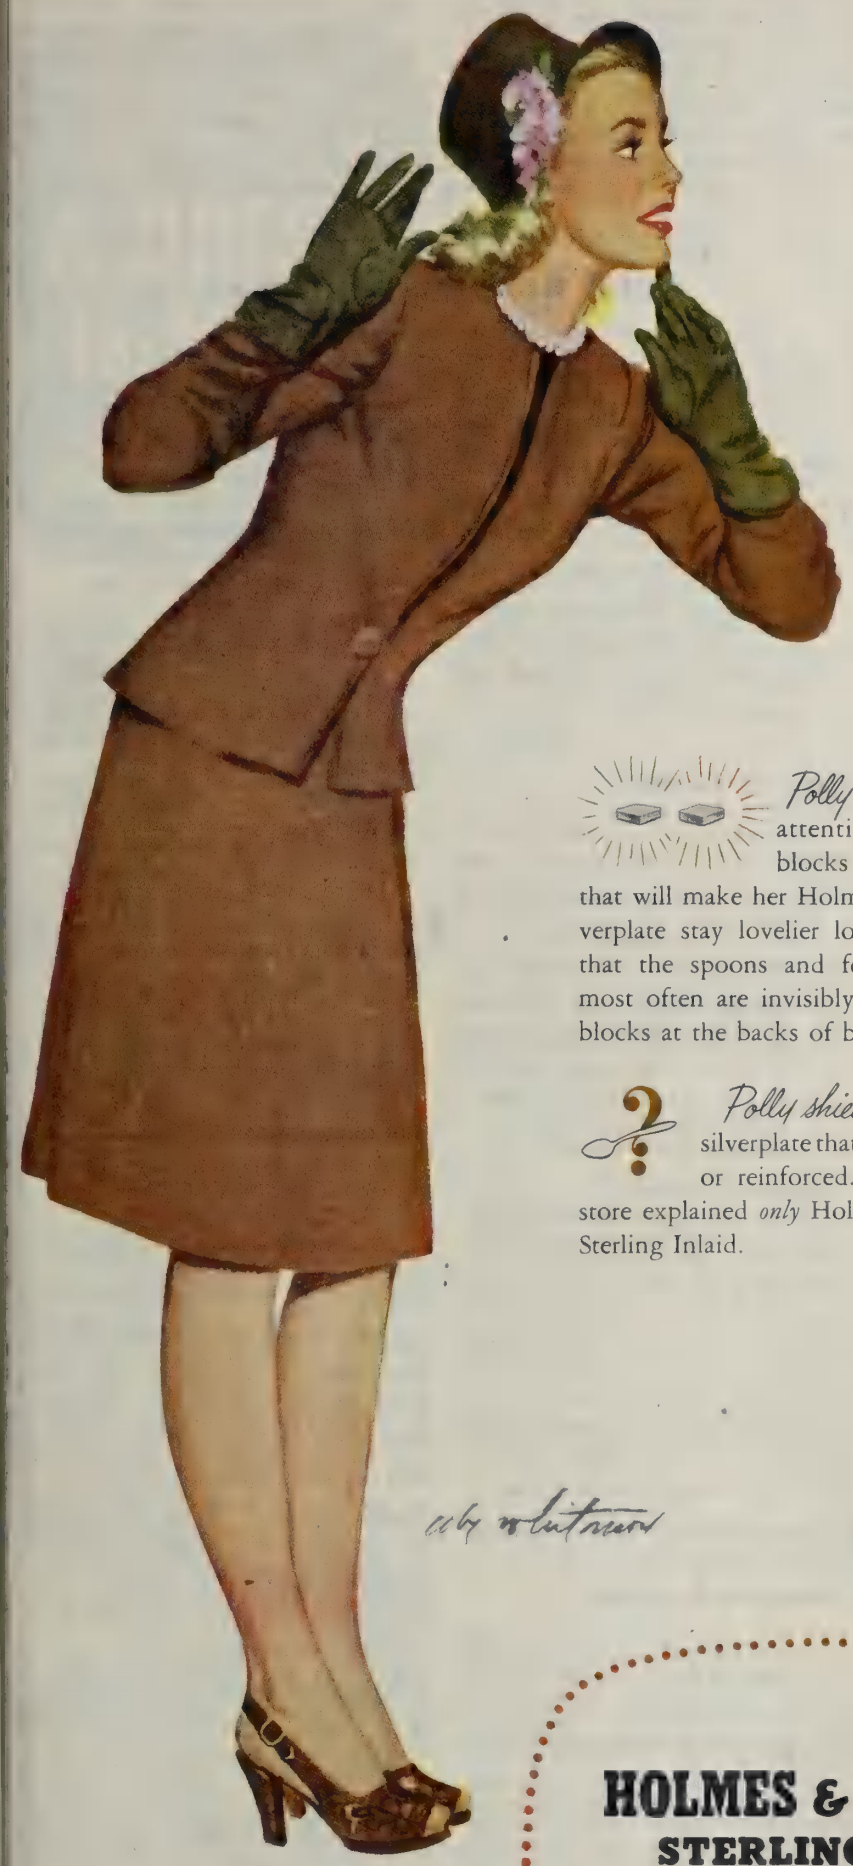
Ran didn't speak.

Stacy said gently, "Mrs. Marsh just gave it to me. On account. Why didn't you tell me, Ran?"

She saw his eyes then. Deep and somehow disturbed. "I told you. If you let your heart show, everyone takes a whack at it. You get hurt."

"Would I hurt you?" Stacy asked, her heart swelling.

"You?" His dark head was erect. "You're Stacy Forrest. There are half a dozen men with everything to give you just waiting for you to get over this whim. A week after you've left you'll forget all about this and me too. What do you know about me? I'm not like the men you know. My people never had a penny. I worked as a waiter to get enough for my first year's tuition. Summers I worked in the stockyards. I've still got it all to make—to be independent."



His voice went on. Stacy's green eyes grew wider. They grew deeper and more

(Continued on Page 116)

Answer

By Elaine V. Emans

Like the sun come out
When rain persisted,
Faith where a doubt
Or fear existed,
Smiles to the lonely,
Clasp of a hand,
Is your saying only:
"I understand."

HOW POLLY Picked HER PATTERN

Polly paid particular attention to these two blocks of sterling silver that will make her Holmes & Edwards silverplate stay lovelier longer. She learned that the spoons and forks she will use most often are invisibly inlaid with these blocks at the backs of bowls and handles.

Polly shied away from other silverplate that's only extra plated or reinforced. The man in the store explained only Holmes & Edwards is Sterling Inlaid.

Polly looked at lots of patterns, and settled on a Holmes & Edwards design, Danish Princess. It was different, she said, not extreme or too conservative, but with a dignified beauty that she would love for years to come.

Polly thrilled to find a fifty piece service for eight, with chest, costs only $65.75 No federal tax.

HOLMES & EDWARDS
STERLING INLAID° SILVERPLATE

HERE AND HERE
It's Sterling Inlaid

Copyright 1946, International Silver Co., Holmes & Edwards Div., Meriden, Conn. In Canada: The T. Eaton Co., Ltd. °Reg. U. S. Pat. Off.

Part of your wardrobe

TUSSY
CREAM DEODORANT

Here's the most enchanting cream you've ever used to protect your daintiness! Tussy Cream Deodorant is part of your wardrobe—part of your costume—whether you're wearing gingham or gossamer. Whisk on a fingertipful. This fluffy cosmetic deodorant disappears almost instantly, leaving a haunting fragrance. It guards your charm faithfully. Gentle to your skin and to the finest fabrics. And it stays creamy so much longer—by all means buy the large size. $1 plus tax.

JAECKEL GOWN

HAT BY MME. REINE

(Continued from Page 114)

clear and Stacy heard his voice but not what he said. She was thinking, He's thirty, almost, but he doesn't trust anyone because he's afraid they'll hurt him. And he's afraid of me most because he loves me. She didn't hear what Ran was saying in that troubled deep tone. She didn't have to. She thought, We'll let Tim and his wife move in here. We'll have a house on the other side of town where the dogs won't disturb Ran after hours. We'll work her together and live there together, and ——

Her breath went with a sigh. She looke at Ran—widely, aware. She said, "When?"

Ran stopped talking. His shoulders sagge just a little and his gray eyes looked int Stacy's with a hopeless longing. "Whe what?" he asked.

"When," Stacy said breathlessly, "are yo going to stop talking and start kissing?"

OUR READERS WRITE US

(Continued from Page 13)

way this office works to be proud of being part of UNRRA, in spite of numerous criticisms in the American press. Believe me, there are no criticisms in the press of the receiving countries! In many cases—in fact, the majority—UNRRA is the biggest source of supply for essentials. It has literally saved thousands of lives, both from starvation and from epidemics. It certainly has proved how successful international organizations can be. Our mission is made up of Americans, Englishmen, Canadians, Russians, Czechs and French. It gives a really warm feeling to see everyone working toward the same goal, with never one bit of friction between persons or nations.

Love,
BERTIE.

Teacher Was Our Pet

Austin, Texas.

My dear sir: In behalf of the national organization of 25,000 women teachers which I represent, I should like to thank you for Look Pretty, Teacher, by Ruth Mary Packard.

Unfortunately, the public still seems to hold the popular impression that teachers as illustrations must be caricatured. The fact that you have chosen to stress fashions for teachers is a step in the right direction, and one that our members appreciate deeply.

Cordially yours,
M. MARGARET STROH,
National Executive Secretary,
The Delta Kappa Gamma Society.

Everybody Happy!

Decatur, Illinois.

Dear Editors: Women veterans of Uncle Sam's armed forces are posing no problems for A. E. Staley Manufacturing Co., processor of corn and soybean products.

Of the eleven women employees who entered the service, four have been released.

All four got their old jobs back, at preenlistment rate of pay, plus increases awarded during their absence. All four married.

All four then quit their Staley jobs.

All smart women prefer jobs at home to jobs in an office. ED.

Then There Were None

Ridgewood, L. I., New York.

Dear Sir: We protest! Meet Three Career Girls is no more an illustration of the opportunities, experiences and obstacles faced in the average career than the three girls themselves are typical of the average business girl.

Look at the picture. Three girls from obviously well-to-do families arrive in New York and in a short space of time two land positions in fields where others have labored long and hard before approaching such phenomenal success. Of the three, the sole claimant to being anything like average is Caffie. Her salary, position and the manner in which she obtained it are most indicative of the average girl. She used no personal friends, had no softhearted bosses and is, you will note, the most poorly paid.

What of all the girls who must live in "shabby apartments" for the simple reason that their families live there—girls who must sacrifice to help maintain a home without the compensating fun and freedom a bachelor apartment affords—who have no smart tweeds to offset surrounding shabbiness?

We write as two young businesswomen, representative of the average girl mentioned above, who have had to compete with girls such as Jane and Gretchen. Usually they have proved too much for us. We envy no one their earned success. Success, if anything, is typically American, but so is fair play.

Thank you,
JO JONES and KAY SULLIVAN.

Of our three "career girls" one has been fired, one is getting married, one is going home "sick of a career." ED.

What If There is No Happy Ending?

Wellesley, Massachusetts.

Dear Mrs. Gould: Before my husband was killed I read your wonderful stories with gusto, but now I can't bear them as they all end so perfectly.

Your stories are mostly based on veterans returning to their wives and the glorious and happy ending of four years of waiting. What of the wives whose husbands will never return?

Sincerely,
(Name withheld by request.)

JOURNAL fiction has not ignored the tragedy that has come to so many wives of servicemen. See, for instance: Make Room for Me, July, 1943; Captain Douglass Comes Home, October, 1944; The Road and The Turning, June, 1945; The Rendezvous, December, 1945. ED.

Old England—Not So Merrie

The following letter was written to one of our readers, Oliver K. Whiting, of New York, by his brother. ED.

Caversham—Reading, England.

Dear Ken: You would be surprised how people here in England aged under the strain of the war years. Men and women you knew even in 1940 as young middle-aged now have white hair and seem to have taken to themselves about 15 years. . . . It is, I think, the endless little shortages that are the worst for one's nerves. Imagine trying to start a business, for instance. Try to get an office—with two million buildings gone you can't get one for love or money. Get some stationery printed—wait three months. Try and get labor—the Exchange will not send anyone. Materials? Pair of scissors? None to be had. Telephone put in? Nine months. Electric light put in? Only for invalids. And so it goes.

How accountants and professional men keep looking even decent beats me altogether. I go on washing and pressing old flannel trousers (I am wearing now a pair of yours 10 years old) until they fall to bits. I often noted the American women I met at the B.B.C. How smart they looked against my friends there—they must have caused much envy, but I hope no one showed it. Our women announcers often wear slacks and jerseys even at the microphone and almost always no stockings. At a glance, a London crowd still looks reasonably prosperous, but most keep for the street their only shirt and, perhaps, a prewar suit.

With a hopeful outlook, we will pull through to something worth having—God grant it be so.

All the best,
RON.

Half a Loaf

Dallas, Texas.

Dear Editors: Your note—"one slice of bread wasted once a week in every U. S. kitchen adds up to approximately 4,000,000 loaves. And Europe needs loaves, of everything"—should open somebody's eyes—some of the bakers', I hope. Why doesn't some baker start selling his bread in a half loaf? For the families of two or

NEW EASY PLAN for MARRIED WOMEN

A DRESS for YOU

for Ordering Only 3 Dresses for Friends

Mail Coupon Today for FREE Samples

Read this thrilling news! You don't pay one penny ever, for your choice of gorgeous new dress in your own favorite style, size and color. Select your dress from more than 100 newest Harford Frocks styles—and it's yours just for sending orders for only 3 dresses for your friends, neighbors, or members of your family. That's all! Not one cent to pay now or any other time—everything supplied without cost!

Experience Not Needed —Use Spare Time

Imagine showing your friends and neighbors a vast complete selection of gorgeous, exquisitely-designed Harford Frocks—more than 100 styles, all sizes, and scores of beautiful fabrics in the season's latest colors and patterns—as well as hosiery, lingerie, sportswear, suits, coats, children's wear, etc. Your friends and neighbors will be eager to give you their orders when they see the beauty of the styles, the large selection, and learn the LOW MONEY-SAVING PRICES. And for sending orders, for only 3 dresses at the low regular prices, YOU CAN SELECT YOUR OWN DRESS TO BE SENT TO YOU without paying one cent for it! And this thrilling plan does not stop with only one dress! You can go right on getting dress after dress, until you have a complete wardrobe!

Gorgeous Style Presentation Sent FREE!

Mail Coupon

This—we send you gorgeous presentation showing scores of latest fashions with actual sample fabrics in dresses, lingerie, children's wear, sportswear, suits, coats, etc. Due to present conditions we may not be able to send your Style Presentation at once—but fill in coupon below now to place your name on our list and be among the first to receive the new Style Line when available. No money needed. Don't miss this opportunity to get complete wardrobe for yourself—with chance to earn up to $22.00 in a week cash besides. Mail coupon today.

MAIL COUPON for FREE STYLE LINE

HARFORD FROCKS, INC.
Dept. D-9012
Cincinnati 25, Ohio

HARFORD FROCKS, INC.
Dept. D-9012, Cincinnati 25, Ohio

I want to get a dress for myself for ordering 3 dresses for friends, or members of my family. Please rush me the new Harford Frocks Style Presentation FREE as soon as possible.

Name .....
Address .....
City ..... State .....
My Age is .....

three (and there are many of us) this would be a great saving; at least one fourth of a loaf is thrown away every day or so and I feel guilty every time.

Sincerely,
MRS. GLEN ROSE JACKSON.

They Opened Her Eyes

Phoenixville, Pa.

Dear Editors: I am a Cadet Nurse taking the last six months of training at Valley Forge General Hospital, one of the two Army blind centers, specializing in the care of the blind and plastic surgery.

We had all had two and one-half years of nursing experience, and have seen some pitiful sights, but when I was assigned to a blind ward, my heart sank. How would I ever learn how to act around a boy who might never see again? How could I get them to accept me? For those young G. I.'s are surely the most critical patients I have had. I should never have worried.

We reported on duty, and encountered for the first time the famous acrylic, or plastic, eye. The captain introduced us to one boy and asked if we could tell which was his plastic eye. S——, the other cadet, picked the left, and after some study, I decided it must be the right. The patient, a robust specimen of Southern manhood, began to roar. Both eyes were plastic!

From that moment on the boys teased us, and never stopped until the day we left the ward. It was about two weeks later that I saw on the face of a boy blinded for life—a twenty-year-old genius, whose chief interest was higher mathematics—the most hopeless expression I have ever seen. He didn't know there was anyone present, but as soon as I spoke, a big grin appeared on his face, and he began to comment on the Braille book he was "reading." Then I learned that rarely will a blind boy appear without that set smile or grin when he knows there are people about. Once in a while one of them would let down and tell me what he really thought and felt. One was quite contemptuous of the way civilians treat the blind.

"They run up to you, turn you around three times and ask if they can't help you—poor boy." One thing we must learn: just because a boy has lost the faculty of sight doesn't mean he has lost the faculty of thinking. These boys are healthy, normal people in every respect but one—they cannot see. I'll never forget the time one of the boys asked me to let him know when I left the room. I had thoughtlessly allowed him to go on talking to empty air when I had gone. So we started a game—"Report as directed"—very G. I. And very helpful. But you can never joke with the boys about their afflictions unless they start the joke. One of them would snarl at another, when bumping into him, "What's the matter—can't you see where you're going?" That was always good for a laugh—when they said it.

I'll hate to leave Valley Forge. But I'll be grateful the rest of my life for being allowed to meet the greatest guys in the world.

Sincerely,
JEANNE WERNER.

Throwing Pies at Annie!

Montreal, Canada.

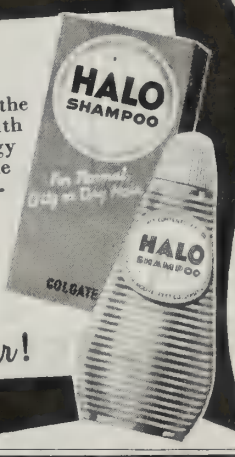
Dear Editors: For years Ann Batchelder has been my household god. But now, apropos of pies, she says: "The British have their jelly tarts and a 'thing' called a pastry!" She can say anything she pleases about our uninspired cooking, but when it comes to pastry we take second place to none! As "American as apple pie," she says. From whom did you get the recipe? The Indians? Why, it came over with the Pilgrims from Bristol.

Almost every town in England has its own special pastry: Banbury tarts, Eccles "cakes," Melton Mowbray pork pies, with their savory jellied pork and brown glazed, rich short crust outside.

A thing called a pastry, indeed! Oh, Ann, how could you?

Sincerely yours,
GWEN WATKINS.

American pastry lore does indeed go straight back to the Queen of Hearts, who made some tarts, and the 24 blackbirds set before the King. But perhaps Miss Batchelder thinks that what was originated in England has been improved in America. ED.



"SOAPING" dulls hair— Halo glorifies it!

Here's why your very first Halo Shampoo will leave your hair aglow with natural luster!

1. Halo reveals the true natural beauty of your hair the very first time you use it . . . leaves it shimmering with glorious highlights. 2. Even finest soaps leave dingy soap-film on hair. But Halo contains no soap. Made with a new patented ingredient it cannot leave soap-film! 3. Needs no lemon or vinegar after-rinse. Halo rinses away, quickly and completely! 4. Makes oceans of rich, fragrant lather, in hardest water. Leaves hair sweet, naturally radiant! 5. Carries away unsightly loose dandruff like magic! 6. Lets hair dry soft and manageable, easy to curl! 10¢ or larger sizes.

Reveals the Hidden Beauty of your Hair!

CALLUSES AND CORNS

Quick, easy, and economical. Just rub it on. Jars, 30¢ and 50¢. At your druggist. Money refunded if not satisfied. Moss Co., Rochester, N. Y.

REMOVED WITH MOSCO

UP TO 100% PROFIT

FREE SAMPLES CORRESPONDENCE NOTES

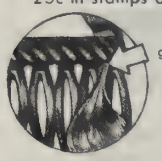
MORE MONEY FOR YOU SELL FAMOUS GREETING CARDS

You just take easy orders from friends, fellow workers. 10 big money making assortments. Sell for $1.00 each—cost you 50¢ up. Extra bonus. Experience unnecessary. Special Offer. Write for leading $1.00 All Occasion box on approval and free correspondence notes samples.

REQUEST $1 ALL OCCASION ASSORTMENT ON APPROVAL

HARRY DOEHLA CO., Dept. L-9, FITCHBURG, MASS.

Remember HAIRTAINERS* Forget HAIRFUSSING



ORIGINAL GRIP-TUTH Hair-tainer HOLDS BETTER ★ IS BETTER

25¢ THE SPRING-TOOTH Grips · HOLDS Every COIFFURE FIRM

Lasting security for every hairstyle—yours with original Grip-Tuth HAIRTAINERS*! If the teeth touch—it's an original HAIRTAINER*! Only HAIRTAINERS* g-r-i-p, can't fall out, eliminate hairfussing! BUY HAIRTAINERS* at leading beauty salons and notion counters everywhere, or send 25c in stamps or coin stating color wanted.

HAIRTAINER* grips hair here.

ORDINARY COMB lets hair strands slip through.

Mfd Pror. Pat. No. 2,196,815 DIADEM, INC., DEPT. L-4, LEOMINSTER, MASS. *HAIRTAINER Trade Mark Reg. U.S. Pat. Off.

LIN-X
Self-Polishing
WAX IS ANTI-SLIP
Even when wet!

HERE'S the wax you've been waiting for...LIN-X Self-Polishing WAX—it's anti-slip, even when water is spilled on it—proved by Underwriters' Laboratories!

And all you do is wipe it on! It dries in 20 minutes to a hard, lustrous, real-wax finish that's a joy to behold. It protects and beautifies.

Only 59¢ PT. 98¢ QT.

LIN-X CREAM POLISH
POLISHES BONE DRY!

Cleans as it polishes. Lin-x Cream Polish restores beauty to fine furniture without tiresome rubbing. It's non-oily—resists finger marks—polishes to a hard, waxy, gleaming surface.

Only 69¢ PT.

LIN-X CLEAR-GLOSS

RESISTS BOILING WATER!

For linoleum and all wood surfaces. Resists boiling water, sizzling grease, fruit juices, perfume, even alcohol. Easy to use. Easy to clean. "Just brush it on"!

Only 95¢ PT. $1.70 QT.

Today!
GET THESE GREAT
Lin-x
Reg. U.S. Pat. Off.
Home Brighteners
MADE BY THE MAKERS OF KEM-TONE

THE GIFTS OF LOVE

(Continued from Page 18)

in Cleveland with two other men named Art and Luke and played a lot of squash. There'd been an awkward moment when John asked him what his father did.

"He was in the diplomatic service, but he died before I was three."

"Gee, that's tough. Your home's in the East?"

"It was while my grandmother was living."

"Haven't you any family?" John was shocked. "Any sisters or brothers? What became of your mother?"

"She was in Switzerland with my sister when I last heard of them." That something more than annoyance in his voice again.

Marjorie suggested bridge after dinner, but they never did get around to it. John went out to the kitchen and came back with a bowl of apples and nuts.

"Anybody want an apple?"

Everybody did, and Marjorie wanted to know where they'd come from.

"The kitchen," John said lazily. "Out of a brown paper bag."

"Gosh, isn't Jane wonderful?"

The apples cracked and split when they bit into them.

"Salt, John. We ought to have some salt. 'My love is like a red red apple.' Is that anything, Jane?"

"Probably." She felt free and at ease, a familiar confidence exciting her brain—just as when she'd gone to an exam and found the questions were the ones she'd studied.

Warren was cracking nuts and dropping the meats in her lap.

"No more, thank you. I have to go." She stood up. "It's been so nice, Marjorie." What a lucky baby to be born of these people, to live in this house and share —— But some of it was hers, too, to take along and remember.

They were waiting at the foot of the stairs when she came down; Warren—she already thought of him so—in his topcoat, hat in hand.

"I'll be glad to drive you if I may."

"Thank you." She smiled. "It was a lovely evening, Marjorie. I enjoyed it, John."

The car at the curb was the raccoon-coat type: racy, long-waisted, top down and complete with full moon. He helped her in and closed the door. "How do we get to your house? The long way around."

She laughed. "I had a lot of fun tonight." It popped out like an irrepressible puppy from a basket.

"I did too. They're nice people. Nice house."

"My favorites—man, woman and house. You turn here."

He ignored her and drove straight ahead. "This makes it longer, doesn't it?"

"Yes."

"John's a good engineer, and a very shrewd buyer, but I wasn't prepared for you. Friends of the wife are usually pretty deadly."

"Are they?"

"Tell me about yourself."

"You just about know it, don't you? I went to the university here, graduated a year ago June. My father teaches chemistry."

"Your mother?"

"She died three years ago."

"Sisters, brothers?"

"I've an older sister, Linda."

"And you work in the library. How do we get there? I'd like to see it."

"Well, straight ahead three blocks. No, wait. I'd rather not."

The car slowed to a crawl. "You're a strange girl."

"Am I?"

"I'll take you home. Which way?"

"Turn left at the next corner." Look, she said severely to herself, don't you dare be disappointed. He's bored and impatient because he's not accustomed to being rebuffed. So all right. You don't want any part of him. Let him sulk.

He stopped the car. "So this is the professor's house?"

"Yes." She said it curtly, defying him to think it shabby or ugly. She'd been born in this house; everything that she loved was part of it.

He turned sideways to look at her, one arm on the steering wheel. "You should get a new publicity agent. John told me you were a professor's daughter, a librarian, a Phi Beta Kappa. Not a word about your ankles, your hair, your very beautiful mouth. I almost didn't come."

"I know." She smiled. Was the implication, Think how much she might have missed? "And then you remembered that John's a buyer and orders are hard to get, and after all it's only one evening out of a lifetime—and the food might be good."

"So that's what you do when you sit there so quietly. Think."

"There's nothing very profound about that. I've done it too. Dozens of times. Marjorie says come to dinner. John's bringing a customer. Maybe the last time it was pretty ghastly. I'd rather have been at home washing my hair, getting to bed early."

"You mean you're there other nights—when they have other men in?"

"Of course. They're my friends."

"Sort of a professional fourth? No wonder you're good at it."

A kind of fury possessed her. "I beg your pardon."

"You should. I thought tonight was something special. Aren't you afraid you'll lose your amateur standing?"

She sat straight, hands clenched in her lap. The only thing I've ever been afraid of is being hurt. And I felt so safe, so strong and sure.

"I'm going to kiss you anyway. I've wanted to all evening."

She found herself staring at his face, thinking, He's not handsome, he's cruel.

"You may kiss me if you wish," she said quietly. "I shan't feel it at all."

He took off his hat a moment, and there was a line of moisture on his forehead. "Do they take you home and want to kiss you too?"

"Please." She found the door handle and turned it. "This is too costly—for both of us. You'll have forgotten by the day after tomorrow that I irritated you."

He was on the outside, helping her out, hand under her elbow up the front steps. "Sunday," he said. "Could we go somewhere for dinner and talk a long time?"

For a moment, she wanted to say yes. Then she remembered with relief that she'd promised to go to a tea. "I'm busy Sunday."

"I'm going to see you again. You don't want me barging in on you in your library, so you'd better name a day—and soon."

She shook her head. "We haven't anything to say to each other. We're strangers who bumped on a crowded street. There's no point comparing our bruises."

"You feel that way about it?"

"Yes, I do."

"Okay. Good night."

"Good night."

She waited till she heard his car start before she bolted the front door. Sort of a professional fourth. She heard again the scathing sarcasm in his voice and shuddered, one hand stretched toward the lamp dad always left burning for her.

She went upstairs slowly, not running as she usually did. She lighted the dresser lamps and moved wearily through the familiar, nightly routine: hat in the hatbox (because it was still new), gloves and bag in the drawer, coat on a hanger, shoe trees for shoes, stockings inside out to be washed. She brushed her teeth, jerked the window open, and crept shivering between the sheets. "'Our Father ——'"

No wonder you're good at it. She had felt quietly at ease, but to him it seemed something practice had made perfect. Men did like her—she didn't wonder about that any more. So far, she hadn't met anyone she wanted to marry, but —— I'm a professional fourth because —— Her eyes widened. Tonight was different. I wouldn't admit it, he won't believe it, but Marjorie and John knew. And what am I to tell her when she asks me? How can I tell her when she invites me again that I don't want to go? I hate him.

Hours later, she awakened shaking, sat up in bed and felt the wind chill her damp body in its thin nightgown. How awful. How disgusting. She began to cry, great convulsing sobs wrenched out of the depths of her. Nice women did not dream such things. She felt her shoulders to make sure she had a nightgown on. But if she felt beyond this narrow space on which she sat, would she find him? She got out of bed and knelt at the window letting the breeze cool her face. When the terror had subsided, she moved stiffly to the bed and lay flat on her back, arms pressed against her sides.

(Continued on Page 120)

Our Last Frontiers

PIONEERING dead? Not at all, the Department of the Interior will tell you. Thousands of Americans will stake their claims to America's last land frontiers—in Alaska, and within the borders of the forty-eight states. The Government expects to offer 193,300 new farms in the Western States—fertile soil reclaimed from arid wastes by modern irrigation.

These are lands of the public domain open for homesteading and up for sale at bargain prices. They're available to men who've never worn a uniform as well as to men returning from the wars. Veterans are offered preferences and priorities under the law, but no public lands have been specifically set aside for them.

Pioneering, twentieth-century style, isn't so helter-skelter as the land grabs of the 1860's. Neither is it so convenient as buying a farm through your local real-estate broker. Many rules, cautions and helpful hints will be found in the new pamphlet,

Our Last Land Frontiers—How Veterans and Others Can Share Them

published by the Information Service of the Department of the Interior, Washington, D.C.

Mrs. Riley has a life, too

—and S.O.S. the magic cleanser gives her time to live it!

Ready-to-go Riley, she's known as. Always uses speedy S.O.S. scouring pads to whip 14-carat shines on problem pots — even burned-black ones. Like magic. Dip, rub, rinse — burned-on food goes, shine comes.

Look for the YELLOW and RED package at your favorite store

Adores her own parties — and why not? Come tomorrow, sturdy, long-lasting S.O.S. will do the work of a whole shelf-full of costly soaps, powders and scouring gadgets. Grease goes, shine comes.

Goes merrily a-Maying — sink work'll wait. For S.O.S. — with soap in the pad — cleans, scours, and polishes in one simple operation. And when handy S.O.S. locks horns with dull aluminum — dullness goes, shine comes.

S.O.S the magic cleanser of pots and pans

The S. O. S. Company, Chicago, Illinois, U. S. A. • S. O. S. Mfg. Co. of Canada, Ltd., Toronto, Ont.

Antonia Drexel Earle

High-spirited, and strikingly attractive with heavy-fringed gray eyes and jet black hair, Mrs. Lawrence W. Earle is very popular in Philadelphia's younger crowd. To help keep her fine-textured skin looking its loveliest, Mrs. Earle has a 1-Minute Mask of Pond's Vanishing Cream three or four times a week. "It's my favorite beauty pick-me-up," she says. "I can see the results right away!"

Mrs. Lawrence W. Earle loves the 1-Minute Mask of Pond's Vanishing Cream

How to glamorize your complexion—in only one minute!

Has winter coarsened your skin? Made it look scratchy and dull? "Re-style" your complexion with Mrs. Earle's 1-Minute Mask!

Mask your face in a luxurious white cloak of Pond's Vanishing Cream. Spread the cool, fragrant Cream over all but your eyes.

Quick glamour-work! The Cream works by what skin specialists call "keratolytic" action. The Mask has the power to loosen and dissolve little skin roughnesses and clinging dirt particles! Tissue off after one minute. Off come loosened "chappings," too!

Smoother... brighter... more exciting—that's the way your complexion looks! And the Mask makes it feel so beautifully soft, too. See how smoothly make-up goes on now!

Get a BIG jar of glamour-making Masks!

"A quick powder base, too!"

"I use my Pond's Vanishing Cream 3 or 4 times a week as a 1-Minute Mask. Other times I smooth it on lightly and leave it on—for powder base," says Mrs. Earle.

(Continued from Page 118)

You wanted him to kiss you. The fierceness of his anger had been fascinating—as snakes, and stories about drug addicts, and movies of Chinatown were fascinating. You thought you knew how his mouth would feel—that's why you said what you did. You wanted to feel that violence and mock it. You're not above wanting to hurt more than you've been hurt. Don't be a fool. You're twenty-two years old. You've read the novels of this enlightened age. Perhaps he even saw through your words and despises you for what you are. No! No! She rolled her head from side to side, but her body remained rigid in its anguish. Oh, how could I have dreamt anything so horrible?

She pulled her hair more severely taut next morning and stood more stiffly erect. She ate luncheon alone, concentrating on the mysterious way laundries folded hotel tablecloths, and on how the steaming tea gurgled out of the chipped spout into her cup.

That night she took Plato's The Republic out of the study and went up to bed immediately after dinner. She heard the telephone ringing and dad going to answer it. Don't let it be for me. It's not a long-distance ring. He won't call me. I don't ever want to hear his voice again.

But dad didn't say anything about the call and she didn't ask.

The third Tuesday after the unhappy Monday brought a white envelope postmarked Cleveland, addressed in unfamiliar writing. She opened it, wondering. The paper inside was blank, folded around a green theater ticket, good only Saturday afternoon, November 7. Price: $4.40. A slow smile softened her face, and she tasted the subtlety of his gesture with the quiet pleasure she felt when a new line of poetry caught her imagination. How neat, and sharply clean.

If she went—not that she would, of course, but if—would he be waiting in the lobby? Or should she go in late when it was dark? And what would he say? I'll have to ask John for his address—darn it—and mail this back. But she didn't. Wondering why he had sent it was as intriguing as the kaleidoscope dad brought her when she'd had the mumps.

She didn't say, "Dad, I'm going up to Cleveland Saturday," because she wasn't going. But Saturday morning was sunsplashed and cold, just right for a winter suit, and she had the afternoon off and a theater ticket in her purse.

"I may not be home for dinner, dad."

He smiled. "I may not be either. Let's tell Mrs. Lloyd to go home when she's finished."

As easy as that. She felt debonair and worldly watching the bleak flatlands from the train window, but the feeling deserted her in the station. Perhaps he'd done this dozens of times before. It was probably No. 57 in his bag of tricks, one of his sure-fire devices. I'll shop, she decided, walking up the stairs. No, then I should have sent the ticket back. After all, four-forty is—well, most of five dollars.

"Hello."

"Why ——" Somehow, she had expected to see him in the theater lobby. That he would figure out which train she'd take and meet it —— "You're rather amazing."

"I'm glad to see you." He'd taken off his hat. "Are you cold? Have you had lunch? Then would you like coffee? There's time."

They sat on revolving stools and drank coffee out of thick mugs. Their eyes met in the mirror opposite.

"What you're thinking shows so plainly that I ought to shake you."

"Don't," she said. "I rattle easily."

"I don't believe you, but all the same, I'm going to try it sometime." He took her magazine off the counter and dropped it in the trash can.

"Really," she protested. "Your nickel gestures are just as highhanded as your five-dollar ones. I haven't finished that magazine."

"Tell me some of the other things you haven't done."

The negative approach. I'm beginning to catch on. Not what have you done, but ——

"Well, I've never been to Europe, nor up in

FOR GENTLE RELIEF try Nujol MINERAL OIL

The easy-action laxative for ordinary constipation

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

Copr. 1945, Stanco Incorporated

TIRED? ENERGIZE BETWEEN MEALS WITH Vita-Sert

When you need extra energy, eat a Vita-Sert Bar made of rich, fine Chocolate and a full day's supply of 5 vitamins.

You Get These VITAMINS IN EVERY BAR

| | |
|---|---|
| A | 4000 I. U. |
| $B_1$ | 1 Mg. |
| $B_2$ | 2 Mg. |
| C | 30 Mg. |
| D | 400 I. U. |

These quantities are 100% of minimum adult daily requirements as set by U. S. Government.

BE ALERT—EAT VITA-SERT

SWEET Vita-Sert VITAMIN CHOCOLATE BAR COOK CHOCOLATE CO.

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

COMMENDED PARENTS' MAGAZINE CONSUMER SERVICE BUREAU

10¢ AT ALL COUNTERS

Chest Cold Misery Relieved by Moist Heat of ANTIPHLOGISTINE

SIMPLE CHEST COLD SORE THROAT BRONCHIAL IRRITATION

The moist heat of an ANTIPHLOGISTINE poultice relieves cough, tightness of chest, muscle [illegible] due to chest cold, bronchial irritation and simple sore throat.

SIMPLE SPRAIN, BRUISE SORE MUSCLES BOILS

Apply ANTIPHLOGISTINE poultice just hot enough to be comfortable—then feel the moist heat go right to work on that cough, tightness of chest, muscle soreness. Does good, feels good for several hours.

The moist heat of an ANTIPHLOGISTINE poultice also relieves pain . . . reduces swelling, limbers up stiff aching muscles due to a simple boil, sprain, bruise, similar injury or condition. Get ANTIPHLOGISTINE (Aunty Flo) in tube or can at any drug store NOW.

EXTRA MONEY QUICK

SELL $1 NAME IMPRINTED STATIONERY

FREE SAMPLES

Up to 100% profit taking easy orders from friends, fellow workers, others. Send for free samples of our new fast selling $1 line of Personal Stationery. Everybody uses. Also large line of popular Everyday greeting card assortments 35c up. Special feature 14 card $1 All Occasion assortment. Extra Bonus.

ODD GREETING CARDS 2½c UP

NEW ENGLAND ART PUBLISHERS, North Abington, Mass.

um-mm!
foot bliss for you
ooo-o!
orchids from him

FLAME—In black patent, red, blue, brown, and tan calfskin. $7.95-$8.95.

Paradise Shoes
BRAUER BROS. SHOE CO.
ST. LOUIS 8, MISSOURI
AT FINER STORES • SORRY NO MAIL ORDERS

genuine Footlets*

For Fashion and Comfort, too.
● No more shoes over bare feet! Comfort, coolness, cleanliness, daintiness demand FOOTLETS when you go barelegged. Protect your feet, shoes, stockings. Perfect fit. Newest styles. Ask for genuine FOOTLETS.
J. W. LANDENBERGER & CO.
Mfrs. of Randolph Knit Anklets
Phila. 24, Pa. *Trade Mark

Legs are young in QUAKER stockings*

Wear QUAKER for the acme in hosiery loveliness.
*REG. U. S. PAT. OFF.
QUAKER LACE COMPANY
HOSIERY DIV. • PHILADELPHIA 33, PA.

MOTHER RAMSEY'S
100% WOOL
HAND KNITTING YARNS
Buy Direct and Save!
WRITE FOR FREE SAMPLES!

P. O. BOX 2062, DEPT. L, PHILA. 3, PA.

an airplane, nor deep-sea fishing. And I've never done this before." She took the ticket out of her bag and gave it to him.

"Sure?"

"M-m-m, not death-and-taxes sure."

They were in the lobby, his coat over his arm now. Down the steep incline toward the orchestra pit. Was it snobbery to be so pleased about front-and-center seats? It was, of course.

"About your memory." He held her coat while she took her arms out of the sleeves. "Do you lie habitually, or just for effect?"

She smiled in spite of herself. "If I told you, you wouldn't know whether to believe me or not, would you?"

He bowed with mock seriousness.

They turned to their programs. Three's a Crowd. A revue in two acts. With Fred Allen, Clifton Webb, Libby Holman and Tamara Geva and a lot of other names she didn't recognize. And the intimacy of the theater is like no other intimacy, she thought, unless it's being read aloud to. A lot of people—strangers to each other—sit side by side, share an experience and go their separate ways.

The lights were dimmed, the curtain rose. Libby Holman moaned low and it was beautiful and exciting. Fred Allen juggled oranges and ad libbed brilliantly, and Clifton Webb danced with breath-taking grace, but she lost her heart to the girl. Must be Tamara Geva. What an adorable costume. Even rhinestones on her black velvet gloves. What must it feel like to stand on tiptoe that way, so beautifully arched and saucy?

Applause, and the curtain bouncing off the floor.

"Shall we go out?"

"Let's."

"Like it?"

She nodded. "I think Tamara Geva's the loveliest thing I've ever seen."

"She's good, but I came for Fred Allen."

"Didn't you love the girl?"

"Love her?" Even his eyebrows questioned her. "You're as parsimonious with your words as Calvin Coolidge and then all of a sudden you spend a word like 'love' on a ballet dancer. What do you mean, do I love her? She's a paid entertainer. I could love that column as well as I could love her."

"She's an artist."

"Curtain going up. Curtain going up."

"My dear, you started this. Certainly she's an artist. I admire her grace and respect the hard work she's put in to get where she is. And she's probably a very nice girl who helps support an invalid mother. I only answered your question as to whether or not I love her. I don't."

NEXT MONTH

Paul said slowly, "Don't make foolish boasts, Jeanne-Marie. What one swears never to do is not always the way one behaves when faced with reality. You don't know what you would do. None of us knows until the time comes."

But when the time came Jeanne-Marie knew. Because she was a woman she knew—as do all women—under the guise of love all things are possible.

Escape From Yesterday

a novel you will never forget of a time always to be remembered.

BY MARY HASTINGS BRADLEY

Complete in the May JOURNAL

You'll never worry about staying sweet and dainty if you use Fresh.

Fresh, new cream deodorant, stops perspiration worries completely.

Fresh contains the most effective perspiration-stopping ingredient known to science.

Fresh stays smooth...never gritty or sticky...doesn't dry out.

THE INSTANT MAGIC OF

All-Day Foundation Cream

IN AN EXQUISITE NEW JAR

ALL-DAY FOUNDATION, famous for its long-lasting, ever-clinging magic, now comes in an exciting new jar inspired by a priceless Chinese antique jade. It holds instantaneous beauty for your face . . . put it on and forget it, sure that the inimitable, well-groomed, soignee look is going to stay right with you all day long.

ALL-DAY FOUNDATION CREAM, in 7 shades
1.25 plus taxes

Elizabeth Arden

She walked on private ballet slippers back to their seats. What a nice person he was. He liked Fred Allen, the comedian. And what a decent, healthy attitude—to go to the theater to laugh.

He was also the kind of man, she discovered, who got you out of the crowd with your hat as it was meant to be worn, both your gloves, and no scuffs on your shoes.

"I'll get the car. Unless you'd rather walk than wait?"

"I'll walk." She saw shopwindows absently, music and color still vibrating in her memory. "Warren, thank you for taking me. I had a wonderful afternoon."

"You say the queerest things in the worst places. When you tell me you love me, we'll probably be hurtling through space from the top of Pikes Peak."

"Oh, I won't tell you I love you."

"A figure of speech," he said smoothly.

They drove out to see if the lake had frozen and he hummed Oh, Give Me Something to Remember You By. She felt a lazy quiet possess her. Why was November always described as bleak and dreary? It had the color, sharpness and strength of steel—a magnificent austerity that she liked. Waves slapped the breakwater with a cold, blank sound. Inside the car, the heater kept up a merry little whirring like a teakettle getting ready to bubble.

"Are you a long way away?"

"Not really." She turned to look at him. "Do you know the other song too?"

"Which one?"

"Body and Soul."

"I thought you might be thinking of the one Fred Allen and Clifton Webb sang. That odd one—'I saw the end of it, right at the start of it.'"

"No. But then, I never do face facts."

"I'll enter that in the left-hand column."

"What's the left-hand column?"

"The lies you tell about yourself."

"The truths on the right?"

"M'm-h'm."

"How'm I doing?"

"About even. Every other one. Know how you used to pull petals out of a daisy? She loves me, she loves me not?"

"This is where I came in."

He started the car. "Do you like French cooking? I know a place ——"

He danced as effortlessly as he drove his car, his arm around her was reassuring and impersonal. And suddenly she was wishing it all hadn't been so special, so different and set apart. She saw the end of it right at the start of it. Something she'd said on the first evening piqued him enough to arrange all this, but there must be dozens of other girls right here in town—right in his office, probably—who had everything she had and a lot more. You've had fun. Take the moment and let go.

"My train. What time is it?"

"Nine-twenty. When you get there, what? Is your father meeting you?"

"Oh, no. I'll get a cab. We'd better go, hadn't we? One of the other things I've never done is miss a train."

"You can check it off your list right now."

"You mean I have?"

"Just as good as. We couldn't make it with a police escort."

She was angry. "I've been incredibly foolish—supposing because you knew which train I'd come on, you'd also know which one I had to take back."

The little muscle in his cheek twitched above his straightening mouth. "Why I let you say the things you do, I'll never know. Do you want it in writing? I like you. I don't want you riding around in taxis at midnight. I'll drive you home."

"Oh. I'm sorry. I didn't think of your doing such a thing. It's seventy miles. It'll be late when you get back."

"Just try not to make me so mad."

Dad was still up when they got in, so she made coffee and sandwiches and they sat in the study. It turned out that Warren was a fisherman, too, so dad came right along to the front door to say good night, and she said, "Good night. I had fun." And went up to bed, furious. Three was a crowd, all right.

caution!
beware!
it's slightly dangerous

it's sleek
it's smart
it's startling

it's the new nail polish color by

La Cross

nail polish manicure implements

SCHNEFEL BROTHERS CORP., 630 FIFTH AVENUE, NEW YORK 20, N. Y.

Pretty Ankles in the EASTER PARADE!

Down the Avenue, up the Boulevard they stroll; confident, comfortably smart, American fashionables groomed perfectly from Easter Bonnet to Miracle-Tread toes.

Miracle-Tread
SMART SHOES FOR GRACEFUL POISE

$5 and $5.50
Distant Points Slightly Higher

Write for name of nearest dealer
MIRACLE-TREAD DIVISION
CRADDOCK-TERRY SHOE CORPORATION
LYNCHBURG, VIRGINIA

I could shake you, William Rankin, she stormed to the dresser drawers. He might have kissed me, he might have, he might have.

She thought, too, that he might write, but he didn't.

But the next morning the Liberty Music Shop sent her the recordings of the music from Three's a Crowd, which was nice, except there wasn't a card inside and she didn't have a phonograph. He was certainly squeamish about putting pen to paper.

And then the letter came, this time postmarked Oshkosh, Wisconsin, but not a very friendly one:

I'm going to be in Allison Friday and thought we might take the Camerons to dinner. Let me know if you can make it. I called you Tuesday and heard the operator ask your father to have you call her when you got in. What do you find to do till after three A.M.? Not that I waited up for you, but I predict you'll be an old woman with wrinkles any day now and serve you right.

"Dad, did I have a long-distance call Tuesday?"

"M-m-m-m. Yes. Yes, of course you did. I told you about it. You were to call Operator Something at Oshkosh, Wisconsin. Do you know someone there, Jane?"

She sighed. "Not quite. But I'm trying to. And you're not much help."

What a stubborn courtship it had been. She was by turns happy, exasperated, hurt, impatient or at deep peace with her world. The Sunday Marjorie had eight for supper and bridge was typical. Dad had been invited out to a venison dinner, so she ate off a tray and put on lounging pajamas to write letters until it was time to dress. Warren had said he'd get there about four, but it was just after two when the doorbell rang.

If the stars would appear one night in a thousand years, how would men believe and adore: and preserve for many generations the remembrance of the city of God which had been shown!

—RALPH WALDO EMERSON.

"You're early."

He stood hat in hand, still wearing his coat, his back against the oval-windowed front door. "I haven't seen you for over three weeks and tonight there'll be a lot of people. Kiss me, Jane."

She moved toward him automatically. This new part of herself that was entirely his doing was a strange thing that her mind and will obeyed—held in awe—and her heart accepted in quiet gratitude.

"I've missed you so terribly, my sweet," he told her.

"I've missed you, too, Warren. It's been awfully long. I've thought about you, and wondered ——"

"You wonder, but you couldn't possibly sit down and write me a letter sometime?"

No, I couldn't possibly. Strange to think of him being lonely, wanting letters. "My pen leaks," she said. "Go back to the study. The papers are there, and the new Atlantic. I'll be ready in fifteen minutes."

They drove out to the river and stood on the bluff watching the ice skaters, laughed at the snow in their faces, and sat for a while at the College Den drinking coffee before they went on to Marjorie's party. And all during the evening she had the feeling of being suspended in time. She ate, and apparently spoke every once in a while, but reality was outside. But he's here. In this room. I don't have to look at the other table to know he's here. He must be remembering those moments in the hall too. She wished it were time to go.

"Oh, I play with Warren. Good." Marjorie cut the cards and tore a page off the score pad. "Did you have fun Thanksgiving, Jane? Linda's dinner was probably gorgeous, wasn't it?"

"Complete with purée of chestnuts. Two spades."

For a second, something happened to Warren's face, but she recognized it instantly. He said nothing until they were in front of

Are you in the know?

If you're budget-bound, which should you buy?

- ☐ A suit
- ☐ A conversation print
- ☐ A fancy formal

Does your budget hoot at your wardrobe plans? Then pick one of the new soft suits. You can wear it more often — with varied accessories keyed to most every occasion. Be a shrewd shopper. Always latch on to the type of duds you can keep living with, longer. And when buying sanitary napkins, remember — you can keep comfortable with Kotex. Because Kotex is the napkin with lasting softness — made to stay soft while wearing. Naturally, Kotex is first choice.

What's the cure for this coiffure?

- ☐ An upsweep
- ☐ A snood
- ☐ A good thinning out

That bush on Nellie's head is strictly barber-bait! What's the cure? A good thinning out. A frizzy effect just can't compete with a simple, sleek coiffure. If your locks have a moppish look, have your hairdresser shear and shape them. Self-confidence goes with good grooming . . . and (on "those" days) with Kotex, too. That exclusive safety center of Kotex gives you plus protection. And to safeguard your daintiness, Kotex contains a deodorant—locked inside each napkin so it can't shake out!

If stranded on the dance floor, should you—

- ☐ Join the wallflowers
- ☐ Retreat to the dressing-room
- ☐ Yoo-hoo to the stag line

A solid joe would know better, but if ever a goon-guy thanks you for the dance and leaves you marooned—what to do?? Walk nonchalantly to the dressing-room — regain your composure and reappear later — with no one the wiser. Such trying episodes challenge your poise. Just as trying days often do . . . but not when you have the help of Kotex! For Kotex has special flat, tapered ends that don't show revealing outlines. So why be shy of the public eye? Just rely on Kotex!

*T.M. Reg. U.S. Pat. Off.

A DEODORANT in every Kotex* napkin at no extra cost

More women choose KOTEX than all other sanitary napkins*

TRIMZ
READY-PASTED BORDERS
. . . the perfect decoration for plain or painted walls

Easy to use.
Just dip in water to apply.

TRIMZ
READY-PASTED BORDERS

Be your own decorator. It's fun. There's dozens of gay, colorful patterns to harmonize with any room. A clever idea for furniture, accessories, too. No paste needed. No muss. No fuss. Packed in 12 foot rolls. 3 widths, only 15, 20 and 29c. Sold at 5&10, Department, Hardware, Variety, Paint, Chain Stores.

FREE! Ask for color catalogette showing designs, uses at your local Dealer!

© 1946, Meyercord Co.

THE Meyercord CO.
SOLE DISTRIBUTORS CHICAGO 44, ILL.

the house and he'd turned off the ignition. And then he didn't look at her.

"Where does your sister live?"

"I told you. Lakewood."

"Just outside Cleveland?"

"Yes."

"You were within twenty minutes of where I live, but you wouldn't call me."

She knew what he was thinking: that he'd driven the seventy miles between Cleveland and Allison a good many times; that he'd called her long distance almost as many times. But she offered no explanation. She had let him kiss her—wanted him to—in ways that would have shocked her a year ago. But he could never in ten thousand years say she called him up, stopped by his office, came up to his apartment.

"I'm afraid I don't understand you at all."

"Is that so important?" Wearily, silently, she began to open the door and found him ready to help her out. They'd done all this before too.

"Good night, Jane."

She heard the awful finality but only said, "Good night, Warren," and ran up the stairs to get safely in bed before she let the tears come. I can't let him go! I can't. I can't. But she knew that she would, if he didn't want her as she was.

Christmas was only two weeks away. She finished her shopping, ordered a turkey, wrapped her packages and decided to have an Open House Christmas Eve.

Dad was delighted. "I think that's fine, Jane. We ought to entertain more."

Things were going smoothly, until the afternoon John Cameron stopped at the library.

"I'm afraid I made a bad break this morning, Jane. Warren was in the office. He wished me Merry Christmas and I said, 'Save it. I'll see you at Jane's Open House.' I supposed, of course, he'd be coming. Marge and I thought you saw quite a lot of each other. I'm sorry I balled things up."

"Don't think about it. It doesn't matter. Is Marjorie feeling any better now?"

So he had been in town. And he hadn't called. She tore the letterhead off a sheet of the library's stationery and wrote:

Warren, I'm having Open House Christmas Eve and it goes in the right-hand column that I'll be terribly pleased if you can make it.

She mailed it at once and regretted her haste a hundred times, because as Christmas grew nearer, it was apparent that he wasn't coming and wasn't going to be bothered saying so—though that wasn't like him. And then a telegram came—two days before Christmas:

YOUR NOTE OF PEACE AND GOOD WILL CAUGHT UP WITH ME THIS MORNING. LUKE RECOGNIZED YOUR WRITING AND FORWARDED IT. I'LL COME EARLY. OKAY IF I BRING MY OWN MISTLETOE?

So it was a merry Christmas after all. And then New Year's with a new evening dress and the same old resolutions, and Easter with her first brown orchids, and Memorial Day when they quarreled because he came down in the morning instead of the afternoon as he'd said and was angry because she'd gone to the parade with Tom Watson.

She started to say "For heaven's sake, I went to kindergarten with him," but she didn't, because she remembered in time that Warren didn't have people in his life he'd known always—except Art, of course.

"Dad's going to trade in his car," she said. "We're driving up into Maine for our vacation."

"When's that?"

"Last two weeks in August. When's yours?"

He shrugged. "First two weeks. I'd hoped they would coincide, so it wouldn't be so long ——"

She smiled quickly. "I'll send you a picture post card. A nice gaudy one with spotted cows wading in a stream."

"Will you write me when I'm at camp?" he asked.

"I thought you were going fishing in Canada."

"That's on my vacation. I'll be at the Aberdeen Proving Grounds the middle two weeks of July."

"Do you get a month's vacation?"

"Not with pay—if that's what you mean. I'm a reserve officer. I told you, didn't I?"

"You did not. Explain."

"Well, I'm an active reserve officer in the United States Army. Army Ordnance Field Service. I go to meetings once a month, to camp for two weeks a year."

It was a whole new side of him and it disturbed her. He was always asking her questions about herself, but there were all kinds of gaps in his background he never mentioned. "What do you do?"

"Study. And drill, of course. And lose some weight, usually."

"What is your rank?"

"Captain. I haven't been doing much with it lately."

"Do you like it? I didn't know you were interested ——"

"I don't know that 'interested' is quite the word. I am, of course, when I'm studying, when I'm at camp, but I'm not an Army career man. I thought of resigning when I got out of school, but I was feeling so alone then, and it seemed a pretty real link with all the men I knew. A lot better seeing them at camp for two weeks every year than going back for something half-baked like class reunions. How about it? Will you write to me?"

"Of course." Six whole weeks out of the summer when they wouldn't see each other.

He wrote her, too, nice letters about what he was doing. From Canada he sent dad a box of lake trout and her a pair of fur mittens. There were movies on rainy nights and cold drinks on hot ones, and September and October were ripped off the calendars and she'd known him a year.

"Father, Warren and I are going to be married."

He dropped his paper and looked at her.

"We've decided on the last Wednesday in May. Does that suit you?"

"It's fine with me, of course. Except it's so soon."

"I know. I thought I wanted to be married in the fall, but Warren ——" She blushed and felt ridiculous.

"I think Warren's wise, Jane."

She let her eyes meet his for a moment. "That's that then. I'm supposed to give him a wedding present. Will you help me? Maybe we could go up to Cleveland some week end? I think a watch, don't you? I'll have to cash one of my bonds first."

"I can help you with money, Jane. Keep your bonds."

Apartment hunting. She dreaded it rather. It made things seem so final and irrevocable. But it turned out to be fun.

They signed a lease Sunday afternoon: living room, bedroom and bath, kitchenette and dining space, maid service on Thursday mornings. The furniture in the living room was mohair and horrible, in the bedroom brightly varnished veneer, but the windows were wide and on clear nights you could see the lake.

"Have you looked at everything you want to?" he asked. "Kitchen cupboards, the linen closet? You'll spend a lot more time here than I."

"I think it's nice. I like it."

"About money," he began. "Sign these cards for the bank sometime and mail them to me. I'll open a checking account for you, and in case the minister forgets to mention it, your 'I will' covers paying the bills. And a couple of other things I'll remind you of from time to time."

She shook her head. "Just let me have the egg money."

"You'll miss your salary, Jane. I don't want you to feel dependent."

How could she say she wanted to feel cared for? You've asked me to marry you and I'm going to. I want ours to be an old-fashioned marriage where men manage the money and women mind the babies. Funny, we've never discussed that either.

"Suppose you give me enough to buy the food and my clothes—though I shan't need any clothes for a long time," she added quickly. "What time is it, anyway? I'm starved."

She learned what his income was when he explained his insurance program to her, and she learned that unless she was up first in the mornings, he would be showered and shaved before the coffee started perking; that mosquitoes never bothered him, but flies made him ugly; and that though he didn't quarrel

(Continued on Page 126)

"I got up on the wrong side of the bed this morning."

HE:

How can anyone so cute be such a wow at cleaning?

SHE:

With Bon Ami, silly! A fast cleanser that doesn't leave dirt-catching scratches.

HE: Help, honey—this is something Mother didn't tell me! Never leaves what?

SHE: Scratches, darling! Most cleansers leave scratches that trap dirt and make your cleaning twice as hard.

HE: And Bon Ami doesn't do that?

SHE: Goodness, haven't you heard that Bon Ami "hasn't scratched yet!"? It just slides dirt and grease away, as smooth and easy as you please—and polishes, too. Shines tub and sink, quick as a wink!

HE: What d'ya know? The girl's a poet!

SHE: Well, I could get poetic over the way Bon Ami treats my hands—it never makes them all rough and horrid.

HE: Then it gets my vote, sugar! And just because you're smart as well as pretty, you get two good-bye kisses this morning!

US: Don't forget—pure, white Bon Ami comes in two forms! There's Powder for sinks, tubs, pots and pans, enamel stoves, refrigerators; Cake for making windows and mirrors sparkle.

Bon Ami

THE SPEEDY CLEANSER that

"hasn't scratched yet!"

Correct Design! That's the reason

it's America's favorite

Cleans better inside, outside, in between...

makes teeth Cleaner, Brighter!

CORRECT DESIGN means everything in cleaning the teeth. When the brush reaches all surfaces of the teeth to sweep them clean—inside, outside and between—cleaner, brighter teeth—a more attractive smile always result.

The Double Convex, Dr. West's Miracle-Tuft Toothbrush, does this job perfectly. It was designed by a famous dental authority for that very purpose. Curved two ways, it fits the teeth perfectly, gives the correct tuft surface for sweeping all teeth clean.

But in addition to cleaning, Dr. West's Miracle-Tuft polishes, too! Its springy "Exton" brand bristling—those miracle tufts—puts a high luster on teeth that can result only after teeth are perfectly cleansed.

So, why be satisfied with less? Get a Miracle-Tuft today! Sealed in glass for extra protection. Guaranteed for a year.

(Continued from Page 124)

with painted fingernails, he hated the smell of the wet polish. So she did her nails on cleaning days when the windows were all open, and by evening the atmosphere in the apartment was fragrant with food, new love, and narcissuses in wet pebbles.

She filled the water glasses and took the butter from the refrigerator. "Dinner, Warren."

He dropped the paper and put out his cigarette. "There was a poem the boys used to read when I was in prep school," he said; "Robert Burns' To the Lass Who Made My Bed."

"I wouldn't know about that."

"You're not supposed to. But I was just thinking that if I could write a poem, it'd be to the gal who gets my dinners."

"Oh, I like to cook."

"Couldn't you say you like to cook for me?"

She brought their plates from the kitchen and he pushed her chair in. "Yes, I think I'd go that far."

He shook his head. "Break down sometime and give me both barrels, will you? What's this? Smells good."

"The lowly frankfurter, stuffed and baked."

"Gee, it's wonderful. You know that outfit in Detroit I went to see last week? They've got a new chief engineer and I had a long talk with him when I was there. This morning we got an order in the mail that'll probably run five thousand dollars."

"Is that pretty big?"

"Not from our regular customers, but it's ten times anything I've been able to get from them so far."

"How'd you do it?"

"Well, a little bit by the side door. I've an idea the man they let out wasn't quite on the level. He's been recommending purchases at screwy prices. Three different times I've bid our cost and never got a tumble. I knew I could convince this new man, Sherman, that we make a better jig than any outfit in the country if I could get at him, but I couldn't go over the purchasing agent's head without getting myself out on a limb."

"Go on. So you ——" She put butter in her roll and waited for it to melt. "How did you get at him?"

"Those birds can be so many prima donnas sometimes. I had three tickets for the ball game and asked the buyer if he didn't think maybe we ought to ask the new man. The Indians were there, you know, playing the Tigers. That was the two of them rooting for their team against mine. We went out to dinner too." He grinned a little. "Next time I'm supposed to bring my golf clubs."

She tasted her salad critically. Too much vinegar. "You like making people do what you want them to, don't you?"

"I don't like them to see it as quick as you seem to. Is there any more dessert?"

"I'll get it." She opened the refrigerator. "I wasn't sure you'd like anything as simple as gelatin."

"It all tastes different when you do it. What's in this?"

(Continued on Page 128)

★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

Ask Any Woman

BY MARCELENE COX

A GIRL never has clothes enough, while more than one pair of pants confuses a boy.

They had lived together so long they spoke shorthand.

Safety "slowgan": Remember the turtle! It won the race.

More than one child has had his play spirit ruined by an ill-fitting gym suit.

Children should be had and seen.

Father to boy: "Don't worry about your voice cracking, son; the same thing happened to Washington and Lincoln."

Children raised under the constant admonition "Now don't muss anything up" will eventually burst out at the seams and tear up somebody's house.

•

Many a so-called heavy thinker has merely learned the weight of silence.

Properly selected books can save parents yards of words in teaching children the consequences of various kinds of conduct.

The highest goal a woman can reach is having those who belong in her home believe it is the best place on earth.

She scraped up gossip and spread it over the neighborhood as if putting jelly on bread.

The eating whims of a family can be indulged until the only thing all will eat is breast of fowl.

Three things a man cannot do: Tune a radio in on the hairline; raise a shade to an even point; dress himself without saying where.

Child psychologists and photographers should have children of their own.

A child can be made to eat his vegetables if properly handled; just tell him he can't have any.

A happy child is not one who is never unhappy, but one who is spared unnecessary grief, fear and emotional upsets.

The reason some parents really enjoy their children is that they take the time to live with them.

Some men can scarcely be blamed for wanting to go back to the days when all a woman could join was the Ladies' Aid.

•

Heredity: The thing a child gets from the other side of the family.

With the return of nylons no woman now has to leave the party before her stockings become baggy.

Just as most women come to the time of wanting their diamonds reset, so every marriage comes to a time when some thought should be given to a change of setting . . . while keeping the same jewel.

A man can be so useful around a house he is practically a menace, as the one who kept his wife's kitchen cutlery so well sharpened that she usually attended a bridge party with all her fingers tied up.

Young daughter explaining the amount of seasoning she has used: "It was about a spoonful of pinch, mother."

A person who can be shocked by the questions and actions of a child is not fit to be a parent.

My grandmother used to say, "Stand up for a child in front of outsiders, but when you get him in the house tan him good.

Question from a little girl: "How can I tell who looks like me?"

★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

Black's the thing this Spring!

And heavy gold jewelry is lovely with it! But you'll spoil your dress, your glamour, too, if you don't guard against perspiration and odor! Use Arrid daily! Arrid is nearly twice as effective in stopping perspiration as any other leading deodorant cream.

Springtime Evening Drama

The new, long Sarong skirt . . . slim and sleek. The casual black top, with the season's smartest sleeve! Wear it with short daytime skirts, too . . . but always protect it (and you) from perspiration and odor. Use Arrid daily! No other deodorant stops perspiration and odor so effectively, yet so safely . . . only Arrid!

★ In the same familiar package . . . marked with a star above the price

Announcing the new Improved ★ POSTWAR ARRID

No other Deodorant

stops perspiration and odor

so effectively, yet so safely![1]

It's the improved deodorant you've been waiting for! The new, soft, smooth, creamy deodorant that gives you the maximum protection possible against perspiration and odor with safety to your skin and clothes! No other deodorant of any sort . . . liquid or cream . . . meets the standard set by this wonderful new Postwar Arrid for stopping perspiration and odor with safety!

so Soft! so Smooth! so Creamy!

Only safe, gentle Arrid

gives you this thorough protection

1. No other deodorant stops perspiration and odor so effectively, yet so safely. 1
2. Nearly twice as effective in stopping perspiration as any other leading deodorant cream.
3. Does not rot clothes. Greaseless and stainless, too.
4. Safe for skin. Non-irritating. Antiseptic.
5. Soft, smooth, creamy . . . easy to apply. Just rub in well, no waiting to dry!

39¢ plus tax Also 10¢ and 59¢

ARRID...nearly twice as effective in stopping perspiration as any other leading deodorant cream!

(1) Based on tests of leading and other deodorants.

SOME OF THE MANY STARS WHO USE ARRID

Carol Bruce · Barbara Bel Geddes · Georgia Gibbs
Grace Moore · Jessica Dragonette · Jane Froman · Diana Barrymore

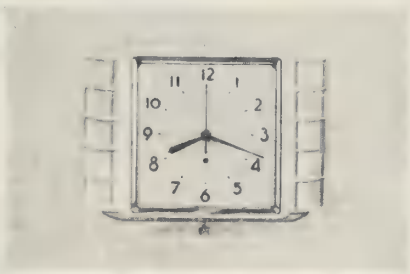
"Never nags me when I'm late for supper. Knows I've a weakness for fine clocks. So she surprises me with this Seth Thomas electric for my desk. Says I've absolutely no excuse now for missing the 5:35!"*

There's a Seth Thomas self-starting electric or spring-wound clock for every purpose ... home ... office ... or as the "perfect" gift. Traditionally famed for accuracy, dependability and long life. Many new, smartly styled models are on their way. They're beauties. You'll see these fine clocks soon in better stores everywhere. Seth Thomas Clocks, Thomaston, Connecticut.



*Seth Thomas is Reg. U. S. Pat. Off.

CAPSTAN—bright and cheery, distinctly nautical. An electric clock that appeals to men. $10.95*

CONSOLE—modern electric clock strikes hour and half hour. Rich mahogany case. $22.50*

HITT—a streamlined electric kitchen clock. Attractive ivory plastic case. Size 8½" x 6¼". $4.95*

PYPER—a new electric alarm in ivory plastic case. Plain dial $4.95.* Luminous dial $5.95*

*No tax included.

Seth Thomas

"The finest name in clocks"

SELF-STARTING ELECTRIC OR SPRING-WOUND

A product of GENERAL TIME Instruments Corporation

Pictured on the desk: The "Yukon"—framed in black and gold color.

(Continued from Page 126)

"Sherry. What are you figuring up?"

He turned his spoon thoughtfully. "Let me see how to say it. Dinner was swell. I know I'm well nourished as well as well fed, but you did it for less than a dollar for the two of us, didn't you? Does it mean your food money's running low?"

"A little. I bought something I wanted, and for ordering early, I got a discount."

"That's nuts, Jane. Why didn't you tell me and I'd write a check. I don't want you worrying about making ends meet. What'd you buy anyway?"

"Something I wanted."

"I hope so. Well, how much did it cost?"

"Warren, please. It was something extravagant, but it's all paid for now and I've enough left to feed us till next Wednesday."

"Jane, was it clothes?"

"No." She began clearing the table.

"Something for the apartment?"

"Oh, dear. It was a symphony ticket."

"Just one?"

"No, for the season."

"You didn't get that for less than fifty dollars."

"Sixty-five," she said wearily. "It's the evening series. They're better than the afternoon ones."

"Wait a minute. You couldn't possibly have saved sixty-five dollars out of what you get. You used some of your own money."

"Not very much. And what if I did?"

"I asked you not to."

"Well, then you can pay me back."

"I'm not sure I want to—now. If you don't mind, why only one ticket? Don't you want me tagging along?"

"Warren, don't speak to me that way."

"What am I supposed to do when you're at the concerts?"

"What you always do on Thursday nights—play poker. Oh, let's not quarrel. I don't mind your playing. I just thought it'd be a good night for me to be gone too. And I've wanted a season ticket for the symphony ever since I can remember."

"Have you figured out what we do about the car? Are we going to alternate—or just flip for it?"

"I can take the Rapid Transit. I won't be dressing."

"It doesn't matter to you that I don't want you out alone at night. Jane, don't you want to be married?"

"Does being married mean that I have to explain everything I do?"

"I think it needs explaining that when I tried to give you a checking account, you wouldn't have any part of it, and for some obscure reason, you won't ask me for money."

"I'll ask them to refund my money," she said dully. "I didn't know you'd feel this way about it." She walked toward the living room.

"Appeasement," he said, following her, "is not solution. Don't you think you ought to know how I feel? And don't you think you should let me know what you——"

"It's not exactly a secret that I like to go to the concerts."

"All right, you were ahead of me on that. I haven't thought about next winter yet. It's still July."

"Well, I don't expect you to give up something you've been doing for years, just because you're married."

"Jane, don't say that again. 'Just because I'm married.' Don't you know I'd like to tell Luke and Art poker would be some other night or they could count me out—that you want me to go to the symphony with you on Thursdays? Don't you know I want to do things for you? And doesn't it mean anything to you that for the first time in my life I can decently and honestly make claims on another human being?"

She crossed over to where he was standing, but she didn't touch him. "I can only ask you to believe that I didn't mean to hurt you. I don't want to. I'm awkard because I can't make myself believe you love me as much as you say. Write a check for two tickets if we can afford it. And kiss me, please."

"Lily of the Valley" LUNCHEON SET BY BUCILLA

Bucilla DECORATIVE LINENS

The Mark of Good Taste and Good Value

Dainty as its flower name-sake ... this 5-pc. hand-printed bridge set by Bucilla. Smartly done in two-tone design on durable Duratex—with an affinity for tubbing. Just one of Bucilla's refreshing ideas for ready-to-use Linens ... towels, cloths, luncheon sets. At all good stores.

Other Famous Bucilla Products

Stamped Needlework — Knitting Yarns
Embroidery Flosses — Crochet Cottons

230 FIFTH AVENUE, NEW YORK 1, N. Y.

"Warren, do you believe this?" She flipped the pages of a magazine. "It says here that the most successful marriages are those contracted between two first-born children, scaling down to the least successful, those in which each partner was an only child."

"What of it?"

"Well, we're both second children with no one younger in the family. And they'd probably say you were brought up as an only child."

"Got two strikes on us before we're married a year? He's making generalizations—we can still be the exception."

She smiled. "All the same, I don't like his saying what he does."

"He probably wasn't talking to you. Confine your recipe reading to cookbooks."

"You have the soul of an oyster," she said, but she thought what nice, sensible minds men had. She'd fortified herself with a hundred articles on the adjustments required in marriage and what happened? Nothing. It was like scanning the sky, loading yourself with rubbers, umbrella and raincoat, only to have it not rain after all.

Humbly we thank those who are helping us to rise. Once we have succeeded we only thank our own merit.
—JOHN PETIT-SENN.

"What are you talking about?" He was reconciling his bank statement and she was mending his socks.

"Us."

"Well, say it out loud."

She tapped her thimble on the wooden darning egg. "I was thinking I'm very glad you asked me to come live with you and be your love."

"I'm smart."

Only very recently had he begun this tongue-in-cheek talk and it pleased her. The Siegfried-Brünnehilde side of their loving was too violent for twenty-four hours a day and out of key with homely details like getting the oil changed in the car and sending their winter clothes to storage.

He put down his pencil. "My dear, shall we retire?"

"No. I want to hear Paul Whiteman. Maybe Ramona will play Get Out of Town."

He went back to his figures. "And me, a traveling salesman."

She smiled, and turned to change the radio station. Slip covers, draperies and bric-a-brac had done a lot for the apartment, but the radio was so ugly. "Warren, when we get rich, let's buy a radio with a phonograph in it. I saw a nice little one the other day—a Salem chest."

"I'm mad at you."

"Will it take you long to get over it?"

"About half an hour. I'll give you a discount if you make me a sandwich."

"Okay." Women's minds are all fuzzy at the edges, she thought, slicing tomatoes. They want so many little things and work so hard to get them, they haven't time for living. Why, if Love, himself, nudged them across the counter at a month-end sale, they'd give him a dirty look and snatch at a bargain house dress. But Warren had known exactly what he wanted out of marriage, and made her know too. A suitable epitaph for me would be: She did her learning the hard way.

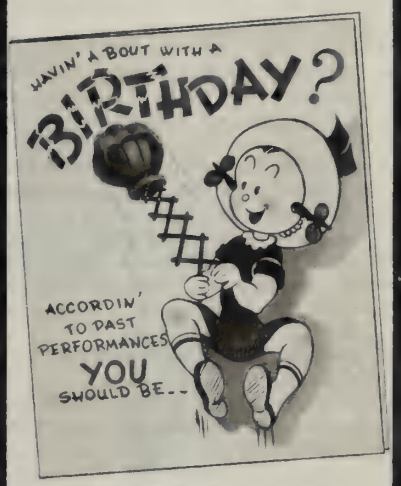
And then summer was over. People were sending in for football tickets, dusk came earlier, and crooners lamented faded summer loves. Warren was to be out of town from Monday till Friday, but instead of going home as she usually did, she decided to shop and get her clothes in order for fall. She found just the blouse to perk up her old beaver-trimmed suit, a really stunning antelope bag, and a marvelous wool dress that was neither green nor gold and had just the right kind of sleeves for mother's old bracelets, but there was not a brown hat in the city of Cleveland she could wear. They either looked like something Mrs. Haskell might pick up at the church rummage sale or what

"Don't go in, Dear! I'm sure I smell



Expello

EXPELLO serves notice on all moths to stay out. Its penetrating fumes kill all forms of moth life...quickly. Ask for Expello at your druggist, grocery or department store. Expello Moth Destroyers and Insecticides available in spray, pellet or crystal forms.

Judson Dunaway Corporation, Dover, N. H.
(formerly Expello Corporation)

Try VANISH THE NEW TOILET BOWL CLEANSER AND DEODORANT

MEET
Myrtle ON STANLEY
GREETING CARDS!

COPYRIGHT 1946, KING FEATURES SYNDICATE, INC.

Many Stanley Cards now feature this famous comic-page character. Ask for them at your favorite dealer.

Now, plan a...
Beautiful Wedding

Veils and cake, bridesmaids and breakfasts, charming home and sterling silver . . . these replace the furlough wedding with "good-bye" almost immediately following "I do." Gorham Sterling offers you a choice of about 12 favorite patterns in basic six-piece place-settings comprising tea spoon, luncheon knife and fork, salad fork, cream soup spoon, butter spreader, averaging about $23*. When you buy Gorham Sterling, you buy solid silver with a great tradition, the aristocrat of American dinner tables for over a hundred years.

Gorham
STERLING
America's Leading Silversmiths since 1831
PROVIDENCE 7, RHODE ISLAND

*Inc. Fed. Tax
© 1946 The Gorham Company

Gown by Jay Thorpe

HAPPY NEWS! Larger quantities of ScotTowels are now being rushed to dealers. Far more are being made than ever before.

So begin to make fuller use of these wonderful "Thirsty Fibre" towels—the towels you don't have to wash!

ScotTowels save wear and tear on good linens. And the whole family will enjoy having a clean, fresh towel each time they wash their hands.

In the kitchen, ScotTowels make a dozen daily chores easier, cleaner, faster—at a cost of only 7¢ a week. 150 to a roll. Sealed against dust and handling. Scott Paper Co., Chester, Pa.

Save Time! Use ScotTowels to drain bacon, flour fish and catch vegetable peels. Then—in just one motion—throw away both towel and scraps!

Save Bother! Use ScotTowels to wipe up spills and clean grease from frying pan. No stained towels and dishrags to scrub out and boil!

Save Towels! Use ScotTowels to dry pots and pans—and keep them handy for the children. Fewer dishtowels and hand towels in the wash!

Made Strong to Work Hard!

Trade Marks "ScotTowels" and "Thirsty Fibre" Reg. U. S. Pat. Off.

Best & Co. illustrated in their catalogue for teen-agers.

"I'm sorry, madam, that's everything I have in large head sizes."

She'd heard it so many times she'd almost bitten a hole in her lip to keep from crying out that she didn't have a big head. They'd done something treasonous to the hats. Finally, one girl, nicer than the rest, didn't bring any hats at all.

"Nobody young has long hair any more," she said. "At least, the only hats we have that will accommodate a knot are for older women. Have you thought of cutting your hair?"

She hadn't, but the idea was rather exciting. Linda's had been short for a couple of years, and Marjorie cut hers last Christmas. Really, now that she thought of it, everybody had short hair except her.

She tried a couple of side-street milliners, and then—more idly than intentionally—went up to the beauty shop where once in the early summer she'd gone to have her hair thinned.

"Emil, what do you think about cutting my hair?"

"No. I wouldn't cut it. You're different looking. It's becoming as it is."

"I can't get a hat."

"Wear last year's."

She was leafing through a magazine of hair styles. "This is pretty. Would mine look anything like that?"

"Well, yes—but short hair's a lot of trouble."

"I think I'd like it for a change. I'll make an appointment."

"I can do it right now if you've decided to have it done."

She felt the paper neckband like a dog collar on her throat, saw herself shrouded in

The difference between salary and income is that salary is money you get for what you do yourself and income is money you get for what your father did.

—Western Mail:
Quoted in Esar's Joke Dictionary. (Harvest House)

the white barber's apron, and closed her eyes quickly as the first long lock fell to the floor. She was swung this way and that, but still she didn't look toward the blue-framed mirror. And instead of feeling jaunty like the new hats, she felt as foolishly naked as a clipped puppy.

And she looked awful. Emil must have known she thought so because he said, "It's a simple style, but perhaps you'd better let me set it for you this time."

"Please do." Oh, why had she been so mad?

The drier was a new experience, too, and she marveled at the other women reading so complacently under their whirring silver hoods. But of course, they knew what they'd look like.

The girl said she was dry and sent her back to the booth. Emil shook a comb from its paper bag.

"Well, now we'll see." He took the pins out and combed and brushed, combed and brushed. And it looked darling. She smiled delightedly.

"I like it."

"And it makes you look so much younger—youthful."

Well, she supposed it did—though that hadn't been the point exactly. Twenty-four wasn't too terribly old—long hair or short.

There was still time for hat hunting, and now there were dozens to choose from, and she decided on a brown suède exactly the color of her bag. It was a Robin Hood hat, cocksure and laughing. That was Tuesday—still three days till Warren would be home. By Friday, she'd almost forgotten her daring and concentrated on his favorite foods: salmon steaks and baked potatoes, asparagus with hollandaise. She whipped the cream for the apple-crumble pudding and set the gate-leg table in the living room with candles and bronze button mums and wore her stiff silk house coat.

Don't be a RUBBIT!

A Rubbit is a silly slow-poke! She spends hours rubbing and scrubbing at smutchy, crusty pans with a spineless, no-count rag. She needs a spunky square, metal-fiber Brillo pad!

BRILLO shines 'em quick!

Just a brisk swoop with a Brillo pad wipes off scorchy crust! Whisks grease away! And Brillo's special-formula polishing soap shines up pots and pans like new! Brillo is fast! Brillo is easy! Brillo is neat! Brillo's grand for keeping aluminums bright. Don't be a Rubbit! Today—stock up on Brillo.

BRILLO
—made 2 ways both easy—both quick!

★ Brillo Soap Pads
—soap-filled pads. In the red box.

★ Brillo Cleanser
—separate pads and soap —green box.

Keeps aluminum brilliant!

She heard his key in the door and ran to open it. "I'm so glad you're back," she said, kissing him. "You've time for a shower." The narrow dark corridor was entry as well as connecting line from the living room to the bedroom.

Men weren't supposed to approve of only candlelight, but Warren had never objected, and the rough plaster walls were on the hideous side. She heard him close the closet door for the last time, put the evening paper by his chair and waited on the hassock.

"You look awfully good to me," he said lazily. "I keep forgetting I married a beautiful woman."

"Oh, Warren."

"All right, you're an ugly good-for-nothing."

"That's probably truer." She kept waiting and waiting for him to say something about her hair. Of course, she had worn it different ways when it was long, and he hadn't always noticed. The coffeepot was empty and she went to the kitchen to refill it.

"Jane, have you done something to your hair?"

"Uh-huh."

"Come here."

She came back with the coffee.

"You've had it cut off."

"Yes," she said. "Do you like it?" She was filling his cup, not looking at his face.

"I do not. Why did you do it?"

It seemed so silly now: I couldn't get a hat. She raised her cup. "I wanted to."

Dinner was over without ever having ended. He went to his chair and opened the paper while she cleared the table and ran water in the dishpan. He always helped with the dinner dishes. Two hot tears burned on her cheekbones.

She finished cleaning the sink and put hand lotion on her hands. Well, she couldn't stay in the kitchen forever, so she'd have to walk through the living room where he was sulking in his outraged masculinity. As if cutting your hair had anything to do with "for richer, for poorer; in sickness and in health."

He was still behind his paper and she intended to pick up her book and—when she felt like it—go to bed. But she couldn't. They were quarreling. And they hadn't quarreled since that business of the symphony tickets. She went to the bedroom, powdered her nose, put on fresh lipstick, and went back. There wasn't a thing to be done to her hair. And if he says one word about crowning glory, I'll crown him.

"Warren."

"Yes." But he didn't drop the paper.

"LOOK at me, please." She'd seen that anger before too. The night they met. Sort of a professional fourth. But that was two years ago. Now they'd been married four months, living together and loving. She sat on the footstool. "Are you being fair to me?"

"That's my line, isn't it?"

"I don't think so. If you decided to part your hair in the middle or grow a beard, I might say I liked you better the other way—if you asked—but I'd still feel it was your prerogative to do as you wished."

"We're discussing feelings," he said, and his voice was tight and arrogant. "They aren't necessarily reasonable."

"I know."

"Then don't be so smug about what you'd feel. It doesn't follow that that's what I'm going to feel."

She sat very still. "I love you. I wouldn't knowingly hurt you."

"You're my wife." There was all the weight of possession in the way he said it, and none of the pride. "Other men dance with you, and you are in their arms; we go swimming and you're more naked than when you go to bed at night."

"Warren, you're being fantastic. My swimming suit's less cutaway than anyone else's. And I don't dance ——"

"I KNOW that, Jane. I'm trying to explain. When men look at you—and they do—I think, 'Well, look; she's mine. She belongs to me.' I try not to watch when you're dancing with someone else. I try not to wonder what he's said that's making you laugh. I tell myself you love me. I remember that when we get home, you'll ask me if I'm hungry, if I've set the clock, and you'll take the pins out of your hair and let it fall behind your shoulders. They don't see you that way. They don't see you soft, complying ——"

Complying. She might have said "I do belong to you" and felt his hands gripping her wrists, his mouth on hers, but it wouldn't have been true—then. The room was quiet, waiting.

"I didn't know," she said slowly. "Again, I should have, but I didn't. I'll let it grow long."

It was peace—of a sort—but she was suspicious of it. Something was gone. Something much more than the knot of hair at the back of her neck.

They had dinner in town one night and she wore her Robin Hood hat for the first time. Their eyes met above the stiff menu cards, and he nodded.

"Very nice. You'd make quite a cover girl."

That from him. "Are you being deliberately cruel?"

"No-o." His tone said he was tired of the subject. "Just a variation on my usual theme: you're very beautiful." Not: "I've married a beautiful woman." She wanted to beat her fists against his chest, to sob out that he couldn't do this to her—to both of them—but she only sat there in her gay, cocksure hat and lifted her chin, and drew her mental cloak more closely about her.

The next morning she couldn't remember what they'd eaten, or what the movie had been about. She pushed the vacuum cleaner into an awkward corner.

"I'm going to Pittsburgh for a couple of days. Will you go home?"

"Yes, I think so."

But she didn't. She couldn't trust herself to face dad. His eyes saw too much. So she stayed in the apartment. What was wrong? Something more than having cut her hair. She'd tried terribly hard to be the complete wife. Well, he'd be home tomorrow.

She went to bed early and was awakened a little after midnight by his key in the lock. She waited for him to turn on the light and discover her, but he went to the living room. She frowned, listening to his aimless walking around. But of course. He thought he was alone. She reached for her robe and tiptoed down the hall.

Only the bridge lamp burned, a pool of yellow at its base, the rest of the room in shadow. He was standing at the bookshelves, still in his topcoat, and one by one he picked up the three little antique cups that said "A Gift," "From a Friend," and "To My Love." And then, still without taking off his coat, he slumped into his chair, hands covering his face. Oh, was he crying?

"Warren, darling, what is it?" She was on her knees beside his chair.

(Continued on Page 133)

★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

Return

BY JEHANNE DE MARE

I shall not walk the flower-spangled meadow
Lest sure remembrance destroy the heart;
Where poppies, amethyst and crimson,
Unfold spring's iridescent start.

This is the field where we had walked together,
But this is not the grass blade, nor the leaf,
Nor do you walk beside me; and the earth
Is desolate, except for grief.

★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

Breakfast Bonanza...

SPAM* 'N' EGGS

SPAM* 'N' EGGS

FROM THE HORMEL MENU FILES

Quickly browned slices of Spam go great with fried eggs—or boiled, scrambled, omelets. For variety, serve broiled or fried Spam with waffles or pancakes. Breakfast, lunch, supper, late snacks—any time you're hungry for something good!

SPAM IN THE LUNCH BOX

Make big hearty Spamwiches...plain, or spread with meat sauce, mustard, chopped pickle. Balance with raw vegetables, cup salad, fruit, cookies or cake. Unpacked with pride, eaten with relish!

COLD OR HOT SPAM HITS THE SPOT!

*"Spam" is a registered trademark. It identifies a pure pork product—packed only in 12-ounce tins—made exclusively by Geo. A. Hormel & Co., Austin, Minn.

HORMEL GOOD FOODS

P.S. You'll like Hormel Chili Con Carne! Everybody likes chili the way Hormel makes it because Hormel Chili is different. You'll like it, too. Double Your Money Back If You Don't!

New Book Saves up to ½ your Baking Time!

Ann Pillsbury's amazing discovery* reveals short cut to glorious baking

Do you sidestep the baking of tantalizing treats like these? Coffee cakes, rolls, fruit desserts—good things your family wants? You've never had the time? All right, then this exciting new book is for you! Makes it easy and quick—really no trick—to get baking you'll be proud to carry to the table.

BIG • COLORFUL • 64 PAGES!

Ann Pillsbury's colorful book tells all. 64 pages, size 6 x 9 inches. It is just off the presses; first come, first served. To be sure of getting your personal copy, send ONLY 25c in coin. Fill out and mail the coupon right now!

* This method Guaranteed only with Pillsbury's Best

Pre-views from Ann Pillsbury's NEW BOOK!

You Bake your Best with Pillsbury's Best

Get yours Today

CLIP AND MAIL COUPON TODAY!

PILLSBURY MILLS, INC.,
BOX 1186—DEPT. L,
MINNEAPOLIS, MINNESOTA

I enclose 25c in coin. Please send Ann Pillsbury's colorful new book.

NAME_____

STREET_____

CITY_____ STATE_____

(OFFER GOOD IN CONTINENTAL U. S. ONLY AND EXPIRES MAY 25, 1946)

COPYRIGHT 1946, PILLSBURY MILLS, INC. PILLSBURY'S REG. U. S. PAT. OFF.

(Continued from Page 131)

"Oh, hello, Jane. I didn't know you were here."

"What is it, dear? Did something go wrong on your trip?"

"Nothing—just thinking. When'd you come back?"

"I didn't go."

"Why not?"

She shrugged. "A little private penance. Oh, Warren, I've been so lonely. I'm letting my hair grow. You can't stop loving me just because ——"

"Get it straight. I don't stop loving you. But I do wonder if you aren't in this with the top of your mind and little of your heart."

He did know then. How awful. She smiled, a futile, foolish little weak smile. "I love you with all that's best in me," she said. "Isn't that enough?"

"If it's true, it's enough, and more than I deserve, probably."

"Then let's be happy. Think, we're having a whole extra night together we didn't know we would." They ate grilled-cheese sandwiches and drank coffee and laughed at bad dreams. "How'd you happen to come back tonight?"

His hand under her chin was vise-like. "I was homesick. I wanted to smell your perfume, to use our towels and sleep in our bed. Even without you, it's ——"

Was this love—this awful urgency, this dreadful desperation? It must be. You couldn't think otherwise. Yet in the very act of surrender and being possessed, the unrelenting mind repeated its foolish little words: I'm Jane. This is Warren whom I love.

He'd said she needn't be alone, yet she always was when she needed most a wordless reiteration that he loved her for something more than this. Possession attained, he slept. Love slunk away with averted face, leaving her devastated and alone in the darkness. Painfully, patiently she set about gathering up the bits of her shattered composure. Perhaps if he were less subtle, if he didn't know so exactly how to fathom the depths of passion without violating the surface stillness? But no. She bit her lips, pressing cold hands against her lean thighs. He'd called her "my dearest" tonight. He hadn't done that for a long time. He'd come home because he'd wanted the comfort of their things around him. She relaxed slightly. He loved her. She'd been stupid and awkward, but she wouldn't be again. She could make him happy and content without being less herself, without letting him become indispensable to her peace.

Saturdays, she thought, setting the breakfast table. When I get rich, I'll have a whole month of them strung right after each other and I'll have bacon on every one with two cups of coffee and a brand-new New Yorker to boot. She poured cream in the pitcher and put bread in the toaster.

"Warren ——"

"Present."

She jumped. "It's downright indecent the way you lurk around ——"

He carried the coffee cups to the table. "It's my house and I can lurk if I want to—but I wasn't. I was thinking very nice thoughts."

"For instance."

"That you're merry as a Morris dancer."

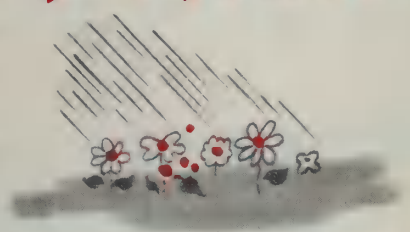
"I don't care for it—sounds like something with hips."

"That'd be disgusting, of course." He squinted at the thermometer outside the window. "Frost last night."

"Was there? I'll get the other blanket from the locker. Is this the janitor's day off? I want to borrow his screw driver."

"Why do you want to borrow a screw driver when there's a perfectly respectable one right in the family?"

"Honestly? Where?" She buttered more toast and refilled his cup. "Imagine us having a screw driver. It sort of makes us respectable. Almost as good as having a basement."



"Aren't you happy here? Don't you like living in an apartment?"

"Of course I do. Will you get the screw driver before you go?"

(Continued on Page 135)

April Showers Bring May Flowers

—so says the old rhyme. But if you really want a flower garden you'll have to add your own labors to April's raindrops. The experienced gardener as well as the novice will find JOURNAL booklets helpful. Study our list and order those you think will be best for you.

JOURNAL REFERENCE LIBRARY

GARDENING INSIDE AND OUT

1667. PLANNING AND BUILDING THE GARDEN. How to make paths of gravel, grass or brick, and garden steps that are easy to use and have solid foundations. How to build a dry stone wall and a picket fence. The comparative advantages of lattice and wire fences and hedges. How to build a pool and place garden furniture. 10c.

1663. HOW TO PREPARE YOUR GARDEN SOIL. Essential elements for successful growing; how to determine the type; how to neutralize acid or alkaline soil. How to prepare new beds. 5c.

1664. YOUR GARDEN OF PERENNIALS. How to prepare the soil and drain the beds. Growing from seeds, seedlings or "divisions" of mature plants. Gives a list of popular varieties. 5c.

1662. YOUR GARDEN OF ANNUAL FLOWERS. Quality of soil required. How to plant seeds, transplant seedlings and care for the growing plants. A list of varieties is given. 5c.

1666. SHRUBS AND TREES FOR THE GARDEN. How to prepare the soil, plant and care for trees and shrubs. Discusses proper location for shade trees, small flowering trees and shrubs. Offers a selected list of dependable varieties. 5c.

1605. BULBS BEFORE TULIPS. How to select the bulbs and prepare the bed for them. Directions for planting, mulching and caring for the bulbs. Includes a list of popular varieties. 5c.

1665. YOUR INDOOR GARDEN. How to overcome dryness and provide drainage for potted plants. When to water them and how to combat insect pests. Includes information on popular varieties. 5c.

1429. WINDOW-BOX GREENHOUSE. How to make a greenhouse frame that can easily be managed indoors through a window. 10c.

2099. GERANIUMS AS A HOBBY. Discussion of the varieties most popular with hobbyists. Rules for propagating and care. 10c.

2209. AFRICAN VIOLETS. Tells of the discovery of this popular plant and its subsequent development. Gives detailed rules for care and propagation and a list of fifteen varieties. 10c.

TO MAKE FOR THE GARDEN

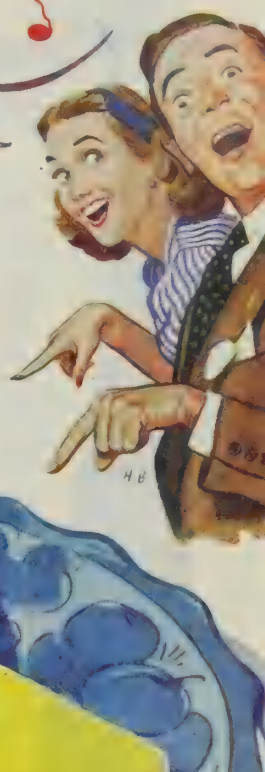
1427. GARDEN PIECES. Directions for making a simple arbor, a sawbuck table with matching bench, and a tarpaulin-lined paddle pan for the little tots. 10c.

1883. OUTDOOR FIREPLACE. Working drawings and instructions for making an outdoor fireplace of stone, brick or rammed earth. 25c.

1428. CHICKEN HOUSE. Directions for building a house for a back-yard flock. This also includes a stencil design for a handsome hen to decorate the chicken-house wall. 25c.



1426. PLAYGROUND EQUIPMENT. Working drawings for constructing a swing, a seesaw, horizontal bars, a sand pan and a slide. 25c.

1424. A GARDEN OF ANIMALS. Working drawings for building a stable, fence, kennel or goat house, rabbit hutch or pheasant coop, rabbit run or pheasant yard. For week-end farmers. 25c.

We will gladly send any of these booklets if you'll order by name and number. They will be mailed anywhere in the United States and Canada upon receipt of stamps, cash, check or money order. Do not send stamped, addressed envelopes or Victory Stamps. Readers in all foreign countries should send International Reply Coupons, purchased at their post office. Please address all requests to the Reference Library, Ladies' Home Journal, Philadelphia 5, Penna.

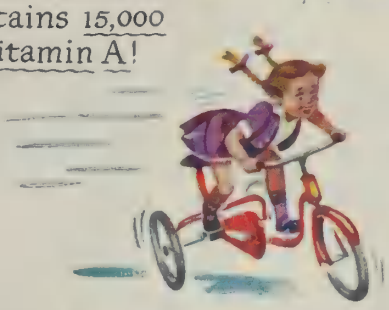
Flavor! Nutrition! Economy-e-e!

Blue Bonnet Margarine Gives "ALL 3"



Flavor—delicious flavor! Fresh, delicate, country-sweet. Just try BLUE BONNET. You'll say, "I couldn't ask for a finer table spread!"

BLUE BONNET comes white—color for table use

Nutrition—yes, proved nutrition! BLUE BONNET is not only rich in Food-Energy, but every fresh, sweet pound contains 15,000 units of Vitamin A!

Listen to FRED ALLEN On the air for BLUE BONNET! NBC Network Sundays, following EDGAR BERGEN—CHARLIE McCARTHY

Economy—yes, your pocketbook will tell you that you really save with BLUE BONNET! Why, it costs so little you can spread it on twice as thick!

Remember how far this flavor will go!

Zesty freshness—lively tropic goodness!
You're sure of both with Del Monte Brand Pineapple.
Try it out in these treats—see for yourself!

Flavor extenders? These are dandies!

Even though it's not so easy to find just now, you do know that Del Monte Pineapple is the same quality as always—juicy, tender, tart-sweet. And you'll find that same sunny flavor in all three styles. So long as it's Del Monte, it's bound to live up to your fondest dreams of rich, golden pineapple!

All this from one No. 2½ can of Del Monte Sliced Pineapple.

Make 4-decker "salad sandwich" as shown, with drained pineapple slices and cream cheese softened with pineapple syrup. Chill 2 hrs., garnish with cheese balls and red gelatin. For formal service, quarter pineapple slices before making "sandwich."

Use remaining 4 slices in "Tropic Gingerbread" dessert. Warm slices in the syrup, serve on hot gingerbread.

All this from one No. 2 can of Del Monte Crushed Pineapple.

Remember, a delicious pineapple meringue pie takes only 1 cup of crushed pineapple. Remainder (about 1½ cups) can top red apple and cabbage slaw made with boiled dressing (as shown). Mix some of the pineapple in slaw if desired.

And as for Del Monte Pineapple Juice—just drink it! That zippy flavor and sparkling color makes any meal fun!

Remember! Del Monte puts

flavor first

- ✓ In Growing
- ✓ In Picking
- ✓ In Packing
- ✓ In Testing

SLICED • CRUSHED
JUICE

Del Monte PINEAPPLE

(Continued from Page 133)

"If you're a nice girl, I might even fix natever you want repaired. Unless it's a ntraption for a canary."

But of course he had to finish the paper st, and then take the golf balls out of his ig and wash every precious one—with her ilbrush, she suspected—and fill his lighter. e'd finished the dishes and changed the d and he still hadn't gone down.

"Warren, Luke'll be here in ten minutes."

"Luke's kept me waiting a good two ndred hours in ten-minute intervals. And st because it's Saturday morning, you n't have to start pushing me around like vacuum cleaner. Where'll I find the anket?"

"In a white box, underneath ——"

She'd just finished the vacuuming when uke rang the buzzer. Next to John, she ked him best of all Warren's friends. He as handsome in the movie-hero style of rling black hair and crinkling eyes, as iendly and direct as Warren was reserved d distant.

"Hi, beautiful."

"Hello, Luke."

"Just in time for breakfast?"

"Do you want some coffee?"

"No thanks. Just take the padlock off the oky jar." He sat on the kitchen table, vinging his legs. "Where's Bobby Jones?"

"Getting some things out of the locker. on't you want a glass of milk or some-ing?"

"Okay, thanks."

She could feel his eyes following her, aking her vaguely uncomfortable.

"You're a nice gal, Jane," he told her. "You're just feeling our oatmeal cookies, ren't you?"

He snorted. "You now, Art and I had ou figured for a dud efore we met you. We lt sorry for poor old Warren, chasing eventy miles down to llison every week end nd coming back mad s a hornet all the time. Well, here's looking at ou. I gotta say the boy knew what he as doing, sure enough."

She smiled a little ruefully and stared out he window. Something in me brings out he best in everybody. Did I ask for his oyish confidence?

"Jane?"

"Hello. We're in the kitchen.'

"Might have known. Hi, Luke. Here's our screw driver, madam. And your blanket. Remember this, Luke?" He shook out a rumpled suède jacket. "I've been looking or it for three years."

"You've been trying to collect the price of that jacket from Art ever since that week nd ——" He stopped. "Are you all set? They'll be waiting for us."

"Jane, give this to the dry cleaner when e comes, will you?"

"Thanks for the titbits, Mrs. G."

THEY were gone, and the apartment was unhappily still. She sifted flour on the breadboard with noisy impatience. Luke didn't mean a thing, of course, but he or Art was always making allusions to some week end before —— She sprinkled brown sugar and nuts on the soft dough. I'm silly. I haven't got good sense. Warren had hundreds of week ends before he met me, and dozens of girls—pretty ones, too, probably. There was a knocking on the door.

"Coming." She dusted her hands on a towel and ran. "Oh, good morning. I'm glad you stopped. This suit is to be cleaned and pressed. And this jacket cleaned, I guess." She went through the pockets as she spoke. A paper of matches, a half-empty package of cigarettes, two golf tees, a couple of papers, and a card. No—a snapshot. She put them on the hall table. "Be careful of the jacket, please. It's a favorite."

She closed the door. Men and the stuff in their pockets. Well, they'd never smoke three-year-old cigarettes. She dropped them in the wastebasket. Matches from the Sweetheart Inn. She opened a thin, yellow paper, a florist's bill. The Flower Shop—opposite the Commons, Boston. Mr. Warren Gregory. One white-orchid corsage, $20.00. It was stamped paid in purple ink, August—blur—1930. That was the summer she began working in the library. He'd never sent her white orchids, and she was rather glad now. There was something a little disgusting in being one of a number of girls to whom a man had sent white-orchid corsages. Or maybe there had been only one girl who rated them?

SHE remembered the spray of tawny little ones he'd brought her the Easter before last. Now would that have cost twenty dollars? Or only seven-fifty? She hadn't thought of the money they represented till just now. But what had happened to the white-orchid girl? Would he rather have married her? Had she been faithless? Or did she bore him after a while?

"I hope," she said to the yellow slip, "he doesn't want you for his files." She was about to drop it in the wastebasket when she read on the back of the snapshot: "Darling, you're being utterly ridiculous and you know it." The writing was a small, meticulous backhand in green ink. "I'll expect you Friday. B."

Slowly, she turned the snapshot over, but her hand shook and the picture fluttered to the table where it lay face up, returning her stare. It was a picture of a very beautiful girl, dreamy-eyed and exquisite, with luminous blond hair falling in a cloud on bare white shoulders. After a while she stopped looking at it, but she went right on seeing it. "Darling, you're being utterly ridiculous and you know it."

She went back to the coffeecake. I'm being ridiculous, too, and I know it, but there doesn't seem to be anything I can do about it. I'll wash my hair while this is in the oven. Soap and water's supposed to make your nails grow. Hair's in the same category. Why did I cut it anyway?

After she'd finished her hair, she gave herself a facial. While the mask was doing its utmost, she experimented with polish on her toenails. When the coffeecake was frosted, she did her hands, bathed, and put on her best brown hostess pajamas. She dusted the hall table. "Darling, you're being utterly ridiculous and you know it." She studied the snapshot with stubborn hatred and then put it with the florist's bill in the bottom desk drawer where Warren kept his papers. What did "B" stand for? Something fancy like Beverly or Beryl, probably.

She remembered that she hadn't eaten since breakfast. And there was the screw driver—just where Warren had laid it. She hadn't even put up the little shelf. The red chintz ruffle for it was finished and pressed. Her copper ladles and spoons were to hang on the wall underneath it. The elevator door clanged open and the rumble of men's voices came down the hall.

"Jane?"

"Hello. How was the golf?" Four men their size just about filled the living room.

"Dunt esk." That was Luke. "Honey, you're sure nice to come home to." He lit a cigarette. "The Sweetheart Inn, for gosh sakes. Where'd these come from?"

She turned quickly. "I found them in your jacket pocket, Warren." Her voice sounded casual enough.

"Oh, did you?"

"That was a week end." Art put his feet up on the footstool. "Did we ever tell you about that week end, Jane?"

She laughed, but it occurred to her that she didn't like Art. Never had. "What about your checkered past?"

"Mine? I like that. First I get accused of taking the old man's jacket, now you try to hang his ——"

"What does your husband work at?" one woman asked another.

"He's an efficiency expert in a big office downtown," replied the other.

"Efficiency expert? What are his duties?"

"It's hard to say exactly," explained the second woman, "but if we women did it, they'd call it nagging."

—Esar's Joke Dictionary. (Harvest House.)

A Secret of Natural Vitality!

All kinds and types and ages of people have the same hunch. They just "know" delicious, hot Quaker Oats is a great help for natural vitality!

Mothers say they feel the same about Quaker Oats for growing children.

Plenty of sense in this instinct.

Whole-grain oatmeal is nature's favorite among natural cereals in important vitality elements. Richer in Protein. In natural Vitamin $B_1$. In Food-Energy itself. All three.

Just further proof that you're right—creamy-hot Quaker Oats is just as good for you as the delicious, whole-grain flavor promises!

Continue to enjoy hot, nut-tasty Quaker Oats regularly.

Quaker Oats and Mother's Oats are the Same

QUAKER OATS

The World's Best-Tasting Breakfast Food

by Cambridge Outstanding in the table settings of today's smarter hostess is the beauty and rich brilliance of Crystal by Cambridge. Smarter in a practical way, too, for crystal of this fine character outlives passing fashion. You may add new pieces over the years. Look for the Cambridge label, your assurance of authentic table crystal, hand-made in America. Because Cambridge is so much in demand, please be patient if some pieces are not always available.

THE CAMBRIDGE GLASS COMPANY, CAMBRIDGE, OHIO

Bob Mitchell said, "Wonder how State's doing?" and turned on the radio.

They were alone finally and she began emptying ash trays. Warren stretched out on the sofa. "I'm tired. What'd you do? Did the screw driver work?"

"I just put two x's to mark the spots. Warren, I don't think——" She was going to say she didn't think she liked Art, but Warren was already sleeping. It was just as well, probably. He'd grown up with Art, and Luke lived with him, and it wouldn't help matters for her to—— But why did the girl have to be so beautiful? And why did he have to fall asleep the minute they were alone? "Warren, it's quarter after six."

He jumped up. "Gosh, I'm sorry. I didn't mean to sleep. How long before dinner?"

"We'll have to eat out. I didn't shop today."

"Oh, all right. I'll step on it. Janie, I'm sorry about falling asleep. It was a crumby thing to do." He leaned toward her and she stiffened.

"It doesn't matter."

The lights were soft, the music low, the menu excellent. She suspected it while they were eating; before the end of the second act she knew she was bored. And it wasn't the play's fault, because they'd seen dozens of "B" pictures and only laughingly threatened to demand their money back.

"Shall we go somewhere to dance?" he asked on the way out.

"I'd just as soon go home."

"You're not saying that because you think I'm tired?"

"No." I'm thinking only of myself—for a change.

She put herself to sleep making ■ careful study of her life as a divorced woman. She couldn't go back to dad and Allison, of course. And she couldn't stay here and run the chance of meeting him on the street. But she'd never lived alone in her life. It was probably a good thing they hadn't bought a house and a lot of furniture. What'd you do with the wedding ring you no longer wanted to wear?

She wakened at her customary seven o'clock vaguely apprehensive. And then she remembered. Divorce Warren? She sent his hunched shoulders a wordless apology. I've a gnat's mind. She slipped out of bed and dressed on tiptoe. There are times when I don't like you, she told her reflection in the bathroom mirror. You wouldn't know a penny whistle from a magic flute.

It was bitter cold, but she made herself walk all the way to church.

We have followed too much the devices and desires of our own hearts. . . . We have left undone those things which we ought to have done; And we have done those things which we ought not to have done; And there is no health in us.

She almost ran home, she felt so relieved and good. I don't use the brains I was born with. I'll tell him about that crazy picture. Maybe it'll comfort him a little to know that I'm not immune to jealousy. She ran up the stairs because she couldn't wait for the elevator and split the thumb of her glove getting her key in the door.

"Hello."

He looked up from his paper. "Hello."

"I've been to church."

"I wondered."

She felt her mood chilling a little. "Have you eaten?"

"Yes."

"Could you be persuaded to drink a cup of coffee?"

"No, thanks."

The kitchen gleamed, but he hadn't squeezed any orange juice for her. Oh, well.

"Yes," said my friend reflectively, "she is not a brilliant woman: she is not even an intellectual one, but there is such a thing as a genius for affection and she has it."

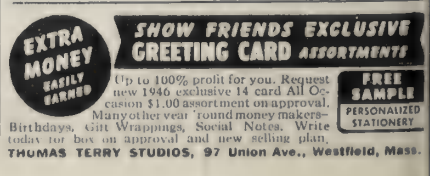
—HELEN JACKSON.



Cleans! Disinfects!

It's fragrant of PINE

- MAKES CLEANING EASIER
- DEODORIZES
- ECONOMICAL TO USE
- FOR PAINTS, TILES, FLOORS, BATHROOMS AND KITCHENS
- WON'T IRRITATE HANDS
- ASK YOUR DRUGGIST

Sergeant's

DISINFECTANT

She opened the breadbox. "Warren, you didn't eat any coffeecake." She faced him accusingly.

"I didn't know if you were saving it."

She turned slowly and went back to the kitchen. And then, of course, she saw it—the little shelf neatly screwed on the wall just exactly where she wanted it. She turned around again, facing him without quite looking at him. "This is your house. There'll never be any food in it you can't have if you want it. And—thank you for hanging my shelf."

"You crazy nut." He took the coffeepot out of her hand and held her firmly by the shoulders. "Just how do you suppose I feel waking up and not finding you?" He shook his head slowly. "I'm not even used to the idea of you yet—much less able to eat a lumberman's breakfast when you've gone off without——"

"Sometimes I have to go off."

"Do you? Do you, Jane?"

"Not for keeps though."

He kissed her and mussed her hair. "Let's have the works. I'm starved. All I had was coffee. And it was terrible."

How easy it was to lie, she thought, especially to yourself. You thought what you wanted to think, believed what it made you comfortable to believe. She told herself again it was settled this time, they were beginning to understand each other now. And maybe that much was true—of the surface of their lives. They didn't quarrel about who took which shower, and managed to keep out of each other's way while they were dressing, and they were both pretty good about getting places on time. Once in a while he referred to the bathroom as clothesline alley, and she'd remember that her stockings were still on the towel bar where she'd hung them to dry, but she thought he didn't mind too much. But looking back on it, she knew her fool's paradise was on the edge of a precipice.

They made Christmas lists and put them under each other's breakfast plates—though Christmas was still nearly two months away—and then she wondered if that wasn't carrying practicality a little too far. Christmas to him was probably white orchids and ermine wraps and bare-shoulder photographs. It wasn't trying to find a two-dollar tree that looked like five.

They walked in the park in the rain, but she was reminded almost in the middle of a laugh that "B" would never be caught drenched to the skin like this. "B" probably moved in eighteenth-century drawing rooms and never exerted herself beyond pulling the bell cord, and she most certainly never wiped up the bathroom floor when the cleaning woman didn't come.

Like a furtive thief, she slipped the taunting snapshot from its hiding place and stared at it. Why hadn't she said, simply and naturally, "These things were in your jacket pocket"? The answer was obvious. She couldn't because he was different too—in spite of being terribly thoughtful and frighteningly intense. They were so marvelously considerate of each other, so sensitive to nuances, so cautious of impulse.

And then one Monday morning the invitation came to the dinner dance Harlan was having at the country club to celebrate Linda's birthday.

"Shall we go?" she asked dubiously.

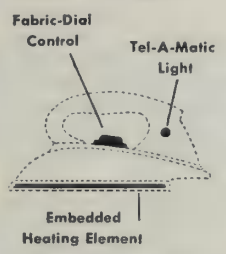
"Don't you want to?"

"Yes, but——"

He tuned the radio for news. "No butterfly costume?"

"I've got a dress."

"Let's go then. And send my suit out, will you? Wonder if it still fits?"



It did, of course, and something more than that. She watched while he went through the motions of making sure he had cigarettes, keys, billfold and money. There were party people, she thought, like Linda and her set, and there were people like her: dressed to play the part, but really only ham actors underneath—nice when you got to know them, maybe, but whoever did at a party? And then there were people like Warren, who could assume the party mood at will.

ELECTRICAL K-M KNAPP MONARCH SERVANTS

K-M Tel-a-Matic Iron

CUTS IRONING TIME! ELIMINATES SCORCHING, BURNING, MELTING!

At last! A smoother, faster, safer iron! Smoother and faster because heating element is embedded in sole plate closer to the fabric. Eliminates hot "spots"—iron heats up quicker! Safer because Fabric-Dial dials perfect heat for every fabric and Tel-A-Matic Light tells when it's safe to start. No guesswork when dialing to lower temperature! Beveled sole plate ends "button busting." Reserve one at your dealer's today!

KNAPP-MONARCH CO. · ST. LOUIS, MO.

WHIZOOKA WINNIE SAYS:

Only DEAD ROACHES ARE GOOD ROACHES

WHIZOOKA ROACH GUN—a wartime development, with D.D.T. added—makes short work of killing roaches, ants, bedbugs, silverfish. Comes fully loaded, ready for safe, sure, instant action. Only $1.00 at your store. R. M. Hollingshead Corp. Camden, N. J., and Toronto, Can.

ZUD

HAVE YOU A YELLOW STREAK?

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

Removes RUST and STAINS from BATHTUBS, SINKS, TILE FLOORS, METALS, RANGES

10c – 25c – 50c

AT GROCERY, HARDWARE, DRUG, DEPT. and 10c STORES

RUSTAIN PRODUCTS, N.Y.

KNITTING YARNS

For over 35 years. Ask for FREE Sample Card. Pre-War Quality. CLIVEDEN YARN CO., Dept. E-1, 711 Arch St., Philadelphia 6, Pa.

STOP that squeak!

in Metal Drawers & Hinges with 3-IN-ONE

America's accepted household oil for over 50 years.

3-IN-ONE Oil

Boys! . . . Girls! . . . Here's the new

ELECTRICAL PROJECTOR

No slides . . . no film! Projects any picture, comic, photograph, post card, rare stamp, etc.; also, botanical or biological specimens such as flowers, leaves, fruits, butterflies, frogs, turtles and birds. Place the object under the projector and presto! On the wall or screen you have a clear reproduction, colors and all, two feet in diameter! A scientific instrument patterned after the projector used by the U. S. Navy! All steel construction, optically ground and polished lenses. 7½" high, 10" wide, 4½" deep. $4.85 postpaid.

Send check or money order.

Mayfair Gifts 72-08B AUSTIN ST. FOREST HILLS, N.Y.

SAVOGRAN WAX REMOVER

10¢ AND 25¢ AT PAINT AND H'DWARE STORES

for Floors, Woodwork, etc.

WRITE FOR CIRCULAR 4

THE SAVOGRAN COMPANY, BOSTON 10, MASS.

MENDS

CHINA, GLASS, WOOD, LEATHER and FABRICS

There are scores of uses for Du Pont DUCO CEMENT . . . for mending toys, dishes, furniture . . . for repairing luggage and books . . . for making models. It is water-proof, transparent and flexible. Get a tube today.

DUCO CEMENT

REG. U. S. PAT. OFF.

Ask for them by THIS NAME

KNITTED and WOVEN FROM COTTON

MORGAN

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

DISH CLOTHS

SOLD IN STORES EVERYWHERE

MORGAN COTTON MILLS, Inc., LAUREL HILL N. C.

"FROM RAW COTTON THROUGH FINISHED PRODUCT"

PROPORTIONED

NYLONS OF NOTE

HOW DO YOU KNOW

THEY'RE

HOLEPROOF

REG. U. S. PAT. OFF.

Of course you want nylons . . . but to be sure of getting proportioned nylons, insist on HOLEPROOF! For HOLEPROOF Nylons of note are perfectly proportioned in width as well as length . . . which means better fit, longer wear and added glamour. When you ask for HOLEPROOF Nylons, say Do for small, Re for medium and Mi for tall.

Makers also of
Men's Socks by Holeproof
and Luxite Lingerie

PROPORTIONED NYLONS OF NOTE BY HOLEPROOF

HOLEPROOF HOSIERY CO., Milwaukee, Wis.
In Canada—London, Ontario

All the way over to the club he was—well, amusing was as close as she could come to defining it. He was gay, and debonair, and clever. Almost as if they were on a date and not married at all. Almost—though the word wasn't subtle enough—flirting with her. And that was frightening because he was asking for a response it wasn't in her to give. And he looked so beautiful in his shiny tall hat, so smooth behind the wheel of his extravagant, man-about-town car that she felt like a stowaway. What if no one asked her to dance but Harlan?

There was a parking space close to the entrance and he pulled into it, ignoring the doorman's signal to drive up to the porte-cochere.

"Do you mind? It's been so long since I've kissed you."

Why was she trembling? Why did she want to cry? But it was a party kiss, deft and light, and it wasn't enough. She wanted him to kiss her deeply, fiercely, possessively—any way at all but this touch-and-go. Most of all, she wanted him to say he loved her, but he only smiled. His connoisseur's smile.

"You're beautiful, Jane." (Not "My Jane.") "And very desirable. But you know all that, don't you?" He opened the door for her.

She stepped out and felt the wind cold in her face, slashing at her ankles. She stood very straight, only the tips of her white-gloved fingers on his arm.

A young woman at a corner table scribbled notes on her pad that would appear in Sunday's Plain Dealer under "Society." Mrs. Stokes' sister, Mrs. Warren Gregory, was stunning in ivory satin, the off-the-shoulder line of her dress banded with mink. Her only jewels were a single strand of pearls, repeated in the Juliet cap she wore on her dark hair.

What the girl didn't know, of course, was that it was her wedding dress made over. That the pearls had been Warren's grandmother's and, oddly enough, were real, but the Juliet cap was a last-minute invention mothered by necessity. Her hair was just long enough to be awkward now and too short to stay pinned up more than ten minutes.

She found her place card on Harlan's right, next to Mr. Clyde Stafford's, who turned out to be a tall, beak-nosed, silver-at-the-temples man. Harlan was fond of saying he had buckets of ducats and was his best customer.

"You're Mrs. Stokes' sister?"

"Yes."

"Beautiful girl."

"Yes, she is."

"And it's your husband she's talking to?"

That was a masterpiece of understatement.

"Yes."

"Fine-looking chap."

THERE was no answer to that either, but Mr. Stafford was obviously trying to be nice. "My wife's across the table," he said, "near the center. In green."

"Yes, I know. She's lovely." She was gorgeous; petite, titian-haired, and not half his age.

"Isn't she?" Almost anxiously. "She's terribly clever too. Does textile designs."

"I saw some at Halle's. They're very original."

That takes care of the soup course. Now it's my turn, only nothing I can think of is fit party patter.

Harlan said, "You're so quiet, Janie. What were you thinking just then?"

"Nothing."

"Yes, you were. I can tell."

Suppose she said it? I feel like the country mouse at the city mouse's party. But not to Harlan. She liked him. They were friends in spite of being in-laws.

"Aren't you having fun, Janie?" Harlan went on.

"Of course, but I don't get around much. This sitting between the lion and the unicorn——"

It wasn't as funny as he pretended, but it did something for the tension. "Hey, Clyde, Jane's got a hot one. She calls us the lion and the unicorn."

"Oh, you do, do you?" Mr. Stafford crumpled his napkin impulsively. "For that you'll dance with me. And I'm a very bad dancer."

Actually, he wasn't hard to follow. They talked about The Autobiography of Alice B. Toklas and the new mystery in The Saturday Evening Post. Linda and Warren danced past.

"I've never known such unlike sisters!" he exclaimed.

She smiled, and refrained from reminding him that he'd just said Linda was beautiful. You got used to things after twenty-odd years.

"Do you like books?" he asked. "I mean collections?"

"I used to be a librarian."

"Really? How swell. I've got a pretty nice library. At least, I think it is. I collect samples of bookmaking—extra-illustrated editions—that sort of thing. I have some Didots, 1795, of La Fontaine. Look, Doris and I—my wife, you know—are having some people in a week from Sunday. Do you think you and your husband could make it?"

The waiters were taking the silver hats off steaming plates. Harlan smiled and patted her hand. "Good girl. Never lets the family down. Honey, he's hard to know!"

So it was going to be a nice party after all. She settled down to enjoy it, not feeling a bit like the country mouse any more. A shadow fell across her plate and Harlan stood up.

"Oh, hi, Buck. Jane, this is Buck Daniels." He didn't finish the introduction, and she found herself looking up at football shoulders and a face so homely it was fascinating.

"Will you dance?"

"I'd like to." She wondered where he'd come from, and why—unless he'd been especially instructed—he'd made such a point of coming way down to their end of the table to ask her. He was only a little taller than she, but he was a marvelous dancer. She liked him instantly and thought Warren would too.

"I had a lot of things all planned to say to you, and now I can remember only one of them."

She smiled. "Suppose you start with it. One thing may lead to another."

IDIOT

In ancient Greece, if you were not a seeker after public office, you were an idiot. The men who preferred to live as private citizens became known as Idiotai. Their modest tastes, their lack of ambition, their indifference to the political life of that civic-minded day were set down to an inferiority of intellect.

Today "idiot" implies the absence, usually congenital, of intellectual or reasoning powers. In the field of psychology the term is compared and contrasted with the terms "imbecile" and "moron," which are technical designations of the degree to which a person is mentally deficient, "idiot" designating a person of the lowest grade. It is probably in this sense that Millay uses the term in her line: "April comes like an idiot, babbling and strewing flowers." An appreciation of the meaning of the term gives deep significance to Macbeth's characterization of life as "a tale told by an idiot, full of sound and fury, signifying nothing."

Mark Twain has an interesting use of the term in Following the Equator: "In the first place God made idiots. This was for practice. Then He made school boards."

—DAVID T. ARMSTRONG.

"Okay. I love you."

Her eyes widened. Was he drunk? She remembered the odd reluctance in Harlan's introduction. "Where I come from we don't throw words like that around."

"No, of course you don't. And believe it or not, I don't either. You gave me the wrong cue."

"You've got the wrong script, haven't you?"

"Don't say that. I've thought about this so long—meeting you, hearing you speak—I'm rattled. I'll see if I can start somewhere near the beginning. Do you remember being at dinner at the Union Club with Harlan and Linda and your father the first Friday in May? I was at the club that night too. Sat facing you. And all of a sudden I wanted to ring bells and blow whistles. I said, 'Buck, old boy, your bachelor days are over. Yonder sits the future Mrs. Daniels.' Wait. Don't say anything yet. I called Harlan the next morning and asked him who you were and if you were married. I said I wanted to meet you and he said he'd speak to you. Then this thing came up at the office and I was sent to England. I just got back yesterday. I called Harlan and he invited me to this party. I knew you'd be here."

"I was married in May," she said carefully. The orchestra went right on playing Sophisticated Lady.

His thick face turned white. "You mean it? You are married?"

"Yes."

"I probably owe you an apology or something. Or do I?"

"Suppose we just change the subject."

"I haven't anything else to talk to you about. I haven't been thinking of anything else for six months." He shrugged, and it was an ugly gesture. "There it is, my dear. Wear it pinned to your furs. I love you. I wanted to marry you. Right out of a novel by good old Thomas Hardy, isn't it? If, if and if. Am I boring you too terribly?"

She kept her eyes over his shoulder, but she didn't see the faces whirling past her.

"Come. Don't look like that. You should be thrilled to a peanut. Two men loving you and wanting to marry you at the same time."

She knew why he said it. He was a little boy turning sick at the sight of his own wound. "How did you feel when you found a stray dog on your doorstep and your mother told you you couldn't keep it?"

His eyes held hers. "What're you trying to do? Make it tougher for me? All right." He was no longer patient and intelligent-looking. "It's not your fault I love you. You can't help the kind of face you've got any more than I can help mine, but it is your fault I told you. If you're married, why don't you look like it? Why do you look so cool, and untouched, and virginal?"

Why did people bother to insult her, she wondered wearily. She thought of several not-too-bad retorts, but didn't bother to make them.

"Don't look like that, Jane. I'm terribly sorry I said that, only you don't know what it's like—counting so——"

"Please. It doesn't matter."

The music stopped, and he drew out her chair. She sat rigid to control her trembling. When she did look up, there were Warren's eyes, compelling, demanding, and she could only smile, begging him to be patient. If only they could go home. But no. They had to stay here with the glamorous, gay people, with the brittle, bright people who dropped their love in your lap as if it were a quarter on the cigar counter.

She escaped to the rest room and locked herself in one of the booths. The heavy outside door opened, letting in a blare of music and a tangle of voices.

"Have you danced with the brother-in-law?"

"Has anybody but Linda?"

"Isn't he marvelous?"

"I wouldn't know. Linda seems to think so."

The rest-room door opened again. Another shaft of music came in.

(Continued on Page 141)

Prelude to Love

You know this must be the theme song of your life! You never felt the earth quake before. You never touched the stars before. You never heard this rhapsody racing up and down the keyboard of your heart. This is the moment you knew you'd know. And his eyes tell you he knows it, too.

Till the day after forever you'll keep your beauty bright for him. You'll use Woodbury, the beauty soap made for the skin alone. You'll always take your daily Woodbury Facial Cocktail—mildest of cleansing for delicate skin. Oh, lovely way to a soft, smooth complexion . . . ready and waiting for love.

WOODBURY 10¢

FOR THE SKIN YOU LOVE TO TOUCH

CUTEX

DARK'N HANDSOME new mystery color

It's dark . . . it's exciting . . . it's the new Cutex color for intrigue. Put it on your long, temptress nails . . . wear it — then let men beware! • And when in lighter mood try the new Cutex Proud Pink.

(Continued from Page 138)

"Here's the birthday gal. Marvelous urty, Linda."

When the room was silent for several inutes, she thought it would be safe to me out, that she was alone; but Linda was tting at the dressing table making up her outh.

"Having fun?"

"It's a wonderful party."

"Your dress looks good. I take it you're t sentimental about it."

She let that go.

"Buck Daniels is getting stinko. Know ything about that?"

"He's the one I danced with, isn't he?"

"Call it that if you want to. I've an idea arren might not agree entirely. Not that
's any of my business, infant, but do u ——"

Their eyes met in the mirror: brown and ina blue.

"No," Jane said evenly, "it isn't any of ur business. Are you ready?"

Warren was waiting at the edge of the ance floor and she wondered for a wild mo-ent if he wasn't going to ask her to dance.
he'd ask Linda again instead. But his in-itation, though wordless, was for her; and it as the security of heaven to have his arm ound her, his fingers closed over hers. Their eps matched, they were the right heights each other; and she looked up at the miliar sternness of his face gratefully.

"Warren ——"

He smiled down at her—his white-tie mile. "Hello. What's it like—being the elle of the ball?"

She bit her lip. Marriage. Garden spot of merica. But she'd lost her temper enough r one evening. "Warren, that nice Mr. tafford asked me if we'd come to their ouse a week from Sunday. He collects rare ditions ——"

"And your prize fighter. Does he want to how us his etchings? Or didn't he mention
e?"

You say you love me, but your delight is in estroying me.

"You can't dance with your wife here.
t's against the law." Harlan's hand was on er wrist. "Get moving, fella. This is my lance." He was all brother now. "Take it asy, Jane. I should have told you about Buck, but I forgot the whole thing till he ame down to our end of the table. Warren's nad, isn't he? I'll explain to him."

"No—no. It's all right."

"You're a femme fatale, honey."

"I know. Isn't it marvelous?" That's what you think. I'm Chicken Little and the sky eally is falling. Only nobody worries about ne. All I wanted was a rocking chair in a corer by the window.

She danced on, pulled like a masked marionette from one pair of black broadcloth arms to another until the orchestra played Good-night, Ladies, and Warren said, "Let's get out of here."

They were silent all the way home except for the moment when he said, "Keep that robe around you." She undressed while he put the car away and then waited in tense dread while he dropped the things from his pockets on the dresser, while he brushed his teeth, turned out the lights, opened the window, and finally lay down on his side of the bed.

Twice she started to say, "Good night, dear," but the words wouldn't come, and waiting dragged on. He must say something. But he didn't seem to be even breathing. So this was marriage: a man and a woman lie down together with hatred. In marriage there's no room of one's own, not even a bed of one's own. If you're married, why do you look so untouched and virginal?

Why, she wondered, trying to console herself, are things done to you that you wouldn't dream of doing? The words had cut like whiplashes, and she remembered her anger and humiliation, but she no longer understood them. Slowly, stiffly, she sent her hand across the bed toward his. It didn't matter what he did to her. It was what she did—to herself and to him. Perhaps he was sleeping. She'd expected the hollow of his hand, to feel his fingers lock around hers. She found a hard fist.

"Can you see my side?" she begged. "There won't be anything left of me if you take your love away. I thought if I didn't let you know how much I really cared, you could never taunt me—or be contemptuous. And I would not grovel, nor beg." She took a deep breath. "But I have no love that isn't yours. That's what you wanted me to say, isn't it?"

She withdrew her hand. She'd said what needed to be said. There was no relief or comfort—not even disgust, though that would come—but it was said.

"Yes." His voice was a crude shock in the silence that for so long had been broken by only her voice. "That's what I wanted. But I wanted you to be glad in your giving, and generous. You're begrudging it even now, and you're only giving it because you'll pay any price for peace. And that kind of peace is simply endurance. It isn't living, and it certainly isn't love."

She had no will for argument, only a stubborn, selfless adherence to truth. "I don't expect peace. I only know I can't go on this way."

"What are you afraid of?"

"I told you. Being hurt. Of having you one day come to despise the decent and best

Pond's Make-up Pat

"Water-Colors"
Pond's new Make-up Pat washes gorgeously smooth, natural color over your face.

"Camouflages"
Make-up Pat hides little blemishes, freckles. Gives your skin a young, "poreless" finish.

"De-Shines"
No more shiny nose! Make-up Pat gives a velvety, just-made-up look that lasts and lasts!

"Gives my skin a fresh smooth look!"

MRS. JOHN A. ROOSEVELT joins other beautiful society leaders in praising Pond's new Make-up Pat

IT PROTECTS your skin from wind and weather. Wear Pond's Make-up Pat every day! 39¢ plus tax.

Pond's double-formula discovery gives *clearer blonde shades . . . . richer brunette shades

At last—cake make-up whose blonde shades never look thick or pasty . . . whose brunette shades never look flat or sallow. It's Pond's Make-up Pat—the only cake make-up we know of that's made with a double formula!

A featherweight formula makes the blonde shades go on clearer, softer—never "masky"!

A richer formula gives Pond's brunette shades a richer, rosier glow—never "stagey."

"And it takes no time at all to put on—smoothly," says Mrs. John A. Roosevelt. Just apply sparingly with a damp-to-wet sponge or cotton. While moist, blend evenly.

"Make-up Pat gives such a fresh, all-over-smooth look to my skin!" Mrs. Roosevelt says. Try Pond's new Make-up Pat today. We believe you'll like it better than any make-up you've ever tried.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRAR

Note that angle

COMPARE THIS TOOTHBRUSH with any other. You will see two important differences. First note the way the small head is bent at a sharp angle. Then note the thin shank near the head. These features make it easy for you to reach every exposed surface and crevice of your teeth—back and front, inside and out. The unique design of the Squibb Angle Toothbrush was developed after long study by a practicing dentist. You'll find this brush remarkably efficient. Your choice of hard or medium bristles.

SQUIBB A name you can trust thing in me—and not want it, as you had wanted it."

"How could you let yourself love me at all if you thought I'd ever do that to you?"

"I didn't let myself love you. I just did."

"Dearest, listen." His arms drew her to him, cradled her head in the hollow of his shoulder. "We're all alone in the world. The pain and ugliness—the mean stupidity —— We're only safe together." He kissed her closed eyes, her quiet mouth. "Love me, Jane. Let me look at you and know you're glad to belong to me—that you're not afraid any more."

"I love you." She spoke the words because they were the true words, but all feeling had been stripped from her. This was the drifting before drowning, the wandering beneath the layers of thought or feeling.

"Dearest. My lovely."

OH, the traitor body exulting in the ecstasy of feeling again while the mind, protesting the violent siege that sought to lay waste its loneliness, writhed and wept. Not this. Not this. She shuddered. He knew too much. She must be alone now, have time to restore the violated —— Where was your security unless —— "Please." She stiffened, but felt herself being led on, away, out of herself to an unknown level of experience that —— "No. No."

"Yes, Jane. This for all time." The voice was gentle, and infinitely patient, deep with understanding while it denied her wish to retreat.

The steep ascent. Beyond struggle and surge, harmony with all the rhythms of the earth: the grace of snow drifted across fields, the majesty of mountains blended into distance. I am no longer Jane. There is no I nor he.

Two solitudes protect and touch. So many things were suddenly clear: why young faces were sometimes wise, and old faces sometimes not ugly. Solitude seemed a sterile thing compared with this richness of belonging.

"Warren, I love you."

"Dearest."

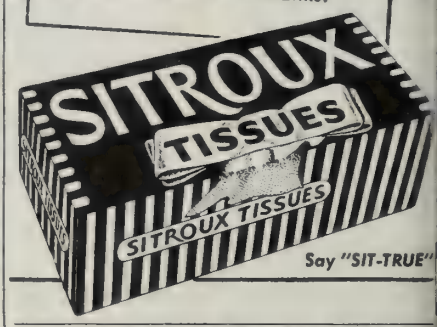
She awakened once and waited for the old feeling of revulsion, but it didn't come. Why had she been frightened? Tomorrow would not be like any yesterday. There was no need for denying in the heart, tomorrow or ever, the things ——

"Jane?"

"I'm here, dear."

Jane opened one eye, closed it, yawned, and then remembered. It was Saturday, of course. The electric alarm clock said seven, and rang at this time five mornings a week, but not Saturdays or Sundays. She slid out of bed and tied the belt of a beige silk robe monogrammed in brown: JRG. Its mate, in a man's size, initialed WHG, lay across the foot of Warren's side of the bed. They had been handsome six years ago; now they were just old. She'd bought them the first summer they were married because they were good-looking and the idea was amusing; they'd assumed the importance of a first love letter, the song they played when I met you. She remembered how uncomfortable she'd been, listening to Warren praise them. Did men always say too much or not enough? Then, perhaps. Not now.

She padded in bare feet to the bathroom down the hall, showered and dressed quickly, tying the bow of a brown dress splashed with white daisies.



There was a charm about Saturday mornings that no other day of the week knew, she thought. The virtuous, good-and-faithful-servant feeling of beds aired and changed, the week's mending finished and piled neatly in drawers, Sunday's coffeecake set to rise and only the marketing left to be done. Downstairs, she opened the top half of the kitchen Dutch door and looked around the garden. The phlox and delphinium nodded pink and blue heads. The morning was cool, without glare, but it would be sweltering by afternoon. She started the coffee and prepared two grapefruit halves, took the milk from the chute and put it in the refrigerator. Occupation: housewife. There might be less rebellion,

JACK AND JILL LIVED HAPPILY EVER AFTER!

All because Jill had soft, absorbent SITROUX handy! Jack, being no dummy, saw how this would save on laundry bills. Use SITROUX for removing cosmetics . . . for hankies. Ask for "Sit-True"!

* Tissue manufacturers are still faced with material shortages and production difficulties . . . but we are doing our best to supply Sitroux Tissues. And, like all others, we are making the finest quality tissues possible under present conditions. For your understanding and patience—our thanks!

CRO-PAX FOOT AIDS

CORNS
6 Waterproof Pads . . . 4 medicated discs . . . for quick, safe removal of corns.

CALLOUSES
Callous Pads, waterproof, remove pressure; 3 large medicated discs remove core.

BUNIONS
Bunion Pads...Waterproof . . . medicated . . . Relieve Pressure.

AT ALL 10¢ STORES

FOREST CITY PRODUCTS, INC. CLEVELAND 13, OHIO

Try this sensational shampoo yourself

Women rave about Kay Daumit's cream shampoo, Lustre-Creme. Stores can't get enough. Why? Is it because this different shampoo not only sweetens, cleans, and refreshes but actually makes hair behave better; or because it actually brings out unsuspected beauty, glamour? Find out. A jar costs $1 at department and good drug stores and it lasts a long time. Or, for a generous trial size send 25 cents, coin or stamps, with this coupon.

Name .....

Address .....

Post Office ..... State .....

Mail with 25¢ to KAY DAUMIT'S

Lustre-Creme

540 NORTH MICHIGAN AVENUE, DEPT. L4
CHICAGO 11, ILLINOIS

One spraying with BERLOU Mothproof protects clothing, furs, blankets, rugs, furniture for years . . . or BERLOU pays for the damage. At leading department, drug, and hardware stores. Send for booklet, Dep't LHJ-4. BERLOU service available at leading laundries and dry-cleaners. BERLOU MFG. CO., Marion, Ohio. In Canada: THE BERLOU COMPANY, LTD., London, Canada.

BERLOU Guaranteed MOTHPROOF

THOMASTON
Sheets
SINCE 1899 THEY HAVE MET THE TEST OF TIME

Now Hear Better

Beltone Mono-Pac is such a sensational advance that already tens of thousands of hard-of-hearing people have been delighted with how splendidly they hear with this tiny but powerful device. No clumsy, separate battery pack or wire!

Send Post Card Today for
FREE BOOKLET
with valuable information for hearing problems.

BELTONE HEARING AID CO., Dept. L-4
450 W. 19th Street ▪ Chicago 8, Illinois

she thought, if there was space on the census reports for a description of the house you kept, the man whose wife you were.

She ate alone, making notes on her grocery list, skimming the morning paper. Then she ran upstairs and stood a moment in the bedroom doorway.

The master bedroom, it had been called on the blueprints, but it had been "our" room nearly five years now: a ruffled-curtain, hooked-rug, chintz room with a big spool bed in a white petticoat. She paused at the side of the bed, her mouth curved in tenderness. Only in sleep did his face lose its habitual stern look and reveal the gentleness he was capable of and reserved so stubbornly for her.

"Warren, dear."

"Hi, wooden shoes." He dragged himself up out of sleep. "Got the street scrubbed?"

"I'm going."

"What time is it?"

"Just eight. You can sleep as long as you want to—your coffee's in the vacuum jug."

He punched his pillow and watched her at the mirror. "Is there any pie for breakfast?"

"No, silly. Now I have to fly." She kissed him vaguely and ran downstairs.

In town, she dropped her parking stub in her bag and crossed the street, studying the window displays, sometimes catching a wavy reflection of herself. Did she look twenty-nine? Probably. Long hair was completely out and hopelessly associated with sensible heels and a settled look. Well, she'd been all over this before, and she was settled—even if her legs were still good and she hadn't taken on any weight. She hoped she looked the way she felt: happily married and a little prosperous. It was enough that sometimes in train stations, shops, or when he came home at night, Warren's eyes said she was nice to look at, and more than enough,

Two foreigners met.
"You spik de English, not so?"
"A few. And thou?"
"Small." —Edinburgh Evening News.

the way he said, "Jane, this is Mr. Westcroft. My wife." He thought she was something, and other people took her at his valuation.

She smoothed her gloves across the backs of her hands. What I'm trying to fit into words, I suppose, is that Warren and I have the same scale of values. And I suppose, really, that's the basis of friendship, and love, and any other kind of liking.

She scanned the store directory: Q, R, S. I'd have made my old suit do if we were just going to swim at Emma's cottage with Fred and the boys, but Harlan and Linda's country club —— Oh, all right, she conceded impatiently, it's because I won't be poor relations. Is that a crime? Curious, that she and Linda, who were so far apart now, should be married to men who so obviously liked each other.

She got off the elevator at the negligee floor. Funny place for swimming suits.

"May I help you?"

The voice interrupted her absorption in a high-lighted swim suit of brown plaid satin—a silly, adorable trifle. She turned toward the voice. "Yes. I'd like to see a swimming suit."

"Something in a dressmaker style?"

"No, I don't think so."

"I can't show you much. I have this one."

It was navy-blue dull sharkskin, neatly but not very dramatically cut, and not so very different from all the swim suits of her life.

"This is priced at seven-ninety-five; I have just the one in your size. If you'd care to go a little higher," the voice purred, "our dressmaker styles start as low as eleven-ninety-five, and then I have a Hollywood original—that brown satin you were looking at on the model."

"This one will do." She spoke more curtly than she intended.

"Charge or cash?"

"I'll pay for it." She laid a ten-dollar bill on the blue suit and looked again at the Hollywood original. You're lovely, all right, but you'd be bad for me. She took her package

Woman of many faces...

A woman's prerogative . . . to change her mind . . . and to change her FACE. FRANCES DENNEY makes this possible with her Make-Up Foundations. Either Cover-Up or Transparent, Mat finish or Luminous. Some give you that dewy, lush look of youth, others a look of smart sophistication. You can achieve the dramatic coloring you desire, or you can bring out the beauty of your own skin tone. No matter how you decide to face it, you find the skill of FRANCES DENNEY in these Make-Up Foundations.

Luminous Film. Cream. Luminous and Cover-Up. Four shades. $1.50

Over-Tone. Cake. Mat and Cover-Up. Eight shades. $1.50

Luminous Cover-Up. Liquid. Luminous and Cover-Up. Four shades. $1.50 and $2.50

Under-Tone. Liquid. Luminous and Transparent. Four shades. $1.50 and $2.50

Neck Blender. Now for the first time, make-up for the neck that does not rub off on clothes. Blends beautifully on the neck, arms and shoulders and decollete fashions. Four shades. $1.50

all prices plus tax

FRANCES DENNEY
MAKE-UP FOUNDATIONS

"I want to make a confession"

PLENTY of people make mistakes, but few are as honest about admitting them as Mrs. I. O. Siler, who lives down in Mesena, Georgia.

She wrote us a letter recently, and her first words were: "I want to make a confession . . ."

What terrible thing had Mrs. Siler done? And why confess to us?

Well, it seems that her "sin" was to go along for years thinking Pequot Sheets were too luxurious to buy for her household of five. Until a good friend gave her a pair of Pequots. And then, says she:

"Being experimental-minded, I proceeded to make a detailed comparison between those Pequots and my lower-priced bed linens. I found I had been cheating myself shamefully!"

Not only did those Pequot Sheets last much longer, but, says Mrs. Siler:

"They were so comfortable, and so easy to keep white. From now on, my budget calls for Pequots, and Pequots only!"

If you are the hard-to-convince, "show me" kind of gal, there's nothing else to do but make your own comparison. Buy several brands of sheets, including Pequots, and see for yourself which gives smoothest comfort and longest wear.

But if you'd like to enjoy the best at once, why not benefit by Mrs. Siler's "confession"... and buy Pequots exclusively?

Pequot Mills, Salem, Massachusetts.

PEQUOT SHEETS

so good-looking — PEQUOT PILLOW CASES — so long-wearing and change and pushed the elevator button. Then, stupidly, she wanted to cry. I could have had it. I've got enough money.

"Going down."

She stepped into the elevator and faced front. Why don't I do what I want? Or rather, why don't I know what I want? But she wouldn't go back, of course.

"Main floor."

"Hello, Jane."

She turned. "Why, Harriet. Hello." They shook hands and the feeling came back that came every time she met Harriet: that they were people meant to like each other and prevented—by what?

"Out pretty early, aren't you?"

"Practically opened the place up. I bet you love the office's being closed on Saturdays."

"It's heaven. I came down to cull the sale rack for a cotton suit." She was handsome in the deep-breasted, blond manner of German goddesses, intelligently competent and serene. But she worked in your husband's office, and once, just before you were married, you had thought Harriet and Warren might have meant a lot to each other. But Harriet wasn't like Art and Luke; she never made references to other week ends and her reticence was the kind you understood, and it didn't make you uncomfortable.

"I have the car, Harriet. Can I drop you anyplace?"

"No, thanks. I have some other shopping to do. How about dinner and a movie some night when Warren's out of town?"

"I'd like to. Thursday?"

"Swell. I'll meet you. How's the Cleveland about six?"

"Good."

She drove around a half hour, hunting a parking space at the market, and then began her weekly tour of the stalls. Warren said they ate cheese in any language including the Norwegian. If it was unpronounceable, Jane bought it.

The round, white-aproned dairyman lugged the huge red disk to the corner of the block and poised his long knife. "Some Swiss today too? And Roquefort?" Warren would eat Roquefort-cheese salad dressing seven days a week if she'd give it to him. "Yes, madam. How about some nice nokkelost?"

She bought a crusty round loaf of pumpernickel bread, dusty tins of anchovies, black olives, a basket of vegetables, and a newspaper bouquet of gladioli. And everywhere around her was the smell of foreign foods, the sounds of foreign tongues, the laughter-wrinkled, leathery faces of lusty, robust people who fascinated and repelled her, whom she half loved and didn't quite trust.

SHE was on her way to the car when she saw her in the corner window of an Italian shop: a shapeless mountain of a woman with dark hair strained to a knot at the back of her head, worn gold loops in her ears. She was squatting on a low box behind a counter of evil-looking sausages, crooning tonelessly to a petal-skinned baby nursing at her breast. There was nothing furtive or bold in what she did, only a natural simplicity.

Jane pretended to read the labels on the cartons stacked in the window, but it was only to look longer at the woman and her baby.

Had the dark woman really given birth to such fair, diminutive beauty? Had she wanted to? Or only endured? As she held him in her arms now, did she remember the nights of loving that preluded his birth? Or had dreaming and beauty died for want of care?

She drove home slowly. She'd never thought much about it, and now—all of a sudden——

She stood in the terrace doorway, holding her bags of groceries, studying Warren's profile and wondering if he knew how terribly handsome he was. He was listening to the radio, with his feet on the ottoman, and the sprinkler practically flooding the petunias.

"WARREN, I'd like a baby. Would you?" If he said something dewy and started folding her in his arms, she'd die. But he scarcely fluttered his eyelids.

"At the moment, all I want is a spot of lunch—when you get around to it."

That was all right then. She turned her spectator pumps kitchenward, propping her groceries against the breadbox, and letting cold water run for the flowers. "What time are we supposed to meet them?"

"Around three. Was it hot in town? Anything doing?"

"I met Harriet Canfield. We're having dinner and going to a movie Thursday." She took off her hat and fanned her face with it. "She reminds me of Juno—or maybe Dido."

"Why them—particularly?"

"I don't know. Don't you think so?"

"Never thought much about it. Did they know anything about engineering? Harriet does."

"You're making me feel like the little woman: long on fingernails and light on brains."

He smiled with his eyes and only the corners of his mouth. "You're only light on weight. Do you feel all right, Jane?"

"I will when I get out of this misnomer called a two-way stretch."

"For heaven's sake, do you have to wear a girdle to buy a swimming suit?"

"Mind your own business. It holds my stockings up."

"I could think of a better way."

"Get a patent on it. We'll be rich."

She came back in an abbreviated blue tennis dress and dropped into the swing. "I probably ought to do something about lunch. Is it too hot for coffee? Want lemonade?"

"Coffee."

She peeled hard-boiled eggs and chopped celery. Potato salad, ham—what else? Cheese, of course. They could have fruit for dessert and the almond macaroons if he hadn't eaten them all. She decided to wear her white crepe. The pleats looked nice dancing.

They ate and loafed until it was time to dress, and it got hotter and hotter.

"'Mad dogs and Englishmen,'" she said coming down the stairs.

"Oh, I don't know. You look like a vanilla ice-cream cone. Don't you think you better take a coat? In case it's cold coming back tonight?"

"I can't imagine anything more wonderful than having my teeth chatter, but I'll take one."

They found Linda, like an ad for sun-tan lotion, stretched out in a deck chair at the club pool; her face masked behind enormous white-rimmed sunglasses. But even next to naked, she looked rich and scornful.

"Hi, punks." She pushed a gaudy bath rug out of the chair next to hers and reached for Warren's hand. "Sit, sweetheart. Isn't

(Continued on Page 146)

Crickets

By Elizabeth-Ellen Long

Who loves a wind-blown orchard more
Than any well-groomed park
Will find no city substitute
For crickets in the dark;

Who loves a ragged meadow more
Than any tailored squares
Will never hear from city streets
A song as sweet as theirs;

For only he who has not lost
His heart to country things
Can live content in towns whose nights
Are not the kind which sings,

Can live in towns and never miss
His three score ten years through
A music which was old when all
Earth's other songs were new.

No other mattress gives you new

Two Way Comfort!

1. SOFT: Smooth, Tuftless cushioning to relax you!

2. FIRM: "Live" Ribbon Steel Innersprings support you!

See the difference!

SOFT to relax you... for soothing comfort to weary nerves and muscles. Supersmooth because it's SERTA tuftless... no buttons, bumps or cramping hollows!

Feel the difference!

FIRM to support you healthfully... its "Live" Ribbon Steel Coils give you lasting resilient, satisfying support. Deep-down comfort, through and through!

Here is the innerspring mattress that's built the way medical men recommend. Its Two-Way Comfort means that you relax more luxuriously... sleep more healthfully. Make sure your next mattress is a SERTA Perfect Sleeper Tuftless.

Copyright 1946, Serta Associates Inc., Chicago, Illinois

MADE BY A Serta ASSOCIATE

PERFECT SLEEPER TUFTLESS

Innerspring Mattress and Box Spring

SERTA ASSOCIATES, INC., 33 Leading Mattress Manufacturers From Coast-to-Coast and in Canada

A make-up Color as Breathtaking as Your First Kiss

YOUTHFUL, yet not naive . . . demure with a worldly touch . . . Lover's Knot is an enchanting spring make-up designed to tie his heart to yours.

The face powder has a rich depth of color without looking dark . . . a creamy-rose tone with a touch of mauve for translucence. Lipstick and rouge lean to the rosy-red with a tinge of blue to give radiance.

Lover's Knot goes with almost every complexion type . . . and remains staunchly true to them all!

Lover's Knot Face Powder . $1.00
Lover's Knot Lipstick . . . . $1.00
Lover's Knot Rouge . . . . . 85c
Lover's Knot Nail Polish . . 25c
(All prices plus tax)

Barbara Gould
Distributor New York

(Continued from Page 144)

this heat beastly? Harlan's around somewhere, Jane." Her red fingernails made impatient gestures in her shining gold hair without disturbing its deliberate casualness. They matched the enormous red poppies on the bra of her white suit.

"I think I'll change."

"Why don't you?" She turned to Warren. "Long time no see. Sit down and stop acting as if you were at dancing school."

He laughed. "Bossy wench."

Jane bolted the dressing-room door and slid out of her clothes. Linda shouldn't be so blunt about how much she likes him and he'd like her a lot more, she thought, but there was no elation in the knowledge that for the first time in her life she had something Linda would like for herself.

She fastened the straps of the blue suit. All it needed was "Property of the YWCA" embroidered across the front. Even cut down to the waist in back, it was as exciting as a ham-on-rye. She looked at herself critically. I got about what I paid for, she decided, but I wish I'd bought the brown one.

She pushed her dark hair under a white skullcap and made a neat, unspectacular dive from the edge of the pool into the limpid, green surface. She came up blinking the water from her eyes.

"Hi, Janie."

"'Lo." She smiled lazily and accepted Harlan's outstretched hands.

"Gee, I'm glad you could come. Honey, you should wear swimming suits all the time. You're better than Venus."

"'And what's more, I've got arms?'" She stood wet and dripping beside him. "You're silly."

"Me 'n' all the other boys. See those men over there? Behind me? We were grading

He is not fit to live who is not fit to die, and he is not fit to die who shrinks from the joy of life or from the duty of life.

—THEODORE ROOSEVELT: Quoted in Under the Bridge, by Ferris Greenslet. (Houghton Mifflin.)

the gals: C minus, B plus. You got triple A from all of us."

"That kind of thing gets boys in trouble," she said, but she thought he was sort of sweet.

"Come on. Race you to the other end."

"Okay."

"You weren't even trying to win," he reproached her. "Janie, you think too much. Give the gray matter a rest. Can't you ever just play?"

Nobody ever wants me just as I am, she thought. Except Warren, of course. "A dollar I can beat you back."

His whole face lit up. "Five."

"I said one."

"Your one to my five."

"That's a screwy bet. Call the signals." She won, of course, but she could never be sure he hadn't let her.

"Your money. Come on up. I'll pay you now."

Warren was in the chair next to Linda's. "I just won five dollars from Harlan."

"Sit down." He indicated the rug at the side of his chair. "You looked good."

She felt his hand, warm and dry, on her shoulder, and felt contentment like a kitten's purr somewhere deep inside her. She kept her eyes on the shadows in the pool. There was something to be said for the lotus-eaters.

"Anybody got a cigarette?" That was Linda.

Nobody did, so Warren offered to go for some, and Linda decided to go with him.

"Linda thinks Warren's tops," Harlan said generously. "He is too. Almost good enough for you, Janie."

"That's what I keep telling him. It's nice here, Harlan."

"It's all right." Their eyes met for an instant. "Linda needed an excuse to walk around," he said. "How yuh been this summer? Manage to keep cool?"

Your housewifely reputation is safe when you know your toilet bowl is clean. A clean toilet bowl has no odor. SANI-FLUSH is your safeguard—the toilet bowl cleaner that works quickly, surely, by chemical action.

SANI-FLUSH disinfects — removes stains and invisible film, sources of germ growth and odors. No scrubbing. It's harmless to septic tanks—works effectively in hard and soft water. Sold everywhere—two handy sizes.

Sani-Flush
USE TWICE WEEKLY

SAFE FOR SEPTIC TANKS

Sani-Flush won't harm your septic tank. This has been proved by a nationally-prominent research laboratory. Your copy of its scientific report is free. Write for it. Address The Hygienic Products Co., Dept. 101, Canton 2, Ohio.

THIS EASY WAY MAKES WINDOWS
MIRRORS, WINDSHIELDS
SPARKLE

Just dampen Ritz chemically-treated cloth! Wipe glass crystal-clear quickly—easily! Ritz Cloths leave no smudge. Require no chamois, soap, powder, or "elbow-grease." Last long. Save half your cleaning time. On the market for over 20 years. 45¢ at better Housefurnishing and Linen Departments, Hardware and Gift Shops, Groceries, or write:

JOHN RITZENTHALER
73 Franklin Street, New York 13, N. Y.
Makers since 1892 of the famous Ritz Cloths for Cleaning

STRAWBERRY PLANTS Senator Dunlap, world's most popular, or Giant Mastodon Everbearing . . . 100 plants, very special $3.50, or 25 for $1. Cash orders prepaid, or sent C.O.D. plus charges. Return at once if not satisfied. FREE for prompt action with $3.50 orders, 2 hardy Cushion Mums $1.00 Value. Order now. OWEN NURSERY, Dept. 5C1, Bloomington, Ill. Clip this.

YOUR GUESTS as well as your family appreciate a sanitary bathroom. Far more important than spic-and-span tidiness is hygienic cleanliness, so easily provided by Clorox. Since dangerous germs can exist on clean-looking washbasins, bathtubs, toilets and floors, it's an effective health precaution to use Clorox in routine cleansing. For Clorox disinfects . . . it protects. It also deodorizes and removes stains. Simply follow label directions.

AMERICA'S FAVORITE BLEACH AND HOUSEHOLD DISINFECTANT CLOROX
FREE FROM CAUSTIC
Disinfects
DEODORIZES BLEACHES
REMOVES STAINS

When it's CLOROX-CLEAN... it's Hygienically Clean!

PRESTO! Sani-Wax Homes GLEAM!

In ONE operation SANI-WAX cleans, waxes, polishes and preserves anything of wood, enamel or porcelain... magically dissolving all dirt, grease, smoke, lipstick, crayon, finger smudges and rubber heel-marks.

No scrubbing, rinsing, or drying with this COMPLETELY DIFFERENT cleaning-lotion ...JUST...

Wipe it on—and you're done!

GUARANTEED by PARENTS MAGAZINE IF NOT AS ADVERTISED THEREIN REFUND OR REPLACEMENT

SANI-WAX Sold ONLY at BETTER Stores

THE SANI-WAX COMPANY
1911 Pacific Dallas, Texas

KILL INSECTS
WITHOUT DUST OR SPRAY

Bait in the protective tube unfailingly kills roaches, silverfish, waterbugs, crickets. Sanitary—cannot be blown or tracked on food supplies, etc. Gives clean, long lasting protection. Sold by most drug, grocery and other stores. If yours has none send $1.00 for 3 packages postpaid. Money back guarantee. Over 20 million sold. De Soto Chemical Company, 4 Rose St., Arcadia, Florida.

GATOR ROACH HIVES

"I guess I don't mind the heat so much, and our house really is comfortable."

"You and Warren sure bought at the right time. Nice house too."

"M'm-h'm." She closed her eyes against the glare of the sun on the water.

"Holy smoke, Jane! Did I snore?" Harlan jumped out of his deck chair, sleep-wrinkled and contrite. "Gee, I'm sorry. We were out till all hours last night, but that's no excuse for —— Gosh, I'm sorry. Why didn't you wake me?"

"I was dreaming myself. What do you suppose happened to Linda and Warren? What time is it?"

"After five, I imagine. There's Warren. Linda's with him."

"Hi." Warren sat on the grass beside her chair. "Have any fun?"

"I've been lazy as a lizard."

Harlan said, "Thought maybe you forgot what you went after."

"Don't try to be funny," Linda interrupted. "You're not."

Warren stood up. "Guess I'll see what the water's like. Come with me, Jane."

She was too relaxed to make the effort, but she knew why he asked her and got up obediently. They swam slowly, twice around the pool, but the water was too warm, or she was too tired.

"I've had enough." Somehow she didn't want to be alone in the dressing room with Linda. "Think I'll go in."

She pushed her wet suit to the floor and left cool as a glass of ice water. Wonder what Warren thinks about having a baby. She sprinkled bath powder on her brown legs and white body. My dolls used to look like this, she thought, their arms and legs never matched their bodies either. She took the pins out of her hair and watched the maid wring the water from her suit.

"My, you've really got long hair. Shall I get a drier for you?"

"No, thank you. It'll be all right." She pinned the braids high on her head, painted her mouth scarlet.

She dropped her beach bag in the car and found an empty chair on the shady side of the porch. The pool was almost deserted. There was a scraping of chairs and the clatter of dishes from the dining room.

"Hi."

"Hello, dear."

"Harlan's down there muttering in his beard because he fell asleep on you. Do I look like a mastiff?"

She smiled. "Did Linda lead you around?"

Warren frowned. "I've met everyone in the place, including the gardener. She's dizzy. Harlan ought to lock her up."

"Then Linda'd be like me." She spoke quietly, almost to herself.

"What do you mean?"

"I don't know. Sometimes I wonder if I'm a complete person. I feel like ——"

"Like what?"

"I don't quite know. It sounds extravagant and silly out loud. Like a violin. A thing to answer your moods, that only you can tune properly, and ——"

He shook his head. "You don't seem at all like that to me." The sun dropped quickly behind the solemn pines. "I think of you as a tree with roots deep in the earth and branches far over my head. I'm foolish enough to think that a picket fence around you makes you mine, but I know that part of you belongs to everyone you meet, and part of you will never belong to any of us."

Harlan's voice came around the corner of the veranda. "Here they are. I found them, Linda. Come on, you two. Let's eat."

She walked beside Warren and for one second let her hand touch his. That two solitudes ——

"Janie, you look like an owl." Harlan opened his napkin with a flourish.

"I'm hungry." She read the complicated menu and heard Linda debating between cold madrilene and cold consommé Bellevue, and remembered the Saturday-night suppers at home: bacon-and-tomato sandwiches with milk for Linda and her, peaches

A budding tree — A friendly call
Song birds and balmy days
A friendly chat — A sip and snack
Resplendent on Hasko Trays.

Yes! You can get those HASKO Trays you've wanted so long. And just notice how many of your friends serve outdoor buffets this spring and summer on HASKO Trays. Save linens! Save laundering! Makes gracious serving a "cinch!" Most standard HASKO Trays are now available at your Jewelry, Gift or Department store. Beautifully gift packaged. And plenty of delightful new HASKO accessories are on the way also.

Haskelite Mfg. Corp., Dept. 143, 135 S. La Salle St., Chicago 3, Ill.

HASKO TRAYS
AND ACCESSORIES

in a sauce dish and maybe a piece of slightly stale layer cake. That was the kind of thing Warren had missed, growing up with only his grandmother. They sat a long time over coffee and cigarettes.

Marjorie and John always invited Warren and her to Allison for the Labor Day week end. They'd gone every year since they were married, and the road was dotted with sentimental landmarks, but Warren was stubbornly silent all the way down.

She thought he looked almost greedy, picking up the paper after he'd hardly said more than "Hello" to Marjorie and the children, but when John came, he did the same thing.

"Well, looks like they're in for it."

Warren nodded. "It's been a long time coming, but this is it, I guess."

What was to have been a lazy, peaceful week end was tense with foreboding, staccato with news flashes. Warren bought every edition of every paper and then threw them aside in tight-lipped impatience.

"Hitler Blockades Gdynia." Where was that? "The free city of Danzig ——" Warren had told her about that months ago. "Hitler has laid his cards on the table in a way that makes a mockery of democracy."

They stayed up late Saturday night, pretending to play bridge, but Warren was already downstairs when she wakened Sunday morning.

"New Deadline Today for Hitler as Britain Delays War Decision."

She drank her coffee in moody, stupid silence while Marjorie and Warren and John talked. War? It was a word coming out of the radio. A word in thick black letters across the top of the paper. It didn't mean anything to her—not really. The last war had been pledging allegiance to the flag at school, knitting blocks for soldiers' blankets, saving for Liberty Bonds. A war now? In the middle of her adult life? No, that wasn't real—yet.

But Monday it was. "British Ship with 1400 Aboard is Torpedoed as Europe Goes to War."

"Warren," she said, when she couldn't bear his isolation any longer, "I think I know how you feel, and why it's upsetting you so, but there isn't anything we can do about it, is there?"

He said, "Look, Jane, if someone in your family was ill, needed money and blood transfusions, would you argue about the cost, say it wasn't your illness? Or would you fight and try to borrow wherever you could? Hitler and his kind of thinking is a world disease and it's malignant. England's been trying to stave it off six years. Now she's got to go to war. Fight or succumb."

She thought she was finally beginning to understand, and was ashamed of how long she'd been oblivious of what was going on.

The whole family came out to the car to see them off Monday afternoon. "We'll be up the twelfth of October whether we're invited or not," Marjorie promised. "What day is it this year?"

"I don't know yet, but you're invited."

They'd had a housewarming the twelfth of October after they moved into their house, and it turned out to be such a good party, they'd had one every year since. There was something good and right about inviting everybody they liked to celebrate the anniversary of the night they met. Not that they defined it, of course.

Was tonight's party better than all the others? she wondered a year later. The candles flickered without dripping, the logs were just dry enough to burn to Warren's satisfaction. She'd made dozens of tiny pastry puffs and filled them with minced chicken and anchovy paste, fried a hundred small meat balls and served them hot on the ends of colored toothpicks. There were shrimps on cracked ice around a bowl of cocktail sauce, cheese biscuits spread with spiced ham.

"Had a marvelous time, Jane."

"Swell party, Warren."

"Good night, good night."

Warren carried ash trays and glasses to the kitchen and folded up the extra chairs. "Nine years with one woman. My average used to be four months."

"You're bragging. And you'll have me mixed up in a minute. We won't be married seven years till May. Or will that make eight?"

He picked up a deviled egg and shook his head. "You're terrible. A year one way or the other—what's it to you?"

"Do you want any more of these? It was a nice party, wasn't it?"

"Swell," he answered. "I thought Harriet looked good."

She stared at him, a little frown between her eyes. "Warren, if you weren't you, I'd hate you for saying that. Why shouldn't Harriet look good? She's stunning. You sound surprised that she still has her own teeth—just because she isn't married. Harriet's got a good job, a beautiful apartment, and a mind of her own."

"All right, Susan B. Anthony. I just said she looked good."

"I know, but when Art saw her tonight, he asked her how single blessedness was. Why is an unmarried girl so pitiful and a bachelor so glamorous—in his opinion? If you ask me, it irritates men that a girl like Harriet can get along without them."

"As I've said before, you keep out of Art's way."

She was about to untie her apron, but put her hands on her hips instead. "I like that. You're the one who always wants to invite him."

"I'm sentimental. We swiped apples from the same orchards. Art's all right, he's just never outgrown his unholy delight in horning in on my gals."

"I wouldn't have him for a barrel of wormy apples."

He laughed. "Maybe that's why I have him around. Just to show him he can't cut me out any more."

"Doesn't seem like much of a basis for friendship to me."

"It's my own fault. If I hadn't let him know it bothered me when he walked down the hall with my girl, maybe he wouldn't have. I sent a girl a valentine when I was eleven, and Art found out about it and sent her a great big fifty-cent job. When we started going to parties, he always went stag—where he could—and spent the evening rushing my girl. I was engaged once—to a girl in Boston ——"

"What happened?"

"I broke it. I don't think she cared a bit for Art, but she couldn't resist playing up to him. I guess the only thing she really liked about me was making me jealous."

"What was her name, Warren?"

He tilted her face upward, smiling his crooked, sad smile. "Poor Jane. I'm a heel. It was years before I met you, and it wasn't anything like us. You made me mad and I kept coming back for more. Beatrice made me mad and I quit."

"I hate her."

"She's not worth it." He brightened. "That's why I have Art around—look what he saved me from, and for."

"That sounds suspiciously like the answer you think up on the way home, but I'll go for it. Only it doesn't make me like Art any better, and the next time he takes a crack at Harriet ——" She stopped.

He was leaning against the refrigerator. "I had a few dates with Harriet before I met you. She stayed late at the office one night doing some work for me and I asked her to have dinner and drove her home. There were a couple of other times—enough for Art to get an idea ——"

She didn't say anything, for how could you say you wished you didn't know, wished it weren't true?

"There wasn't anything in it, Jane."

Maybe there wasn't. Just because you loved him after the first time you had dinner with him is no reason for being so positive Harriet had too. She certainly doesn't look eaten away with unrequited love. But it explained why Warren had been so lukewarm and silent about her liking for Harriet, and how often they saw each other.

"I suppose we'd better go to bed," she suggested.

"I love you," he said. "You have such wonderful ideas."

She waited at the foot of the stairs while he pulled a couple of chairs into approximate position. "Never mind them. I'll clean up tomorrow." He turned out the lights. "Warren, I wouldn't like your kissing some other girl behind the dining-room door."

"That's putting it mildly, I hope."

"Well—no." Her finger traced the curve of the newel. "Since we seem to be on the subject of the women in your life, what about Linda?" They were standing in the dark, only the light from the upstairs hall showing faintly the white V of his shirt. She felt his hands on her shoulders, making her face him.

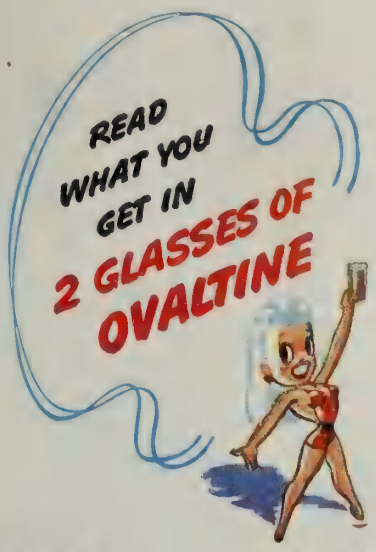
"The women in my life, as you call them, were all in the discard before I met you. I wanted you, and you are all I want."

"Linda's beautiful."

"She is—but not for my money. Look, Jane, you know me better than that. Suppose I had met her instead of you, suppose her face excited me as yours did—though it couldn't have. From an entirely selfish point of view, would I ever have had a minute's peace with her? Linda only wants what she hasn't got—and isn't sure she can get. You know that."

"Then why are you always ——"

"Don't you know that either? Think. Your family is my family now, and all I have. I don't want anything happening to it. How can I say it without sounding holier-than-thou? As I see it, everything's been too easy for Linda. She wanted a lot of money, so she married it. What she does with her marriage is Harlan's lookout, not mine; but what she does to the family—well, that does concern me. Somewhere along the line she got stuck with the idea that she wants me."



"So you have to ——"

"No," he corrected her, "I don't have to. I don't even want to, but if I can help it, she's not going to mess things up for Harlan and the kids and your father, because that'd mean messing them up for you too. She's going to play

(Continued on Page 151)

"Do you think there's anything wrong with her, doctor? She never asks me any embarrassing questions."

take your Vitamins this New Way...for better results!

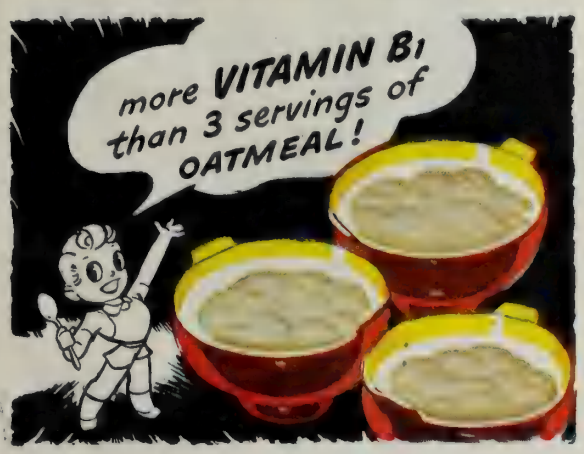
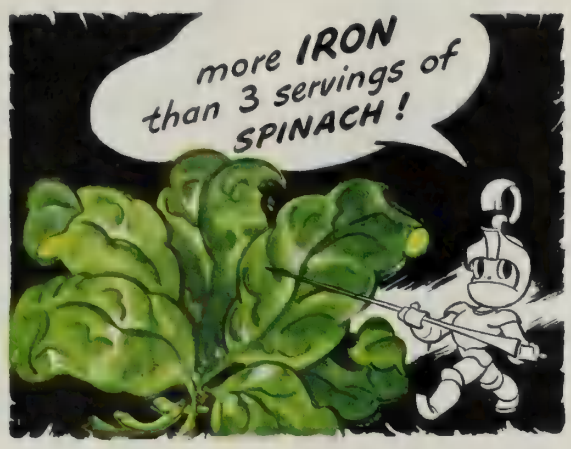
Take them in fortified food—the delicious Ovaltine way!

Of course, the whole subject of vitamins is new. We learn more about them every day. And today, millions are learning a new and better way to take their extra vitamins—a more modern, more natural way that can do more good. Discarding earlier methods of taking vitamins alone, they now take them in fortified food!

For latest evidence shows that vitamins do not work alone. They work most effectively in combination with certain other food elements—which are absolutely necessary for best results.



This is why so many people are changing to Ovaltine. A specially-fortified supplementary food-drink, it contains—besides vitamins—nearly every precious food element needed for good health, including those elements necessary for vitamin-effectiveness.



For example, Vitamin A and Vitamin C can't do their complete jobs in body-tissue building without high-quality protein. Vitamin $B_1$ and energy-food act together for vitality. Vitamin D, Calcium and Phosphorus also need each other. You get them all in each glass of Ovaltine made with milk!

So why not turn to Ovaltine? If you eat normal meals, 2 glasses of Ovaltine daily should give you all the extra amounts of vitamins and minerals needed for robust health.

3 out of every 4 people should get extra vitamins or minerals—according to Government reports. Reasons include vitamin deficiencies of many modern foods—also loss of vitamin-mineral values due to shipping, storing and cooking.

How to Boost Your Family's E.Q.

Energy Quotient

HERE'S HOW much extra energy you can give every member of your family—by adding fresh, crisp Kellogg's CORN FLAKES, with bananas, milk, and sugar, to an ordinary skimpy breakfast . . .*

1 Each delicious Kellogg's CORN FLAKES' breakfast bowl can give a busy mother like you enough extra energy for nearly 3 hours' ironing.

2 It can give a young back-yard acrobat enough extra energy for 1½ hours of gymnastics.

3 It can give the hard-working bread-winner enough extra energy for 2¾ hours of desk work.

4 It can give a budding musician enough extra energy to practice piano for more than 4 hours.

5 What's more, Kellogg's CORN FLAKES are the equal of the whole ripe grain in important protective nutrients declared essential to human diet! At your grocer's in 3 regular sizes.

LOOK! A Whole Shelf of Extra Energy in Kellogg's Variety!

In one handy carton Kellogg's VARIETY brings you 10 generous packages of 6 different Kellogg's cereals, some flaked, some popped, some shredded. Includes CORN FLAKES, RICE KRISPIES, PEP, RAISIN BRAN, SHREDDED WHEAT, KRUMBLES. Fun for all to choose their favorites! Foods for extra energy, every one, with important whole-grain protective vitamins and minerals, too. Ask for Kellogg's VARIETY!

*These statements about extra energy are based on authoritative scientific sources, considering the ordinary skimpy breakfast as about 325 food-energy units. Eat a better breakfast!

Copyright, 1946, by Kellogg Co.

"THE GRAINS ARE GREAT FOODS"— W. K. Kellogg

Man is what a woman marries. Men have two feet, two hands and sometimes two wives, but never more than one collar button or one idea at a time. Like Turkish cigarettes, men are all made of the same material; the only difference is that some are better disguised than others. Generally speaking, they may be divided into three classes—husbands, bachelors and widowers. An eligible bachelor is a man of obstinacy surrounded with suspicion. Husbands are of three varieties—prize, surprise and consolation prize. Making a husband out of a man is one of the highest plastic arts known to civilization. It requires science, sculpture and common sense, faith, hope and charity—mostly charity. It is a psychological marvel that a soft, fluffy, tender, violet-scented, sweet thing like woman should enjoy kissing a big awkward, stubby-chinned, tobacco and bay-rum-scented thing like man.

If you flatter a man, it frightens him to death, and if you don't you bore him to death. If you permit him to make love to you, he gets tired of you in the end, and if you don't, he gets tired of you in the beginning.

If you wear gay colors, rouge and startling hats, he hesitates to take you out. If you wear a little brown toque and tailor-made suit, he takes you out and stares all evening at a woman in gay colors, rouge and a startling hat.

If you are the clinging-vine type, he doubts whether you have a brain. If you are the modern type, an advanced and independent woman, he doubts whether you have a heart. If you are surly he longs for a bright mate, and if you are brilliant, he longs for a playmate. If you are popular with other men, he is jealous, and if you are not, he hesitates to marry a wallflower. If you please him, he seldom mentions it, but if you displease him, he never fails to tell you about it, especially if you are his wife.

That's all. —M. E. PERRY.

(Continued from Page 148)

around—you know that—and she doesn't think she'll get burned. Well, she won't—as long as she takes it out on me. Harlan knows that, so does everybody else—except you, apparently. And you should have, Jane." She didn't say anything and his hands tightened their grip. "You believe me, Jane, don't you?"

"Yes, but ——"

"You're the one," he said meaningly, "and the only one. If it makes one scrap of difference to you that I kiss Linda under the mistletoe, I've done it for the last time."

She knew exactly what would happen then: there'd be no more gay foursomes of the Rankin girls and their husbands, no more family reunions with dad. She sighed. "Kiss me, why don't you?"

His footsteps behind hers on the stairs had a pleasant reassuring sound.

"Warren, this Selective Service thing they were talking about tonight—that you're supposed to register for next week—is that the same as the peacetime conscription in England you told me about?"

"Yep."

"Where do you do it?"

"I don't."

"Why not?"

"They've already got me. As a reserve officer ——"

"Oh." It was almost a whimper. "Then if we—if this country should get into the war, you'd be one of the first to have to go?"

"Yes."

"Have you known this long?"

"Look now," he said, "let's cross that bridge when we come to it. Go brush your teeth like a good girl."

Live without Warren? She saw her eyes, wide and almost foolish, in the medicine cabinet mirror. Quit harping on it, she told herself severely. How do you suppose he feels?

Two pillows were punched; two books opened.

"Warren, I saw Doctor Jewett today. He has the report. He says there isn't any reason why I can't ——"

"All set?" he asked irrelevantly. "Shall I turn out the light?"

I've embarrassed him, she thought. After nine years. No, almost seven. Or was he going to change his mind now and say they shouldn't have a baby?

March 5, 1941, Jane wrote on the green check. Collector of Internal Revenue. She looked at the note Warren had clipped to their income-tax return, and made the check out for that amount. His secretary, she thought distastefully, me—that loved mending socks and baking pies.

The eighth year of her marriage didn't make any sense and the ninth promised to be just like it. Perhaps because it wasn't marriage? Warren was at Camp Gordon and she was saucer without cup—the same saucer, but not much use. Even working half days at the library and three nights a week at the Red Cross with Harriet, there were nine hundred and ninety-nine days in a year.

She took a sheet of stationery from the desk drawer and began her letter to Warren:

I've written the checks you asked me to; from here out I'll write I.O.U.'s. I'm not working too hard. It just sounds like it on paper. Remember how I used to wonder about time? Where it went? How it flew? I'm finding out. They put it in cold storage for now.

She straightened up the desk and decided to go to bed. He was a magnificent soldier and the Army recognized it—though he'd tried hard to minimize his promotion to a major's rank.

She read herself to sleep and awakened at seven, thinking she mustn't forget to put her letters out for the mailman; but as she swung her feet out of bed and felt for her slippers, the floor came up within an inch of her face. Why, I'm going to be sick, she thought, dismayed. I mustn't be. She ran down the hall. "Oh, no," she sobbed, wringing out a towel in cold water and pressing it to her face, "not again."

She felt better by noon, but she still couldn't imagine what she'd eaten to upset her. By evening when she stopped for Harriet to go to Red Cross, she'd forgotten all about it. She'd been put in charge of the files and worked doggedly to keep them as meticulously as the ones at the library.

Thursday, Friday, Saturday, Sunday. She was dressing for church and stopped suddenly to stare at herself in the mirror. Five mornings in succession. Why, I wonder if I could be ——

Monday morning she called Doctor Jewett's office for an appointment. What if she really was? A baby after all this time. She looked at her watch, trembling with excitement. Imagine! She didn't even cringe too terribly during the examination, she was so anxious to know. He only said "Relax, if you please" once, and mumbled things to the nurse.

Dressed again, sitting across the desk from him in his office, she thought she'd try upsetting his inkwell if he didn't soon say something.

"It's really much too early to say, Mrs. Gregory. Suppose you come back in two weeks? If by that time ——" He smiled. "Just as a matter of precaution—in case you are pregnant—we'll have to restrict your diet carefully." He consulted the white card in his hand. "The measurements are all very small."

She wanted to shake his conservative glasses off his ultraconservative nose. A fig for you and your measurements. Five-foot-six in my stocking feet, I am. She thought

WITH THIS Original GEBHARDT SEASONING

From picturesque Mexico comes a centuries-old flavor secret that has no equal for piquancy and tang. This incomparable flavor . . the basic seasoning for real Mexican cookery has been captured in Gebhardt's Chili Powder and brought to your kitchen in ready-to-use form. Only the Gebhardt process blends genuine, imported ancho chili peppers with fragrant spices to produce this original seasoning. With it you can make delicious Chili con Carne and other flavorful Mexican dishes. Use it also to add new zest to your stews, sauces and gravies. Try it in spaghetti or beans. "Flavor makes the food, and Gebhardt makes the flavor!"

MADE BY GEBHARDT IN SUNNY SAN ANTONIO SINCE 1896

MEXICAN RECIPE FOLDER PACKED WITH EVERY BOTTLE

Gebhardt's EAGLE CHILI POWDER

LOOK FORWARD TO CARLTON AND A LIFETIME OF WEAR with Minimum Care

Thermo-Ply Stainless Steel makes kitchen hours short and happy. Better wait for better Carlton Ware. It cleans so slick, can't stain or dent, heats fast and evenly. Cool Bakelite handles are replaceable.

Carlton Ware STAINLESS STEEL REG. U.S. PAT. OFF. CARROLLTON MANUFACTURING CO. CARROLLTON, OHIO

LOOK FOR THIS TAG
Maroon and tan, it's on every gleaming Carlton Ware utensil.

FREE! A folder of beautiful practical utensils. . . Write to Dept. H, Carrollton Mfg. Co., Carrollton, Ohio.

A CHERISHED Gift
PRACTICAL AND DECORATIVE KARVIT*
TONGS

For holding roasts, fowl and other meats while carving. Prevents slipping, skidding, soiling tablecloths.

For weddings, anniversaries, prizes and other gift times.

CHROMIUM 2.00 HEAVY SILVER PLATE 6.00 Fed Tax Prepaid

AT YOUR DEALER OR POSTPAID IN GIFT BOX

*Reg. U. S. Pat. Off.

KARVIT DIVISION, Dept. LJ
QUEEN CITY BUCKLE CO.
CINCINNATI, OHIO

KVP Shelf PAPER

FOR Flaky, GOLDEN PIE CRUSTS
FOR Crisp, GOLDEN Waffles
Just ADD A TOUCH OF JIFFY-WHIP

Also... WHIPS SINGLE CREAM, TOPS OF MILK, EVAPORATED MILK

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping
REPLACEMENT OR A RETURN OF MONEY IF DEFECTIVE OR NOT AS ADVERTISED THEREIN

IMPORTANT: CLIP AND USE THIS DIRECTION SHEET
(Your package may not contain directions for these uses)

PIE CRUSTS — Add ½ teaspoonful Jiffy-Whip to the first tablespoon of iced water used in your recipe. Then add remaining fluid. (For 2-crust pie)

WAFFLES — Beat ⅛ teaspoonful of Jiffy-Whip into each partially beaten egg yolk. Then continue beating yolks, adding milk and combining dry ingredients called for in your recipe.

THE AMERICAN PRODUCTS COMPANY
[illegible] MONMOUTH AVE., CINCINNATI [illegible] OHIO

DON'T COVER UP A

"PROBLEM SKIN"*

(YOU MAY MAKE IT WORSE!)

*See how quickly this famous cream helps heal ugly blemishes

Don't take chances with ugly, externally-caused pimples and blemishes. "Covering them up" may actually make them worse! Instead, help heal them with medicated Noxzema.

Nurses were among the first to discover how effective Noxzema is for pimples and blemishes. That's because it's a medicated formula. It contains special ingredients that not only soothe and smooth rough, dry skin but aid in healing blemishes and irritations.

See for yourself how much Noxzema can do to improve the appearance of your skin. Get a jar today at any drug counter. 10c, 35c, 50c (plus tax).

*externally-caused

NOXZEMA

STRIPED HAND-KNITS ARE SPRING FASHION

It's smart to knit your new sweater with daring bold stripes on the bias. It's smarter to knit it of luxurious Bear Brand Quali-Tested yarns, and be sure your wool is worthy of your work. Sparkling colors. Soft after sudding. More resilient. At good stores everywhere.

Send 5c today to Dept. JY-4 for instructions in making this striped favorite.

Bear Brand
QUALI-TESTED Yarns

230 FIFTH AVENUE • NEW YORK 1, N. Y.

she'd die of disappointment if she wasn't sick the next morning, but she was. She wanted to write Warren, but what if it weren't true? She'd better wait the two weeks out anyway.

His telegram asking her to leave Thursday came the day before she was due at the doctor's. Now what? She smiled wryly. If I could get decent train accommodations, it might not be too bad.

She explained to Doctor Jewett, but he shook his head.

"No, no. I'm sorry, but I can't give my consent to your traveling now—even if you think you could stand it. A little later, the danger is less imminent. A hillbilly Army camp is absolutely —— No. No."

"Just as you say." She rose and wanted to hug him, because he surely wouldn't be so fussy unless he was pretty sure. Only how to tell poor Warren?

"I can't come," she wrote on the yellow telegraph blank. "A letter's on the way."

What a letter. She wasted half a box of paper on false starts. How under heaven did you tell your husband he was about to become a father—in two hundred and fifty-seven days?

I'll come later—if you don't mind how I look. Just now I'm sort of rocky. Being at the library afternoons now is better, but I'm only staying until they can get someone to take my place.

His letter came at last, thin, frightening. He wouldn't be pleased, she decided quickly. She must get used to that idea right now. But not because he didn't love her, or wouldn't love their baby, but because he was Warren. She read the pages slowly:

I was out on maneuvers when your letter came. Since then I've been trying to discover what my reaction is. I guess I don't know because I'm not sure you're honest in what you say. I don't know that you're not being brave and taking this on the chin. I don't believe the rot about babies being the fulfillment of love. Our love is. You don't have to have a baby for me to know. Oh, Jane, darling, what do you want me to say? What will make you happy? If I were at home, seeing you every day, sure that you were all right —— If I could believe this baby would make you less lonely, my worrying about you would be a small enough price, but —— I've written Doctor Jewett. Hope you don't mind. I had to. I believe everything you say when I can see your face, but I suspect that when you take your pen in hand, you cross your fingers. And I suppose I love you for that too. Only please be careful.

It was all right, then. She hugged her new security close.

June. July. August. She was washing the lunch dishes, wearing a blue gingham pinafore with a string-and-gather attachment at the waist when a car came up the lane and stopped. It sounded something like the mail car that brought the packages and specials, but she decided not to go look because that was bad luck, and the mail'd be for next door. She poured scalding water over the dishes and shook out a clean towel. Think I'll call Harriet and ask her if she'd like to come out for dinner.

"Jane."

She stopped, trembling, because that was Warren's voice and it couldn't be. A shadow fell across the kitchen and she looked nervously toward the open door.

"Warren!"

"Hello, Slim." He dropped his bag and she ran to him. And then stopped—because she'd feel awful to him—and held out her hands.

"How beautiful of them to let you come to me."

For just a second there was something wrong with his face, then his hands were on her shoulders and he kissed her nose. "You look like ten years old."

"How could I? You've been gone a hundred. Oh, my darling. Sit down. Have you had lunch? Would you like a shower while I get something ready for you?"

He looked at her face—not any place else—but there was something hurt in his voice when he spoke. "I'd like to put my arms around you."

Then she couldn't look at him and knew she was blushing. "I'm so awkward and ugly."

...it's the ONLY throat you have!

Soothe it with

GLYCO-THYMOLINE

Mighty delicate are the membranes of the nose and throat! At the first indication of irritation from a common cold or ordinary sore throat, we suggest you spray or gargle with GLYCO-THYMOLINE! When these common winter ailments prevail, let GLYCO-THYMOLINE help soothe and heal the sensitive throat and nasal tissues.

For 50 years and more, this effective alkaline solution has helped relieve thousands. Ask your doctor. Keep a bottle around and use it often!

GLYCO-THYMOLINE

"Are you? Other women seem awkward and ugly to me because I compare them to you."

She went to him then. "Don't scold me." She raised her arms and put them around his neck. "We just didn't want to be forward—my baby and me—and we are, sort of."

"Oh, my crazy darling." He kissed her fiercely, deeply. "I've worried so about you."

Cooking was fun again. The silver coffeepot came out of its flannel and there were candles on the dinner table. "Warren, tell me about you. Are you happy?"

They were sitting on the swing, his fingers laced around hers. "I'm thirty-eight years old. Suppose that's old enough to start getting perspective? It seems to me I've only been really happy since we've been married. I was miserable as a kid because my setup wasn't like everybody else's." He shook his head. "I was even jealous when Art's father whaled him. Actually, of course, I had it more than decent, and my grandmother was wonderful to me. I see that now. It couldn't have been easy for her—taking me in—she wasn't young. I suppose we loved each other, but we didn't talk things over."

"But you said she gave you steam engines and trains."

"Oh, she did. But what I wanted was a mother and a father, like other kids. Do I sound like a heel? I'm telling you how I felt, not how I acted. I could explain my father's death as a tough break, but I never got over the fact that my mother didn't love me, was bored and annoyed with just the idea of me. I'd have stayed on with her though, if she'd put up a single argument when my grandmother said she was taking me home with her, but she didn't. It suited her swell to have me out of the way."

"You've never heard from her?" she asked.

"I saw her once the year my grandmother and I traveled in Europe."

"What happened?"

"I told you she was a tramp. She flirted with me, that's what happened. 'But you are handsome, dear boy! Beautiful! Not impossible at all!'" His face was ugly with disgust.

"What else about when you were little? Did you go to camp? Did you have a dog?"

"Sure. When I was graduated from prep school, the headmaster told my grandmother I was the best disciplined boy in the school and she was to be congratulated." He smiled reminiscently. "I can hear her yet. She looked at him. 'I take no credit for that, sir; he disciplined himself.' I liked college. I was beginning to appreciate how really fine my grandmother was—and then she died. It's awful to be all alone in the world, Jane. I'd meet a girl, start thinking —— Oh, you know me. I'll never forget your face that night at John and Marjorie's. I had to ask you right out if you lived in town. I was so afraid you might be staying with them all night and I wouldn't have a chance to see you alone."

"And then we quarreled," she said sadly.

His fingers caressed her face. "Don't regret that, Jane. We had to quarrel to find all this."

"How are things now? Do you have to work as hard? Are you happy?"

"It isn't a question of happiness, Jane. I eat well, sleep all right; I'm busier than I've ever been in my life, but it all rubs me the wrong way. There are too many people, too close. They're all men, and they all wear the same clothes. I'm never alone. I read your letters over and over. I dream of you —— Remember you asked me once why I had Art around? It's probably a case of arrested development, but every once in a while I had to let him know I was living like other people at last—and a lot better. I had a beautiful wife, a house, a good car and a decent job. Wait'll I tell the big lug we're going to have a baby."

"You are pleased?" she asked hesitantly. "Do you really feel all right?"

"Wonderful. Nothing to it—though it will be nice to see my feet again. I've sort of missed them. I'm not doing anything unheard of—having a baby. It'll be good for me to have something important to do until they let you come back to me."

He was resting his face in his hand. "I may not be able to come when you have to go to the hospital. And there is always the chance that I may be sent overseas."

That, of course, she had never believed or considered. She bit her lip. "Why? I thought defense ——"

"Don't use that word any more," he said briefly. "We're at war now—whether it's been declared or not. We sent naval and marine units to Iceland last month. Japanese assets in this country have been frozen, we've warned them to keep their hands off Thailand, Italy is in, France has already surrendered to Hitler. Just last week Japan warned us she'd force her way through our 'blockade' with force if necessary. There aren't two ways of interpreting that."

"Is the whole world going to war?"

"God only knows, but I don't see how they can miss."

She listened tensely, patiently, knowing that he was only telling her now to spare her a future shock. She knew, too, it was her part to pretend she wasn't getting it.

"Look, Jane, you aren't to worry. Hear? Think about me—not what I might have to do—and I'll be all right."

She'd said too much. "Okay. I've got everything down in my notes. I'll read it over after you've gone. Meanwhile, there's tonight—now."

But now was a golden ball, juggled tantalizingly for a moment and then gone. Tomorrow was today, and he was going. She shuddered. I can't bear it. I don't want a baby. I don't want anything but to be with you. I'm afraid. Oh, I can't bear it. I'm more than afraid. I'm lonely.

She stood awkwardly beside him while steam hissed from the waiting train.

"Look at me, Jane."

"Don't," she said harshly, "don't come again. I can't stand this. I'll come to you—after while—if they'll let me. Don't you come again."

"All aboard!"

Return in Spring

By Dorothy Boicourt

It was not spring the day the first kites flew
In blue and crimson patterns on the sky,
And even when the geese went over, high
Above the trees where hidden leaflets grew,
It was not spring. The lilacs blossomed white
And purple. Breathlessly I watched the small
Gold crocus shake its petals, and the tall
Gray-silver willow shimmer in the night . . .
And still it was not spring. Then came the hour,
The bright split second of spring's wakening.
No bluebird heralded the time, no flower
Was token of the season's blossoming—
But spring's enchantment flooded all the land
When you returned, and took me by the hand.

"Problem" Hair made Lovely again

Girls, don't give up the fight for lovely hair. Shampoo as expert hairdressers do—with Admiracion. Admiracion makes glum, listless hair appear shades brighter in minutes. Admiracion's fast, deep-down, gentle action eliminates lusterdimming dirt and loose dandruff. Rinses off easily, leaves no dulling film, won't bleach or darken your hair. Admiracion cleans hair till it glows with soft, romantic luster and shimmering high-lights. Take no chances with your hair. Ask for Admiracion—the fastest growing shampoo of its kind—at your favorite toilet counter or hairdresser's. For lots of lather, use Admiracion Foamy Shampoo. For coarse or wiry hair many prefer Admiracion No-lather.

says Michael of the Waldorf, Director of the Beauty Salon of the celebrated Waldorf-Astoria Hotel.

"I prefer Admiracion because it makes hair easier to manage. In fact, Admiracion Shampoo is such an effective all-round aid to hair beauty that we use it two to one over any other shampoo."

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

Girls with Lovely Hair always get

ADMIRACION Shampoo

She felt his arms around her and his lips on her face, but she didn't raise her eyes, or wave, or move until the last car had thundered out of sight. She walked slowly up the stairs.

Doctor Jewett took her blood pressure and made a note on her card. "You're a very satisfactory patient, Mrs. Gregory. You're doing fine."

Ho! she thought, stepping out into the street. One word of praise from him, and I'm silly. Crazy as a loon. I'll call Warren and tell him. But it'd be a waste of money. I know. I'll go downtown and buy baby clothes. Wonder if it'll be a boy or a girl? I wish I knew if Warren had a preference, then I could concentrate on that.

It was in Infants' Wear that she ran into Linda. Linda reached for a chair and sat. "Are you going to have a baby?"

Jane was elaborately casual pushing a hairpin back where it belonged. "So they tell me."

"You goon. But that's swell. Sit down. Let me buy the first present. Something flossy. Gad, do you think you've been married long enough? Eight years, isn't it?"

"Last May." She took her list from her bag and the clerk began opening and closing the glass drawers. "Will you and Harlan be the baby's godparents?"

"Angel, we'd be thrilled to pieces! Look, you go ahead and finish up here. I'll see what's doing in bassinets. Do you want pink or blue? When do you expect it?"

"About Thanksgiving," Jane told her. "Sometime the end of November."

"Gosh, that soon? We can't talk here. How about coming out for dinner? I'll call Anna and tell her to set an extra place, and then we'll look at bassinets. Maybe I can think of someone to make a fourth at bridge. I haven't been so thrilled for ages." Linda came back elated. "It's all fixed. I just had a brain wave. I called Clyde Stafford. Doris is in New York, and he's coming out."

Jane sat at the library window, watching the wild arabesque of the September garden. It would be cold so soon now. What was Warren doing at this moment? She looked at the telephone and looked away. When he was at home, she'd seldom called him. There was no need. She always knew when he'd come. Now that she so often and so desperately wanted just the sound of his voice, the telephone was as useful as a penwiper in the rain. She dropped her head on her arms. Warren, I'm so lonely. Everything's so long and wrong.

Harlan came in, friendly, handsome. "Jane, it's pretty swell—you and Warren having a baby. Nice going."

SHE hadn't felt self-conscious meeting Harlan, but what about Clyde? He didn't know she was pregnant. How must she look to people who hadn't seen her for a long time?

It turned out to be a wonderful evening. Harlan built a fire in the fireplace and they listened to a lot of Bing Crosby records before they settled down to bridge. Once when she'd been especially lucky and made a doubled bid, Clyde reached across the table and shook her hand excitedly.

"Jane, you're wonderful! That was swell! Write it down, Harlan. You doubled us. Six spades."

Warren played bridge when he wasn't studying, she thought, but this kind of thing didn't happen to him. Old friends, the vague feeling of having done the same thing before weren't part of his life now. Of course, thousands of other men were living their lives just as he was—but not quite the same, unless they, too, were trying to live two lives on two levels, in two different places.

Clyde buttoned his coat. "You drove out, Jane? I'll follow you home."

"I won't hear of it. It's miles out of your way."

But he was beside her at every traffic light, right behind her all the way. She wondered about Doris and her textile designs. Clyde was so sweet and generous, and he seemed so alone. It wasn't always the women who waited then. He opened the garage door and pulled it down again when she came out, offering his arm as they went up the walk.

"So you're going to have a baby, Jane." There was something almost wistful in his voice. "Harlan's right, you know, you really shouldn't be coming home alone at night."

"I don't often—and I'm not quite as alone as I seem. I know all the people around me, and they're very good about everything."

HE hunched his big shoulders inside his coat. "If there's anything I can do, I'd be very glad to help."

"Thank you, Clyde. I'll remember."

He took her hand at the door. "Yes, you'll remember, but you won't call on me. And I understand why you won't. Good night, Jane."

It took a long time to get to sleep that night, a longer time to think the evening through and relate it to Warren. All the platitudes bubbled to the surface: life wasn't lived in a vacuum—even with your husband a thousand miles away; the hand extended in friendship didn't imply the arm encircling in passion. Warren—or Doris either—couldn't in fairness object to —— That's how dope fiends get started: just a little to ease the pain. She stirred restlessly. I'd better stick to Harriet and the movies. She hadn't realized it'd be so much fun having dinner with men again, being helped into and out of the car, not having to close the garage door herself. Oh, Warren!

Make it a rule of life never to regret and never to look back. Regret is an appalling waste of energy: you can't build on it: it's only good for wallowing in.

—KATHERINE MANSFIELD: Bliss and Other Stories. (Alfred A. Knopf, Inc.)

Father had said he would drive up the Wednesday before Thanksgiving, and his car turned into the lane just as she finished her letter to Warren. She felt awkward and hideous going down the stairs. If only she could get safely through Linda's Thanksgiving dinner. She wasn't sorry the twins were at Culver this year and not coming home till Christmas. She'd had enough of curious eyes the past six months.

"Hello, father."

"How are you, Jane?" He hung his coat in the closet, and lowered himself stiffly into Warren's chair. "You look tired, dear. Aren't you sleeping well?"

"I'm all right. Just impatient now, I guess."

"I've been thinking," he said slowly. "It's really unwise of you to be alone here, Jane. What does your doctor say?"

"He's a man of two words: yes and no. And what he thinks, he writes on a white card and covers it up with his hand—as if he thought I might copy."

He smiled. "When does he expect your baby?"

"This week end, I guess."

"When we go to Linda's tomorrow, why don't you take a bag and plan to stay on with her until you go to the hospital?"

You too, she thought. Doesn't anyone understand why I must do this alone? I want Warren. Since I can't have him, I'll manage by myself. What's so wrong about wanting to keep just a few things——

"I'd feel better about you," he said.

She frowned. "I'll make out all right."

"For me?" he asked. There he was again—trying to make a centerpiece out of an orchid and a sunflower. "If you wish," she said wearily. It didn't matter.

Friday, November 21, 1941. She replaced the telephone, looked at her watch and began putting things in her bag. Habits were pretty nice to have around at a time like this. Brush your teeth, shower, dress, put on your

(Continued on Page 156)

AUERBACH'S presents the newest idea in American fashion design!

"Sized to height by Murray White"

A high-style dress that fits you perfectly, no matter what your height is! You can be five feet three or under, or five feet seven or taller, or your height can be average . . . in this "Sized to Height" dress, you're fitted perfectly, at the shoulders, at the waist, down to the hem! AUERBACH'S, the Salt Lake City store that's always FIRST, brings you the newest "Sized to Height" . . . 1946's important peplum-dress, of finely combed cotton poplin by BATES; feels like silk, washes like a hankie! A dream-come-true; it even has a ZIP-CLOSING for hip-sleekness and shoulder pads that snap out for easy laundering! ORDER IT NOW, in aqua, coral, or lemon. Sizes 8 to 20. All you have to do is tell us your size, and your height with shoes on. The dress that comes to you will fit divinely! And it's only $8.95 plus postage

F Sizes 8 to 20 for the SHORT FIGURE, 5 feet 3 or under.

I Sizes 10 to 20 for the MEDIUM FIGURE, 5 feet 3½ to 6½.

T Sizes 12 to 20 for the TALL FIGURE, 5 feet 7 or taller.

SIZED-TO-HEIGHT
Originated by murray white
boston
Reg. app. for.

Auerbach's
SALT LAKE CITY 10, UTAH

TEAR HERE TO ORDER BY MAIL:

AUERBACH'S
Salt Lake City 10, Utah

Please send me
"SIZED TO HEIGHT BY MURRAY WHITE" @ $8.95.
Size____ My Height is ____ aqua____ coral____ lemon____
I enclose____, plus 10c for postage
Money Order ☐ Check ☐ C.O.D. ☐
My Name____
My Address____

Refresh your clothes often with SANITONE dry cleaning

All of your clothes have a bright future ahead of them when they're cleaned the amazing Sanitone way. Keep them looking fresh and "new" as the day you wore them in the Easter parade . . . rejuvenate them often with an exclusive Sanitone cleaning that removes all soil like magic! Your SANITONE cleaner is listed in the classified section of your phone book. Remember, he is a fabric expert.

OUR SANITONE SERVICE

- Removes all soils
- Makes colors sparkle
- Leaves no "dry cleaning" odor
- Restores original fit, texture

Look for LICENSED SANITONE CLEANERS this Sign

EMERY INDUSTRIES, INC. ▪ CINCINNATI 2, OHIO

(Continued from Page 154)

face, comb your hair—just like every other morning of your life. Her eyes closed, and she clung desperately to the back of a chair, biting her lip, waiting for the pain to subside. When it had gone, she sat down at the dressing table to file a rough spot on her nail. Now she knew how the target felt when the amateur archers came for practice: never knew where it'd be hit. I didn't know you had pains in your legs. She left the room without looking back, because it wasn't her room and Warren's. It was Linda's green-and-silver guest room.

She stopped halfway down the stairs, clutching the banister, swaying crazily. I-must-remember-not-to-fall. "Look, Sylvanus," she addressed the writhing mass within her. "Let's try to behave as gentlemen. I didn't invent the system, and I don't like it a bit better than you do." But already "Sylvanus" had changed his identity, was no longer a part of herself she sheltered, but an enemy she struggled with.

Harlan came into the hall from the dining room. "Why, good morning. Oh, Jane, you're sick! Why did you bother with your bag?"

"I hoped you hadn't gone. Will you drop me off at the hospital? I've called Doctor Jewett. He's going to meet me there."

"Is Linda ready?"

"Don't call her—or dad. I'd rather be alone."

The sounds, the lights, the smells. The men and women in white. Doctor Jewett could talk after all. He was giving more orders than a government bureau.

Was that I who groaned? How horrible. "I'm being so much trouble," she apologized weakly.

"Give her a hypo."

Oblivion again—but not quite oblivion. She tried to remember what she'd read about pain. If you welcomed it, hurled yourself against it, its power over you was lessened—as if it were a sword that could go into you only up to the hilt. I'm glad Warren isn't here. He might remember this—how I look. It's better this way. I wonder if I'm an awful sissy? I'm glad I told him it wasn't to be till the first of December.

She opened her eyes and moved her body tentatively. "Has the baby come?"

"Yes."

"What kind, please?"

"Girl. Like to see her?"

She looked at the wrinkled pink face in its blanket nest and trembled. So you're the one. Hello, angel. I thought maybe I wanted a boy, but I guess it's better this way.

THE weeks went by: one, two, three. She'd been planning what she'd say all that time, but the saying was something else again.

Dearest: Don't worry about us any more—and thank you for all the wonderful, long letters, but what are you doing for sleep? Mary is a love. Looks exactly like you—which, my favorite nurse tells me, is a sure sign she'll be smart.

About Linda—it's hard to explain. The people at the hospital say they've never seen such devoted sisters. If I protest at having my temperature taken, she says what do I think she spent a hundred and fifty hours becoming a nurse's aide for? She's wonderful with the baby and I'm seven times seventy heels if I forget how terribly good she's been to me. Harlan too.

The christening is a week from Sunday. Linda has bought a new dress for the occasion and is planning a party in the afternoon. I've asked Harriet to be the other sponsor. All right?

Again the weeks went by; then the Friday Mary smiled in her bath, when the last Christmas package was wrapped and stuck with silver stars, and the mailman brought a fat letter from Warren.

She looked at the date—December 20—and felt something inside her tighten. Now she, who'd been so oblivious, remembered everything he'd ever told her about the war and his part in it; but now, of course, when she needed so terribly to know just what he was thinking, he said nothing because she had a new baby, and she was just home from the hospital.

She picked up the jade-handled letter opener and slit the envelope. Her eyes moved slowly as if to prolong the pleasure. Then she read it over again—quickly—and wished again that he weren't quite so conscientious about censoring his own mail, quite so considerate of her. Surely he could be a little more definite?

"Linda." She raised the little flower basket knocker and let it fall.

"Come on in." Linda waved toward the chaise longue, took the astringent-soaked pads from her eyes, and stuck her elbows in two jars of cream. "This party tonight'll be a binge. Thought I'd see if I could nap. What's cooking?"

"WARREN'S in California. It's a maddening letter. Every time I read it I think he means something different. I think he wants me to think he's going to be out there for some time, but he doesn't want me to bring Mary. On the next page, he talks about a furlough, but we'd lose so much time by his traveling that why don't I come? And at the end, he says he'll let me know."

"Write and tell him you can come at the drop of a hat. If, after you get there, it looks as if you might stay, we'll bring Mary out to you. Or you can come back and get her. Jane, don't do everything the hard way. And don't say 'thank you' to me again."

I'm going to see him, Jane thought excitedly. I'm going to see him soon.

The frequency of the expression of affection is a very important thing in human life.

—CHARLES ELIOT NORTON: Quoted in Under the Bridge, by Ferris Greenslet (Houghton, Mifflin)

Linda sprinkled astringent on the cotton pads. "Scram. I'll give Mary her water when she wakens."

Warren's telegram came Wednesday, but Harlan couldn't get accommodations for her until Saturday.

She wanted to go, of course, had to—but she hadn't known it would be so hard to put a sleeping baby back in its bassinet and know that it would be how long before your arms —— She closed the door softly.

Departures at seven o'clock in the morning couldn't be gala, she told herself, even wearing Harlan's brown orchids and carrying the new book father had given her. People didn't dig themselves out before dawn on Saturday morning to see you off—but Harriet did. She was waiting at the marble rail, shaking the snow from her coat, holding a ribbon-tied box.

"Harriet, how darling of you!"

"I love seeing people off. I'm so glad you're getting to go. You look wonderful, Jane. Get a lot of rest and have fun. And call me when you get back."

The train was late and she hadn't been able to eat at breakfast. Her coat was heavier than she needed and she felt dirty and tired. What if Harlan hadn't sent the telegram? Where was her purse? She took a deep breath and started down the aisle.

She couldn't find him at first; there was so much khaki. Then she saw him before he saw her, a thinner, browner Warren. What had they done to him? Oh, God, let me say the right things, she begged. Don't let anything be not just the way he wants it. She deliberately stood behind a fat woman to give him time to find her—watched the quick movements of his eyes over the crowd.

"Hello, Jane."

"Hello, dear."

His little cap disappeared and they kissed, his hands on her shoulders. "It's a fake. You don't look a bit like a mother."

"Nevertheless, I —— Warren, could we eat? I'm so hungry."

"Of course." He led her out of the station and across the parkway to a long-waisted, underslung, cream-colored convertible with its top down.

(Continued on Page 158)

Kleinert's 75th Anniversary — 1871-1946

"You can't tell me anything about Kleinert's, young lady!
I wore Kleinert's Dress Shields
75 years ago!"

"But, Granny, you wouldn't know Kleinert's Dress Shields today . . .
they've become important fashion accessories.
And you should see all the other wonderful, washable, waterproof products
Kleinert's are making—and all guaranteed!"

SOME OF KLEINERT'S PRESENT DAY PRODUCTS

SOFTEX* BABY PANTS
SOFTEX* PAD PANTS
with disposable pads
WATERPROOF SHEETING
WATERPROOF HIGH CHAIR PADS
NURSERY BAGS
DRESS SHIELDS
BRA-FORMS • GARMENT SHIELDS
SANI-SCANTS and
OTHER SANITARY GARMENTS
BEDTIMER SCUFFS
PLAYSHOES
SHOWER CURTAINS and DRAPES
GIRDLES • GARTER BELTS
BATHING CAPS
BEACH BAGS
MAKE-UP CAPES

Kleinert's

*T. M. REG. U. S. PAT. OFF.

Give a Magic Touch to Everyday Meals!

GIVE everyday meals the same sort of magic touch that makes New Orleans cooking famous! Try these recipes and use clear, delicate Wesson Oil, America's favorite salad oil! You'll find Wesson perfect for baking and frying...as well as for salads!

POT ROAST GLAMOURIZED!

Rub 4 lbs. of pot-roast beef with a mixture of ½ teaspoon each: ground cloves, mace, allspice and salt. Chop 1 onion fine; spread over beef. Mix 4 tablespoons Wesson Oil, juice of 1 lemon and 1 tablespoon vinegar. Pour over meat. Let stand in icebox overnight. Simmer meat 10 minutes in covered pot, adding 3 chopped bay leaves. Mix 1 tablespoon flour and ½ teaspoon Wesson Oil. Brown in pot with meat; add boiling water to half cover meat; simmer 3 hours or until tender. Serve with gravy.

WESSON OIL IS LIGHT AND DIGESTIBLE!

TRY THIS "SECOND HELPING" SALAD!

Into your salad bowl toss crisp, well-dried greens such as lettuce, romaine, endive, chicory, watercress, plus sliced radishes, tomato quarters, and sliced hard-cooked eggs, if desired. In a small jar put 1 teaspoon salt, ½ teaspoon pepper, ¼ teaspoon cayenne, ½ teaspoon celery salt, ¼ teaspoon dry mustard, 1 cup Wesson Oil, 2 tablespoons vinegar, 2 tablespoons tomato juice. Add 1 clove garlic, grated. Shake and pour desired amount on greens. Toss and serve.

WESSON OIL BRINGS OUT YOUR FRESH SALAD FLAVORS!

EASY GINGERBREAD GLORIFIED!

Stir ½ cup molasses and ½ cup sugar into 1 beaten egg; beat well. Sift 1½ cups sifted flour, ½ teaspoon cinnamon, ¼ teaspoon cloves, 1 teaspoon ginger, 1 teaspoon soda, ¼ teaspoon salt. Mix into molasses mixture. Add ½ cup Wesson Oil and ½ cup boiling water combined; mix to a smooth batter. Mix ¼ cup Wesson Oil and ⅓ cup brown sugar in a square cake pan. Arrange canned peach halves on bottom. Sprinkle with ¼ cup chopped nuts. Pour in batter; bake in moderate oven (350°) about 35 minutes. Serves 6.

USE DELICATE WESSON OIL WHENEVER THE RECIPE CALLS MELTED SHORTENING!

Wesson Oil

FOR SALADS & COOKING

NEW ORLEANS

(Continued from Page 156)

"I suppose this is a standard papa car? Or did Marlene Dietrich just lend it to you for the afternoon?"

"Isn't it a honey?" He was trying not to act in love with it. "That all your luggage?" He tipped the porter and got in beside her. "I've rented it for while you're here. I want to impress you."

"Oh, dear. I planned on relaxing and taking off my shoes."

"It's all right, isn't it? This is sort of our holiday from safety pins and sense. We've got it coming to us."

"You won't have to work?"

"Nope." He put his hand on her knee. "I've got us a pretty good setup too. Sitting room, bedroom and bath. You won't approve of the bed. It's velvet and voluptuous and bigger than Billy Rose's. I stayed there last night." He took his hand away. "I love you, Jane. And I've missed you terribly."

"I know. Just give me a minute. My heart's acting like a potato masher."

"We can stop any place along here and get you something to eat, or we can go up to the hotel and you can shower while I order something sent up for you."

"Yes."

"Which?"

"Whatever. You do our thinking for us," she said. "I'll just do nothing but purr."

"You're glad to be here?"

"It's like coming home."

The boy put her bags inside the door and left the window shades as they were — surprisingly. She looked slowly around. It was so large. So elaborate. The picture window was hung with mist-gray gauze and draped with delft-blue satin. There was a kidney-shaped sofa in red velvet curved around a bleached-mahogany table. It was like no hotel room she'd ever seen, and yet it had the look of all hotel rooms: of never having been lived in except temporarily—in snatches. Three pictures of her stretched across the chest of drawers in a folding leather frame.

"It's beautiful," she said. "I feel like Cinderella." She knew then. He had his orders. This was good-by. He'd planned all this, arranged all this to tell her he loved her before he said —— This was the end. And all her life, she'd hated —— This time he was going so far away there'd be no use hoping for the sound of his voice, much less the chance of —— "Would you kiss me, Warren?"

Don't cry out that his hands are breaking your bones, his mouth cruel in its bruising. You'll have long enough to forget, and little enough to remember.

"Say you love me," she begged. "Say you always will."

"Silly Slim. You belong to me." He held her head in his hands, his thumbs pushing the skin on her temples up to her hair.

IT would be nice—just to let him comfort her for the handful of hours left. "You win," she said. "I'm impressed. But I'm still hungry." She picked up her coat and walked slowly toward the bedroom. "Will you bring my bags?" She opened the closet door and saw his few clothes. "Cinderella would like to know—when is midnight?"

"I won't be able to see you after Thursday."

She caught the gasp before it could do any damage. This was Monday noon. "You haven't planned every minute, have you? You've left us a here-and-there now-and-again?"

"I've got tickets for a show tonight and there's that dinner dance tomorrow I wrote you about."

"Sounds nice." She slid out of her dress and into her robe. It was so long since there'd been anyone in the same room with her while ——

"You should try getting out of a strait jacket sometime. I bet you could."

"Oh, hush." She shook out a brown velvet hostess gown. "This is what the girls are wearing for intimate dining."

She gathered up her shower mitts and dusting powder.

"Did you bring any new snapshots?" he asked.

SHE wanted to hug him, but she said as casually as she could, "In the little bag, in that writing case. There's one you'll love. I guess you have to be six weeks old before you begin looking like much."

She turned the shower on full force. See? she said, scrubbing herself jubilantly. You thought he didn't want to see her. He's a better mother than you are. The steam crinkled the new hair around her face, the gown was even nicer than when she'd bought it. She looked at herself in the long mirror and knew she'd never look better—or feel worse.

"Here I come—ready or not. I hope you ordered me something under bell. That always sounds so fancy." She paused in the doorway and felt his eyes go from the part in her hair to the rug under her feet. Don't look so hard, or how shall I ever get across to where you are? But he managed even that for her.

"Come look at these dishes and tell me if they're all right." He held up a little blue cup from the tea set near the fireplace. "They're not marked, but they're supposed to be the real thing. I bought them for Mary. It's an English nursery tea set, see?"

"Why, Warren!" She studied the tiny dovecotes and castles. "They're exquisite. Wherever did you find them, and how come you know so much about little girls? You haven't been a father that long."

"I read a book," he told her. "Jane, if you cry, the house detective will come and think the worst."

"If I don't, will you take me to the shop where you got this?"

"You spoil everything. I was going to surprise you with that." He looked at her closely. "Aren't you awfully thin?"

"The word is 'svelte.'"

"You will take care of yourself? What're you doing about getting regular help? I expect you to keep your same symphony seat and not miss any of the plays, and buy yourself and Mary the kind of clothes you want, but I'll raise thunder if you refurnish the house while I'm gone."

"I thought I'd put her in the little room. What do you think?"

"Funny," he said, "you and she will have a life together in which I won't even be a dim memory."

There it was: the blunt stone you kept bruising your heart on. "I know," she began. "But look how stupid I was when you tried to tell me this would happen. I won't know or understand more than a fraction of what you'll experience while you're gone, so it's good that I, too, will be absorbed in a new work. When you come back, Mary will adjust to a little less of me for some of you. I've loved you too long—too much—to be diverted ——"

"I know that." He got up to answer the knock on the door. "Should be our lunch."

They ate slowly and had their coffee in the blue nursery cups.

"The Army likes me," he said. "I did something a couple of weeks ago—before I came out here. The general invited me to his quarters."

Rock Pool

By Anne Einselen

Tide out.
And a child is bent
Frogwise,
Wondrously intent
Upon a tear the sea
Has wept in the night.

Magic
Is to find it so
New-shed,
Holding the rainbow
Of the new-washed morn
To child's delight.

Strange transiency
On which to feed
Discovering sight.

"What did you do?"

"Nothing spectacular. A tough little ser-ant was raising Cain with the morale of his oup, and none of us could dope out why. ne day I looked up his record, and discov-ed that one of the privates under him was om the same town. It was a poor-boy-rich-an's-son feud. I talked to the kid—got to now him pretty well. He was thorny, too, oor devil."

"And now he loves you?"

"I suppose."

"When you were with the general—were ou excited?"

"A little, maybe. He said some pretty de-nt things. Then he asked me about my rly Army training, and about you, and if I ad a family. I didn't tell him—but I anted to—that if this war had come along n years ago, I'd have been court-martialed he first month after I was inducted."

"That's silly."

"No, it isn't. I hate the Army. I hate any ind of discipline that isn't self-imposed, and y infernal jealousy would have got me icked out in short order. But there isn't uch for me to get jealous about any more. nd that's your doing. I get mad, but I don't o anything screwy because I remember that 'm married to you, and you love me. I re-ember that I own a corner of the earth ith a house on it, my name on the mailbox, nd my chair by the fireplace. There just n't a thing for me to envy any man."

Sometimes, she thought, your cup did run ver. Against the long and lonely nights to ome, facing his empty chair, would be the emory of his voice saying those words. I ave sent my love to war with peace in his eart. That much was good. Beautifully ood. And when he did come back, Mary ould be there to ——

Wednesday the telephone interrupted hem at their late breakfast.

"Yes, yes. This is Gregory speaking." He looked at his watch. "Eleven-thirty? I'll be there." He turned back to the table. "Don't look that way, Jane. It's all right. I have to be gone for a couple of hours. Can you find something to do?"

"Of course."

"One-thirty then. I'll meet you down-stairs in the lounge—if that's all right."

"Fine."

Now it is Wednesday evening, she thought, and this was their last night. Warren pushed the sofa to face the window and they sat side by side, their feet on an ottoman, watching silently while the light faded and the sky line became a smudgy sketch in charcoal. Everything was intensified by the quiet and the twilight: the feel of the material of his coat against her arm, the scent of her perfume, the rhythm of his breathing.

"Warren—it's foul of me; it's grisly and possessive, but—do you believe in immortality?"

"No," he said, and she had the horrible feeling that he was trying to be gentle. "I think this is probably the whole show." There was a pause. "I imagine our immortality is pretty brief, and in direct proportion to the impression we make on a few people, the gap our going leaves in a few lives. To that extent, perhaps, parents have a little longer—my grandmother to me, your mother to you. But they won't be real to Mary, you know, except as we transmit ——"

She sat quiet, waiting.

He said, "It doesn't matter, you know, what I think. Much wiser men than I have believed as you do."

"I'm not married to them—and I don't love them."

"Help any if I promise to think about it?"

"Yes, but it doesn't matter. I love you, Warren."

Did they sleep that night? She'd always been impatient with the people who said they didn't get to sleep till two, or three, or five. How in the world did you know at what precise moment you dropped off? And she had never believed the people who said they

NEW SPRING LUNCHEON SALAD

Easy for entertaining or special luncheons!

WHITE CAP TOMATO JELLY

(Serves 6; uses ¼ pkg.)

1 envelope Knox Gelatine
¼ cup cold tomato juice
1½ cups hot tomato juice
1 tablespoon lemon juice
¼ teaspoon salt
⅛ teaspoon celery salt
2 tablespoons minced celery
1 cup cottage cheese
2 tablespoons chopped stuffed olives
1 tablespoon chopped chives

Soften gelatine in cold tomato juice; dissolve in hot tomato juice. Add lemon juice, salt, and celery salt. Cool. Combine cottage cheese, celery, olives, and chives; shape into 6 balls. Pour a thin coating of gelatine into individual molds that have been rinsed in cold water. When firm, put a cheese ball in each mold. When remaining gelatine begins to thicken, pour into molds. Chill until firm. Serve with mayonnaise. Garnish with additional cottage cheese.

THIS gay "White Cap" salad is fancy, yes, but easy to serve because—like all Knox dishes—you can make it ahead of time, whenever convenient. And, like all dishes made with pure, unflavored Knox Gelatine and real fruits or vegetables, it gives you all their wonderful true flavor (and good vitamins!)...so much more delicious than factory-flavored products.

FREE—Write to Mrs. Charles B. Knox, Box 24, Johnstown, N. Y., for her attractive recipe book.

KNOX GELATINE

Be a Designer of Smart Fashions

Fascinating field. Originate your own distinctive clothes. Our basic training provides excellent starting point for career. Learn at home—spare time. Send for FREE booklet today.

NATIONAL SCHOOL OF DRESS DESIGN
1315 So. Michigan Ave., Dept. 1374, Chicago 5, Ill.

KVP PIE TAPE

So You're Skeptical?

See if this INSTANT COFFEE isn't as delicious as the finest ground coffee you can buy!

● If you doubt that an Instant Coffee can taste as delicious as the finest ground coffee—then try a steaming cup of the NEW G. Washington! Just add hot water to one-half teaspoonful and see for yourself if it isn't the grandest cup of coffee you ever tasted! That's because it's pure coffee, 100% coffee—with no dextrins, maltose or dextrose added!

Thousands switching to New G. Washington

No wonder thousands are changing to G. Washington! For G. Washington, with 25 years' experience, knows how delicious instant coffee should be made! There's no coffee pot; no grounds; no waste. It's ready in 5 seconds. And it costs no more! The 2-oz. container is equal to a full pound of ground coffee. Ask for the New G. Washington at your grocery or delicatessen store today!

SEE HOW EASY IT IS to make G. Washington! Just add hot water to one-half teaspoonful and it's ready! Saves time, work—and it's *delicious!

IT'S ALL COFFEE!

THE NEW G. Washington's INSTANT COFFEE

A PRODUCT OF AMERICAN HOME FOODS, INC.

is your husband "old hat"?

Your husband is your best beau! ■ Does your good provider still provide you with a feeling of pride when you're out on the town with him? Does he reflect that look of importance, that flair for gracious living that first captured your heart? Look for one of the top answers in his hat . . . ■ Is it a new hat? Does it make the most of his very special personality? Is it shaped, shaded, and styled especially for him? ■ If it's not up to par, link your arm in his—and steer him to a Recognized Hatter. That's where experts make the most of the head of your family.

RECOGNIZED Hat Research Foundation HATTER

This Plaque Identifies a Recognized Hatter

The store that displays it is staffed with experts trained to fit you with the right shape, the right shade, and the right style hat for your personality.

a new hat on your husband helps you look smarter didn't sleep a wink all night, but she was beginning to think now ——

A clock struck somewhere in the dark night, but she missed the count. Warren jerked spasmodically, shook himself, and sat up. "Aren't you sleeping either?" he asked.

"No."

"Mind if I smoke?"

"No, of course not. Warren, have you any idea where you're going?"

"Yes. Australia. But that's confidential."

"I know."

"Jane, my errand this morning wasn't Army business. I made a will. Appointed Harlan executor. All right? They're sending it on to his lawyers."

Her fingers closed around his wrist. "That frightens me. I feel so shut away from you."

"Now who's foolish?" he teased. "Let's plan what we'll do when I get back. Do you still want to go to Europe—what's left of it? We haven't gone deep-sea fishing either. That was the other thing you hadn't done, wasn't it? Oh, Jane, my sweet."

The end of desire attained, they lay motionless beside each other, only their fingers touching. Tomorrow you will not cry, she told herself severely. You'll not gnaw your hands, nor avoid his eyes. Think where you'll put the little blue tea set. You'll have to make a ruffle for Mary's bed. Invite Harriet to dinner a week from ——

The cream-colored convertible waited under the marquee, her bags beside it.

"Good-by, Mrs. Gregory. Good-by, colonel. Enjoyed having you."

She wore the brown suit she'd worn coming out. "Warren, if you should want anything,

When one longs for drink, it seems as though one could drink a whole ocean—that is faith; but when one begins to drink, one can drink only two glasses—that is science.

—ANTON CHEKHOV.

you'll be sure to write and ask for it, won't you?"

"Yes."

"I've had a wonderful time. Everything was beautiful."

"You'll keep me up-to-date on Mary?"

She nodded. "You'll take care of yourself—for us?"

They walked across the little parkway to the station. The porter showed them her compartment and they sat down.

"You'll eat three decent meals a day, Jane? And go to bed early?"

"M'm-h'm. And see my dentist twice a year. I think you'd better go, darling."

"Yes, I suppose so. I'll be loving you, Jane."

"Yes, darling. Good-by."

Time went by in the heart, Jane thought, not recorded in hours or events, but in simple statements like the writing of schoolboys on wood fences: "Jane loves Warren." The war years were large blank calendar pages that she filled with words as you filled in crossword puzzle forms. But there was no relation between the vertical and horizontal, no real connection between a baby's learning to say "mother" and the commentator's adding "Guadalcanal" to his vocabulary; no parallel in the world's reading its papers and shouting "D Day" and Mary's pointing to a photograph and murmuring "Daddy."

Creativeness had gone out of living when Warren went into the Army. You did as you were told to do by established habits and unrelenting self-control. She reached toward the table and picked up the letter that had come that morning:

9-4-'44

I have the snapshots on the table here, but the dampness and heat have already made them curl and start to crack. You can't imagine how maddening it is to try to work or even think in this awful steam with nothing but mud, mud, mud—and bugs. We eat and breathe the things and they crawl all over us in spite of everything we do.

Mary is pretty, all right, but as I look at the two of you, all I seem to think is "clean." You "Stop it now, Henry! I'm convinced a Wilson Brothers Duratwill Tie doesn't slip, slide or wrinkle!"

Wilson Brothers

Quality Men's Wear Since 1864

Chicago • New York • San Francisco

Pajamas • Shirts • Sportswear • Knit Underwear
Shorts • Ties • Socks • T-Shirts • Sweaters

ROSEVILLE
decorative art pottery

"Freesia" Bud Vase

Enhance the beauty of cut flowers, house plants with charming ROSEVILLE vases, bowls, jardinieres, baskets, novelty pieces. Select from lovely "FREESIA" pattern at gift shops, department stores.

Write Dept. L-46 for "FREESIA" FOLDER

ROSEVILLE POTTERY, INC.
ZANESVILLE, OHIO

Sweep Easier and Faster with a WAGNER Carpet Sweeper

■ Years ahead in cleaning efficiency. See your dealer . . . insist on ■ Wagner. Write for literature.

WAGNER Komb-Kleaned Sweeper

Better, Easier "PICK-UP"

E. R. WAGNER MFG. CO., Dept. J, Milwaukee 9, Wis.

LAST YEAR MORE PEOPLE PLANTED

Mandeville TRIPLE TESTED FLOWER SEEDS

THAN EVER BEFORE IN 70 YEARS!

Flower gardeners have found that it pays to plant the flower seeds of a company that has specialized in them for 70 years. Mandeville Flower Seeds are Triple-Tested for: (1) Germination; (2) Quality of Flowers; (3) Completeness of Mixtures. Every copyrighted packet has a map that shows just when to plant in your locality and illustrations that show how to tell seedlings from weeds. A wide assortment of both popular and new varieties to beautify your garden awaits your selection at your dealer's. Make this year's garden a long-to-be-remembered one by planting Mandeville Triple-Tested Flower Seeds.

Write for free copy of "Garden Plans". It will be helpful this spring.

MANDEVILLE & KING CO.
1051 University Ave., Rochester 1, N.Y.

At Stores Everywhere!

You'll like what you See!

. . . When you ask for Fincastle Fabrics at your favorite store - their styling - coloring - texture - created for every interior, period or modern, will captivate you. Yes, you'll like what you see - when you ask for . . .

Fincastle FABRICS

LOUISVILLE TEXTILES, INC. LOUISVILLE, KY.

Moths breed in cracks of Closet Floors and Dresser Drawers

Lint from woolens gathering in the cracks is the ideal breeding place of moths!

Fill the cracks with Plastic Wood

Comes Ready to Use!

Handles like putty . . . Hardens into wood.

BUY IT IN TUBE OR CAN

PLASTIC WOOD

A CELLULOSE FIBRE FILLER

both look so clean. I can almost smell our linen closet just looking at you.

I know the Cole Porter song you mentioned. Some of the fellows have worked up a pretty good glee club, but I go outside when they sing You'd Be so Nice to Come Home To.

She refolded the pages and put them back in the envelope. In the almost three years he'd been gone, when the doorbell rang, when the news from the Pacific was bad, she'd prepared herself a hundred times against the possibility of his death, and each time the anguish left her less resilient. Miles and interminable waiting with only letters and remembered images between them now where there had been the intimacy of eating the same food, hearing the same sounds, sharing the same bed. She knew the strain was telling on her, but she didn't know what to do about it—except, of course, not to let it touch Mary.

She hadn't written Warren the stormy rebellion she felt, but he had written it, and when loneliness and wanting became intolerable, those few letters were the ones she went back to.

I can't sleep. I want you. If I could see you —— I can see you, but I can't feel you. I want you stretched out beside me, your arms around me. I want to hear my name as you whisper it. Oh, Jane, must you leave me so alone with it?

She had answered that letter—not at once, but one night when her mood echoed his, when she realized the comfort there was in just being able to read what you already knew:

Dearest, you aren't alone with it. I miss you—just the way you said. Sometimes I think I won't sleep in our bed, I'll move over to the guest room, but I can't. So I do all sorts of foolish things like getting out a pair of your pajamas and wearing them, or sleeping on your side of the bed. But none of it's any good. I go on wanting you—just as you said.

She sat a while listening to the slow, almost petulant drip of the rain. Another autumn and then another winter. No, no. Don't think about it. Harriet's coming to dinner tomorrow. What shall I have?

Harriet came at six-thirty, handsome, easy, intensely alive.

"Oh, Jane, it smells wonderful. I've had a ring around this day ever since you called me. How are you?"

"Fine," Jane replied. "Let me have your coat. Mary ——"

"Hello, Aunt Harriet."

"Hello, angel-face," Harriet said. "How yuh doin'?"

"I'm going to pass something that's a secret," Mary told her. "And my mother made a pie for dessert. And I made the little crow's feet in the top."

"You did? I'm getting little crow's-feet in my top too. Gee, she's cute, Jane. Looks like Warren when he isn't leading with his chin. But she's got your mouth, lucky gal. Say, the boss spilled something today. I'd been telling him some of the things Warren did as a matter of course that dope Davis still hasn't got next to, and he said, 'See here, Miss Canfield. You seem to think it was my idea Gregory went into the Army. You may remember some pretty steep telephone bills to Washington the three months before he left? I wasn't trying to fix up a golf date with Harry Hopkins. I tried my best to keep Warren here, and the Army tried just as hard to get him away from me. And they won. But they wouldn't have had a chance in spite of his being a reserve officer if he hadn't thought it was his duty to go!' Did you know anything about that, Jane?"

"Well, Warren's version wasn't quite like yours, but I did know there was a choice involved since he was in an essential industry."

"And you let him go?"

"Oh, Harriet, I didn't have anything to do with it." She'd been glad so many times that she hadn't tried to influence him, remembering how oblivious she'd been to the whole war impetus.

"You don't know how wonderful it is to be invited out to dinner," Harriet said. "It's so late when I get home at night now, and

"You men, you never learn!"

WIFE: Here you are, bringing Bobby another pair of sneakers. You know he'll just wear them all the time.

HUSBAND: Whoa, not so fast. These canvas shoes have "P-F"!

WIFE: And I suppose "P-F", whatever that is, makes a big difference?

HUSBAND: Indeed it does, my dove. "P-F" means Posture Foundation and it makes all the difference in the world.

HUSBAND: You see, "P-F" is built right into the shoes . . . keeps the bones of the feet in their natural, normal position. Guards against flat feet and strained leg muscles. Most wonderful improvement since sneakers were invented!

WIFE: I see I have to eat my words. Tell me, wonder man, do all canvas shoes have "P-F"?

HUSBAND: Nope. "P-F" is a Patented Feature. Only canvas shoes made by B. F. Goodrich or Hood Rubber Company have it.

SEE HOW "P-F" PROTECTS FEET

1 This orthopedically correct, rigid wedge keeps the bones of the foot in their natural, normal position. 2 This sponge rubber cushion protects the sensitive area of the foot.

"P-F" means Posture Foundation

—a Patented Feature found only in canvas shoes made by

B. F. Goodrich or HOOD RUBBER CO.

SAVE SUGAR

NO SUGAR NEEDED for this Brer Rabbit Molasses Layer Cake

DEVIL'S FOOD LAYER CAKE

½ cup shortening—½ cup Brer Rabbit GREEN LABEL Molasses—2 well beaten eggs—2 sqs. baking chocolate, melted—1¾ cups sifted all-purpose flour—1½ tsps. baking powder—½ tsp. baking soda—½ tsp. salt—1 cup milk—1 tsp. vanilla.

Cream shortening. Beat in molasses and eggs. Beat in chocolate. Mix and sift dry ingredients; add alternately with milk and vanilla to first mixture, blending well each time. Bake in 2 greased and floured 8" layer cake pans, in mod. oven (350° F.) 20 minutes or until done.

Fluffy Frosting. Put 2 egg whites and 1 cup corn syrup in top of double boiler. Place over boiling water and beat with rotary beater continuously for 7-9 minutes, or until frosting peaks.

BRER RABBIT
NEW ORLEANS
MOLASSES

OVER 60% NATURAL SUGAR — That sugar in Brer Rabbit Molasses comes straight from sugar cane. Real sugar in natural form.

RICH IN IRON — Iron is essential for good red blood! Brer Rabbit Molasses is one of the richest sources of food iron.

TWO TYPES:

GREEN LABEL—full-flavored dark molasses for cooking and a richly flavored milk shake.

GOLD LABEL—highest quality mild-flavored light molasses for table use, cooking, and a delicately flavored milk shake.

FREE! 15 SUGAR-SAVING RECIPES

Send me your leaflet giving recipes for no-sugar desserts. Also valuable 52-page cook book of 116 fine molasses recipes. BOTH FREE.

Name_____
(Print Name and Address)

Address_____

Paste this coupon on penny postcard and mail to: BRER RABBIT, c/o Penick & Ford, Ltd., Inc., New Orleans, La., Dept. J4-6 so hard to find anything in the stores after six o'clock, that I eat out all the time and grouse about the food."

"I can imagine. Has your cousin found an apartment yet?"

"Not yet. What's the news from Warren?"

"He sent some snapshots of the camp where he is. I'll get them and then we'll eat."

Harriet was wonderful to cook for, she thought, clearing the table. She was so honest in her attitudes.

"Come, Mary, say good night. The papers are over there, Harriet."

"Good night, Aunt Harriet."

"Good night, sweet."

Mary looked at the soldier doll flattened against her dress. "The really Warren's my dad," she explained, "and he doesn't sleep here on account of the war. But he will when the war's over. Then he'll come home every night for dinner. Won't he, mother?"

"Yes, dear."

In a way it was easier—asking a favor with your hands in soapy water and your eyes on the dishcloth. "Harriet, would you consider coming here to live and letting your cousin and his wife have your apartment?"

"I would not. Why in the world should you get hooked just because there's a housing problem in the Canfield family?"

"But I'm not being generous, Harriet. I'm in a spot myself. I'd like you here—unless you think Mary would get in your hair?"

Harriet's eyes narrowed. "Aren't you afraid of being struck dumb for a crack like that? Mary's adorable and you know it. Jane, has something happened to Warren?"

"No—no. I had a letter yesterday, written a week ago, and he was fine. You don't have to decide now, Harriet. I'll understand if you think you'd rather not uproot yourself."

"I can root in a glass of water and you know it," Harriet told her. "Let's talk dollars and sense. If I pay you what my rent is and let the kids assume my lease ——" She was thinking out loud.

"Harriet, the room's upstairs not being used. I'll take your ration book, and something for the food if it'll make you happier ——"

"Food? Jane, you nitwit, you don't want to feed me?"

"But of course. Oh, I know you have a lot of friends, and there'll be plenty of times when you'd rather not come right home from work. I don't want to take over your life, but ——"

"Just all the comforts of home without the headache. I don't get it."

"Yes you do. I'm lonely. And I don't want Mary to become mother-dominated. It'll be good for her to live with someone besides me, and she loves you. I thought perhaps we might try it for a while. If it shouldn't work ——"

"Lady, you bought something and you're stuck with it. I'm moving in."

HARRIET stepped into their lives as easily as if she'd been rehearsing the routine for years, and Mary bobbed around behind her like a little rowboat being towed by an ocean liner.

"It's just like having company all the time, now that you live with us, Aunt Harriet."

"'Tis, eh? How about if we make the beds and surprise your mother?"

Jane heard them whispering about their secret while the bacon sputtered and the coffee bubbled in a comfortable Sunday-morning way. They came down from upstairs.

"Bacon!" Harriet cried. "Mary, your mother's magic. Let me tie your bib. Jane, don't you really think you could leave with me tonight? I've got a drawing room. A week in New York would do you good. I'm not expected to work evenings. We could see some plays."

"I know, but I'd feel guilty traveling now."

"Okay. You'd better get on your horse if you're going to church. It looks like a good day. Maybe Mary and I will walk down in time to meet you."

Harriet came back Friday, bringing presents and a great relief. "Gee, it's good to be home." She turned to Mary. "How're you, lamb?"

Mary looked at her reproachfully and smoothed the soldier doll's wrinkled suit. "You were gone too long, and we were lonesome for you."

"I missed you too. Come see what's in this box and give me a love."

When Jane came down from putting Mary to bed, the dishes were finished and Harriet sat at the window knitting.

JANE tuned the radio. "I think a lot of things I never get around to saying, Harriet, but it's wonderful having you here."

"Don't, Jane. I may be completely self-centered, but I hope I'm not so dull I can't read a score card straight. Anyway, why do you suppose I came home early? Still five days left of my vacation. Did you make arrangements with Mrs. Earle to come every day so we can go places next week?"

"We're all set."

"Good."

It was to be a ladies' week: Town Hall, antique shops, a bridge luncheon. They counted their gas coupons and decided to splurge on a trip out to Gates Mills and Painesville.

Monday night they had dinner in the Statler's Terrace Room before they went to see The Voice of the Turtle. Tuesday they took Mary and three other little girls to the zoo and brought them back for chicken dinner. Wednesday they went to Town Hall and drove out to Gates Mills and Chagrin Falls.

Thursday morning Jane was awakened by Mary's excited stage whispers and the smell of coffee.

"Good morning, dear."

"Mother, you slept a long time. And Aunt Harriet's going to bring your breakfast upstairs for a surprise."

"Then I'd better hurry and brush my teeth. What kind of a day is it?"

"This is bonfire day, don't you remember?"

"Sure enough." She combed her hair quickly and ran a lipstick over her mouth. "Hi."

"Hi, yourself." Harriet put down the tray and raised the shades.

"You're a sleepyhead, mother."

"I certainly am. This is awfully good, Harriet. You're spoiling me."

"Could be, but you can stand some spoiling. Though I will say you look better than when I moved in six weeks ago."

"I feel wonderful." She would never be able to tell Harriet how good it was to have her in the house, to have a day-to-day life with an adult again, to share the news and small talk. She got into brown slacks and blue jersey shirt, and tied a printed scarf around her hair. "Get your overalls, Mary, and we'll rake leaves." She buttoned her brown jacket and took a pair of gloves from the drawer.

"Very natty." Harriet came out of her room with an armful of stockings. "That's the best looking outfit I've seen. Or maybe it's what's in it."

"I betcha. Here, Mary, mittens too. Come out when you've finished, Harriet. Looks like a beautiful day."

The sun was warm and brilliant. Mary tumbled delightedly in the piles of leaves they raked. "Look how they're playing ring-around-a-rosy, mother!"

A car stopped beside them. Jane looked up.

"Gregory? Mrs. Warren Gregory?"

"Yes."

"Telegram."

She leaned her rake against her shoulder and took the pencil he offered.

"Mother, I want to ride my bike now."

"All right, dear." She wheeled the blue tricycle onto the drive. "Stay on the sidewalk, Mary. I'm going in a minute."

If we did not flatter ourselves, the flattery of other people would not harm us.
—LA ROCHEFOUCAULD.

It Takes Day-Long Baking For This Extra-Tempting Flavor

You'll prefer the extra-tempting flavor of these genuine New England brick-oven baked beans. They're actually baked and baked (not boiled) . . . for one entire day. Baked through and through to mealy, tender goodness. Baked by New Englanders in famous New England kitchens as New Englanders like 'em best. If your Grocer is out, keep asking. He'll soon have more. Burnham & Morrill Company, Portland 2, Maine.

"DO IT UP BROWN"
GRAVY MASTER
Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping
FOR GRAVIES, SOUPS AND STEWS

KEEP BABY SNUG AND SAFE with Ducky Blanket Fasteners
IN NEW GIFT BOX FOR HOME USE
Ducky clips lock securely; will not tear sheet or blanket. Safe, practical; made of sanitary plastic. Packaged one pair in smart, clear-plastic gift box that does double duty at home as handy little container for baby's pins, rings, etc. At dealers everywhere . . .
$1.00
FEDERAL TOOL CORP.
CHICAGO 12, ILLINOIS

She pulled off her gloves and took the letter pener from the hall chest. Harriet came histling up the stairs from the basement.

HE SECRETARY OF WAR DESIRES ME TO XPRESS HIS DEEP REGRET THAT YOUR USBAND LIEUTENANT COLONEL WARREN AMILTON GREGORY WAS KILLED IN CTION IN DEFENSE OF HIS COUNTRY IN OUTH PACIFIC AREA OCTOBER 21. LETTER OLLOWS. THE ADJUTANT GENERAL

Her eyes closed. One hand gripped the abinet edge.

"Oh, hello. I thought you were —— Jane, hat is it?"

"Warren," she said dully. "Warren's een ——" She offered the trembling yellow aper and walked slowly into the living room. istlessly, she pulled the scarf from her head nd felt the fine wool fringe between her ngers. Mary's red corduroy legs pedaled urdily up the hill. Vaguely, she heard sob- ing in the hall behind her, but thought was nprisoned in two words. Warren. Dead. She reathed slowly, with one-at-a-time effort.

"Oh, Jane, my darling." Harriet was sob- ing wretchedly. Jane stood behind the wing hair—Warren's chair—her hands tense on 's curved, high back. Harriet buried her ead in her arms and pounded her fists on he desk. "Oh, why did it have to be him? Vhy did it have to be someone so swell? Vhy couldn't those yellow rats have missed im when there are so few decent people in his rotten world?"

The grandfather clock in the hall struck he hour: one-two-three-four-five-six-seven- ight-nine-ten-eleven. The room was still gain.

Harriet searched futilely for a handker- hief.

"Here." Jane pulled the white square om her jacket pocket and crossed the room. Don't, Harriet." She put her hand on the erking shoulder.

"No," Harriet said thickly. "I shouldn't, hould I? He was your husband, not mine. t didn't make any difference to him that I ould have loved him—almost let myself. ou were the one he wanted. The only one."

"Harriet, don't."

"I'm a pig. You know I love you, don't ou, Jane? I was glad he'd found you. It early killed me, but I knew you were ood enough for him. I knew you could give im what I'd never in a million years —— hut me up, why don't you?" She ground er teeth against one another. Something— lmost surprise—came into her face. "You an't cry, can you? Well, you've got to, do ou hear?" Her hands were on Jane's houlders, shaking her. "Jane, let go! Don't ou know you can't go on keeping it all in- ide you this way? He's dead. He's not coming back. You're never going to see him again."

There was a mittened thumping on the front door. "Mo-thur. Mo-thur."

Harriet rushed past her, up the stairs. The door of her room slammed. Jane walked slowly toward the vestibule. "Hello, honey."

"I'm too cold."

"Come in then." She was on her knees, pulling red mittens from small pink fingers. "I'll blow on them. That'll make them warm. Better?"

Mary nodded. "I'm sleepy."

"I'll carry you up." She felt the cold little face pressed against her neck, felt the baby arms tight on her shoulders, the soft little body relaxed against her own. She buttoned the blue sleeper, drew the shades. "Sleep tight, honey. You aren't cold now?"

Mary shook her head. "Mo-thur, are you saying prayers now? At nap time?"

"I guess I was." Jane got up from her knees and moved the blankets a little. "I'll see you after while."

She walked slowly down the stairs, her hand following the familiar smoothness of the banister. A crumpled yellow paper lay at the edge of the rug and she picked it up.

THE SECRETARY OF WAR ——

A pattern called a war —— No. She went to her chair by the window, saw the wind stir the leaves she'd raked and whirl them down the street.

"We're all alone in the world, Jane. The pain and ugliness, the mean stupidity ——"

Her eyes closed, her mouth trembled, the tears were hot on her face. For a dizzying second she seemed to feel the hard muscles of his shoulders under her hands, his face against hers. "Warren, I love you so."

She reached for a handkerchief, remembered she'd given hers to Harriet, and went into another pocket for Mary's. He was gone. She was alone. The years ahead stretched like a vast gray ocean—monstrous, endless emptiness.

You are the water at the earth's end.

A little gasp escaped her. Ah, yes. I've loved you too long, too well, to be diverted— "Even by your death," she whispered. All he'd given her—comfort, love, peace—he'd given her for all time. She thought of Mary, and remembered Warren's words. "I could explain my father's death. . . . I'll be loving you, Jane."

She stared at her thin, white hands, at the wide carved band of her wedding ring. She was not alone. The years of their love would shelter her always. She could walk in peace if she remembered to be glad in her giving.

(THE END)

M-M-M-Scads of Vine-Tender Raisins!

They stay softer, juicier, in this improved Raisin Bran

HAPPY news for raisin lovers! The juicy tenderness of fresh-from-the-vineyard raisins is now sealed in by Kellogg's new honeycomb coating — so they stay tenderer, juicier, than ever before. You get 'em right in the same box with Kellogg's extra-crisp bran flakes . . . a breakfast treat that's loaded with whole-grain nourishment, supplies needed iron. Naturally sweet — you can save sugar. Try 'em.

Kellogg's RAISIN BRAN FLAKES

Cereal with Fruit

Look for This New Package

If you haven't tasted Kellogg's Raisin Bran Flakes lately, you're due for a real treat. The raisins are now honey-comb-coated to stay tender and juicy. So good with Kellogg's crisper flakes!

Copyright, 1946, by Kellogg Co.

THE BRANDS THAT MADE TUNA famous!

Yes, these are the two brands that made America "tuna-conscious." Because only the tender light meat is packed, these quality brands have won, and held their position of leadership as "America's favorite tunas!"

Under wartime restrictions, your dealer frequently was unable to supply you. But our rapidly-expanding postwar fleet of new tuna clippers is already operating. Soon you should be able to get all of these famous tunas you want.

VAN CAMP SEA FOOD CO., INC.
TERMINAL ISLAND, CALIFORNIA

Buy either of these famous VAN CAMP SEA FOODS
...the Quality is the same!

GRANDMA'S STRENGTH WAS AS THE STRENGTH OF TEN—BUT HER GRANDDAUGHTER HAS TO BE ALL TEN.

I'm Tired of Grandma!

BY EVELYN ARDIS WHITMAN

I'M tired of grandma. I'm tired of her to the marrow of my bones. I'm tired of hearing how hard she worked how sterling was her character, how strong her sense of duty. Especially, I am tired of hearing women my own age say wistfully, after a day of work which would kill a horse, "Oh, well, I guess we just haven't the stamina grandma had!"

It's time someone debunked grandma. It's time the modern woman wrote her own saga. For millions of women today work so hard and under so great a strain that grandma's vaunted dawn-to-dark day would look, to them, like lovely Victorian leisure!

Let me introduce myself and, with me, the women who are my friends and of whom I write. I am forty years old, the wife of a professional man and the mother of two children. I live in a little home—bought recently after years of hard saving—in the suburbs of an Eastern industrial city. I have no domestic help of any kind. I am a college graduate with, I hope, some talent for leadership. The group I represent numbers in the millions and is growing rapidly—the group of women who, for reasons of education, natural ability or conscience, are taking the duties of their homes seriously and working for their communities as well.

And I suspect that grandma—my grandma, at least—was much less typical of her day than I am of mine, although she was precisely the kind of grandma of whom everyone talks with such wistful admiration. She lived on a farm, she had five children, she milked the cows and fed the pigs and knit the family socks and made her own soap. She canned and pickled, washed and scrubbed and had the hired men for dinner in haying time. Her life was much more strenuous than that of her city cousin who, if the Victorian novels tell a straight tale, kept a hired girl, read Ruskin in the Culture League, and had time to retire to bed with the vapors on a summer afternoon.

But I accept the challenge of the traditional grandma and insist that, in peacetime or in war, modern women work harder than grandma ever did and under a strain so much greater that to precipitate grandma into the midst of it would come near to unsettling the poor darling's reason!

Let's open the door and start right in, in the sphere where grandma was a specialist—her home. Admittedly, house cleaning was a harder job for grandma than it is for me. That is, it would have been. But grandma knew how to offset that difficulty. She just didn't keep her house as clean as I keep mine! She didn't have to. For the simple truth is this: Our rising standards of cleanliness have not only kept pace with but have even outdistanced our rising standards in laborsaving devices.

In the first place, grandma maintained only a nodding acquaintance with her front parlor. Most of the family living was done in the kitchen, which, for cleanliness, efficiency and order, resembled the modern kitchen just about as much as a country store resembles Macy's! The windows all over the house were kept hermetically sealed against all dust and dirt from outside; garden shoes were taken off at the door; and the spectacle of half a dozen neighborhood youngsters playing on her parlor rug—as they are playing on mine, at this moment!—would have turned grandma's hair gray at an early age.

Then, if it be true that many possessions are a burden to the soul, grandma's soul journeyed on light wings. For I am convinced that I own three times as many books, papers, dishes and articles of clothing as grandma did and, until the incredible closets of the ultramodern houses catch up with me, I shall be forced to continue wasting precious moments while I wander about like a lost soul, my possessions in my arms, seeking just one more inch of shelf space.

And, speaking of clothing, my family washing would have left grandma gasping. Oh, the mountains of shirts and socks, of shorts and slips, of sheets and towels!

Grandma and grandpa—let's face right up to our unsanitary pedigree!—never dreamed of such cleanliness. Grandma's bathtub occupied about the same status as the parlor. Like the parlor, it received guests once a week. On Saturday night all the members of the family were duly dunked in it, supplied with a clean shirt or dress, a pair of stockings and a pair of drawers apiece. And if they had a shampoo once a month, they were doing well.

Grandma's descendants have very nearly made the bathtub America's national emblem. Who, not wishing to be branded a social outcast, will own up to taking a bath less often than once a day? That we thus use up five to seven changes of underwear and an equal number of towels a week each does not deter us from listing the bathroom as a laborsaving device!

Grandma's comparatively unwashed family gave her a great break. Their simple tastes in cookery gave her another. It's true that grandma's woodburning monster and my gas stove aren't sisters even under the skin. But did grandma ever try to make vichysoisse or cream puffs? Did she serve formal dinners, complete from salad to nuts, to exacting guests? On the contrary, she knew how to prepare only a dozen or so simple dishes, and they were enough for her hungry and uncritical clientele. Furthermore, grandma never heard of vitamins and balanced diets, of baby formulas measured to the spoonful. True, she preserved, canned, pickled and made jelly. But victory gardens have made the modern woman grandma's equal there too. At this very moment, there are nearly three hundred jars of home-canned fruits and vegetables in my cellar, and any of my friends could put on a display that would rival grandma's.

And what grandma didn't know about interior decorating! I doubt that she ever even heard the words. She put down the Axminster carpet, hung lace curtains at the windows, put a red cloth on the table, lined up the sea shells on the mantel and called it a day! The modern, intelligent woman, on the other hand, must have an artistic eye and skilled hands if she is to rate at all with the homes around her. She is expected to understand the principles of mass and shadow and color harmony, to know a good period piece when she sees it, and to understand what makes an antique valuable. And, though she may not make patchwork quilts and hooked rugs, the imprint of her hands is on her home no less than was grandma's imprint on hers.

Leaf through any woman's magazine if you doubt it. We are the women who make the ruffled slip covers for the living room, the chintz curtains, the appliquéd bedspreads. We paint the woodwork, too, and grow flowers in the rock garden and line our closet shelves with cretonne and put stencils on the bathroom walls. For we, the women of the twentieth century, have looked, through the open door of books and magazines, at the house beautiful. A deep sense of inferiority is inevitable if, through our own lack of intelligence and resource, we are unable to reproduce that pattern in our own homes.

The complexities of housekeeping serve as a start on the modern woman's agenda, but as little more. It must now be pointed out that we are still having babies in 1946 and the stork still isn't bringing them! It is true we don't have so many as grandma did, but we are forced to bring them up by a complicated process unknown to grandma.

Grandma never heard of suppressed desires—though, I am sure, she encountered them often and suppressed them blithely without even troubling to call them by name! She knew nothing of extroverts and introverts, and worried not at all about inferiority complexes and unsocial behavior. All these things bedevil the modern mother who lies awake wondering what deep-rooted anxiety causes Mary to bite her nails, and hastens to the child-behavior clinic to find out why Junior did not hit Sammy when Sammy put a tack on his chair!

Harried thereto by troubled inner pictures of the child who grows up with repressions because he can't confide in his parents, she tries to make herself Part of His Life. She hurries with him, not only to the doctor and the dentist, but to dancing school and music lesson, to the Walt Disney movie and the zoo. She listens to his lessons, informs herself on his hobbies, tells him carefully chosen bedtime stories, tries to guide and spur his "awakening mind." Grandma, as far as can be discovered, let it awaken by itself, even deterring it from time to time with a judicious application of hairbrush!

Grandma, apparently, spent little time worrying about her husband either. Grandpa was a good man, a deacon, a pillar of the church. Grandma let God take care of any possible wavering faithfulness and, at forty, gave up and settled back to grow old with comfort and serenity. She never dieted a day in her life; she did not "consult her personality" when she went to buy a dress; she never had a facial or a manicure and she never even heard of a permanent. She simply put on her black dress, pulled her hair back into a tight knot, kept reasonably clean and let it go at that.

I certainly spend as much time on my appearance in a day as grandma did in a week. Nor am I being vain or frivolous. I am trying, as my friends are trying, to keep ever young and lovely, to live up to the sporting shibboleth that if you can't keep your husband, you shouldn't complain if someone else gets him!

American women are said to be the most attractive in the world; and well they may be, for the middle-class American woman does not shirk one item of the care bestowed on the lady of society by her maid. It is for her that the ad writers perspire at their tasks.

She is the pictured lady who is besought to buy her cosmetics in color harmony; to select the right face powder, the right cream, the right lipstick; not to forget to wash her undies every night. Until this very generation, these were niceties unknown outside of the leisure class.

Unknown, too, was the strenuous occupation labeled "keeping up with your husband." Grandma rode to church with grandpa on Sundays in the old family buggy, listened to him respectfully when he discussed politics and helped with the haying when that was necessary. But she didn't have to play with grandpa.

Modern women do. We ski and skate, play golf and tennis, shoot and dance and swim and fish. These activities, it is true, were somewhat in abeyance during the war, but the "let's have fun" glint is coming back into the eyes of returning servicemen and weary war workers alike.

Even sex has become a matter for study in the twentieth century. That the sexual relationship of man and woman is an art requiring competence, skill and imagination was a thought which certainly never impinged on grandma's mind. It impinges on ours, believe me!

We keep up with our husbands mentally too. Grandma had no notion of business and international affairs, of the latest in books and current events, and it certainly never would have occurred to grandpa to make that a cause for divorce. Yet, in the twentieth century, a man is tacitly excused if he leaves his dull, kitchen-bound wife for his sparkling modern, mentally alert secretary.

As a matter of fact, our community obligations require us to be mentally alert even if our husbands do not. Community activities, social-service work, war work, church work constitute a mountainous burden which falls almost entirely on the shoulders of the educated or semieducated middle-class woman. Who else would look after the Red Cross, the church choir, the infantile-paralysis fund, the Russian-relief drive, the day nurseries, the Parent-Teachers meetings, the civic cleanup campaigns?

I, for instance, am on the board of the League of Women Voters, with the task of chairman of the Foreign Policy Committee, and I am legislative chairman on the board of the college club. I teach an adult, forum-type Sunday-school class and am a member of the executive board of the city's Council of Churches. I am frequently called on to speak. I interview state senators, asking their support of bills that will give my youngsters and yours better schools. I discuss the problems of petting with factory girls at the Y.W.C.A., and plan mass meetings to help put my country behind Bretton Woods and the San Francisco charter.

HUNDREDS of other women in my city do these and similar things. I know women who have almost every afternoon and evening taken up for weeks ahead with some civic activity, and every day brings a new plea for help in some genuinely worth-while project.

For let no one imagine we accomplish nothing. Each organization I work in does so much for its community; in the aggregate, with other similar organizations, so much for the nation that, however pushed I am, I cannot bring myself to give them up. But, all put together, they make grandma's once-a-month meeting of the Ladies' Aid look like small peanuts indeed.

Since the war, many of us have had to "work" as well. Urged thereto either by reasons of patriotism or by the low melting point of the family income in wartime, many have gone into stores and factories and worked full-time days. I, myself, am a substitute schoolteacher. You will often find me ironing at one o'clock in the morning, or washing clothes and cleaning house on Sunday. And, if the standard of living continues to outstrip salaries, as it has done for several decades, the wives of professional men and white-collar workers will have to work in peacetime as well as wartime to support their families.

We take our final burden to bed with us at night. After the curling and brushing and cold-creaming ritual is out of the way, we climb into bed and lie awake trying to figure out how to relax! We know, for "they" have told us, that women who are tense and keyed up, who fret and nag and speak sharply to their families, are not handling their lives right. Can a husband be expected to love a wife who is always on edge? Will the children remember their homes as serene and beautiful if mother is a nagger? Can a woman keep her looks if she doesn't learn how to relax? Well, we'll have to start all over again, we tell ourselves as philosophically as we can, and try still another new system.

IS it any wonder that nervous breakdowns are so common among us, that our faces, for all our care and attention, look so tense, so keyed up? Perhaps we aren't working too hard—the doctors say we aren't, and they're supposed to know!—but the conflict which underlies all neuroses, the conflict between what we want to achieve and what we are achieving, is always unbearably there like a steady, jumping toothache. It is worth reiterating the simple truth: We are not yet, in America, using laborsaving devices to decrease labor, but only to increase standards!

Let me say, at once, that I wouldn't change places with grandma for the world. Life, for the educated modern woman, is rich and zestful and creative. If only every day would not, so stubbornly, contain just twenty-four hours.

A solution must be found, for the educated woman has surely enough to contribute to family and community to make it worth while to help her. We shall have to feel our way, for, though very numerous, she is still an anomaly, a newcomer on the scene, and the community has, as yet, made no plans for her.

But an obvious first step toward solution is simple understanding. The absurd myth that the modern middle-class woman has nothing to do, that she exists in a kind of bored vacuum created by washing machines and dishwashers—which only a few women own, anyway—has been responsible for a sadly unrealistic approach toward a dozen problems extending all the way from birth control to nervous breakdowns. Just being understood would help a lot.

A second step, of course, would be to make the much-vaunted laborsaving devices cheaper and, therefore, more accessible to the wives of white-collar men who, at present, cannot always afford them. Or—a still better solution—bring the salaries of white-collar men to the laborsaving devices! Efficient part-time domestic help would mean a great deal, too, and some communities, prior to the war, had intelligent plans worked out for neighborhood maid service.

Then we ourselves can do a great deal by co-ordinating community activities and refusing to have anything to do with those which are time-wasting and trivial.

Finally, Americans can well afford to lower a little their terrific standards of shining neatness, to remember that home is not an exhibit but a place to live in; to keep in mind, too, that life is short and that it is good to have time to lie in the sun, to think a little and dream a little, and, maybe, even grow a soul!

★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

Decoration Day

By Hortense Flexner

And when this ash, this I,
Has nourished the root of lilac
Or cellar drain
A thousand years,
Will the Sunday couple
Running out, hands clasped,
To place the wreath,
Believe you are dead?
The more fools they.

★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

"Who said Give in to Periodic Pain!"

Not you? Certainly not! Because you, modern miss, know that functional pain of menstruation is quickly relieved by taking Midol!

Yes, these tiny white tablets are offered specifically to relieve periodic pain. Millions of girls and women accept them because they have learned that they help give complete comfort in three ways: Ease Cramps—Soothe Headache—Stimulate mildly when you're "Blue".

So you see it's easy to be comfortable and carefree! And, it's easy to have Midol handy, because drugstores everywhere carry it.

MIDOL

PERSONAL SAMPLE—In plain envelope. Write Dept. K-46, Room 1418, 41 East 42nd St., New York 17, N. Y.

CRAMPS—HEADACHE—"BLUES"

He'll Trill His Sweetest on the Tested Twelve

Diet often decides the singing quality of a canary. That's why most owners feed French's Bird Seed and Biscuit—a carefully proportioned blend of these tested twelve aids to health and song—

| | |
|---|---|
| Canary Seed | Sesame Seed |
| Red Millet | Poppy Seed |
| Yellow Millet | Corn Syrup |
| Rape Seed | Cuttlebone |
| Soy Bean Grits | Charcoal |
| Yeast | Wheat Germ |

TESTED TWELVE INGREDIENTS IN ONE ECONOMICAL PACKAGE!

French's BIRD SEED — and BISCUIT —

Still GREETING CARDS

100 MONEY MAKERS

MAKE EASY EXTRA CASH with complete line of $1.00 Box Assortments and Individual cards from 5¢ up. Beautiful Stationery, Correspondence Notes. Up to 100% profit. Everyone buys. Wonderful money-making opportunity for individuals, agents, stores, schools, clubs, church groups, scouts, etc. NO EXPERIENCE NECESSARY. Write today for samples on approval and Special Offers.

ALL OCCASION BIRTHDAY EASTER MOTHER'S DAY STATIONERY WRAPPINGS And Other Boxes TO SELL AT $1

HEDENKAMP & CO., 343 Broadway, Dept. LHA, New York 13, N.Y.

WATCH CRYSTALS YOU CAN'T BREAK

ANY SIZE—ANY SHAPE

ASK ANY JEWELER FOR A G-S FLEXO CRYSTAL. 100% BREAKPROOF. CAN BE FITTED WHILE YOU WAIT. GUARANTEED.

GERMANOW-SIMON CO. ROCHESTER 1, N.Y.

IS YOUR MAN NORMAL?

(Continued from Page 49)

4. Is he sociable, shy or unsociable?

The sociable men are friendly; they like people and parties; they are good mixers. The shy fellows want to be friendly, but they are awkward and embarrassed and have a hard time taking part in social affairs. The unsociable or asocial men just do not like their fellow human beings and prefer their own company.

The next question has to do with the way the fellow runs his personality in thinking and doing, how the engines of his soul work and by what they are directed:

5. Is he self-driving, or self-conscious and introspective, or inhibited?

These are higher functions that have to do with will power. If a fellow is self-driving, he is always forcing himself to do things, particularly when he does not want to. Such a young man always has to be busy, just because he feels guilty when idle; he can never sit down and let things go. The self-conscious fellows turn this mental energy inward and are perpetually examining themselves and their thoughts and actions. This habit makes them self-conscious because they imagine that other people are also examining them and watching them. The inhibited persons are always torn by doubts, indecision and the conflict between what they want to do and what they think they ought to do. They are likely to get nowhere because they are usually stalemated by their internal strife.

The last question is a general summing up of personality traits on the basis of how they work together to make a man well balanced, efficient and dependable.

When the famous criminal lawyer Earl Rogers was in his heyday in Southern California, a high-bred old Chinese called on him. The Chinese wanted to know how much Rogers would charge to defend him for murder. The old man then sat down and began counting out the coins. Then with a courteous bow he started to leave the house. "Wait, come back," called Rogers. "Where are you going?" "I go kill man now," answered the Chinese, "then I come back."

6. Is he well integrated, poorly integrated or overintegrated?

The fellows who are well integrated or organized are dependable, thorough, sincere, trustworthy and predictable in their behavior. The poorly organized or less well integrated are erratic, unreliable, unstable, and often lack common sense and judgment. Their activities are likely to be badly directed. The overintegrated or overorganized fellows are rigid, excessively systematic, and so enslaved by routine that if you upset their habits or disarrange their personal effects they are likely to become totally disorganized.

How the Personality Traits Go With Physical Types and With One Another

The various scientists of the Grant Study took at least twenty hours on each individual: classifying his body build, examining his health and physiological processes, and determining his personality traits. To find out how these different things go together is a big statistical labor, but, once it is done, the results are likely to provide short cuts in sizing up personalities. Then you need not go through the whole list, item by item, but, by observing a few of the most important characteristics, you may deduce the rest.

Obviously the easiest and quickest clue is personal-appearance—body-build. If we can hitch up certain easily observable aspects or types of physique to some of the more outstanding personality traits, we can then come to a conception of how the total individual hangs together. There are three general aspects of the physique that enable us to make these connections. The first is the

How to Remove Dandruff Completely

APPLY FITCH'S directly from bottle onto the hair and scalp before any water is added. Massage well with hands, making sure shampoo reaches each part of scalp.

ADD WATER gradually, removing cleansing lather as it forms. Then continue to add water until no more lather forms.

RINSE THOROUGHLY with clear water. Since Fitch's is completely soluble, no after-rinse is required. Set the hair and dry.

FINISHED HAIRSTYLE is soft and lovely. No trace of dandruff or dull soap film left to cloud its natural, sparkling highlights.

Fitch's Dandruff Remover Shampoo is the only shampoo made whose guarantee to remove dandruff with the first application has the backing of one of the world's largest insurance firms. Enjoy lustrous, dandruff-free hair! Ask for an economical bottle of Fitch's at your drug counter, or have professional applications at your beauty shop.

After and between Fitch Shampoos you can keep your hair shining and manageable by using a few drops of Fitch's Ideal Hair Tonic every day. Fitch's Ideal Hair Tonic is not sticky or greasy yet it gives your hair that well-groomed look.

Fitch's TRADE MARK Dandruff Remover Shampoo

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping IF DEFECTIVE OR NOT AS ADVERTISED THEREIN REPLACEMENT OR A REFUND OF MONEY

THE F. W. FITCH COMPANY • Des Moines 6, Iowa • Bayonne, N. J. • Los Angeles 21, Calif. • Toronto 2, Canada

LETITIA FINE KNITTING YARNS

100% VIRGIN WOOL

SEND FOR FREE COLOR CARD

CHESTNUT HILL YARN CO., BOX 4027L CHESTNUT HILL, PHILADELPHIA, PA.

STICKS PERMANENTLY IN SECONDS

Sanford's LIBRARY PASTE

The only genuine Library Paste. Never stains nor discolors.

10¢ A JAR

TRY LAVORIS

It's Different and so Thorough

Lavoris does not depend upon high-powered germicidal agents; but coagulates, detaches and removes objectionable matter, without injury to delicate tissues.

Men like it, too!

QUEST

All-purpose DEODORANT

A most effective powder, for body odors, for foot comfort.

body build as described earlier—whether dominantly mesomorphic (bone-and-muscle), dominantly endomorphic (fat-and-guts), ectomorphic (linear, skinny), or more or less evenly balanced. The second set of tests has to do with "strength in masculinity" as expressed by body structure; the third with what Doctor Seltzer, of the Grant Study, calls extremely disharmonic relations of one body dimension to another (as for example a very small circumference of the chest compared with that of the head).

Beginning with mesomorphy, endomorphy and ectomorphy, we find that the typically mesomorphic boys are on the whole likely to be "vital affect," "practical organizing," "friendly" and above all "well integrated." On the other hand, the dominant ectomorphs incline to be sensitive, ideational, asocial and less well integrated. Of course, not all mesomorphs have the total first list of traits, nor all ectomorphs the second. The endomorphs tend to resemble the bone-and-muscle boys in the personality traits associated with their physical type rather than the tall, slender lads. Also, the anthropologist of the study was able to show how degrees of weakness and strength in masculinity of body form go with the various personality traits. More men with a "strong masculine component" are well integrated than are found among the weakly masculine; nearly twice as many of the men weak in the masculine component are incompletely or poorly integrated. However, both types of personality often have either trait. The overorganized or overintegrated men are slightly more common among those with weak masculinity. The men of strong masculine component are most likely to have the vital and allied characteristics, while those of weaker masculinity lean toward the sensitive, ideational and inhibited.

The bodily disproportions such as markedly flat chest, small leg circumference relative to chest circumference, and so on, seem to show a similar trait association. Men with six or more striking bodily disproportions show more than would be expected of bland affect, ideational type of mind, asocial disposition and less well-integrated personalities. On the other hand, men with no disproportions at all are clearly inclined toward the following traits: vital affect, practical organizing and well-integrated personality.

Putting physique aside for the moment and considering only the way the personality traits clump together, we may say that the traits most usually associated are well integrated and practical organizing. For a more subtle grouping, the best contrast is between men of respectively vital, bland and sensitive affect. Both vital and bland men have the strong tendency to be well integrated and practical organizing. However, the vital men tend to be interested in political affairs, to be verbalistic and sociable, whereas the bland men seem to lack fixed values in life and are inclined to be both inarticulate and inhibited. The third variety of affect, sensitive, is likely to include more men who are incompletely integrated and self-conscious, and fewer who are of the practical organizing turn of mind and the worldly attitude. They are more verbalistic than the other affect men, but lack the sociable nature of the vital boys.

He is so full of himself that he is quite empty.

It must be emphasized that none of the relationships indicated is absolute or invariable; many peculiar and sometimes contradictory associations of traits and physique do occur. You may discover that your own particular man displays a quite different combination from anything described above. He may be unique, but still normal. The most interesting personalities often fail to fall into the usual patterns of relationship between body, mind and temperament. Geniuses are nearly always peculiar; so are lunatics.

Skinless FRANKS
TRADE MARK

EXTRA TENDER! EXTRA TASTY!

You too will prefer SKINLESS franks . . . you'll enjoy every bit more . . . because SKINLESS franks are all frankfurter! No skins to peel, not one bit of waste. And SKINLESS franks are so tender, so juicy! And so easy to prepare!

YOUR FAVORITE PACKER MAKES FRANKS THE SKINLESS WAY

Progressive packers all over America supply franks and wieners made the modern, improved SKINLESS way. So it isn't necessary to change brands. Just change your order. Simply add, "the SKINLESS kind, please." Serve frankfurters often, and be sure they're made the SKINLESS way!

SAY SKINLESS WHEN YOU SAY FRANKFURTERS

THE VISKING CORPORATION, 6733 W. 65th St., Chicago, Ill.

Figure going to "waist"? Better Reduce the Ry-Krisp way!

"Round numbers" are out of style! First step to a slim silhouette is to send for the Ry-Krisp plan. Then, choose what you like to eat from long lists of foods (in quantities given) . . . enjoy Ry-Krisp as bread . . . and any normal overweight can lose pounds! And delicious Ry-Krisp adds flavor to any meal! Wafer-thin, crisp . . . with whole-rye minerals and vitamin $B_1$ to tone you up. Only 23 calories per double-wafer.

FREE! NEW "DESIGN FOR REDUCING," GIVES REDUCING PLANS FOR MEN AND WOMEN. WRITE RY-KRISP, 10 CHECKERBOARD SQUARE, ST. LOUIS 2, MISSOURI

If you have found out your friend's personality to your own satisfaction, it is up to you to bid or to pass. The following questions ought to help you make a crude diagnosis and classification; but recall that this is a tough job even for a battery of expert scientists.

Here are the commonest conventional patterns or stereotypes of the "normal" Harvard young men, slightly oversimplified.

I. Commonest type

PHYSICAL: Dominant mesomorph (bone-and-muscle), strong masculine component, few or no disproportions.

PERSONALITY TRAITS: Vital affect, well-integrated, practical organizing, social, verbalistic.

II. Also common

PHYSICAL: Dominant mesomorph, or endo-mesomorph, or balanced type, strong to medium masculine component.

PERSONALITY TRAITS: Bland affect, well-integrated, inarticulate, mechanical and physical sciences, asocial, inhibited.

III. Less common

PHYSICAL: Dominant ectomorph (linear, skinny), strong masculine component, few disproportions.

PERSONALITY TRAITS: Vital or bland affect, well-integrated, scientific or practical, sociable, interested in humanity or in political affairs, verbalistic, self-driving.

IV. Still less common

PHYSICAL: Dominant ectomorph, weak in masculine component, many disproportions.

PERSONALITY TRAITS: Sensitive affect, incompletely integrated or over-integrated, ideational or creative and intuitive, shy or asocial, self-conscious or inhibited, often inarticulate, often lacking in purpose and values.

V. Very rare in Harvard "normals"

(An insufficient number for more than a guess at personality traits; probably common enough in general population.)

PHYSICAL: Dominant endomorphs (round, soft type), medium to strong in masculine component, few disproportions.

PERSONALITY TRAITS (??): Bland affect, well-integrated, practical, inarticulate or verbalistic, sociable.

Remember that these types are merely suggestions as to the commoner personality traits that go with certain body builds in a limited sample of normal young men. Many other types may and do occur in "normals."

★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

Anniversary Sonnet

By Joanne de Longchamps

Because we cannot hope to know again
The dual pleasure of love unpossessed
And unexplored (the first shy moment when Emotion was a bird heart in the breast),
We can be grateful for this winter hour,
The red ballet performing on the grate,
A teacup at your elbow, and the flower
We picked before the frost and blooming late.
Enough to be together in this place
With warmth and mingled light—to be alone.
I watch the lamp glow curve about your face
And feel your deep glance lifting to my own.
Our restless love has found a softer mood—
We are fulfilled within this quietude.

★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

QUIZ

PART I. PHYSICAL TYPING

1. Has he a heavy, bony head and face, strong neck, broad sloping shoulders, big chest tapering to compact belly, bulging muscles, big wrists, ankles, hands and feet? If so, he is an extreme mesomorph.

2. Has he a soft, round face and neck, high deep chest, big stomach, heavy limbs tapering to small, chubby hands and feet, generally so well upholstered his muscles do not show? If so, he is an extreme endomorph.

3. Does he appear to have been squeezed from side to side and front to back so that he has a narrow head, long hatchet face, long thin neck, narrow shoulders, flat chest, insignificant belly, long stringy arms and legs with narrow hands and feet? If so, he is an extreme ectomorph.

4. Is he more like 1, but with a secondary overlay of fat and some other features of 2? If so, he is a dominant mesomorph with secondary endomorphy.

5. Is he like 1, but with very long and well-muscled though not heavy arms and legs and with other features of 3? If so, he is a mesomorphic ectomorph, a dominant mesomorph with secondary ectomorphy.

6. Is he like 2, but with very broad shoulders, big hands and feet and considerable muscular strength and little appearance of "softness"? If so, he is a dominant endomorph with secondary mesomorphy.

7. Is he like 2 in the body but like 3 in having very long limbs and narrow long hands and feet? If so, he is probably weak in the masculine component and in muscular strength—an ecto-endomorph with endomorphy dominant.

8. Is he like 3, but with fairly good shoulders and chest, moderately heavy bones and sinewy limbs without muscle bulges? If so, he is a dominant ectomorph with secondary mesomorphy.

9. Is he tall and slender, but with pinched waistline, rounded full hips and a slightly undulating walk? A dominant ectomorph with secondary endomorphy and weak in the masculine component.

10. Is he neither fat nor thin nor yet ruggedly muscular and heavy-boned, with limbs neither long nor short, neither fat nor skinny, smooth but not gnarled and bulgy? Does he seem to unite symmetry and smoothness in the strength rather than in the fragility or flabbiness? He is then a balanced type.

PART II. PERSONALITY TRAITS

1. Is he vital, bland, or sensitive in affect?

(a) Does he impress you as overflowing with energy and strength of personality without trying to be dynamic, without forcing himself to be assertive, without attempting to "sell himself"?

If answer is "yes," your man is "vital."

(b) Or does he seem calm, "dead-pan," poised and impersonal, with little desire to express himself or to show his emotions, so that he appears serenely indifferent to people and events?

If answer is "yes," your man is "bland."

(c) Is he jittery and unrestful, with his facial expression constantly changing in a bewildering way? Is he so thin-skinned that he has to be handled with kid gloves? Does he blush, go pale, sweat, shiver, swallow, gulp, sigh at the slightest provocation?

If the answer is "yes," your man is "sensitive."

2. Are his interests scientific, practical organizing, ideational, or creative and intuitive?

(a) Is he more interested in the processes and materials that produced the atomic bomb and in how it works than its effect on mankind and civilization? Does he think of progress in terms of inventions and labor-saving devices rather than in terms of better or worse human behavior, happiness or misery?

If so, he is "scientific," in the sense that he is motivated toward physical and mechanical science.

(b) Is he the sort of person who is asked to head a drive for collecting money, or one who promotes new organizations designed to accomplish something practical (such as re-

YOU CAN PAINT

New Life

INTO YOUR HOME, TOO.

A new kind of life for walls painted with Kyanize Clingcote Flat Enamel. This easy-to-apply oil-base flat enamel dries overnight. Use it over plaster, brick, concrete, wallpaper, or even over calcimine. Beautiful pastels or white. Washable. Self-smoothing. Easy to clean.

BOSTON VARNISH COMPANY
Boston · Chicago · Los Angeles
Montreal

KYANIZE BEAUTIFIES AS IT PROTECTS

SAVE THE NATION FROM INFLATION
Use it up.
Wear it out.
Make it do or do without.

Self-Smoothing
Kyanize
PAINTS · VARNISHES · ENAMELS
THE LIFE OF THE SURFACE

duction of taxes, residential zoning, city planning), or one who is likely to be on committees having to do with carrying out projects rather than developing new ideas and methods? Are his business interests management and production rather than sales and advertising?

Such a man is "practical organizing."

(c) Is he full of ideas on the reorganization of business, government, education, relations of labor to management, international affairs, and does he like to talk and argue about better methods, efficiency, economic planning?

If so, he is "ideational."

(d) Are his interests rather in producing something new in the realm of thinking—some intellectual innovation that will make people revise their old ideas, or some startling departure from the usual in art, architecture or even in business and government? Is he the sort of person who is likely to flash out with some revolutionary idea or process that seems to have come to him from his instinctive understanding of people and things rather than by a slow tedious method of trying out this and that until somehow or other he manages to hit the right solution?

If so, he is "creative and intuitive."

The envious person feels as if the praise given to others is taken away from his own. —JOHN PETIT-SENN.

Man grows through misfortune. Not only does he learn more about others, but most about himself. —GOETHE.

3. Is he inarticulate, or verbalistic?

(a) Does he keep still while others talk and hesitate and get all balled up when he tries to express himself? Or has he just "nothing to say"?

He is "inarticulate."

(b) Does he monopolize conversations, carry on monologues and get up and speak often and long whenever he can grab the floor at a meeting?

Such a fellow is "verbalistic."

4. Is he sociable, shy, or asocial?

(a) Is he always at parties and other gatherings, calling everyone by nicknames, usually in the middle of a group, and a perpetual "glad-hander"?

He is "sociable."

(b) Does he go to such gatherings, but tend to stand off by himself, on the edges, looking ill-at-ease? When he tries to mix and be friendly, are his efforts awkward and forced?

He is "shy."

(c) Does he avoid meetings and parties as he would the pest, only appearing at one of these affairs when he is dragged there, and then glowering and sullen? Does he appear to lack friends and associates and to prefer to keep by himself?

He is "asocial."

5. Is he self-driving, self-conscious, or inhibited?

(a) Does he rush about in a flurry from one place or task to another? Is he overconscientious about being on time, doing his duty, taking on disagreeable tasks that others avoid? Does he never know when to stop working or exercising, no matter how tired he is?

He is "self-driving."

(b) Does he always seem to be so concerned with the impression he is making on others that he is nervous, uncertain, awkward? Is he so wrapped up in himself that he is afraid to walk before an audience, even to take a front seat? Is he afraid of being laughed at or criticized?

He is "self-conscious."

(c) Is he ineffective at what he tries to do, because he always seems to be indecisive, hesitating, stumbling and trying to go in several entirely different directions at once?

He is "inhibited."

6. Is he well-integrated, incompletely integrated, or overintegrated?

(a) Does he seem to have himself well in hand, so that you are confident of his ability to get what he wants? Does his whole personality seem well rounded and stable? Can you bet on him?

He is "well-integrated.'

(b) Does he appear to have flaws or weakness of personality that make his behavior unpredictable, so that you hardly know what to expect of him? Is he likely to weaken in a crisis?

He is "incompletely integrated."

(c) Does he have to have everything "just so"? Does he throw a fit if anyone moves the furniture in his room or the objects on his desk, or asks him to have lunch an hour earlier? Is he overparticular about manners. conventions, all sorts of rules and his personal appearance? Is he rigid in habits, thoughts and general behavior?

Such a man is "overintegrated."

9 feet - 6¢

Royledge
SHELVING

1. To brighten a dark kitchen, paint walls in light, sunny colors (like golden yellow) . . . and use a bright Royledge Shelving pattern on open shelves, cupboards, closets . . . changing the Royledge color scheme every other month in just a few minutes, for only a few pennies.

2. To make linens look whiter, crisper, place Royledge shelving in bright reds, greens, blues, etc. in linen closets for colorful contrast. The smart hostess dresses up clothes closets too (one of the first places a visitor sees) with decorative Royledge Shelving.

See newest Royledge patterns now at 5-and-10's, neighborhood, dept. stores.

MAN'S GREATEST ENEMY—MAN?

(Continued from Page 6)

men to "labor commodities," by gearing the rhythm of their lives to machines, by humiliating them before their wives and children, through unemployment, by reducing their personal dignity. They compensate against this by aggressiveness.

Chronic hunger breeds psychical and emotional aberrations. "Yond Cassius hath a lean and hungry look," was, in Shakespeare's words, a description of a dangerous individual. Inadequate nourishment depraves the mind and soul, for it gives a purely animal instinct priority over all higher yearnings.

The reduction of the erotic instinct to the purely physical aspect of "sex" also degrades the human being, and bars him from those outlets in sublimation, which are the source of all art, thought, manners, decorum, and civilization itself.

These things are as well known to psychologists as bacteria to biologists, or the ingredients of nuclear energy to physicists. They were known to the philosophers and the great religious leaders, centuries ago. But Man has concentrated more brains, energy and organization on perfecting the material world than on perfecting himself, or he has thought that material progress alone was enough.

It is obviously not enough, for, by and large, mankind is better off materially than ever before in history, but worse off psychologically.

Except as the accompaniment or aftermath of war and revolution, which are man-made catastrophes, men seldom starve; they live longer and more healthily; they have fewer bodily diseases—but they are more often insane or subject to neurotic aberrations. So Man is not growing less dangerous, while his weapons are infinitely more so.

The problem that confronts us is therefore a purely human one, and it demands that political and economic leadership concentrate their primary attention on creating societies in which people are psychologically happy. For only then are they safe, in their relations with one another.

If hundreds of thousands of people are to spend their income-producing time at tasks which make them mere cogs in machines, working hours must be shortened, regardless of any other considerations, and opportunities must be created to encourage other creative activity.

Canned recreation does nothing to cultivate that self-respect and self-expression which are necessities of the human ego.

The decentralization of industry, which would make it possible for men to live in their own detached houses, cultivate their own gardens and meet their fellow men as

(Continued on Page 172)

It's Here! Kroehler's Marvelous New Luxury Lounge Furniture

Here's the thrilling, new Kroehler furniture you've waited for. Excitingly . . . buoyantly . . . restfully different!

Just sit down and lean back in any new Kroehler sofa or chair. Move your shoulders . . . shift your weight. Feel how the amazing new back and seat cushioning actually gives you the sensation of floating—how it moves with you—co-operates with you.

No Other Furniture like It

You see, there's nothing to interfere with sensational, new, free spring action. No needless stuffing to get in the way, bunch up or become lumpy. No strings to come untied. Nothing can break or slip out of place. No humps or bumps, ever, to ruin the comfort or looks of your furniture.

New Luxury Lounge Features

Here, for the first time in upholstered furniture, Kroehler has developed springs of scientifically graded weight and resilience to work in unison for your utmost rest and relaxation.

Now, Kroehler gives you two complete sets of springs in the back—and two complete sets of springs in the seat. Each working independently, yet in complete harmony, they give you a buoyancy never before possible in furniture at any price.

From fine hardwood frames to the tiniest spring, every hidden feature is perfectly co-ordinated to assist every other feature. This precision construction not only gives new luxury lounge comfort, but also makes Kroehler furniture stay beautiful years longer!

See Your Authorized Kroehler Dealer

Thrill to this triumph of Kroehler scientific wartime research. Doubly thrilling, Kroehler has the resources to bring you this new "million dollar" comfort for no more than average furniture costs. Sit in it just once and you'll never be content to own anything but Kroehler furniture!

Look for This Famous Label—Your Guarantee of Kroehler Luxury Lounge Furniture.

KROEHLER
STERLING QUALITY
WORLD'S LARGEST FURNITURE MANUFACTURER

KROEHLER

(Say KRAY-LER)

Follow the Footsteps of Fashion this gay spring season in smartly styled
Krippendorf Foot Rest Shoes.
Lovely shoes they are . . .
to work in . . . play in . . . live in.
Comfortable, too,
especially designed to fit snugly
at toe . . . and heel . . . and instep.
Write for name of your nearest dealer.

$6.95 to $7.95
(Slightly higher Denver west)

THE KRIPPENDORF-DITTMANN CO., CINCINNATI 2, OHIO

HAND KNITS
BY
Beehive

Choose high-fashion designs from Beehive books, and Beehive yarns . . . the quality team that will bring knitting success. Supreme among knitting wools since 1785, Beehive yarns excel in colors, textures and durability.
At leading stores . . . or order books in coupon below.

Mail coupon today for Beehive Fashion Books . . . just 25 cents each.

Royal Society, Inc., Dept. LHJ-4
230 Fifth Avenue, New York 1, New York
Dear Sirs:
Enclosed find.....cents for the books checked, at 25 cents each:
☐ Hand Knits by Beehive (adult fashions—see above illustration), No. 132
☐ Hand Knits by Beehive—Teen-Age Fashions, No. 131
☐ Hand Knits by Beehive from 4 to 14, No. 130
☐ Hand Knits by Beehive for Babies (reprinted by popular demand), No. 120-A ☐ Hand Knits by Beehive for Babies (new baby fashions), No. 129

Name.....
(please print)
Street.....
City.....State.....

(Continued from Page 170)

neighbors, might not appear immediately as "economic," but it would pay off in happier, because more creative and more self-respecting, people.

No man can be particularly proud of a production in the creation of which he did no more than rivet a single bolt. Yet our modern work system is collective, and the infinite division of labor does create fantastic material values. All the more reason, then, why a much more intensive private life should be encouraged. For man cannot satisfy his ego collectively. He has to be able to point to my work, my wife, my home, my garden.

Hollywood has created erotic ideals which the ordinary man can never realize. The glamour girls are rich men's flesh. The average man's sweetie cannot be a Powers model. Why can we not more often present the female of the species as she is—generally broad in the beam after middle age, even if she is a queen, even if she was born and raised on Park Avenue? Why does not mass entertainment and education more often celebrate motherhood as it is, fatherhood as it is and children as they are? The erotic instinct has its base in sexuality, but it encompasses all beauty, tenderness, protectiveness, parenthood, friendship and the most fundamental societal impulses. "It's love that makes the world go round," but not the clinch and the Grand Passion that as often as not end in a divorce court and the bitterest disillusionment.

★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

Returned Soldier

By Catherine Haydon Jacobs

Up the avenue and toward me,
New arrival of the day,
He walked with each step knowing
The months he'd been away.
Up the avenue and toward me. . . .
The whole street
Seemed to echo with the rhythm of his feet,
Seemed to catch, as I did
His clear eye
As it searched the city's towers,
Saw the sky.
And to us who had been standing
On war's rim,
There was a look of God on him.

★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

Just at present there is a boom in the idea that the people are masses and must all be organized twenty-four hours a day, as objects of machinelike rationality—all guaranteed a minimum of 2500 calories, and so on. If God (or Nature) has thus designed men, there certainly would not exist the subversive fact that no two of them are exactly alike, not even identical twins. The old nursery rhymes about Jack Sprat and his wife, and pease porridge hot, have more sense. Man (or woman) is a creature of infinite variety. Some like music, some are tone-deaf, some are enraptured by pictures, others are color blind, some adore to tinker with radio sets, some like to build cabinets, some like salads, some only enjoy eating meat, but every last mother's son of them likes to eat something, build something, love something.

Pope said, "The proper study of mankind is Man." So while we are disintegrating atoms, setting up UNO's and bouncing echoes off the moon, we had better devote our chief energies to asking:

What makes people happy, creative and reasonable?

Otherwise, one of these days, Man, the most reasonable of animals when happy, the most terrifying when frustrated, will blow up the world simply because, on the whole, it makes him sick.

MOJUD

. . . a name that means everything you can ask for in nylon stockings

"Mojud" means stockings we are proud to make and you'll be proud to wear. Skillfully fashioned of nylon, du Pont's miracle yarn, Mojuds are the last word in long-lasting loveliness.

At better stores everywhere.

TRADE MARK REG.
© 1946 MOJUD HOSIERY CO., INC., N.Y.C.

NEW dry SHAMPOO!

CLEANS HAIR IN 10 MINUTES
WITHOUT WATER

- No soap—no rinsing—no drying
- Removes oil, dirt, hair odors
- Retains wave; restores sheen
- Grand between water shampoos
- Ideal during colds or illness

MINIPOO
30 Shampoos with Mitten $1.00 plus tax

PREVENTS CHAFING—

Warner's
CHAFĒZE
REG. U. S. PAT. OFF.
(Pronounced Chay-fees)

Adjustable, soft, washable. Rayon and cotton jersey. Worn next to the skin. Will not slip nor slide. Be sure it's a Warner's Chafeze.

Sold only in Corset Departments

$1.25
larger size
$1.50

THE WARNER BROTHERS COMPANY
LAFAYETTE ST. BRIDGEPORT 2, CONN.

Why Not Let Your Child Alone?

By H. J. Heltman

"WAIT for your child to grow up." That is the simple advice I am giving to the young mother whose distressing letter lies on my desk before me. She tells me that her not-quite-three-year-old daughter has been stammering noticeably for several weeks, and she wants to know what to do about it. Being an intelligent woman with training in child health and welfare, she feels that with some suggestions on correction she will be able, as she puts it, to clip any habit of stammering before it becomes established.

The somewhat complete history of the case gives a pretty accurate description of the usual progress in speech development from the time of the first monosyllables to the much later correctly spoken words and simple sentences. Indeed, quite early this particular child mastered the l sound, which comes rather late for some little ones, and also the somewhat difficult k and g, which in the average youngster may be sounded as t and d until well into the fourth year. From the story, I gather that the child's speech is developing just as it should, with a slight balance on the superior side.

What disturbs this mother is that what the baby has to say doesn't run so smoothly as it ought to. Her speech sounds as though what she has to say "just does not come." It seems to those around her quite as though there is a lack of co-ordination between mind and the speech organs. Here are some of the actual expressions: "Jo, Jo, Jo, Jo, Jo wants the ball." . . . "I want, I want, I want, I want to stir that." . . . "Give, give, give, give Jo some soup." . . . "I, I, I, I, I, I can do that now."

In her attempt to do something about it, the mother has been making the child stop speaking—telling her to think what she wants to say, and then say it. In some instances the desired words are spoken for the little one. To quote again, "The former expedient often only makes her self-conscious, and say nothing. The second procedure more than likely results in her allowing me to do her talking for her."

The doctor came out of the husband's room. "It's his nerves," he informed the wife. "He drinks too much strong coffee and you mustn't let him have it, as he gets too excited."

"But, doctor," protested the wife, "you should see how much more excited he gets when I give him weak coffee!" —EVAN ESAR: Esar's Joke Dictionary. (Harvest House).

Keep thine eyes wide open before marriage; and half-shut afterward.

—THOMAS FULLER: From Reperusals and Re-collections (Harcourt, Brace & Co.).

THE description given above presents an excellent picture of what seems to be stammering in children, and also of the way in which parents often try to deal with it. Yet the thing that is bothering this mother is a perfectly natural aspect of developing speech.

Several years ago, Dr. Max Steer, director of the speech clinic at Purdue University, conducted an experiment which demonstrated, with regard to the hesitations and repetitions in the speech of children between the ages of four and thirteen, that there is little difference between those who are supposed to be stammerers and normal boys and girls.

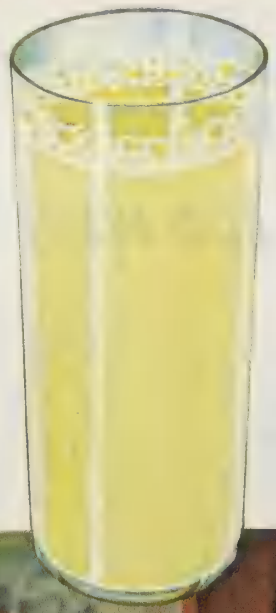
Later, Dr. Wendell Johnson, of Iowa State University speech clinic, from another investigation pointed out that, almost universally, it is in cases where parents have been unduly concerned about the natural clumsiness of their children's speech that the real stammering disorder later puts in its appearance.

The advice I am giving this mother should be followed by every parent: Wait for your child to grow up. When your youngster gets up on his hands and knees for the first time, pitches forward and takes the skin off his nose, you do not stand him on his feet and say, "Now walk." Nor do you carry him from one spot on the floor to another. If he picks up his cup and drops it, spilling the contents over the table, you do not give him a slender-stemmed goblet, at the same time admonishing him to hold it gracefully and drink. Neither do you deny him further use of cups. Rather, you wait patiently and hopefully for him to develop the necessary skill to perform these acts through many a clumsy attempt and frequent failure.

ISN'T it rather odd, then, that people who expect little ones to have considerable difficulty in learning to perform even the simplest acts common to all human beings, should be so disturbed when these same children have trouble talking like grownups, even before they are old enough to go to school? When baby first begins to use a spoon he holds the utensil in his fist, spills the food on himself and on the table and floor, and generally makes a discouraging job of it. Your comment is merely that he is just learning to eat with a spoon. When he gets on his feet and totters a step or two and then falls, often painfully, to the floor, you are delighted to know that he has taken his first step. But when he makes the clumsy attempt to learn the much more complicated process of speaking like adults, a good many parents are inclined to forget that here, too, he is only growing up, and with the proper encouragement and patience he will learn this skill, too, quite as certainly as he learns to walk and eat like his elders.

The mother who writes me this letter is to be commended for her good sense in seeking professional advice, since she feels that something is wrong. Too often nothing at all is done in hopes that in the end everything will turn out all right, that the disturbance will be outgrown. Or, on the other hand, there is sometimes an inclination to take the advice of neighbors who have presumably seen cases "just like that." The wise parent would no more follow such a course than he would ask the recommendation of a corner druggist when a physician should be consulted.

If you have in your family such a problem as occurs in the story told in this letter here before me, your procedure is not so much in knowing what to avoid as it is to know what would be best to do to prevent the development of stammering as a fixed habit or permanent speech disorder.



Following are five rules which, if they are observed, will give your son or daughter the best possible chance of growing up with speech which is free from this distressing handicap:

1. Keep your child in the best possible physical and mental health.
2. Encourage and direct him in plenty of speech play so that he may come to enjoy the mere use of his vocal equipment.
3. Listen with quiet patience when he tries to speak, even though he has a great deal of difficulty getting it out.
4. Respond to him in such a way that his efforts to speak are pleasant to him, rather than expect him so to manage it that it will be pleasing to you.
5. Get used to the idea that it may take a long time for his speech to be at its best.

DELICIOUS FLORIDA GRAPEFRUIT JUICE

100% Refresher!

With its wealth of vitamin C, it gives you a Helping Hand in feeling 100%, in looking 100%, in being 100%

● Here's news about canned grapefruit juice that's 100% GOOD news! Not only has Florida found the way to put up juice 100% delicious, but now in Florida Grapefruit Juice you'll enjoy a drink 100% refreshing.

It's a drink that gives a helping hand in restoring vigor from head to foot . . . because it fights fatigue. For in the Juice that's offered you today, there's an abundance of the vitamin C you need daily to help keep you 100% fit.

For quick and long-lasting refreshment—for a helping hand in fighting fatigue, infections and colds—make Florida Canned Grapefruit Juice your family's daily stand-by. It saves time and trouble and money. It fortifies you with vitamin C the delicious, NATURAL way. Try it regularly—and see. It's the 100% REFRESHER!

Try ALL these delicious Florida Juices and Fruits

● Orange-Grapefruit Blended Juice
● Florida Orange Juice ● Florida Grapefruit Sections

100% DELICIOUS!
100% HEALTHFUL!
100% CONVENIENT!
100% ECONOMICAL!

● FLORIDA CITRUS COMMISSION ▪ Lakeland, Florida

Canned

FLORIDA GRAPEFRUIT JUICE

Oh, My Aching Stomach

BY ROBERT J. LANDRY

Even after a hundred years some Americans haven't quite forgotten how angry their great-great-parents were at Charles Dickens and Mrs. Trollope for writing harsh words about what Americans ate and how they cooked it. So, when Robert Landry's gaily mordant piece about British cooking of today came into the JOURNAL office we editors wondered whether, if we printed it, we might not be precipitating another International Incident upon a world that seems to have about as many of them as it needs. But Dorothy Black was on hand to reassure us. "I agree with every word of this," her comment reads. "It is not only funny, it is true, you are unnecessarily kindhearted and thoughtful for our feelings. The British attitude has never been, 'Love me, love my potatoes.' We have no delusions about our pastry. Indeed, I think we have a sort of stoic pride in being able to take it."

Anyway, turn and turn about is only fair. And after all, we've waited a century and more for our turn. —The Editors.

THE most "normal" value in postwar Britain is British cooking. Food is scarce and rationing is rugged, but British cooking is much as before, neither better nor worse, just normally bad. They still overboil all vegetables and underbake all pastries. Coffee is still created by pouring scalding water on grounds and serving, uncooked, at once. In a posh London hotel, dinner still consists of three waiters to serve you, four forks, three knives, three spoons, gold service plates and dirty potatoes. There is no truth in the rumor that British toast is made on Monday for the rest of the week, but the "tradition" of serving it uncovered encourages hardening, and hence British toast tends to be resistant to the bite. As for British margarine, which is also never covered, this enigmatic lubricant occasionally lapses back into the idiom of the garage.

British cooking is apparently immune to disaster and wisecracks equally. It survived six years of bombing, submarine blockade, food warehouses gutted by fire, the comments of outspoken G. I.'s and the constant lecturing of the British Ministry of Food. Neither the terrors of the enemy nor the tears of critics could dissolve the rooted idea that bad cooking was somehow splendidly British, and in consequence not lightly to be abandoned.

The sympathetic American visitor may at first politely refrain from noting the cooking. He realizes that food is drastically limited in amount and variety. He sees that this nation is "tired." But after a while the suspicion grows that it's not just what they get to eat but also how it's laid before them that is contributing to this tiredness. The French, Belgian, Armenian, Greek, Turkish and Spanish cooks of Soho and other London districts provide the invidious comparisons. With the same rations and handicaps as everybody else, these non-British operatives manage to make food at least moderately zestful and tasty.

British cooks and housewives complained to us, in their own defense, that the long absence of onions from the market had been a dreadful handicap to their practice of fine cuisine. Nobody could deny the difficulties thereby implied, but their "no onions" excuse was not altogether convincing. When onions did return (and they were reasonably plentiful while my wife and I were in Britain) the foreigners used them to advantage, whereas under purely British supervision the onion appeared, in our experience, not as an ally of the potato or a friend of the meat or the fowl, but as another boiled (until blah) vegetable.

The visitor is struck repeatedly by the ingenuity of the adult Briton, male and female, in the pursuit of added items of food. An occasional rabbit, or pheasant, or catch of trout does materialize. Next to a welcome food package from the United States or Canada, such windfalls keep alive the spirit of hope. From cabbie to countess everybody is discussing his or her stomach and how it has fared of late. It is no longer bad form in Britain (as it once was) to be hungry or interested in appeasing hunger. Meals are incessantly reported, analyzed, recalled. But with all this wistful concern for food, the prized items, once turned over to the kitchen, are regularly and systematically, and with a dreadful refusal to depart from old habits, rendered dull and disappointing by the treatment accorded them.

Our first, but not our last, gruesome experience with culinary sabotage and aesthetic outrage was in the North-of-England home of some cherished friends. We were watching our hostess prepare breakfast and feeling guilty about being there, although we had meticulously brought along our temporary food cards from London and a donation of packaged foodstuffs from the United States. When our hostess produced bacon we felt especially self-conscious, for bacon was scarce even at home and we knew that the official postwar allotment in Britain was but one and one half slices per person per week. We nodded appreciatively as our hostess referred to the frustrations of going to market under present circumstances. With what we deemed to be loving care she separated the few skimpy strips of smoked pig. In combination with some "reconstituted" (that is, powdered) eggs we were to have bacon and eggs for "an American breakfast." Touched, we sensed that this was indeed a gala occasion. Then as we looked on we saw our British friend (and we love her) take the oh-so-precious bacon, every bit of it, and toss it indifferently into a pan of cold tap water under which she brought up a gas flame. Our American stomachs first fluttered, then somersaulted, as the meaning of her action became manifest. This bacon was being condemned to the dreadful British ritual of boiling. And there was worse to come. When the fatty content had nicely vanished (poured down the drain with the water) the bacon was then set aside to harden, and when finally placed upon the breakfast table the result was cold crusts of slightly greasy, stiff, grayish blubber.

During seven weeks in postwar Britain my wife and I were repeatedly assaulted and shocked by such casual atrocities of the British scullery, both public and private. We saw three-day-old gravy converted by the addition of a little water, and nothing else, into the soup du jour. We saw pies galore in which the crust might just as well have reposed on a separate plate, for all the connection with the filling. We were prepared from previous trips for the tyranny of the cabbage, the Brussels sprout and the runner bean, and were not therefore surprised that these stand-bys were still offered to the human palate as immemorially since the Battle of Hastings, overboiled, limp, faded and tasteless. A wartime pamphlet of the British Ministry of Food sadly agreed on this point: "No country in the world grows better vegetables . . . or cooks them worse." We were prepared, too, for the inevitable soggy or suet, or suet or soggy, steamed pudding, and for that crankcase rinse which the British admit as coffee. (Will Rogers once told a London Coliseum audience, "Your coffee is so bad, I hate to get up in the morning.") But having discovered in a matter of hours after our arrival how stringent were the food shortages of Britain and how desperately preoccupied everybody was with the subject of eating, we were not quite prepared to find British cooking still fast in the embrace of tradition. The war had perhaps embarrassed, but it had not really changed that carelessness in the kitchen, that inexplicable but notorious tolerance for food spoilage which has long been typical of an otherwise highly urbane society.

It's conceded in London that the British housewife is "excessively conservative" and changes her kitchen behavior patterns slowly and grudgingly. If well-to-do, she expects others to bother with the cooking anyhow, and it would be beneath her class to take an interest in the details. If she is her own servant, milady's rules of procedure seem simple. Vegetables are, in her book, immersed in water and brought to a boil. Pastries are rushed into and out of the oven in order to avoid baking, underdone being deemed proper for doughy morsels. What more does she need to know about cooking? Oh, yes, perhaps how to prepare mincemeat at Christmas.

Afternoon tea remains the only "meal" into which millions of Britons really put their hearts. This is even now the one layout of the day in which a certain artistry of design and planning can be detected. Teas, and especially

(Continued on Page 210)

The English adventures of a man who came to dinner.

Copyright 1946, Liggett & Myers Tobacco Co.

WESCOTT

Bob and Georgiana's courtship began with a hosteling trip. Since their marriage they've done a Cook's tour of United States en route to jobs in Utah, Nevada, Tennessee.

"THE WORLD IS OURS"

Meet the Feeneys, of Oak Ridge, Tenn., Elkins Park, Pa., and all points west—a gay, growing family out to take the world in their happy-go-lucky stride. ★ BY HILDEGARDE DOLSON

Georgiana Feeney's letter, which came to the JOURNAL, began sedately:

Dear Editors: It's becoming apparent even to me that if Bob and I are not following excitement, then it must surely be following us! In four and a half years of marriage we've painted, scrubbed and made livable thirteen different dwelling places (all without bathtubs) ranging from a Nevada-desert trailer to our current demountable house on stilts in the mud of Oak Ridge, Tennessee. Here, in this amazing, so-long-secret city, Bob has had a part in the atomic-bomb development.

Now, once more facing an uncertain future, we are advised by our dear, conservative parents in Philadelphia, "Come home, settle down, build a house, have security." And we answer "Yes, but not yet!" First we have a date with a couple in Mexico, and we must dash over to Japan to visit my brother in the occupation troops and somehow squeeze in three years for Bob to get his doctor's degree in chemical engineering, and we want six children. (Our two-year-old Griff is the start.) In 1950 we plan to settle down and build a house, after deciding which part of this wonderful country is our favorite. I feel confident we're not asking any more than is possible for us to find, enjoying life to the brim.

When you get three Feeneys, plus a mansion-size police dog, fifty record albums, a typewriter, easel and several hundred books into a four-room plywood house on stilts, that phrase "enjoying life to the brim" already seems like sluggish understatement. Walk in on the Feeneys spending what they call a quiet Sunday afternoon at home: Six-foot Bob is studying Russian out loud while he sandpapers a coffee table. Blond-as-a-new-moon Georgie is either banging a typewriter (she sold her first story last month) or sprawled on the floor sketching. Two-year-old Griff squats happily beside her, listening to the music-box kangaroo sent him by doting grandparents. For spirited competition, the phonograph is playing The Marriage of Figaro, which

★ 5.9 per cent of America's families earn between $5000 and $6000 a year. ★

Georgie lived in substantial suburban home first twenty-one years of her life; was married in church with "white trimmings" on ■ week's notice, piled her luggage into Bob's car and drove to Salt Lake City. The Feeneys moved eleven times the first year. Griff—now two years old—was born in California, christened in Nevada, blew out his first birthday candle in Tennessee. Both Bob and Georgie have firm convictions against cluttering up their lives with material things, but can't bear to part with old magazines, seed catalogues, gardening tools or high-school themes.

MUNKACSI

In Boulder City Georgiana hunted apartments for three luckless weeks, worried because they were spending twice what they earned living at local hotel. One afternoon she went into town, blew the family nest egg on a model-T trailer—later discovered that there was no heat and no running water at the trailer camp. Before gas rationing made of Boulder City "a period of exile," the Feeneys took jaunts to Las Vegas, Yosemite Park, Mexican border on "the extra $5 in the household kitty." Georgie visited swank Western night clubs in a shirtwaist dress, felt completely at ease. Their budget allows $400 a year for vacations, $100 for clothes, $180 for books and records.

Georgie gave Bob on his last birthday, and Blitzen, the dog, barks a cheery accompaniment as he bounds from Feeney to Feeney, licking faces.

Conversation at the Feeneys' follows the same informal pattern, so that at first a newcomer feels like a seal trying to juggle six balls on his nose. Georgie's mind generates so many ideas that her voice rushes to keep up with it, giving off sparks of delight as she talks. In contrast, Bob speaks slowly, almost shyly, but his wife will tell you "Bob's interested in everything." Among the scrambled notes I made during my first half hour with the Feeneys, I find:

"Have been reading about Sweden's new co-operative houses and would like to live in one if they go to Europe. . . . Bob excited about St. Johns College experiment (using the classics as textbooks). . . . Georgie wants to be conscious while having one baby. . . . Bob thinks Griff old enough to sleep out in a sleeping bag on trip this summer. . . . Georgie has been teaching eighteen two-year-olds, including Griff, in Oak Ridge nursery school. . . . Bob's Russian class Tuesday nights and G. is member of Monday evening Society of Artists."

At this point in the conversation Georgie said explosively, "Of course, we're in such a rut here," and I thought to myself dazedly, If this is the Feeney idea of a rut ——

Seen from the outside, their house looks depressingly like all the other rainy-gray prefabricated houses on muddy South Seneca Road, in the least attractive section of Oak Ridge. When the Feeneys jounced east from Nevada in their old LaSalle in the fall of 1944, all they knew about Bob's new $4200-a-year job was that he'd be working on a top-urgent, top-secret war project in a town nobody seemed to have heard of. The personnel representative of the mysterious Manhattan Project who hired Bob out West had arranged to have their furniture shipped to Oak Ridge and moved into "adequate living quarters" before the Feeneys arrived. One glimpse of their new home, and the Feeneys remembered that this was their thirteenth dwelling place, and that thirteen has never been famous for luck. The floors and walls were filthy. A waddle-legged coal stove ate up most of the space in the small living room. The handsome functional desk, bookcase and wall seats Bob had made for their last apartment in Nevada were too big to fit in gracefully. On the credit side, the back windows had an exciting view of the blue-hazed Smoky Mountains, the kitchen was equipped with electric stove and refrigerator, and the rent, including fuel and electricity, was $30 a month.

Oak Ridge, where cars are searched entering and leaving, where factory-fortresses lie behind bristling fences and guard towers, is, as Georgie says, "a place that makes you feel as if you're poaching on Mars." In three years it had grown from nothing to the fifth largest city in Tennessee. Seventy-five thousand workers and their families lived with the world's most explosive secret practically in their laps, and managed to keep quiet. The hardest thing for the Feeneys to get used to was Bob's not being allowed to mention anything about his job to Georgie, except to tell her when he got a raise. (He got two, is now making $4600.) Before starting to work as a chemical engineer in Y-12, one of the biggest factory-fortresses where U-235 is processed, he signed the A-secrecy pledge, which contains such solemn phrases as "I stake my personal and scientific reputation on not divulging ——" Because of the nature of his work, Bob knew from the first about the atom bomb-to-be. Once during the tensest period of secrecy he said to Georgie broodingly, "It's a good thing you don't understand Einstein." But as she remarks, "That's the only time he even gave me a hint, and he knew I wouldn't catch on."

The morning President Truman announced the news of the bomb, Bob and the other key workers in his section acted drunk with relief, went around slapping one another on the back. Georgiana was making the bed when the girl next door came running in to tell the news she'd just heard on the radio. "I was so dumfounded," Georgie remembers, "that I found myself standing on the bed in a sort of trance, saying 'So that's what Bob has been up to.' I didn't get the bed made till midnight."

Bob feels strongly that scientists should be allowed to go ahead and work out constructive uses for atomic energy, with all UNO nations pooling their information. "The way things stand now," he said, "a scientist could be jailed for experimenting along those lines. There's been too much scared talk about the bomb, and instead we ought to be harnessing that energy to improve the world."

In spite of Bob's sensitively chiseled scholar's face and shy manner, he's no ivory-tower addict. Georgie says, "I've never once heard him say anything is impossible. He just goes ahead and tries it." On the husbands-are-human side, she says Bob puts the groceries away so scientifically she never can find anything, and yelps when she wears his bathrobe and slippers. He's also disconcertingly honest: when Georgie gave him a Christmas present of leather folders in which to keep magazines, he said, "That's a dumb idea" and lugged them pronto to the attic. If a guest bores him, he makes sturdily forthright remarks about how late it is. Being charming to people is as natural to Georgie as breathing, and she fusses sometimes because Bob doesn't smile often enough. "He's happy inside, but it ought to show more," she explains. When Bob does smile, it's a warm, engaging business. He has very white, even teeth, brown hair with a little-boy cowlick, and his 165 pound slimness makes him look much younger than twenty-eight.

Twenty-six-year-old Georgie is five feet seven and has gained twenty-five pounds since marriage, so that she weighs as much as Bob now, but you'd never

The Feeneys make it a not-so-quiet evening at home with a recorder duet. Georgie's proud that "Bob is not a one-sided mechanical man," says his background in classics puts hers to shame. She does most of family reading now, sieves out best current books for Bob. He's teaching her plane geometry, fine points of boogie-woogie. "We agree on all the important things," they say. "We think children shouldn't eat with grownups till they're school age; we love a lavish Christmas, and we're just fools about dogs."

MUNKACSI

"Sure we'll settle down," the young Feeneys assure their worried families. "But first we have a date in Mexico, an errand in Japan, and a year to see how the rest of the world lives."

Bob and Georgie want five more children, hope they'll all have voices that "will pass in a chorus so we can have family part singing." Recent census reports that women with four years of college education average less than one-and-a-fourth children. In Boulder City Georgie bought an old piano for $15, moved it in while landlord was out. Friends came for evenings with enough instruments for an octet.

★ ★ ★

Biggest Feeney problem: "We want to do too many things." Georgie wants to bring up children herself, play the clarinet, have a big garden, sell short stories to help Bob through college. Bob has sights set on becoming top-notch consultant engineer, learning more about geology, traveling in Europe.

guess it to look at her. She dresses mostly in sweaters and skirts, has the silky-spun hair and fresh-skinned prettiness of a teen-ager, and eyelashes so light that even her mother implores her to use mascara. Bob says Georgie dabbles in too many things, and thinks in terms of thousands instead of tens, but he adds with a nice grin, "I've had a lot more fun out of life since I married her."

In Philadelphia's Cheltenham High School Robert Feeney was three years ahead of Georgie Magargal, loftily disinterested in women, and she thought he was too studious. ("I went for football captains then," she says.) Both of them had lived in Elkins Park, a suburb of Philadelphia, all their lives, but with only a "hi-ya" acquaintance until college. Bob was an only child; his father is the successful businessman-commuter type, operating coal mines in Pottsville, Pennsylvania. Mr. Magargal (pronounced Muh-gargle) owns a small lumber business that provided comfortably for his wife, Georgie, and her younger brother Sam, now a technical sergeant stationed on Okinawa. When Bob and Georgie talk about their childhood and gangly adolescence, they agree that their parents allowed them to make their own decisions in everything that mattered. As Georgie puts it, "I was strictly brought up as far as manners go, but to show you what I mean, when I was sixteen mother and dad said it was entirely up to me to decide whether I smoked or not. So I decided not to."

After Georgie entered Beaver College, in Jenkintown, the Magargals were also remarkably hands-offish when she insisted on earning her own spending money in rather strenuous ways. On Wednesday nights she ran an elevator at Strawbridge & Clothier. During a summer vacation she waited on table at a Lutheran camp in the Poconos, for the princely sum of 75 cents a day. She also tutored, worked as part-time secretary in the Beaver English department and, after winning first prize in a Mademoiselle dress-design contest, sold designs to Philadelphia and New York clothing manufacturers at $5 apiece. Meanwhile she wrote poetry, sang in the glee club, edited the college magazine for two years, and decided to be a nonmarrying career woman. This brisk decision was doomed from the evening Bob Feeney arrived stag at a party with a friend. The friend asked Georgie to dance, and told her smugly, "Bob is one man you'll never get your claws into."

Georgie, being a woman, accepted this challenge on the spot. The studious young Mr. Feeney, already making a brilliant record in the engineering school of the University of Pennsylvania, was dazed but gratified when Miss Magargal evinced a sudden, passionate interest in the bicycle trip he'd taken through Europe the summer before. "You will come over Saturday and tell me more about it," she begged prettily. Bob came, armed with the journal he'd kept on the trip. "He was maddeningly impersonal," Georgie recalls. "But he said something about wanting a lot of kids and seeing them all around the dinner table, and I began to be interested right then."

Young Feeney, a less tempestuous type, went home and waited three months before asking for another date. This time he suggested Georgie come along on a hosteling trip over Easter vacation. She learned to ride a bicycle the morning they started out, rode thirty-five miles that first day, and ate dinner standing up, her backside blistered to a fare-thee-well. "I couldn't back out," she says, "because Bob had invited a little brunette trick he'd met hosteling in Europe to come too. There's no romantic pairing off on those trips, but I wasn't taking any chances." When the blisters went away, Georgie invited Bob to Beaver's May dance, where one of her sorority sisters made a big play for him. Georgie wrote indignantly in her diary later that night, "I'm serious about this and I don't intend to have other women cutting in."

With fine feminine illogic, she then went rushing off to proms at Yale, Lehigh and Annapolis, and fumed because Bob never asked for a date farther than a few days ahead. Bob says, "I figured she'd eventually keep evenings free if she really wanted to see me." He figured right. Just before Christmas of 1939, they went together to pick out the engagement ring. Bob, having been graduated with an average of over 90, was working as a chemical engineer for the Scott Paper Company (research on paper pulp), at $25 a week, in Chester, Pennsylvania. In deference to his budget, Georgie picked out a modestly small diamond. The next day Bob went back to the jewelry store alone and said masterfully, "The same setting, but I want a diamond twice as big."

Georgie was graduated in June of 1941, and their big conventional wedding was planned for October. Bob had been transferred to the Brunswick, Georgia, plant of the Scott Paper Company, but several months before their marriage he came back North, to work at the Frankford Arsenal, in Philadelphia, doing research on fuses and shells, at $35 a week. He already had a job lined up with the Government Bureau of Mines, and in late July he was told to be ready to go to Nevada within a week. Georgie tossed aside plans for the big wedding and decided to be married immediately, in a street-length blue dress. When her father heard of this, he let out a roar. "No daughter of mine is going to be married in a short skirt." He carried on so that Georgie rushed down to a Philadelphia department store, got a dandy buy in a beautiful white satin dress that had been worn in a fashion show, had it cleaned the day before the wedding, altered the next morning, and drifted down the aisle looking so completely like a storybook bride her father was beamish. The maid of honor was resplendent in a new evening dress borrowed from her kid sister, but the six would-be bridesmaids, not having time to scrounge suitable raiment, sat with the Magargal family during the double-ring ceremony in Ashbourne Presbyterian Church. The date: August 2, 1941. Georgie was twenty-one, Bob was twenty-four, and both of them say if they had it to do over again they'd get married even younger.

Georgie's domestic accomplishments in those first weeks of marriage are best summed up by a telephone query to a friend. After explaining that she wanted to cook a potato, Georgie asked, "And do I use the top or the bottom part of the oven for it?" As she says now, "It was certainly lucky Bob knew how to make French dressing and broil a steak."

"Success in our minds has nothing to do with getting rich," the Feeneys explain. "We don't underestimate money, but don't want to reach a standard of living we'll have to live up to." Bob graduated fourth in his class at University of Pennsylvania, earned $25 a week on his first job, has merited two raises at Oak Ridge; he considers himself feet-on-the-ground scientist, is learning Russian, "the coming language in science." Georgie's taking a stab at Russian, too. Oak Ridge is "rut" for active Feeneys, but welcome rut. "After months of socializing in Boulder City we were ripe for binge of reading and relaxing." Bob plays prize-winning bridge, moves mean pawn in chess. Georgie wishes that he wouldn't use scientific method in putting away weekly grocery order. "I have a tough time finding things," she says.

"If you teach in a nursery school, you soon find that other two-year-olds do the same cute things your own youngster does," observes Georgiana. She gave up full-time nursery-school job in Oak Ridge because she was dog-tired at night, didn't think it was fair to Griff or Bob. Georgie read thirty-seven child-psychology books while son was infant, made up her own mind about conflicting theories, firmly believes that "what you give your children before they're six or seven is more important than material things you do for them later." Griff's a husky, earnest child; plays hard, eats hard; likes noise, and is regular fiend for exercise.

PHOTOS BY MUNKACSI, WESCOTT

MUNKACSI

"Hey, throw me a towel. I'll be out in a minute," shouts Bob while Georgie puts dinner on the table. Bob's convinced he's fast dresser, can shave in ten minutes. His wife says confidentially he's "poky," takes at least half an hour. In Boulder City Bob wore khaki trousers, field boots, often worked past midnight, was called out of bed for emergencies. At Oak Ridge he wears business suits, ties—but overtime is generally prohibited in strictly supervised atom-bomb plant. Both Feeneys dislike hot, humid summers, long and muddy winters in Tennessee, but love seeing spring with laurel and rhododendron after two years in the desert.

How the Feeneys Spend Their Money

| | |
|---|---|
| In 1945 Bob Feeney earned | $4590 |
| Georgie earned | 1090 |
| | $5680 |
| Income taxes | $ 550 |
| Savings in War Bonds | 2250 |
| Rent, water, electricity, coal | 360 |
| Old-age tax | 30 |
| Insurance—Bob | 260 |
| Georgie | 26 |
| Food and milk | 600 |
| Hospitalization | 50 |
| Other medical expenses | 75 |
| Clothes | 100 |
| Christmas | 175 |
| Books and records | 180 |
| Trips and vacations | 400 |
| Car upkeep | 154 |
| Sunday paper | 5 |
| Charities and church contributions | 75 |
| Baby sitter and amusements | 108 |
| Laundry and cleaner | 150 |
| Gifts and miscellaneous | 132 |
| Total | $5680 |

The Bureau of Mines sent Bob first to Salt Lake City. The young Feeneys had just arrived there, taken a lease on an attractive apartment and sent a wire to Georgie's mother saying "Send on all wedding-present silver and china because we want to give big dinner party," when Bob was transferred to Boulder City, Nevada. There he was put in charge of a pilot plant doing research on domestic chromiums for war usage, at a salary of $2600 a year.

Boulder City had all the elements of a war-boom town and frontier settlement rolled into one. Until the OPA moved in, the sky was the limit on rents. One local resident stood on her front lawn and auctioned off her house to rent to the highest bidder, then went to Florida on the swollen profits.

Bob and Georgie lived briefly in an auto court, then in an $18-a-month tar-paper house. Restaurants were so jammed that Georgie learned to cook in a hurry, even made her own bread. On their first anniversary they were flat broke, but Bob bought a Chinese cookbook for a dollar and he and Georgie whipped up a Cantonese banquet to celebrate. Georgie says, "I used to be terribly finicky about food, but he's got me now so I eat everything but sauerkraut."

The high point of the Feeneys' nesting flurries came when they bought a battered trailer for $300. They painted its dingy walls turquoise, the ceiling coral, and hung beige monk's cloth at the windows. After five months there they moved into a roomy Government apartment, where Bob planed and hammered and sawed, making the blond-wood furniture. Life in Boulder City was lively, with lots of Bob's bachelor engineer friends dropping in for dinner, or for cider and some fancy part singing. Every three months the Feeneys drove to Los Angeles for a week end of theater, concerts and dancing.

Because of the lack of adequate hospital facilities in Boulder City, Georgie also went to Los Angeles to have her baby, and Mrs. Magargal came West to stay with her. "I'd timed it all so beautifully," Georgie says. "I thought Griff was due on a Sunday, so Bob and mother and I were going to a concert Saturday evening, and then they could drop me off at the hospital just in time to give birth." Unfortunately, Griffith Feeney decided to arrive a month late, and Georgie's mother spent a hectic month dashing about Los Angeles with her restless daughter, to fill in time until the baby came. He was born October 7, 1943, and Georgie had rather a bad time of it. "But the thing that really upset me was the maternity weeps that month afterward," she says. "Somebody ought to warn all young mothers that they'll bawl like mad, for no reason." She cured the weeps by giving a christening breakfast for Griff, and inviting a mere thirty-five guests.

At the age of two, Griff is now rambunctiously healthy and outgoing. Before he was born, Georgie read thirty-seven books on child psychology. "Then I winnowed them down for Bob so he had to read only ten," she adds. Both Bob and Georgie feel the most important thing is to make a child self-reliant as early as possible. "And then let him make his own decisions." (Presumably, Griff has already made his own decision—affirmative—about camping out in a sleeping bag.) Last summer he went through a brief period of throwing spoons and even his cereal dish to gain attention, but his parents felt he was really justified, because they'd been having a lot of guests and neglecting him. He's been sick only once, when he ate two bars of dye remover. Georgie explains casually, "Bob saw Griff eating the stuff, but thought it was only soap, so he didn't stop him." After they realized it wasn't li'l' ole harmless bars of soap Griff had consumed, they filled him with every emetic listed in the first-aid book, and dangled him upside down, trying frantically to get results. When that failed, a Government car rushed him to the Oak Ridge hospital, where doctors applied a stomach pump with admirable results. Griff came home that same night—cheerful and ravenous. "He ate three eggs, four dishes of oatmeal, bacon and I forget what else," Georgie says.

In Boulder City the Feeneys acquired not only Griff, but Blitzen and his twin police dog, Donder. On the rollicking trip East to Oak Ridge, the dogs jumped through the top of the 1937 LaSalle, and ate most of the front-seat upholstery. To add to the jolly confusion, the car broke down every few miles; the Feeneys were towed into Dallas perched on the back wheels like Roman charioteers, with Griff leaning out shouting "Hi" to admiring Texan bystanders.

Due to the fact that it was early December when the Feeneys arrived in Tennessee, their new neighbors on South Seneca Road were understandably puzzled when tall, pretty Georgie kept rushing out her front door to call "Here Donder, here Blitzen." Even in the mushrooming atom city, where anything could (and did) happen, this apparent cry for reindeer had a certain piquant novelty. Eventually the neighbors learned that young Mrs. Feeney was merely summoning her dogs home. Donder roamed away several months ago, and the Feeneys still hope he'll turn up, although, as Georgie's mother pointed out, "One police dog in this house is already the equivalent of an elephant."

Books take up even more room than Blitzen, in the little demountable house. They spill over into the bedrooms and kitchen: Moby Dick next to Music for the Man Who Enjoys Hamlet; Thurber wedged in between Greek Architecture and The Maltese Falcon. The only close friends the Feeneys have in Oak Ridge are the couple next door, who also came from Boulder City, and they stay home most evenings. The money earmarked for recreation in their budget has gone into books and records. Both Georgie and Bob worked like inspired beavers fixing up the house. In Griff's room, they covered the walled recess for the crib with spanking-fresh blue-and-white-striped cotton. Bob made the charming child's table with red-cushioned chairs, and the window seat with toy compartments underneath. He also built an impressive butler's pantry into the kitchen, with shelves for their wedding-present silver and china, and the colorful demitasse cups they've been collecting. For living-room curtains, Georgie dyed sheets a sunlit yellow, and hung them to the floor in unpressed pleats.

Until recently, she taught at the Oak Ridge nursery school, got up at six every morning and, with Griff, spent five days a week, from 7:30 to 3:30, at the school. In the late afternoons she did a whirlwind job of cleaning the house, bathing and feeding Griff, and getting dinner started. Bob always (Continued on Page 209)

"What does a DUZ family wear on Sunday?"

Writes Mrs. J. R. St. George, Milwaukee, Wisconsin

"From your ads, you'd think people always dressed like this,"

Mrs. St. George writes. "All the DUZ ads I see show women hanging out the same three things . . . towels, overalls and undies!

"Sure DUZ is tops for getting towels white and work clothes clean. And we all know it's safer for undies than other 'big-name' washday soaps. But your ads ought to show that DUZ is best for the whole wash—for Sunday duds and dozens of other things that folks wash every week!

"Don't their kids ever get dirty?

"You can dress kids up in their Sunday best and they'll still get good and grimy. DUZ gets my youngsters' grimiest clothes clean as a lick and yet it's safe as can be for washing their best colored outfits.

"How about their Sunday dinner cloth?

"Don't folks spill things on it and get the napkins dirty? Why don't your DUZ girls tell how DUZ gets those spots out easy as winking and show how gleaming white their table linen comes out?

"What about Grand-pop's socks?

"Men's socks are a real washing test and DUZ can pass it with colors flying! DUZ is such a favorite at our house I even caught Grandpa DUZzing his beard!

"Seems to me you're missing the boat if you don't get those DUZ ladies to show that DUZ does more—and can't be beat by any washday soap for cleaning quick and washing safe!"

DUZ does Everything

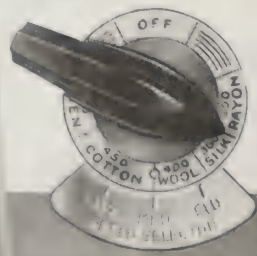
—and I mean Everything!



Even tempered Heat

MAKES EVEN TEMPERED IRONING
Actual heat prints prove the amazingly even Proctor Heat Pattern that gives easier, smoother ironing . . . saves time and temper.

PLUS "PUSH BUTTON" IRONING
Proctor, most even heating of 7 most popular 1000-watt irons pre-war, now brings you virtually 100% even heat—no cold spots to cause wrinkling and drag—no excessively hot areas to encourage scorching. Result—you do better ironing with fewer strokes, less re-ironing of wrinkles.

This, plus the "Push Button" action of the new Proctor Never-Lift Iron, coming soon, means the easiest, quickest ironing you've ever known. No lifting. No tilting. See your Proctor Dealer for details.

FIRST WITH PROCTOR — the "SPEED SELECTOR" FABRIC DIAL . . . gives you complete ironing control . . . correct ironing temperature for varying thicknesses and dampness of fabrics at the ironing speed you want—fast, medium or slow. You set the iron to suit your ironing, instead of ironing to suit the iron.

PROCTOR
AUTOMATIC ELECTRICAL APPLIANCES
PROCTOR ELECTRIC COMPANY, PHILADELPHIA 40, PA.

We're Planning Our Life

By Georgiana Magargal Feeney

BOB and I both love to plan, but our methods were very different at the start. My original contribution was daydreaming; Bob's was systematic preparation. Now I have reformed to the extent of studying catalogues, a procedure specific enough to take away my guilty feelings about daydreaming, and Bob's plans have gained added romantic color from association with mine!

All through the long war years, during which we were very lucky in being together, planning was almost the only amusement open to us. Long lines strung out in front of the cinema, crowds waited at the tennis courts, dance halls were jammed, gas was rationed. But at home our big corner couch would hold both of us and a fat round globe of the world, and atlases open at maps—glamorous red and green patches and wide blue seas. There were desk drawers of folders with luring legends on their covers: COME TO MEXICO . . . LAND OF THE MIDNIGHT SUN . . . THE EMERALD ISLE . . . SKIING IN SWITZERLAND. There were graduate-school catalogues, fat with facts and figures about courses, but between the lines adventure seemed to beckon to us.

At the beginning, our planning was merely a lighthearted way of passing time in dull and disagreeable places, but as the years passed it seemed to us that many of these dreams were things which we had come to want too much to give up. Then we began to sort the pastime dreams from the ones we hoped to make into reality, and to make a few actual preparations for our planned life.

For example, one of the things we are sure we want to do is go to Mexico. We couldn't go there during the war, but we were able to study Spanish so we might enjoy it more whenever we could go. Bob, of course, would not have thought of leaving his work on the atomic bomb to go back to school for his doctor's degree—but he did prepare himself by studying Russian and German and doing a great deal of technical reading. And I spent a lot of time and study on schemes for doing without an income when and if we undertook those three extra years of college.

Of course, we realize that we may not be able to do all these things. This article is only a chart of what we should like to do if it is possible. As we get older and more experienced, we know some of these plans will change to accommodate our developing ideas.

For example, when we first went out West, we were determined to travel forever, to raise our children in all sorts of wild and strange places, and never, never, to settle down! We had been born and raised in the suburbs of Philadelphia, gone to the same schools and camps from kindergarten up, remembered the same friends and places. How much more exciting our children's lives would be! Then we met many people who had had that kind of upbringing, and it was they who changed our minds.

They had been born in one country, reared in several others, spoke six or seven languages, and had memories of schools and holidays in every conceivable place. Almost without exception, they felt their lives would have been happier and more secure had they considered one place home. Especially during the adolescent years, changes seem to bring heartache and maladjustment.

Since we are convinced of that fact, our first big long-range decision called for a radical change in the original plans. We decided, if we could, to settle down in one place long enough for our children to go through school there. Since we want to have at least six children, this calls for quite a long stay in the chosen place! Our first little boy, Griffith, was born in October, 1943, so the tentative date we have set for this decisive move is September, 1949, at which time he will begin first grade.

I was asked to make this article specific. With misgivings, then, I offer the following list of ambitions which we hope with luck and hard work to accomplish by that time:

1. At least two more babies.
2. A doctor's degree in chemical engineering for Bob.
3. Trips to Europe and Mexico.
4. One more tour of the United States, with an eye to determining the place where we want to live for the next twenty or thirty years.
5. A reasonable degree of competence in the field of writing for Georgie.

The immediate project will arrive in July—our second baby! How wonderful if it should turn out to be twins—that would really set us ahead on the schedule! Until May or June we plan to stay at Oak Ridge, where Bob is still needed, and save every cent we can in preparation for our years at school. We hope to have the summer in or near Philadelphia, since we have not spent much time near our families in the past four years, and the time will be spent—for me, in writing and having the baby, and for Bob, in studying Russian and German intensively in the hope that he will be able to pass his comprehensive examinations immediately upon entrance and thus have one large task off his mind.

Our second actual decision was whether or not Bob should spend the three years necessary to get his Ph.D. He talked to many technical men before making his decision, and some felt another degree was not necessary and that he would lose more than he would gain. Others felt that a higher degree in his field is almost essential to the highest kind of success. Some warned us gloomily that, while two fine jobs are now open to Bob, by the time we get out of school there will probably be a terrible depression and he won't be able to find any work at all! However, Bob's decision is that although he is now prepared for many interesting jobs, with his doctor's degree he will be equipped for anything in the field, including teaching and consulting engineering, either of which may possibly turn out to be what he eventually will want to do.

Bob now plans to enter Yale, M.I.T. or Cornell in September, 1946. His choice

Two Years Can be Twenty

"I'M twenty-four and feel like forty-four," sobbed Martha Anderson the day her husband came home. For two years she had done a singlehanded job of keeping four hundred noisy chickens from starvation, of persuading a temperamental furnace to stay in order, of juggling a slender budget into the black, and attending to the twenty-four-hour demands of three vigorous youngsters. The house was dusted, the children were neat; but Martha's once lovely hair was unkempt, her nails ragged. Can a man in the house mean the difference between tears and laughter? Meet Tom and Martha Anderson—

How America Lives

IN THE MAY JOURNAL

ill be determined by how much financial aid available, and on the housing situations in e towns in which these schools are located. o one knows better than we how hard it ill be to find a suitable place for two children d still stay within our limited budget.

It will be quite a drop from an income of out five thousand a year to a possible no-come-at-all, but we have a little pile of ar Bonds which we scrimped and saved to ay so that we would be prepared for some etty lean years. These will be available for nergencies, but our hope is that we will be le to finance ourselves as we go, and begin r post-school life with most of our bonds ill on their way to maturity.

We have several schemes in mind. The st year at least, Bob may teach, which ould insure a small but definite income. I ave done considerable study in the field of ursery-school education and have had ex-erience teaching in such a school, since I lt that this was one full-time job I could un-ertake without being separated from Griff. Both Bob and I feel strongly that my first uty is toward our children, and that if we annot go back to school without defaulting that duty we cer-ainly will not go at ll.) Even with a new aby, I think I could anage a small pri-ate half-day nursery chool for children of riff's age. Or, if it ould prove more ractical, I could take wo or more foster hildren on a twenty-our-hour basis. We ould try to lease an ld-fashioned house ith lots of extra pace, and rent rooms o other graduate stu-ents. Around a uni-ersity there are often obs one can do at ome, such as typing r tutoring, for which would be qualified. But much more im-ortant than any of hese temporary ex-edients is my writ-ng, which shows ome promise now of ringing financial re-urns, and on which I would much rather pend my time and ffort.

The one thing we ope not to do in order o complete these chool years is to work n the summers. Since long before we were ngaged, travel has been an obsession with oth of us, and the next few summers may af-ord us our last chance for a long while to ome. We hope that every single vacation, ong or short, will mean one more place to o and one more thrilling experience to re-nember!

For example, we will stick closely to usiness from September, 1946, until Christ-nas, but then the baby should be about ripe or a visit to grandma, and Griff, Bob is sure, will be able, at three, to share the fun of a ski rip in the Laurentians! Perhaps spring will ind us in Bermuda for a week, or Nassau. We have both had experience in leading groups, and in case of an empty bank account we plan to finance these short trips by taking along several junior-high-school-age boys and girls, and sharing the responsibility for their care and amusement.

By the summer of 1947 our favorite dream will come true! We have read that Europe will be ready to welcome visitors by then, and we are more than ready to be welcomed! July and August will find us biking along the English roads, sleeping on the deck of a freighter bound for the North Cape, and eating in French restaurants that Bob has described so glowingly during the long discouraging food shortages. We will probably have to take a group to pay for this trip, but hope by the next summer to be on a firm enough financial footing to go again with our children.

This brings us up to the autumn of 1948, and sometime during this last year of school we should like to have our third baby. Bob should finish in June, 1949, with his doctor's degree, and we plan to start our quest for a place to live. Bob hopes to arrange interviews in various parts of the country, and then in keeping these appointments we can weigh the advantages and disadvantages of each place. We both like being near the water, so it will probably be on the Atlantic or the Pacific, or possibly the Great Lakes. We should like either to live near a large city, or in a town with a first-rate college or university. An excellent library is a must, as are good school and hospital facilities. We love Utah, and California is irresistible—the pull to the West is very great. On the other hand, our families and ties are in the East, and we love New England. Where shall it be? We don't know. That is one of the always exciting things about the future. In this, as in everything, Bob's happiness in his work will be the important factor.

Now at last we are ready to settle down, and build our modern house on a hill! We don't care at all about living in an exclusive section. But we would like lots of trees and plenty of ground, and fences to keep children and dogs out of the paths of automobiles. We need space for big-family projects such as tennis courts or a swimming pool. In the house we want closets to hold all our scrapbooks and hobbies, shelves for many books and records, and space for group music and informal parties. The house is to be babyproof and childproof—and sometime, too, in the next five years or so, we want the rest of the babies! We'll need a dining room with a big table to accommodate welcome and unexpected guests, and to serve for family council meetings. We want privacy for every child and lots of doors connecting with outdoor terraces and gardens, and planned facilities for easy outdoor eating and entertaining.

Perhaps it is unseemly for these bright and hopeful plans to come out of the birthplace of the greatest destructive power ever known to mankind. But atomic power, of course, like any other great power, has enormous potentialities for good as well as evil.

In any case, we see no virtue for ourselves or our children in pondering whether or not the world is coming to an end in the next ten or one hundred years. We realize all too well how many things are woefully wrong with the world, but we have no patience with the prophets of doom. We believe that enormous happiness and great satisfaction await our children in the world, and we want them to be prepared to take advantage of it. We hope we shall be able to raise them to love God and their fellow men. We want them to try to do unto others as they would be done to. We hope they will be internationalists and interracialists and, if possible in their time, thinking, active pacifists. We want them to have definite ideas and to understand them so thoroughly that they can make other people believe in them too. We don't want these ideas to be ours—we want them to be better than ours! And we know that if we succeed in even a few of these we shall be happy and lucky parents.

Gift

By Alma Robison Higbee

She brought strawberries in a little square box,
All wrapped and tied with a scarlet string,
Ruby berries from among the rocks,
Tanged with the sweetness that May winds bring.

The box was lined with scallops of green,
To keep the berries dewy and cool,
Emerald frosted with velvet sheen,
That grew by the side of a woodland pool.

When she brought me berries she brought a dream,
Dream of a hill and a star-white spring,
She brought a path and a singing stream
All tied up with a scarlet string.

IN THE SPRING A YOUNG MAN'S FANCY

Ah, Spring! When birds are a-twitter . . . when the sap begins to run again (no offense, Junior) . . . and a fellow pops out of his cold weather covering like a butterfly from a cocoon!

Now's the time when harried mothers are more than ever grateful for Fels-Naptha Soap. With clean shirts in constant demand, it's a real relief to use this faster, gentler soap. . .

There's relief from endless hours in the laundry. Relief from ordinary washing wear on collars and cuffs. Not to mention relief from wear and tear on Mother's disposition.

Ah, Spring! Ah, Youth!
(and from the ladies, in chorus)
A-h-h-h, Fels-Naptha!

Fels-Naptha Soap

BANISHES "TATTLE-TALE GRAY"

PHOTOS BY HAROLD FOWLER

This is a basic room which grows up with the child. Small changes from time to time keep the room attractive and usable for many years.

Room to Grow In

BY HENRIETTA MURDOCK

Interior Decoration Editor of the Journal

ONE of the most satisfactory ways to furnish a child's room is to plan features which can grow up along with the child. For the first five years the bed, closets, tables, chest and other furnishings are designed to serve his baby needs. Then, as he grows older, small changes and adjustments keep the room suited to his size and expanding interests. A fresh color scheme every few years keeps the room new-looking and in character with the child's maturing personality.

Mrs. Feeney is planning a progressive room of this kind for her son, Griffin, just as soon as the space is available, meantime using the basic idea in her tiny "closet" nursery. Here is the way a growing-up room is developed; and you can, of course, start planning for a child of any age:

Using simple construction and without altering the permanent wall, build in two closets as shown in the photograph. Thirty inches is a good depth, and the width is determined by your room size. But be sure to leave enough space between the closets for an adult-size bed, with headboard placed to the wall. Inside the closets, build sliding trays, deep shelves and drawers to hold everything a child or adolescent uses. Into the recess between the closets goes the bed, centering all the living requirements in that one end of the room.

A window seat is almost a necessity in a child's room. The space beneath the seat accommodates awkward toys when the child is young; roller skates, ball bats and mechanical devices when he is older. The seat does not have to be recessed, but can be made like a box couch or a sturdy bench with a padded top, and finished with a pleated flounce. Children like seats better than chairs and they save space. Be sure also to have several deep bookshelves and a low, wide adult chair.

A homemade, initialed toy chest like the one shown in the photograph at right—the initials are put on with brass-headed upholstery nails—becomes a sea chest when the boy is older, or a (Continued on Page 197)

On this wall is a pin-up board which is kept at a convenient height by being raised as the child grows. The nested tables, planned for his increasing size, all are usable at any age. The toy box turns into a chest for sports gear or feminine trifles later on.

★ HOW AMERICA LIVES ★

"I had a feeling I was being followed!"

"IT HAPPENED IN BROAD DAYLIGHT—in the town's biggest department store.

"I heard footsteps. Felt eyes on my back. A moment later, as I stepped up to the counter to buy my first beautiful new Cannon Percale Sheets since the war, came a tap on my shoulder!

"There stood a cute little wide-eyed gal with 'bride' written all over her. Seemed she was out to buy the first sheets of her life. Didn't know beans. Was just waiting for some one who looked hep to come along. (That was me.) Hoped I could give her some tips!

" 'You've asked the right person!' I grinned. 'Me—I'm the original Cannon Percale Sheet fan! Got 'em for my trousseau back before the war. Picked 'em because they were so soft and smooth and wonderful. Been congratulating myself ever since on the way they wear!'

"By that time, the salesgirl had my new Cannon Percales out. 'Blissful!' sighed the bride. 'I don't care if I am extravagant—'

" 'Surprise—you don't have to be!' I beamed. 'Cannon Percale Sheets give you percale's own luxury and lightness for prices that would bring a grin to a porcelain piggy bank. Honey child—here's where you live up to your trousseau dreams!' "

| IF THIS IS YOUR DREAM | CANNON PERCALE IS YOUR SHEET |
|---|---|
| A sheet that's a beauty! | So fine-woven—so smooth-textured. Touch one. Feel that blissful, slip-you-to-sleep softness! |
| A sheet that's a wonder for wear! | Just ask the gals who were lucky enough to own Cannon Percale Sheets during wartime. Under long and hard wear, Cannon Percale Sheets prove themselves real troupers! |
| A sheet that makes housekeeping easier! | Bedmaking and home laundering are less work with Cannon Percale Sheets—they're so light. Yet they're woven of fine, soft, long-staple cotton—with 25% more threads per inch than best-grade muslins. |
| A sheet you can depend on! | That Cannon label assures you you're getting your sheet-$$$ worth every time! Cannon Percale Sheets are wonderful anywhere, anytime, in any store you find them! |

P.S. Another real Cannon value is Cannon Muslin Sheets—well-made, long-wearing!

TRADE MARK MADE IN U.S.A. CANNON

Cannon Percale Sheets

Cannon Blankets • Stockings • Towels ★ Cannon Mills, Inc., New York 13, N. Y.

America Will Love

APRONS MATCHED TO DRESSES

From coast to coast, pretty young housewives like Georgiana Feeney are doing their own work. Some dress the part. Others wear any old thing, and dread the doorbell. Mrs. Feeney always wears aprons, designs and makes them herself. The JOURNAL designs a collection to match morning, marketing and afternoon-at-home dresses. You can make both dress and apron matching in color and fabric; or do an apron in a style and color to go with a dress you have . . . some from your own scrap bag; others from toweling, or remnants of chintz, ticking, calico, gingham—many costing as little as $1.00. ★ ★ ★ BY NORA O'LEARY Back and other views, and sizes of Hollywood dress patterns are on page 233. For other views and sizes of Journal apron patterns, turn to page 223.

PHOTO BY LESLIE GILL

Mrs. Feeney loves simple classic dresses like this pink linen; wears aprons to protect them; is always ready to answer the door.

Navy-blue linen-weave rayon, coat-style home or shopping dress, easy to iron. Hollywood Pattern 1610, 25c.

Sturdy ticking apron for cleaning, cooking, polishing; glove and pot-lifter patterns included. 2262, 15c.

White cotton bib-apron trimmed with bands of ging-

Gay gingham apron, pretty over any simple dark dress; could also be made of water- hambray basque dress; double-puff sleeves and full skirt, Tollywood Pattern 1815, 25c. Matching apron 2265, below.

Matching Guatemalan cotton dress, dirndl apron; for luncheon a home. Dress, Hollywood Pattern 1719, 25c; apron 2265, 15c

Kitchen-toweling apron, with appliquéd fruit or flowers cut from gay printed fabric. 2263, 15c.

PHOTOS BY GENE FENN

The chambrays—a mother-and-daughter fashion; child's dress, Hollywood Pattern 1805, 15c; child's apron 2266, 15c.

Buy Hollywood dress patterns at the store which sells them in your city. Or order by mail, postage prepaid, from Hollywood Pattern Service, Putnam Avenue, Greenwich, Conn., or 2 Duke Street, Toronto, Ontario, Canada.

Journal apron patterns must be ordered by number from the Reference Library, LADIES' HOME JOURNAL, Philadelphia 5, Pennsylvania. 15 cents for each of the apron patterns.

© HOLLYWOOD

White poplin coverall apron with red rickrack, over the checked gingham dress, brightens routine, launders like a sheet. 2267, 15c.

The gingham bow dress, cool and practica for housework. Hollywood Pattern 1577, 15c

Freshly cleansed and free of all make-up, Georgiana Feeney's masklike fairness is ready for color to waken her pretty face.

A warmly flesh-toned base is applied all over. One eye is given a melting look with bluish shadow and brown lashes.

Eyes seem to twinkle more as make-up progresses. Powder with a peachy-beige cast and rose lipstick increase sparkle.

Georgiana emerges as the ideal American girl. Make-up has brought out her best points, dramatized her personality.

PHOTOS BY STUART

WAKE UP WITH MAKE-UP

By Louise Paine Benjamin

Beauty Editor of the Journal

GEORGIANA FEENEY'S unusually fair coloring makes her an ideal subject for make-up. When she is freshly soaped and washed, guiltless even of face powder, she is so uniformly light of skin, hair and eyebrows that the effect is quite startling. Step by step, as shown in the pictures, we relieved this whiteness. A richer look was given to her skin. Her pretty blue eyes were framed with darker lashes and brows, and deepened with a soft blur of eye shadow. Her laughter-loving lips were tinted with rosy—not too dark—lipstick. No theatrical exaggerations, only a deft stepping up of her own natural assets. Skillful make-up has a triple purpose: to emphasize good points, minimize defects, and contribute a subtle enrichment of color. The object is to build up, not cover up; to dramatize personality, not cosmetics. Fortunately, any woman can learn to do a smoothly professional job on herself. She must be willing to experiment, to practice patiently and to be completely honest. The first step in a triumphant make-up is the ability to face oneself unshrinkingly in a good mirror and a strong light. Wishful thinking will work no transformation, but a cunning assortment of complexion aids and a steady hand, restrained by good judgment, will produce a masterpiece. Perfection comes through experiment and repetition. As in all creative work, evidence of genius is apt to lie in masterly understatement!

★ ★ ★ HOW AMERICA LIVES ★ ★ ★

Do Your Face-Making This Way

✔ First step: A clinical consultation with your mirror, without make-up.

✔ Before applying any preparation, consider your eyebrows. Too heavy? Uneven? Too near together? Judicious streamlining and the removal of stragglers are desirable, but avoid a finely plucked look.

✔ What color are you? Light hair does not mean a blond skin. Be realistic about your coloring; nothing contributes more to the success of your final appearance than a make-up base which "does something" for skin tone as well as texture. This base may vary from a solid cream to a semiliquid powder, depending on whether your skin is dry or oily and whether you live in a dry or a moist climate.

✔ If you are ripely colored, try to match your skin.

✔ If you are pale, mottled or sallow, use a slightly warmer, darker base.

✔ If you tend to get red-faced, choose a beige foundation.

✔ Your rouge should be placed where your natural color appears when you are fresh, glowing and looking your best. Never hurry on this part of the job. Badly applied, excessive, rouge has done more than anything else to give make-up a bad name.

✔ Eye shadow is applied to upper lids, away from nose, except when eyes are unusually far apart. Best daytime colors are gray-blue or gray-violet, which give a misty look without being theatrical. At night, experiment with more positive colors. If eyes are deep-set or lids dark, apply only oil.

✔ Complexion finish can be powder, cake make-up or a combination of the two. The shade may be lighter than your base, but not lighter than your own skin. Go lightly about nose and mouth, where oil glands may affect color.

✔ Next: eyebrow pencil and mascara. Pencil should be applied in a series of light short strokes and brushed carefully afterward. Mascara on upper lashes only, and put on as delicately as if you were brushing butterfly wings!

✔ Lips should not be drastically reshaped, but they can be encouraged to look fuller or more symmetrical. Make a careful outline first, then fill in. Many make-up experts prefer to do this with a lip brush, which takes longer but is also more lasting. Lipstick color is an individual problem. In general, blood tones are more becoming than "high style" colors; crimson or rosy shades make the skin look clearer than the yellow reds; very dark shades should be used warily after forty!

EASTER AIR — across the park, along the avenue, exciting sparkle of "Bond Street"— some fragment, in its whispered spell, of every broad and glamourous thoroughfare where beauty walks. Yardley brings it to you in "Bond Street" Perfume, $13.50, $8.50 $4.50 and $2.50. Toilet Water, $2.50 and $1.50. Prices plus tax.

"Bond Street" by YARDLEY

Yardley products for America are created in England and finished in the U. S. A. from the original English formulae, combining imported and domestic ingredients. Yardley of London, Inc., 620 Fifth Avenue, Rockefeller Center, New York, N. Y.

ADV. OF N. W. AYER

"A LESSON I REMEMBER, A THOUSAND TIMES A YEAR—"

It's Smart to Buy the FINEST Sterling

Look only at the best solid silver when you select your pattern — remember it is to grace your table a thousand times a year. Wise generations of American families have identified Reed & Barton Sterling as the very finest solid silver.

Which of the lovely patterns shown here will be personally yours, for a lifetime? Ask your jeweler to show you all the Reed & Barton masterpieces, in flatware as well as tea and coffee services. It costs very little more to own the best.

HELPFUL HOSTESS HINTS: For fascinating and valuable booklet, "How To Be A Successful Hostess", send 10 cents to Reed & Barton, Box 990, Dept. L, Taunton, Massachusetts.

Reed & Barton

ESTABLISHED 1824

Sterling Silver

TAUNTON, MASSACHUSETTS

A Group of the World's Most Beautiful Sterling Patterns

Practice makes perfect! G-Ann and Bob are quite expert with chopsticks. Chinese dishes are specialties of the Feeney house.

CHOPSTICKS AND COOKBOOKS

By Louella G. Shouer

HERE'S a girl after my own heart! She'll find a place in yours, too, particularly if you collect cookbooks; find food and cooking it fun; go in for the new and strange in foreign foods and get creative pleasure out of the little but wonderful things of home, like setting a party table, inventing a new dish or frosting a cake for a small son's birthday.

Nothing seems to be too much for G-Ann. She'll attempt anything. This "just go ahead and do it" habit she's learned from Bob. If you can imagine serving a party dinner to eight guests—deer steaks, at that, and without any previous acquaintance with this delicacy or the how of cooking it—and pulling it off at the end of a social day with a luncheon at noon and tea at four, you have some idea of her gay, take-it-as-it-comes approach to everything—not just dinner parties.

Then there was the time in Boulder City when a bedroom was their home. They had a party nevertheless. "We just pushed the beds in a corner." Here's the menu she served to eighteen guests:

★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

Fruit Salad in Grapefruit Shells

Individual Sandwich Loaves

(Rounds of bread put together with the following three fillings: egg salad, tuna fish, pimiento cheese; frosted thereafter with seasoned cream cheese. She even took time to decorate them.)

Chocolate Éclairs

Coffee

Party philosophy. Many of Bob's bachelor friends drop in for Sunday breakfast or come home with Bob for dinner. G-Ann has ideas on being a hostess: "If you eat every day as if you were having company—and we do—a guest or two never floors you."

"We never have anything for guests we wouldn't be having for ourselves."

"We'd rather have people around, and a good time more often, than not to have them because it would be too much work."

In addition to her many cookbooks, G-Ann has a super loose-leaf scrapbook. She takes recipes where she finds them—on box tops, in advertisements, as well as from cookbooks and magazines. Nothing gets into this scrapbook unless she's tried it and she and Bob have pronounced it "super."

Collecting recipes by the hundreds is one thing, but trying them and making them your own is the real way to increase your repertoire. There'll never be a dull meal in the Feeney ménage, you can bet on it.

Chinese Modern. G-Ann's favorite and most-used cookbook is one published by the United China Relief. The Feeneys look forward to a someday trip to China, read everything they can get hold of about the country and are collecting accessories—rice bowls, cups, China spoons and chopsticks to serve their party dinners.

Bob insists on using chopsticks whenever they have a Chinese meal. Both Feeneys handle them expertly, guests not so well, but it provides considerable fun and merriment.

Chinese cookery appeals to both of them. "It's such a palatable way of eating vegetables," explained G-Ann. "I'm ashamed to say I never liked vegetables much, but I feel I must eat them, as Bob says it's the civilized thing to do. The recipes in this book are just right for us, as they do not call for any of the hard-to-get Chinese foods. Of course, there are no carrots and peas in China, but these Americanized versions suit our way of life."

Here are the menu and recipes for their Chinese dinners—whether you use chopsticks or not.

Chinese Pork With Vegetables
or Beef With Asparagus
Rice
Green Salad
(sometimes omitted)
Fresh Fruit Cup or Sherbet
Almond Cookies Tea

HANG-YEN-YOK-DING
(Pork with almonds and vegetables)

Blanch and chop ¼ cup shelled almonds. Cook in 1 tablespoon salad oil until crisp and golden brown. Drain and set aside. Shell 1 pound peas, or you could use 1 small package frozen peas. Prepare 2 cups raw carrots diced small. Cook together in boiling salted water about five minutes. They should be just tender, still have crispness. Cut 1 pound lean pork into ⅓-inch cubes or strips. In a large skillet sauté the pork with 2 cups sliced fresh or canned mushrooms in ¼ cup salad oil. Season with 2 teaspoons salt. Stir frequently and cook until golden brown. Now add 2 cups finely diced celery and 1½ cups chicken broth or strained canned chicken soup. Add the cooked carrots and peas. (Any vegetable liquid left over after vegetables are cooked could be substituted for part of the chicken broth.) Cover and cook over low heat about five minutes. Blend together 2 tablespoons cornstarch, ⅓ cup cold water and 1½ tablespoons soy sauce. Add to pork and vegetables. Stir until the juice thickens and mixture is heated through. Serve with fluffy cooked rice. Serves 4.

NA-SHUN-NGOW-YOK
(Beef and asparagus)

Cut enough cleaned fresh asparagus diagonally into ½-inch pieces to make 2 cupfuls. Cook in boiling salted water until almost tender—not more than five minutes. Drain. Frozen asparagus may be substituted for fresh. Cut 1 pound beef round steak into thin slivers about ⅛ inch thick. Brown the beef in ¼ cup salad oil, stirring frequently. Use a large skillet for this. Season with 1 teaspoon salt and a little pepper. Now add ¾ cup beef bouillon—or you can use hot water and bouillon cubes, meat paste or powder. Stir in 2 tablespoons chopped onion and 1 clove garlic, finely minced. Cover pan and cook until meat is tender. During this time, sauté 2 cups sliced fresh mushrooms in 1 tablespoon salad oil. Add mushrooms and asparagus to beef. Blend 1 tablespoon cornstarch with ⅓ cup cold water and stir into beef. Stir constantly until juice thickens

(Continued on Page 196)

Collecting cookbooks—to date she has twenty-two—is just one of G-Ann's many enthusiasms. "I love to read them for sheer excitement," she says. "It's like reading a novel. We're both keen about foreign dishes, and cooking with herbs has been a very real adventure."

G-Ann simplifies entertaining. "Less work, more fun" is her motto. She serves the first course and dessert in the living room. If the dessert can be served in a sherbet glass, minus plates, it is. So far they haven't acquired a coffee table, but G-Ann curls up beside the tray and serves her guests from the floor.

"Why don't you picket someone your own size?"

Collective bargaining may come to this . . .

unless mothers give rennet-custards to the whole family

It takes just one raid on the ice-box to tell the folks baby's getting all the best of it when Mom gives him rennet-custards! And they know their seniority rights . . . they want rennet-custards too, if they have to strike to get 'em!

And why not? Rennet-custards are dee-licious desserts—true; but they're all milk, too . . . milk glamorized and made even more readily digestible by the rennet enzyme in "Junket" Brand Rennet Powder and Tablets. They've got all the precious food values of milk itself. And they're easy as "Pooh!" to make, 'cause they need no eggs—no cooking.

Better give in, Mom . . . serve rennet-custards tonight and often to the whole family. A different color, different flavor, different topping every time!

Make RENNET-CUSTARDS with either:

"Junket Rennet" Powder—already sweetened, in six popular flavors: Vanilla, Chocolate, Lemon, Orange, Raspberry and Maple. At all grocers.

"Junket" Rennet Tablets—not sweetened or flavored—add sugar and flavor to taste. Also make delicious ice cream. At grocers and druggists.

We've got sugar troubles too...

That's why we can't make all you want of all our "Junket" Brand Food Products. But sometimes you can find "Junket" Freezing Mix and "Junket" Danish Dessert; and the minute we can get the "makin's," "Junket" Quick Fudge Mix will be back too. So keep on asking for them, won't you?

"JUNKET" BRAND
RENNET POWDER • RENNET TABLETS
FREEZING MIX • DANISH DESSERT
QUICK FUDGE MIX
FOOD PRODUCTS

If it isn't made by "The 'Junket' Folks"
It isn't the "Junket" Brand

FREE! First aid for nose-wipers, panty-changers, and all mothers! New booklet of "Double-Duty Menus and Recipes," full of time-saving ideas for feeding both adults and children. Get your copy and FREE TRIAL PACKAGE of "Junket" Rennet Tablets . . . just send coupon!

"JUNKET" is the trade-mark of Chr. Hansen's Laboratory, Inc., for its rennet and other food products, and is registered in the U. S. and Canada.

MAIL COUPON TODAY!

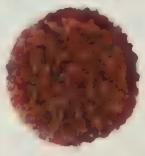
"The 'Junket' Folks"
Chr. Hansen's Laboratory, Inc., Dept. 24
Little Falls, N. Y. (In Canada, Toronto, Ont.)



Please send "Double-Duty Menus and Recipes" and FREE trial package of "Junket" Rennet Tablets to

Name.....
Address.....
City..... State.....

Our downstairs is "looking up" with Mohawk Foundation Colors

Our whole downstairs is blended into harmonious beauty . . . each room in itself and each with its neighbors . . . all coordinated by lovely new Mohawk Carpets. Mohawk's Foundation Colors are wonderful. Created by a famous color authority they have a "blending-in" quality which seems to make everything go together.

1. For our living room we chose this dusty rose carpet in Mohawk's new "lustre-carved" Wilton design called Raleigh . . . a delightful foundation indeed which has given refreshing accent to the gold and nutmeg overtones of our other appointments. Our salesman gave Mohawk's "Color Guide," a leaflet that makes selection easy.

2. For our dining room our choice was this soft blue in the same Raleigh pattern—a perfect foil for the grey walls and salmon rose draperies. Carpeted wall-to-wall it has given the room a new air of expansive luxury. It's a joy to know that our Mohawk's Balanced Construction means we can count on years of wear.

3. The hallway opens off the living room, and for it we chose a darker, harmonizing tone called rose cedar . . . and a heavier weave because the hall carpet gets so much more wear. I found that Mohawk makes every type of carpet—the only mill that does.

MOHAWK RUGS and CARPETS

Beauty that endures

MOHAWK CARPET MILLS, Inc. • AMSTERDAM, N. Y.

Their Home is Young and Gay

KEEPING HOUSE UNDER DIFFICULTIES IS JUST AN EXCITING CHALLENGE TO G-ANN'S SUNNY ENTHUSIASM!

PHOTOS BY STUART

"Get it in writing" is the effective G-Ann method of pinning her pep and zest down to real accomplishment. Thus, "Georgie's skedge" for the day—Bob's and Griff's too—is chalked up each morning on the family bulletin board. "There's no escaping once it's up there looking at you, and I love to make the check mark that says 'done!'"

Off with the door, on with some shelves, and Bob's clever hammer and saw transform a shallow, rather useless closet into a bookcase with wide thin drawers for their beloved scrapbooks. "The Feeneys," says Georgie, "will always need more room for books and records than clothes, I guess." Bob has made record cabinets from orange crates.

Stenciling on cloth is one of Georgie's new discoveries. She's happily at work now decorating some old-new window draperies, with a head full of future plans for tea towels and place mats to be stenciled.

By Judy Barry

"GREEN thumbs" is the happy phrase for describing the genius some folks have with growing things. But as far as I know, even the Greeks didn't have a word just right for expressing the way some women have with homes. Yet, nameless as it is, that art of making a little oasis of order, comfort and friendliness bloom around them wherever they go, no matter how short their stay or slim their budget, is a real talent, and Georgie Feeney is one of the lucky ones who have it in abundance. With it, she's made a dizzying succession of furnished rooms, bare apartments, hut houses and even a trailer feel like Home with a capital H to Bob, her husband, and their two-year-old, Griff.

Secret of her success is the fact that she's enthusiastic about every facet of life and living, especially her job as homemaker. The sparkly champagne quality of her enthusiasm for housekeeping makes everyone around her happy, too, makes even dun-colored, dirt-grimed walls seem rosy! Not that any walls which were going to be Georgie's would stay dun-colored for very long. She would have scrubbed and painted them to match her own gay spirits before the Feeneys had lived with them a week, and would have had a good time doing it too!

Her enthusiasm, however, bubbles up from a deep well of common sense, for she knows that while a "this will be fun" approach is half the battle in doing any job well, planning it intelligently, learning more about it constantly, are what make it keep on being fun.

Georgie's planning of both time and money is the "orchids on your budget" variety. There's nothing grim or constricting about it, yet it's wise and completely workable for them. Her work schedule is designed to dispatch all must-be-dones in the quickest, easiest manner possible, so there'll surely be room for all the want-to-do's. That, of course, is the kindly purpose of all plans and schedules and even budgets (a thing that it's awfully hard to make those who think they're just horrid words appreciate!).

"Get it in writing" is one of Georgie's firm directives to herself, her way of getting everything done when it should be. "If I don't," she confesses, "I'm just like the girl in the cartoon—the one with springs shooting out from her head like curls after a permanent!"

You know the feeling? Her memos to herself are very detailed—on a blackboard for home, in copious notebooks for marketing or trips downtown, even tables of contents pasted inside the lids of various suitcases and boxes. Her shopping notes for trips to town are really "road maps," planned to save time, steps and gas by mapping her route out in her head before she stirs from her desk, so that, with any luck, steps never need be retraced.

"Of course, I love to wander through the stores just mooching, but I have to be stern with myself about it—I just can t afford the time. And there's one consolation—lists and such are wonderful for the morale, I think. It makes you feel so efficient when you've finally worked through to a whole page of check marks!"

A firm believer in lighthearted housekeeping, Georgie's quick mind welcomes every new "how to do it better" idea she finds in (Continued on Page 244)

Up they go! Believe it or not, the stenciled curtains were made of an aged sheet which had worn thin down the middle. Starched and tinted, they look fresh as spring. The fabric's beautifully drapable.

CHOPSTICKS AND COOKBOOKS

(Continued from Page 193)

and mixture is well heated. Serve with fluffy boiled rice. Serves 4.

G-ANN'S ALMOND COOKIES

(This recipe is really Russian. It's called Lepeshki. It was given G-Ann by a friend. "I didn't have a recipe for Chinese almond cookies," she said, "so I use this and decorate the tops with blanched almonds. No one knows the difference.")

Cream together 1 cup butter or margarine and ½ cup confectioner's sugar. Add ½ teaspoon salt, ½ teaspoon almond flavoring and ¼ teaspoon vanilla. Work in 2 cups flour thoroughly. Chill. Roll in small balls, flatten them and decorate tops with whole or half blanched almonds. Bake on greased cooky sheets in moderately slow oven, 325° F., twenty minutes. Makes 4 dozen one-and-one-half-inch cookies.

And here are two other favorite company menus:

Spaghetti With Meat Sauce
Green-Salad Bowl
Italian Bread
Fruit Platter With Sherbet Balls
Demitasse

Tomato Juice
Casserole Feeney
Green Salad
Ice Cream Chocolate Mint Sauce
or
Baked Alaska
or
Strawberry Shortcake

*CASSEROLE FEENEY

If G-Ann expects a crowd, she makes up three casseroles—two for company, one to warm over next day or to give to a friend, if the mamma is on the sick list. A nice idea, don't you think? This casserole is a put-together you can easily reproduce. It's one of G-Ann's stand-bys for such affairs.

Make up 1 pint good medium cream sauce. Cook and drain 1 six-ounce package noodles. Rinse with cold water. Have ready some diced cooked chicken or 1 seven-ounce can tuna fish drained of oil and flaked, 1 small onion, chopped, and 1 green pepper, chopped. In a greased casserole, put a layer of noodles, then a layer of chicken or tuna fish, raw chopped green pepper and onion and part of 1 can mushrooms drained. Have three or four layers, adding sauce as you go and seasoning with extra salt and pepper. Top with butter crumbs or paprika. Bake in moderate oven, 350° F., until bubbly hot. This may be prepared in advance and kept in refrigerator until time to bake.

Chocolate mint sauce. G-Ann makes her own chocolate sauce or buys it in a can. She serves it hot on ice cream with a little peppermint flavoring added for piquancy.

Another dessert for company supper. Here's an idea which I consider quite a trick. Instead of making plain floating island (chilled boiled custard topped with sweetened meringue poached in milk), Georgina Feeney tops the custard with chocolate meringue.

CHOCOLATE MERINGUE

Beat 2 egg whites until stiff but not dry. Add 5 tablespoons confectioner's sugar a spoonful at a time—beating after each addition. Melt 1 square unsweetened chocolate over hot water. Cool to lukewarm. Drizzle into meringue a few drops at a time or in a fine stream so as not to thin the meringue. Beat a turn or two as it is added. Add a pinch of salt and ½ teaspoon vanilla. Top the custard with spoonfuls of the chocolate fluff.

WILSON'S B-V "MEAT MAGIC" for STEWS

by George Rector
Food Consultant to Wilson & Co.

Brown meat, salt lightly, cover with water and cook until tender, adding vegetables for last 45 minutes. Thicken and add Wilson's B-V to taste—from 1 to 2 tsp. per lb. of meat. Super taste. . . . Wilson's B-V is a delicious blend of concentrated meat extract and selected vegetable flavors.

Makes it taste better

Home Made Lemon Pie that's My-T-Fine

For a special treat, delight your family with a luscious lemon pie made with My-T-Fine Lemon Pie Filling. So quick and easy . . . just follow the simple directions on the package. They'll love it!

5 delicious My-T-Fine desserts
Lemon Pie Filling
Chocolate
Butterscotch
Vanilla
Nut Chocolate

ROOM TO GROW IN

(Continued from Page 186)

hideaway treasure chest if the room's occupant is a girl. Notice particularly the nest of tables, all of which are useful at any age. The low ones for letter cards, cutting out, reading or games for the small child; the higher ones for study or hobby work when he is older. There is a height for every age, and the remaining ones are usable and convenient as lamp or book tables in numerous places.

The pin-up board, to hold pictures for the young child, becomes a bulletin board for the school-ager, and a handy place for sports clippings, news items and sketches in the teens. Raise it to eye level, of course, when the child outgrows its height.

To help you adapt the room attractively to your child's age, here are some specific suggestions. The room as shown is suitable for either a girl or a boy until the child is five years of age, then the baby bed is changed to youth size. Later, replace the bed with a single or three-quarter size, or twin beds if there is room. Of course you may use a pink or blue scheme if you prefer it to our yellow and turquoise, but the scheme shown is more versatile than the pink or blue, when you are ready to make changes.

> Do you wish people to speak well of you? Don't yourself.
> —BLAISE PASCAL.

For a boy 11 to 16. Upholstery and hangings: blue-and-white-striped ticking or red, green or gold cotton duck or sailcloth. Choose the color that goes best with your rug and painted walls. Use a solid-color candlewick spread to match your preferred scheme. Keep the backgrounds neutral in ivory or a light tint of your new color. Change the picture to a good print of horses, birds or dogs. Add an adjustable reading light.

For a girl 11 to 16. Upholstery and hangings: pink, blue or green gingham, plain or checked, in a color harmonizing with the rug you already have. For a particularly feminine child or in a period house, use buttercup or rose-sprig muslin, with bedspread of the same material, quilted. Change picture to a romantic fairytale print or the child's own painting. Keep walls and woodwork a tint in harmony with chosen color.

For a boy 16 to 21. Curtains, upholstery and slip covers of rough cotton in maroon, emerald, Canton blue or gay Scotch plaid. Paint walls and woodwork neutral beige or cream. Inside of closets may match the fabric color, such as the maroon or emerald. Both the rug and the bedspread will probably be changed at this time and should match or pleasantly contrast the new fabric color. Add a big lamp and a pull-up chair. This time the picture should be chosen by the boy himself.

For a girl 16 to 21. These are the dream years when most girls want romantic decorations in their bedrooms. Most satisfactory are slip covers, curtains and spreads that will launder. For swish, use eyelet embroidery and organdy, threaded with soft-toned ribbons. For general good style use pastel chintz or flowered sateen with pleatings or ruffles finishing the edges. Add another chair and pottery or crystal lamps. The walls and woodwork can be the same color as the background of the chintz, or lighter. Pick up one of the flower colors for the closet lining. With the white eyelet embroidery use a pastel wall or flowered wallpaper. For a modern effect try coral, chartreuse, turquoise or deep lime in a plain fabric, against neutral or matching walls. Linen rugs in soft plain colors are ideal for all youths' bedrooms.

YOU'LL BE SEEING

MORE AND MORE OF

THIS FAMOUS SPREAD

AT YOUR GROCER'S SOON!

THE SANDWICH SPREAD OF THE NATION
Branded with the devil...but fit for the gods!

Amazing DORMEYER! Mixes Better Cakes in 3 to 5 Minutes!

Toss everything into the Dormeyer bowl—flick a switch—don't dare turn away! Dormeyer-mixed cakes are ready for the oven in a jiffy . . . mixed full of light velvety-textured melting smoothness you'd work an hour to get by hand! Enjoy it Today—thousands of Dormeyer's are

NOW IN RETAIL STORES EVERYWHERE!

Dormeyer—the First name in mixers—has specially positioned beaters that feed the batter through one into the other—instead of between. Lifts and folds the mixture—blends lightness, smoothness, IN! Magic Mix-Arm lets you move beaters from side to center of bowl, while it's mixing! Portable mixing-head lifts off—use it anywhere in kitchen! Save 4 minutes out of 5 with Dormeyer mixing—and have a better cake! 27 Amazing features . . . 3 kitchen tested speeds . . . with two bowls and jiffy-quick juicer.

$20.95 DENVER, WEST, $21.95

DORMEYER CORPORATION
4300 N. KILPATRICK AVE., CHICAGO 41, ILLINOIS

WE SAY "VELVET BLEND"
. . . you'll say "magic"!

Creamy-smooth Carnation Milk is wonderful for cooking. It velvet-blends perfectly with other foods, in all milk-rich dishes. It whips . . . it freezes . . . it's flavorful . . . it's economical and convenient. Try this recipe . . . and see!

GOLDEN EGGS 'n' PEAS, CARNATION
A meal-in-one "find"—for Lent!

⅓ cup butter
⅓ cup flour
1 tall can Carnation Milk mixed with ¾ cup water
¾ teaspoon salt
¾ teaspoon Worcestershire sauce
Dash white pepper
6 hard-cooked eggs, in wedges
1 cup cooked peas

For the cream sauce—also perfect with any fish, poultry, meat, or vegetable—heat butter in double boiler, add flour, blend thoroughly and add milk mixture gradually, stirring constantly; add seasoning and cook over hot water 5 minutes or till well thickened. Add eggs and peas and heat over hot water for 5 more minutes. Serve on toast and tomato rounds. Garnish with parsley. Serves 6 to 8.

WHEREVER MILK OR CREAM IS CALLED FOR, USE CARNATION
THE WORLD'S LARGEST-SELLING BRAND OF EVAPORATED MILK.

"From Contented Cows"

© CARNATION CO.

FOR MUSIC with a velvet blend: the new "Contented Hour," Monday evenings. For daytime drama—"Lone Journey," Mon. through Fri. See newspapers for NBC stations.

FOR BABY ask your doctor about a formula prepared with safe, nourishing, digestible Carnation Milk, fortified with vitamin D—universally approved for babies and children.

To give your house that "lived-in-look", try decorating it with four small children.

WHY MOTHER'S AGE IS SHOWING

By Hilda Cole Espy

Author's Note—Two years ago the LADIES' HOME JOURNAL published a piece of mine about my children, entitled Three's a Crowd in Seventeen Months. Since then Mona and Freddy, the twins, and Joanna, the next in line, have been joined by a fourth little girl, Cassin. They are all under five. Though the years of their babyhood have been wartime years when help was scarce, we've had some wonderful times together. Managing a houseful of tots, however, must be put down as an extremely rugged occupation. To prepare rookie mammas for The Works and to amuse the vets (I hope), I have written down one aspect of my experience, showing how sometimes all your troubles can indeed be little ones. Please don't forget that I dote on my children most of the time. But not always.

—H. C. E.

LITTLE children from two to four years of age speak the English language. They may say "alligator" instead of "elevator," as Freddy does, or describe a tall horse as a "high horse," which is Joey's phrase, but you know what they mean. Still, the fact that they speak the same language and are our closest relatives does not always mean that they share the same world. There are many wonderful, sweet moments when the two worlds merge, when mother and child look out a window and watch the first snow of winter drifting down and are lifted by the same ineffable excitement, or when a drowsy, warm little child snuggles against an equally drowsy and peaceful parent. There are other, perplexing moments, when mother and child are not on the same beam in any sense of the word. At these times, the little one's actions seem beyond understanding.

There is, for instance, a tot's way of seldom using any toy or household furniture in the way it was intended to be used. A little girl will tuck a wet dishrag into her pretty new doll bed, and mop up the kitchen sink with Raggedy Ann. There is the little one's absolute inability to grasp when a grownup is weary or ill or simply beginning to go a little mad from confusion. And then there is the child's interpretation of orders or advice.

Our old friend, Doctor Dorothy, whom the children adore as a third grandmother, sometimes visits us on week ends and always brings the children wonderful presents. Mona, Freddy and Joey have been wont to race down the flagstones to meet her, screeching, "What did you brought me?"

A short time ago, I decided that this crude welcome should be revised. So I called my brood on the mat.

"Now, Mona and Freddy," I addressed the twins, the eldest, now four-going-on-five. "When Doctor Dorothy comes this afternoon you are not to ask her whether she brought you a present. You are to hug her, tell her hello, and that you're glad to see her," I expatiated. And then I did my cross-examination. "Now, Freddy, what are you going to say when you see Doctor Dorothy?"

"Hello," said Freddy. "How are you?"

I CONGRATULATED her. "That's fine. And Mona, what are you going to say?"

"Thank you."

I was surprised. "Thank you for what?"

"Thank you for my present," said Mona composedly.

The other day Freddy got into some candy. I dropped to one knee and took her by the shoulders and looked her earnestly in the eye.

"Now, honey," I said, "any time you want candy, you must ask me first. Understand?"

Freddy nodded and looked like Miss Goody Gumdrops in person. I arose to go about my business.

"Mommy," Freddy said, "may I have a piece of candy?"

"No, dear," I replied. "Not just now. You must wait until after supper."

I was startled, a few moments later, to come across Freddy happily munching candy.

"Freddy Espy!" I protested. "I told you ——"

"You said to ask you," Freddy replied reasonably, "and I did."

There is an enormous breach between adults and children on the subject of tidiness. It makes most adults weary to look at a room which is upside-down. I was shocked to the verge of idiocy the other day when I ran across an article by a woman in the interior-decorating field. How to achieve "that lived-in-look" was the burden of her message. That this could be considered an achievement caused me to grip the arms of my chair for support and ease myself carefully into it.

"Child's play, my dear," I muttered. It comes natural to my gifted poltergeists. Daughter Mona, when "cutting out," can make a rug look as if it had spent the night in Times Square during a frenzied welcome for Douglas MacArthur. Add Freddy's books and water colors to Mona's snippings, then Joey's blocks, toys and assorted rusty spoons, and finally Cassie's pants and shoes, which she loves to take off, and her graham-cracker crumbs, and you needn't worry about that lived-in look. This trend in interior decorating, if it is one, was certainly tailor-made for the Espy family.

PHOTO BY RICE

Mona, Joanna, Freddy; Baby Cassie in front.

Nothing I ever read or heard prepared me for the untidiness of tots. Decorators love to do nurseries for children. But what characterizes a real nursery is not so much the cuddly Teddy bear on the ruffled pillow as a dizzy assortment of litter that would frighten a junkman. I picked up one item just now to illustrate what I mean. It is a mason jar—filled with sand, a chair from a doll's house, a wet rag, a red bead and a broken bubble pipe. I don't know what sort of composition that might be. Remind me to ask Salvador Dali.

And the grownups who make children's toys are as unrealistic as the decorators. I can never yearn over an adorable blond doll, dressed in ruffled organdy, without visualizing her ruined and horrible like The Picture of Dorian Gray. When Mona, Freddy and Joey get their hands on a new doll, all wearing apparel is immediately stripped off. The organdy apron is wrung out in mud and water and used to wash the doll's face. When the last snow melts in the spring we shall find dolly's shoes and her pretty picture hat.

